The Hitakarini, of the 26th August, says in its leader:—From the speech which Mr. Montagu gave in the House of Commons three days before his appointment as Secretary of State, his broad-heartedness has become plain. His appointment has gratified the whole of India. Indians are very happy to hear that in response to an invitation from His Excellency the Viceroy, Mr. Montagu is coming to this country to enquire into the political condition of India personally. It is not possible to decide what has induced the Viceroy to invite Mr. Montagu at this critical juncture. It appears that Sir V. Chirol and Mr. Curtis are to accompany him. How far these gentlemen are the benefactors to India is plain from their past career. The public fear that the hopes entertained by the Indians may be blighted by Mr. Montagu coming to visit India with these gentlemen accompanying him, and that Mr. Montagu's angle of vision may be influenced by the misrepresentations of the authorities. But there is no reason to fear so soon. It is to be believed that he is coming not merely in response to an invitation from a Viceroy who gives his assent to the policy pursued by the Provincial Governments in suppressing constitutional political agitation. The scheme sent by the Viceroy without consulting the people's representatives, and the scheme of the Congress and the Moslim League reached the Secretary of State. It is to be believed that he saw that the two schemes were opposed to each other and intended to go over to India to do justice after consulting personally with the Government of India and the representatives of the people. There is nothing absurd in saying that the present bad time has made the people mistake a rope for a serpent. The commotion in the country testifies to the fact that the authorities are paining the minds of the people by incessantly enforcing perverse laws in an improper way. The actions of the authorities are the cause of the increase day by day of the agitation in the country. . . The country has understood that at this time the Indians should follow the advice of Commander Wedgewood. The people are full of hope that the British Empire which having given the hand of protection to the Italians against the Austrians and to the people of Poland against Russia, is waging a great war, will not, as stated by Commander Wedgewood, incur the bad reputation of not granting self-government to India which is under its rule. The people believe that Mr. Montagu will certainly carry out the traditions of the Empire. Only the influence of the authorities should not prevail upon him. We cordially welcome Mr. Montagu. We hope he will, before he arrives in India pass an order annulling the internments. The country cannot become an abode of peace until it attains the reforms suggested by the Congress. HITAKARINI, Ellore, Aug. 26th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 5th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit to India.

Referring to the proposed visit of Mr. Montagu to India, the Dravida Patrika, of the 5th September, points to the existence of two parties here, one representing the views of the Congress, the Muslim League and the Home Rule League and demanding the reforms suggested in the memorandum of the nineteen and the other being of opinion that this country will not be fit for Home Rule, unless the distinctions of caste and creed existing here disappear, which however is reported by the paper as being against the history of the world and observes that, as each party will press its views upon Mr. Montagu when he goes here, he should use extraordinary skill in sifting matters for himself and understanding the real needs of the people.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 7th, 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 7th September, reproduces the above.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Aug. 29th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit

The Desamata, of the 29th August, says:—The repressive policy of the Government, the internments imposed, and the indiscriminate application of the Defence of India Act have greatly incensed India. The people have protested against the policy and sent telegrams to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State. In spite of this, the Government have disregarded the opinion of the people, and have not given up their narrow-minded policy. This has led the people to come to the unanimous opinion that passive resistance is the only remedy for this state of things and that there is no use if it is not adopted. In such a state of commotion, the announcement of Mr. Montagu has given us new hopes. It is not far from the truth to say that the present agitation in India has to a large extent induced Mr. Montagu to come to India. But we fear that Mr. Montagu may be influenced by Mr. Curtis, who recently tried to bring India under the Government of the Colonies also, and by the wise Sir V. Chirol who is showing stepmotherly love to the Indians, and by the Indian bureaucracy which may thrust its views upon him.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Aug. 25th, 1917.

The visit of Mr. Montagu.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 25th August, writes under this heading:—Mr. Montagu is a Jew, is noble-minded and is a lover of liberty and has respect for India. When it was known that Mr. Chamberlain resigned his office all well-wishers of India naturally expressed their wish that Mr. Montagu might succeed him. Their wish has been realised. When the appointment of Mr. Montagu as Secretary of State was announced all the Indian papers shouted applause. . . When the Mesopotamia question was discussed in the House of Commons, Mr. Montagu rose and said that it was not due to the defect of any one individual, but that the weakness of the machinery of the India Government was the main cause of the failure. The India Government was neither responsible to the Parliament on one side nor to the people of India on the other. The India Council is making the Secretary of State irresponsible and keeps him away from the supervision of the Parliament. . . He also said that in the matter of the political administration of India the responsibility of the Parliament must gradually be reduced and the powers of the Indians increased. Even Mrs. Besant who is undergoing the punishment of internment has never criticised the bureaucracy so severely. If this very Montagu had not delivered his speech in the House of Commons but had come as the editor of New India and delivered his speech in Madras he also would have been subjected to the punishment of internment. But fortunately Mr. Montagu is appointed the head of the bureaucracy to uphold the cause of subject nations. . . He said that before determining the reforms he had to come to India to consult with the official authorities and the representatives of the people in this country. What good news! He seems to have been taken into his consideration the fact of the India Government sending their scheme of reforms secretly to the Secretary of State without consulting the representatives of the people . . . and then determined to formulate a scheme adopted to the wants of people after coming here personally and consulting the popular leaders and discussing the questions with the official authorities. All this is, undoubtedly, a matter for congratulation.

TAMILIAN, Madras, Aug. 29th, 1917.

The hardships of the Panchamas.

59. The Tamilian, of the 29th August, dwells at length upon the hard life of the Panchamas in villages, trodden down by the overbearing Aryans, and, referring to the absence of a member in the Legislative Council to voice forth their grievances, suggests that a representative can well be chosen to safeguard the interests of these Panchamas from among the Indian Buddhists or the Protestant Indian Christians. The paper also advocates the grant of lands on darkhast to these poor people from the extensive poramboke lands available in the country and adds that, as the village officials are all of them caste people and will therefore stand in the way of such lands being given, the Government should hereafter at least evince an interest in this matter.

Weights and measures.

60. The Hindu Nesan, of the 5th September, dilates upon the inconvenience caused to the public by there being a wide difference between the weights and measures in use in different places in this country, and suggests that one of the reforms to be introduced after the end of the war should be the wiping away of this difference and the introduction of a uniform scale of weights and measures throughout the country.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 5th, 1917.

The prospect of the release of the interned.

61. Quoting the question asked by the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah on this subject and the reply of Sir William Vincent thereto, the Swadesamitran, of the 6th September, observes:—This reply gives room for every one to expect that the fetters placed on the liberty of Mrs. Besant by the repressive measures will be cut in twain by the Government. As it has been stated that the other patriots, who have been subjected to internment orders on the plea that they indulged in violent methods of political agitation, will also be released, every one will deem the policy now enunciated by the Government to be a new one and a turn for the better. The reason assigned by the Government for this change of policy deserves to be noted. It was observed that, in adopting this course, the Government were actuated by the confident hope that our patriots would help to preserve a calm and peaceful atmosphere in this country, by abstaining from violent and unconstitutional political agitation, in order to enable Mr. Montagu during his approaching visit to consider about important political reforms and problems and come to a conclusion. Every one knows that those excellent patriots, who are now in internment, never did, nor do ever intend to, indulge in such violent methods of agitation and therefore the argument can have no meaning except that it comes in hand as an official explanation. The use of expressions like these lead also to many unpleasant results. In the reply of Sir Willian Vincent, the hope is expressed that no revolutionary or violent agitation will be resorted to until the end of the war. Is it then the opinion of the Government that there will be no harm in committing such hostile acts after the end of the war? Whatever may be the view of the Government, we will assure them that all people agitating for Home Rule and their eminent leaders will never do any act or resort to any agitation, which will be inimical to the stability of the British Government. The Indians always adopt only quiet methods. Therefore there is no room whatever for the people or their leaders being suspected in this matter. We are not going to anticipate here the joy and enthusiasm that will prevail in the country on hearing that Mrs. Besant will be freed from the unnecessary and unjust restrictions imposed on her and will, after regaining her health, once again be the leader of the Home Rulers. But if the speech delivered by the Viceroy yesterday is an indication of a change in the attitude of the Government towards Mrs. Besant and the Home Rule agitation conducted by her, he should do two things. Firstly, he should curb the highhandedness of the bureaucracy. Secondly, he should put a stop to the mischief of several Anglo-Indian papers, which give these bureaucrats an immense support and provoke their rancour. At the conclusion of his speech, the Viceroy appealed to all classes of people to co-operate and forget all animosities. Though this advice is unnecessary to our people, they will readily act upon it and be prepared to co-operate in the mighty task before them. We expect the Government to adopt all possible means to make Anglo-Indians and those subject to their influence also do so.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 6th, 1917.

Referring to the same subject, the Hindu Nesan, of the 6th September, observes:—We would welcome this as a happy news, as it surely indicates the speedy release of Mrs. Besant and her colleagues. We hope this will become a fact and the news of the release will be received with gratification throughout India. If this takes place and the interned persons in other provinces are also released, we can surely expect that undesirable methods like passive resistance will be given up. Then we can also expect political discussion to be carried on, as it suits the present juncture, on constitutional lines. We do not think the Government of India made the announcement regarding Mrs. Besant yesterday on their own responsibility. They should have done it only in pursuance of the wishes of the Secretary of State for India. It bespeaks the wise statesmanship of the Secretary of State that he should have gauged the present situation well and asked the Government of India to make this announcement. The Government of India should translate their speech of yesterday into action and benefit the country thereby.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 5th, 1917.

The Home Rule flag.

62. Referring to the hoisting of Home Rule flags at the premises of Home Rule Leagues in several places, the Swadesamitran, of the 5th September, writes:—Hoisting of flags is a practice which has been observed in all countries and at all times. A flag is hoisted to signify the faith of a particular party. When an idol is taken in procession with a standard bearing the representation of the figure of Nandi (the bull) carried in front of it, that standard signifies only the Saivite faith but does not signify any hatred towards the Vaishnavite faith. Similarly the Home Rule flag represents only the tenets of the Home Rule Leagues but no hatred towards the British Rule. Just as the flag carried by a party going to the battlefield reminds every individual therein of the object of his party and inspires in him an enthusiasm for work, and just as these men will not allow themselves to be dispossessed of it so long as they are alive, the Home Rule flag also reminds the members of the Home Rule League of their desire to acquire Home Rule and infuses in them an enthusiasm to work for its attainment. In the procession conducted on the 16th August 1917 in Kumbakōnam, the Home Rule flag was carried with the Union Jack just above it, and this shows clearly that the object of the Home Rule League is the attainment of Home Rule under the British rule.

MAHAVIKATA DUTAN, Madras, Sep. 8th, 1917.

Home Rule flags.

The Mahavikata Dutan, of the 8th September, reproduces in Tamil a summary of the protest made by the Bar Association, Erode, against the action of the authorities in connection with the hoisting of these flags, which appears in New India of the 5th September 1917.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 8th, 1917.

Referring to the hoisting of a Home Rule flag by an Honorary Sub-Magistrate of Tiruvannāmalai at his residence on the very day a Home Rule League was started at the place, and to the hoisting of similar flags on the house of every Brahman Home Ruler in the locality, a correspondent writes to the Dravidan, of the 8th September, as follows:—Why have not these Home Rulers, who are aware that the Home Rule flags in Coimbatore were hauled down by the District Magistrate of Coimbatore, realised that their flags too will receive a similar treatment at the hands of the Government? Our benign Government should come forward to put down, at the very beginning, the efforts of the Brahmans, who create the Home Rule agitation in this peaceful town. It is indeed a wonder that one of the Honorary Sub-Magistrates of this place, who has, for two days, been flying the Home Rule flag alone, now flies over his residence the Union Jack along with the Home Rule flag, both these flags being tied to a pole in such a way as to occupy an equal position. Would the mere flying of the two flags in the same position cause satisfaction to the Government? The Government may not, perhaps, take exception to the flying of the Home Rule flag below the Union Jack; but the Home Rulers should bear in mind that the Government would deem even this objectionable, as it is likely to create excitement in the minds of the ordinary people.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 7th, 1917.

Home Rule flags.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 7th September, says:—It is said that the members of the Home Rule League, Guntūr, have met to consider the question of the Home Rule flag and that 17 persons have resolved to hoist it. There are accordingly some flags waving in the air in the town.

The Desamata, of the 29th August, refers to the removal of the Home Rule flag hoisted by Mrs. Besant and observes:—

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Aug. 29th, 1917.

The Home Rule flag.

The order of the District Magistrate of Coimbatore has roused the feeling of the Home Rulers. Members of Home Rule Leagues in Salem and other places are adopting resolutions recommending the hoisting of a Home Rule flag on every house.

Referring to the Coimbatore Home Rule flag case the Kerala Patrika, of the 8th September, observes:—Such matters should be considered only as a sort of amusement, and no great harm will result from them. We think that no noise will be made about the Home Rule flag and matters connected therewith, if the authorities treat it as insignificant.

KERALA PATRIKA, Calicut, Sep. 8th, 1917.

The Home Rule flag case.

68. The Dravida Patrika, of the 5th September, writes:—Forty-five years ago, silk and silk goods of the value of 155 lakhs of rupees were exported from India. Silk industry was then in a flourishing condition in our country. But the industry gradually began to decline and silk goods worth only about 15 lakhs of rupees were exported during the last year. Further, forign silk goods have also begun to flood our markets and in the year 1914 silk goods worth 463 lakhs of rupees were imported from foreign countries and sold here. It is not so much the want of demand in this country for these goods that accounts for the decline of this industry here, as its inability to compete with the silk industry in foreign countries. It is, therefore, necessary that the Government of India should conduct proper enquiries into this matter, and take the necessary steps to improve this industry.

DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 5th, 1917.

Silk industry.

64. Adverting to the appointment of a Brahman as a temporary clerk on Rs. 20 in the office of the Collector of Madura, the Madura correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 8th September, observes:—All the six applicants for the post are men who have passed the School Final Examination, and three of these are non-Brahmans. The Collector seems to have forgotten the observations made by Sir Alexander Cardew on the 27th July last He has not taken into consideration the complaint justly made by the non-Brahmans that they are not largely entertained in Government service. Perhaps he is not aware that in other places too the Government have paid attention to our complaints and complied with our request. While the number of Brahmans in the Madura Collectorate is already large, it is not a matter for satisfaction that one more Brahman should have been appointed.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 8th, 1917.

Employment of Non-Brahmans in Government service.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 7th September, contains in Telugu the letter of Mr. A. Sabhapathi Pillai, appearing in English in the Hindu, of the 7th September, under the heading "Non-Brahmans and their self-constituted leaders—an appeal for a new organisation". The paper remarks:—Mr. Sabhapathi Pillai contends that the non-Brahman movement, conducted by Doctor Nair and Rao Bahadur Thiagaraya Chetti, is opposed to the general opinion of the non-Brahmans, and that it is necessary to constitute a new non-Brahman Association to make this plain. The Non-Brahman Conference held at Coimbatore has decided against the views of Doctor Nair. The proposed new association will make it plain that there is no difference of opinion among the Indians regarding political reforms. The Indians will unitedly place their views before Mr. Montagu. We hope that the endeavours to constitute a new association will be crowned with success.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 7th, 1917.

Non-Brahmans.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th September, represents the Modern Review to have said:—We do not say that all non-Brahmans in India are opposed to Home Rule. Even in the Madras Presidency where the non-Brahman movement has had its origin, all non-Brahmans are not opposed to Home Rule. Most of those who have joined the non-Brahman movement do say that they require Home Rule to some extent. The resolutions passed at the Coimbatore Non-Brahman Conference testify to this . . It is very strange that the organisors of the Madras non-Brahman movement have not tried to put an end to the untouching spirit, the monopolising spirit, and the high-handedness of those who rule the country at present and the Eurasians. . . Some contend that if Home Rule is granted, the depressed classes will be subjected to greater social high-handedness. But we do not think that such a thing will happen. . . Even those who advocate a preferential position for the Anglo-Indians cannot but admit that there is much social high-handedness entailed by such preference, for various reasons.

Non-Brahmans and Home Rule.

66. The Swadesamitran and the Hindu Nesan, of the 10th and 11th September, respectively, reproduce in Tamil a statement on this subject signed by several merchants, bankers, lawyers and other professional men residing in the city and in the mufussal and belonging to the various non-Brahman communities, expressing their opinion that the system of reforms propounded by the Congress and Muslim League should be pressed on the attention of the authorities for adoption in its entirety subject to the recognition of the principle of adequate representation of the various communities of this province in the Legislative and other councils.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Aug. 25th, 1917.

The Non-Brahman Conference.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 25th August, referring to the Non-Brahman Conference held at Coimbatore, observes:—It is very commendable that the conference should with a united voice support the resolution that compulsory primary education should be given. The Indians cannot forget the attempts made by Gokhale for primary education and be ungrateful to him though he is a Brahman. Will the Anglo-Indians who denounce the Congress as a congregation of Brahman lawyers now at least lend their ear to the voice of the Non-Brahman Conference. Of all the resolutions passed by this Conference the most important is that of self-government. . . They were one with the Congress in asking for a responsible self-government and for offices which train them up for self-government to be given to the Indians after the war. . . Some of the reforms proposed by them are even more drastic than those proposed by the Congress. It is commendable that the non-Brahmans should wish for such changes as have not been desired even by the Home Rulers who are found fault with as demanding self-government all at once. . . This conference said that the departments of education, health, agriculture, co-operation and registration should entirely be under the control of the non-official members in the Imperial as well as Provincial Legislative Councils. One of them should be elected as president who with a few other members should form a body of ministers and administer the affairs of the said departments, the Government not having any authority over the said ministry. Thus it would be a government of the Indians that manages those departments. . . In this case the said conference has undoubtedly outstripped even the congress. . . They agreed to granting complete liberty to the Municipal and Local board bodies. In this matter also they concurred with the congress. As regards posts under Government service they unreservedly disapproved of the proposals made by the Public Services Commission. It is commendable that resolutions should have been passed as regards fulfilling the desires of the people, to reduce the salaries of high appointments, and to transfer to the Indians the offices now exclusively in the enjoyment of the Europeans. We are obliged to spend thousands of rupees as salaries paid to Collectors, Judges and Board Members. If Indians are appointed for the posts we need only spend half or even a third of the amount now spent. If these changes are brought into force, the necessity for an increase of taxation will considerably be diminished. . . On an examination of all these resolutions our opponents may learn, now at least, that there is none in this country who may be said to be really opposed to Home Rule. . . and that, whatever pranks the Anglo-Indians may play relying on these slight differences the Indians are Indians.

67. The Swadesamitran, of the 10th September, also reproduces in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting held at Tiruppur on the 8th idem, under the auspices of the local Home Rule League, when Mr. A. Ranganatha Mudaliyar, B.A., B.L., late of the Provincial Civil Service, who presided over the meeting, is reported to have opened the Home Rule free reading room and library. The proceedings of the meeting appear in detail in the issue of the Hindu, dated the 10th idem.

Political activities at Tiruppur

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 10th, 1917.

68. The Swadesamitran, of the 11th September, reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Capital of Calcutta on the speech of His Excellency the Viceroy regarding the proposed release of Mrs. Besant. These comments appear in the Hindu of the 10th idem.

The proposed release of Mrs. Besant.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 11th, 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 7th September, contains the following in English:—The Rangoon Times, commenting on the Government of India's offer to release Mrs. Besant on certain conditions, says:—If His Excellency Lord Pentland be a man of spirit his resignation is inevitable; for it is clear whether Mrs. Besant accepts or rejects the condition, Lord Pentland and his advisers have been thrown over by Simla, whose action will deepen the suspicion, that whatever Lord Hardinge may have been, Lord Chelmsford is no better.

The proposed release of Mrs. Besant.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 7th, 1917.

Mrs. Besant can now attend the Congress and preside over its deliberations with all added glory of a conqueror before whom Simla and Whitehall alike tremble. The anmesty while the struggle is still in being is an admission of weakness which encourages the disaffected to persist in the hope of granting their desire. In no other light than this can the Government's action be viewed. The step is a disastrous one in offering the release on any conditions whatever to Mrs. Besant and her co-workers; and the Andhrapatrika, of the 8th September, contains a Telugu version of the above.

The Lokopakari and the Prapanchamitran, of the 10th and the 11th September, respectively, write:—The reply of Sir William Vincent to the question of the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah regarding the attitude of the Government about the release of Mrs. Besant and others shows that the Government have calmed down a bit, and this may be attributed to many causes, such as the numerous questions asked in the Parliament about the internment of Mrs. Besant, her appeal to the Privy Council, the intense excitement in India on account of the internment, the decision of the Home Rulers to resort to passive resistance and the prospective visit of Mr. Montagu to India. Anyhow it augurs well for our country that the Government did not deem it to be derogatory to their prestige to change their order. The Viceroy himself has stated that the internment orders will be cancelled. What will the Anglo-Indians, the Anglo-Indian papers and those of the short-sighted non-Brahmans, who joined them, do now? We hope the Home Rulers will appreciate the spirit in which the Viceroy has taken this step, and seek peaceful ways of getting their grievances redressed, avoiding all unnecessary agitation. The release of Mrs. Besant will be received with ecstasy throughout India As this is the time for India to acquire several privileges, all the Indians should, of necessity, stand united. Popular leaders are trying to prejudice public interests by giving vent to private animosities. This will only help the bureaucrats and clog the efforts of the people. These will themselves prove to be the traitors to our country. All such men should be avoided.

Prospect of the release of the interned.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, Sep. 10th. 1917. and PRAPANCHAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 11th, 1917.

Referring to the pronouncement made by the Viceroy on the question of the release of Mrs. Besant, the Dravidapatrika, of the 12th September, says:—Though this pronouncement implies a condition precedent to the release of Mrs. Besant and her colleagues, there is no doubt whatever that she will be released soon. The decision now come to by the Government will really raise them in the eyes of the people. It is stated that this is due to the interference of Mr. Montagu. Whether this is true or not, the release will be received with immense joy by the people and celebrated by them as a festival. This will also increase the love of the people for the Government and make it possible for the popular leaders and the Government discussing about the reforms together. The Government of India, who have brought about this result, deserve the gratitude of the people in a way.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 7th, 1917.

The Brahmans and Home Rule.

69. A correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 7th September, says that the one thing prejudicial to them which the Varnashramadharma tigers have been screening from the Dravidians is the fact that they have given up the principles of the dharma which they preach, and that the four stages of life which they follow now are acquiring English education, getting into (Government) service, striving for Home Rule and acquiring it, and observes:—Are not the study of the vedas and the performance of yogas (sacrifices) and other vedic rites the duties of the Brahmans? Why should they then interfere in political matters? Even if they acquire Home Rule, as they expect to, are they entitled to be the rulers? When valiant princes like the Raja of Kuruppam, who are eminent Kshatriyas by caste and who live contentedly under the English rule, say that they are not fit to have swaraj and keep quiet, why should these "Brahman jackals" alone howl for swaraj? O Dravidian brethren! What will happen will. The dog that barks will not bite. Do not be afraid in the least. We will have good time soon. Do not despair.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 10th, 1917.

Non-Brahmans and Home Rule.

A correspondent writing to the Dravidan, of the 10th September, criticising the policy of this paper regarding Home Rule, observes that, with all the efforts made by the people, primary education has not been introduced and indigenous industries have not been developed and that the Government, who have not helped the people in this direction till now, cannot be expected to render the necessary help in this matter hereafter. He concludes with the statement that the acquisition of Home Rule would secure these things for the people and that they should, therefore, sink their petty differences and work in union in the interests of their country.

The editor of this paper refutes this view of the correspondent in a footnote.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 10th, 1917.

In the course of a communication, from the pen of a correspondent from the Vellore taluk, published in the Swadesamitran, of the 10th September, in which he condemns the views held by the Justice and the Dravidan of Madras that the Non-Brahmans are not fit for Home Rule in their present condition and that the immediate grant of Home Rule would only be prejudicial to their interests, the following observations occur:—Most of the Non-Brahmans are agriculturists. God alone knows the hardships to which they are subjected under the present administration. The land assessment has been enhanced without any reason in the recent re-settlement. With very great difficulty we have to graze our cattle in the adjoining forests. We have to suffer much on account of the ravages caused by wild pigs and cheetahs. Our cattle are being carried away by cheetahs and we have to be simply witnessing it. Alas! In which country is such an Act (as the Arms Act) in force? Although we are legally entitled to licences under this Act, the officers refuse to grant them. Our sufferings in other respects too are indescribable. Will things be done in this way, if the Government were responsible to the people? Dr. Nayar and Mr. P. Thyagaraya Chettiyar, though aware of these circumstances, say that they do not want a Government responsible to the people. They are in fact the enemies of our country. Home Rule is indeed the rule which will be responsible to the people.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, Aug. 13th, 1917.

Our situation.

70. The Lokopakari, of the 13th August, writes:—India is now in a very criticial juncture, with the war on one side and her internal troubles on the other. On account of the war, the factories throughout the world are manufacturing mostly munitions and therefore other necessary articles are not produced in sufficient quantities, the result being a general rise in the price of such articles. Some articles are not at all available. As India depends only on foreign countries for all her articles, she is suffering much on account of the war, and is, therefore, anxiously awaiting its termination. Inside the country, the Government here are now between two fires. The Indians are on the one side agitating for Home Rule, while on the other side the Anglo-Indians are advocating the suppression of the Home Rule movement. Between these two, the officials are perplexed, not knowing what to do. If these would adopt a straight course and exercise their powers sympathetically, there will be no room for their being blamed. It is necessary that the authorities in India should note that there is nothing unusual about the Indians nurturing a desire for liberty—a desire which is apparent now throughout the world. But the people also should note that the only thing which the authorities object to is their resort to unruly methods. The authorities and the people can be mutually satisfied with each other, only if each gives in to a slight extent. Our duty is done the moment we represent our grievances to the authorities. The duty of redressing the same rests with the authorities and not with us. So we should not commit any excesses.

Brahmans and Non-Brahmans.

71. In the course of a long article contributed by a correspondent to the Dravidan, of the 10th September, on the conduct of the Brahman Archakas of the Srīrangam temple, the following observations occur:—Our people in their ignorance think that they acquire great virtue by giving money to these Brahmans. There are now very few pious men among Brahmans and impious men who take pleasure in doing unjust deeds have increased in numbers. Yet, we have been driven by the force of habit to recognise these men as our elders, preceptors, leaders and patriots. We should soon open our eyes to this state of affairs, and, in future have nothing to do with these men, who having eaten our salt all their life, insult us by addressing us as Sudras.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 10th, 1917.

Interpellations in the Imperial Legislative Council.

72. In discussing the answers given to the several interpellations asked at the meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council last week, the Swadesamitran, of the 11th September, says:—The reply of Sir William Vincent to the question of the Hon'ble Mr. K. V. Rungaswami Ayyangar about the number of permanent appointments in the Government of India Secretariat not reserved for the Civilian officials, shows that nominations to the appointments in certain departments of the Secretariat are made only from the members of the Civil Service. Even in other departments, very few of the appointments carrying high salaries are conferred on non-civilians. The reply does not say how many of the non-civilians employed like this are Indians. Considering the grade of these appointments, we do not think Indians would have been nominated to them in large numbers. We hope the Honourable Member will clear this point by another question. However this may be, the aforesaid reply shows what influence the Civilian officials in the Government of India command. Our friends should think over how many obstacles will be thrown in the way, before our efforts to curtail their influence and authority succeed. If we think deeply over this matter, it may not be difficult to fix upon the root cause of the events that have recently occurred in connection with our political agitation.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 11th, 1917.

In reply to another question by the same Member about the effect of the increase in railway fares, it was ascertained that the number of passengers travelling in railways has gone down from 8 to 25 per cent. Though this will give satisfaction in a way, it is hard to describe the hardships suffered still by the passengers on these railways. Our friends are aware of the extraordinary crowd in every train on the South Indian Railway. Knowing this, the people abstain from complaining in view of the situation caused by the war. But though it may be necessary for reducing the number of trains, why cannot the railway companies attend, without delay, to the several important reforms which have to be introduced in connection with the provision of accommodation for passengers to remain in stations and other matters? The statement of the income of these railways, published every week, shows that it is only increasing and not going down. When the passengers are subjected to hardships, it is not fair for the companies to collect increased fares from them and attend only to increasing their profits, without providing all the conveniences required by the passengers. This point of view should be pressed on the Government and proper remedies sought.

In answer to another interpellation by this member as to whether the Government were aware of the fact that the cashier of the branch of the Madras

Bank at Colombo was being paid a commission on all transactions conducted by the bank, it was stated that, whether it might be true or not, it was a matter concerning the Directors of the Bank and that the Government were not prepared to interfere. This reply cannot give us any consolation. When people borrow money from the bank, they do so after tendering tangible security and paying a sufficiently attractive rate of interest. If in addition to this, they are expected to pay a commission to an official of the bank, we should consider well what petty mischief it may lead to. The bank is paying an adequate salary to its cashier, for the duties discharged by him and the responsibilities undertaken by him. If the payment of a commission to him also comes into vogue, will it not tell upon the straight nature of the transactions of the bank and the self-respect of its constituents? Are the Government justified in keeping aloof in this matter, without ascertaining the truth? The treasury transactions of the Government are conducted mostly through the Madras Bank in this Presidency, and the bank has opened numerous branches only for this purpose. The Government have therefore given many concessions to this bank. Is it wrong, under these circumstances, to expect the Government to evince some anxiety in the affairs of the bank being conducted in a straight manner? We will assert that it is the duty of the Government to find out the truth, when a strong rumour is current about the way in which things are done and maintain the prestige of the bank.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 7th, 1917.

Supreme Legislative Council.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 7th September, writes under this heading:—In view of the reply of Sir W. Vincent to the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah's questions regarding Mrs. Besant's internment, the Madras Times and New India of yesterday have hopefully stated that the release of the three interned is in sight. We are not able to understand on what grounds these two papers have made this statement. . . Then the Viceroy spoke upon several things. The speech was hopeful at some places and at other places disappointing. . .

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, July 5th, 1917.

Cotton import duties.

73. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Vartakamitran, of the 5th July, dwells upon the principles on which an import duty was originally levied on the cotton articles manufactured in India and recently on the cotton goods imported into India, and observes:—When the levy of protective duties is advocated even in England, which stands foremost in industrial advancement, need any thought be spent over its necessity in India? The leech of foreign trade has caught hold of India, and it looks as if it will not give up its hold until it had completely sucked out the blood of wealth from the country. Cannot our Government, who are trying to collect in India a big loan for the war, borrow in India the amount required for improving the railways and other industries of this country? If this had been done, the very amount paid till now as interest to foreigners would have accumulated in our own hands as capital. But what is the use of speaking of all these things? As long as the power of devising the necessary means of altering our economic condition, as we like and according to our convenience, is not in our hands, no benefit will accrue to us. Until our Legislative Councils are granted larger privileges and the Government made to act upon their advice, there will be many obstacles in the way of our industrial advancement.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, July 12th, 1917.

The irrigation system in India.

74. The Vartakamitran, of the 12th July, dwells upon the disparity between the amount spent by the Government on productive irrigation works, which yield them tangible profits and that spent on protective irrigation works, which are beneficial more to the people than to the Government and which are worked at a loss, and says:—The loss now sustained by the Government in connection with protective irrigation works amounts to Rs. 24,69,483, while the profit derived by them through the productive irrigation works is $3\frac{3}{4}$ crores of rupees. This latter figure indicates the net profit derived after payment of borrowed capital and interest thereon and the amount now accumulated under this head is 9 crores of rupees. So it is necessary that the Government should spend this amount only on irrigational and not on other purposes. Until the profit derived from productive works and the loss sustained from protective works meet, the above amount can be safely spent by the Government, without any difficulty whatever. We would suggest the Cauveri

Reservoir Project and the Tungabadra Reservoir Project being taken in hand immediately. Though the Government may not make an adequate profit from these two projects, we need not say that it will benefit the people of our Province immensely, as nearly 2,000,000 acres will be irrigated thereby. Our rulers came to India in the beginning only as merchants, and they have not yet completely forgotten their mercantile instincts. Though the percentage of average income from irrigational projects is higher in this Province than elsewhere, they are not maintained properly and repaired whenever necessary. If the construction of bridges over new channels is demanded, they either ask the ryots to contribute money for the purpose or say that bridges are not necessary. On account of want of proper repairs, the bunds of channels often breach and both the channels and the crops suffer thereby. In the matter of these repairs, a definite rate has been fixed as per acre irrigated for being spent on the repairs to each channel. There are channels which irrigate 100 acres and others which irrigate 1,500 acres for the length of 1 mile. Therefore, in certain localities, the amount available according to the above rate is not sufficient even for necessary repairs, while, in certain other localities, there arises no necessity whatever for the amount set apart for repairs being spent. According to system now followed by the Government, there is no means of finding out which work is necessary. The Government should soon come to a conclusion regarding this, after consulting with the people. The people have no idea whatever about these matters. They believe that the subordinate officials can do anything as they please. So the Government should appoint Indians experienced in irrigational matters to ascertain the works that are necessary for the several irrigation sources in the country and also the repairs that should be executed every year to the existing irrigation works. Such an enquiry should be conducted once every 10 or 15 years.

Difficulties in sea-borne trade.

75. The Vartakamitran, of the 12th July, thinks that very soon there may be impediments in carrying on sea-borne trade, and says that it is not wise on the part of the Government to keep quiet, without expressing how they mean getting over the difficulty.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, July 12th, 1917.

The Empire Resources Development Committee.

76. The Vartakamitran, of the 19th July, refers to the report published by the Empire Resources Development Committee, which was constituted in England before the war for considering about the development of trade in all countries subject to the English rule and which has now suggested the formation of a chartered company called the Imperial Trade Corporation with a capital of fifteen crores of rupees for the purpose of taking over the lands, mines, etc., in India, Ceylon and other places and working them, the profits being divided by all the countries subject to the English rule and devoted to the repayment of the heavy debt incurred on account of the present war, and observes:—It appears this company will utilise only the mines in India, Ceylon and other places. Should the capital and men required for working the mines in India and for cultivating coffee and tea on the slopes of the hills in India come from England? Cannot the required amount of capital be secured here alone? Our Government, who have been collecting an enormous amount of money for war funds and war loans, have not thought of making a collection for the starting of such industries. The capital of foreigners in India already amounts to 700 crores of rupees. Besides this, the Government of India have, till now, borrowed about 560 crores of rupees. Thus, India has been paying either interest or profit at the rate of 4 per cent on all the 1,260 crores of rupees mentioned above. See what amount of money is going to foreign countries from India. It is on account of this that poverty is increasing in India day by day and famine has come to stay in this country, though the country has been enjoying perfect peace for the last 150 years. It has been recorded by one that the people did not know what famine was during the time this country was ruled by Hindu kings, and history shows that, even when there was a famine, it occurred only once in 50 or 60 years. Though there were many famines during the Muhammadan regime for 500 years, only four seem to have been very severe. During the 100 years that India was under the East India Company there were 12 famines, and during the 60 years that it has been under the direct government of the Sovereign, there have been ten famines. What is the cause for this gradual increase in the number of famines? The main reason is the fact that all industries and mercantile concerns are in the hands of foreigners and that the benefit of the Indian trade goes to them. As if this will not do, the Government are arranging for several other big industries passing into the hands of foreigners, and this is not fair. When will Indian industries be carried on in India for the Indians by means of Indian capital and with the aid of Indian labour?

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakottai, Aug. 27th, 1917.

The Vaisyamitran, of the 27th August, also refers to the proposal of this committee, and dwelling upon the undesirability of a larger amount of foreign capital being brought into India than what is already here, expresses the hope that the Government would see their way to include Indian capitalists in this committee so that Indians also may derive a portion of the profits earned by the industries run by the committee.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Aug. 2nd, 1917.

77. Adverting to a memorial said to have been presented to the Government of Bengal by the Calcutta Chamber of Commerce praying for the passing of a law to prevent Indian firms trading under English names, as this leads to other English companies in India and in foreign countries having transactions with these Indian firms and thereby hampers their (European's) trade, the Vartakamitran, of the 2nd August, remarks:—See how far men are prepared to go, when they are actuated by arrogance and self-interest. What do these English merchants care, if Indian capitalists trade with English names? Are they not, for the last three years, reaping the fruits of their avaricious desire to get into their hands the trade of the whole world? Is this not enough? As the English have, within the last two centuries, brought under their control the trade of the world, it is quite natural for any one to feel that he might, perhaps, be able to do larger business by adopting an English name. Are the English justified in being jealous of this? Now they are manufacturing cloths of South Indian patterns in use in India for a long time and sending them over here. How far are they justified in doing this? English companies are advertising their cheroots, cigarettes, etc., in India by printing the figures of Sri Rama and Akbarshaw on them? Is this not done to create a desire for these articles in those who purchase them? English merchants, who permit a grotesque representation of Sri Rama on their goods, without realising that it will wound the feelings of the Indians, cannot put up with Indians trading with English names! Perhaps they can do anything to improve their trade, but the Indians should not do so. If the latter do any such thing, there is a hue and cry immediately and the Government are approached for introducing legislation on the point. Even the Government play to their tune.

Indian firms with English names.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Aug. 2nd, 1917.

78. The Vartakamitran, of the 2nd August, writes elsewhere:—Even in this country they have established a department called the Department of Industries. To preside over this department, they have nominated only the members of the I.C.S., who have no opportunity even to have a book knowledge of industrial matters. It can be definitely stated that, till now the Government have not done anything properly. The efforts of the people alone will not do.

The Department of Industries.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 5th, 1917.

79. The Swadesamitran, of the 5th September, reproduces in Tamil an article in the Modern Review about the views expressed by the Secretary of State for India recently on the administration of India, in which the following observations occur:—It will not do if a few more of the higher appointments are conferred upon the Indians. We want political powers in connection with the management of the affairs of the country and in determining the nature of the administration. We are promised the grant of Home Rule step by step. But no time limit is fixed for the interval between one step and another. It seems we should, before advancing from one step to another, give evidence of our capacity to do so. But who is to be the judge of this capacity? It is the very authorities, who feel that if Home Rule is granted to us, their power and influence would vanish. Mr. Lloyd George in speeking of the German colonies observed that the form of Home Rule to be granted to them should be based upon the desires and aspirations of the people there. So should the people who desire to have a Government which they like, live in the German colonies? Have we not been informed that the people in countries subject to the British enjoy larger privileges than those in other countries subject to the westerns!

Trade in girls.

80. The Lokopakari, of the 13th August, has the following:—Trade in girls is being carried on in the Madras Presidency. As it is difficult to procure Brahman girls in the north, the Brahmans there procure girls from the south through brokers and marry them. As the people of the north are Telugu-speaking men and are not conversant with the manners and customs of the Tamilians, they get themselves duped by these brokers who buy low caste girls and pass them on as Brahman girls. Poor and low class people sell their girls out of love for money. There are none to see how these girls are disposed of by the brokers. Most of these girls, it is understood, are made to lead a life of prostitution. It is, therefore, essential that the Police should watch the conduct of these brokers, as their action results in nothing but slave-trade.

Licences under the Arms Act.

81. Adverting to the ravages caused by wild animals on the crops in several parts of Malabar and attributing this chiefly to the increase in the number of these animals for lack of men to destroy them, the Lokopakari, of the 13th August, observes:—On account of the restrictions imposed by the Arms Act, it has become difficult for the farmers to obtain licenses for keeping arms. The Collector of Malabar realising this trouble granted licences to several persons. This is not enough. Their suffering will end only if licences are granted to a larger number of men.

VANNIKULAMITRAN, Madras, September, 1917.

The London Times on Gokhale's reform scheme.

82. Adverting to the adverse comments of the London Times on the opinions expressed by the well-known popular leaders of India, that the scheme of reforms propounded by the late Mr. Gokhale is out of date and cannot, therefore, satisfy the present aspirations of the Indians, the Swadesamitran, of the 7th September, observes:—The London Times now says that India is wanting in prudent and wise men to lead her, that Indian politicians have lost their balance and that the present condition of India is exactly the same as it was before. But what has the same paper expressed on a previous occasion? None would have forgotten that, while it wrote about India and the Indians, it appreciatingly observed that the views about India had, in consequence of the services rendered by her in the war, changed in all places and in all respects, that reforms should be introduced in India accordingly, that the co-operation of the Indians was essential and that India should be admitted into the imperial conference. Under these circumstances the question arises as to which of these two views is correct—the one expressed now or the one expressed some time ago. Mr. Montagu knows well that the Times is notorious for misconstruing things. As the British public and the Secretary of State for India are well aware of the attitude of that paper, it is our firm conviction that they would treat the strange views of this paper with indifference and do things realising the lawful aspirations of the Indians and the true condition of India.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 7th, 1917.

Mr. Gokhale's scheme of reforms.

The Hitakarini, of the 26th August, says:—We are at a loss to know why His Highness the Aga Khan has now disclosed the reforms of Mr. Gokhale which do not suit the present ideals . . Should he (Mr. Gokhale) be living today, he would surely give his approval to the scheme of the Congress. Who can understand the minds of such men as Lord Sydenham who wrote against this scheme, fearing that if it should be carried out, it would end in a revolution in India.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, Aug. 26th, 1917.

Public reception to His Excellency the Governor.

83. Adverting to the press communiqué issued by His Excellency the Governor dispensing with all formal public addresses and receptions to him in his tours during the ensuing cold weather, the Swadesamitran, of the 11th September, observes:—It is indeed right that the Governor should be of opinion that the people should not incur any expenditure on his account at this juncture, especially when they have already spent their money on several other things. But his statement that addresses too need not be presented to him is not right. The people are entitled to express their grievances and needs through these addresses, and it is the duty of the Governor to reply to them. It is not proper that he should deprive the people of their right or refuse to do his duty.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 7th, 1917.

A public meeting at Kangayam.

84. The Swadesamitran, of the 7th September, publishes, as reported by a correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held on the 5th idem at Kangayam (Coimbatore district), under the auspices of the local Home Rule League, when Mr. S. R. Jaya Rao, the president of the meeting, is reported to have said that it is improper for the Indians to be quiet when Mrs. Besant, who worked hard in their behalf, is under internment and that every one should work for the cause of the country. Mr. K. S. Ramasubba Ayyar, who also addressed the audience on the necessity for Home Rule, is said to have spoken of the administrative policies adopted in various countries and the establishment of the British rule in India, and to have observed, in the course of his speech, that though in the Queen's Proclamation of 1858 many promises favourable to the Indians have been made, several of them yet remain unfulfilled.

DRAVIDABHIMANI, Salem, Aug. 31st, 1917.

The Muhammadan burial-ground at Aruppukkottai.

85. In the course of a communication from the pen of a correspondent, published in the Dravidabhimani, of the 31st August, the following observations occur:—The existence of a Muhammadan burial-ground in the Vārhavandānpuram street of Aruppukkottai which has a population of 30,000 renders unwholesome the water of a public well in its vicinity, which is used by a large number of persons for drinking purposes and is highly prejudicial to public health. The President of the Taluk Board not directing the removal of the cemetery in spite of the report of the Union panchayat of the place and the District Medical and Sanitary officer, the public assembled in large numbers and submitted a memorial to the President of the District Board, Rāmnād, but in vain. When we observe that, while the dead bodies of Hindus alone are required to be carried to a place about two miles away from the town, the Muhammadan burial-ground, which is in the centre of the town, should be allowed to remain as it is to the detriment of the public health, one cannot but think that the law is one for the Hindus and another for the Muhammadans. Have the Government till now enacted such a law regulating the use of burial-grounds which would affect the people differently according to their religions? If such a strange law does exist, it would be well to publish it in the Gazette for the information of all.

The Sowrashtras and Sir Alexander Cardew.

86. Anent the letter said to have been addressed by Sir Alexander Cardew to the representative of the Sowrashtras tendering an apology for his not having been aware of their claim to be Brahmans but at the same time enquiring why, being Brahmans, they sought the aid of others for having a separate school, a correspondent of the Swadesamitran, of the 11th September, narrates how the Sowrashtras, who were once a flourishing class of people, became reduced in circumstances on account of the weaving industry carried on by them having been ruined by the import of foreign articles manufactured by means of machinery and how, by establishing a school for themselves, they have been improving their condition within the last ten years, and adds:—If the caste of a class of people and not their condition should be the criterion for obtaining Government aid, the money spent for helping the Sowrashtras will no doubt be in vain; but if their condition is to be the criterion, there will be nothing strange in spending a small portion of the money of the country for them.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 11th, 1917.

The Nadars and Home Rule.

87. A correspondent of the Swadesamitran, of the 11th September, reiterates the fact that the Nadars as a class are for the grant of Home Rule and referring to the orderly way in which the affairs of his community are managed, wherever they live, by means of organised bodies, asserts that the members of that community have a natural capacity for having Home Rule.

88. The Swadesamitran, of the 12th September, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held at Gobichettipalaiyam, under the auspices of the local Home Rule League, when the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar, the President of the meeting, is stated to have observed that the gagging of Mrs. Besant and her internment under the Defence of India Act are unjust deeds which would not be done in any civilized country. A resolution is reported to have been passed at this meeting protesting against the statement made by the Madras Mail of the 8th September 1917 that the conservative opinion among Indians is against the unconditional concellation of the internment of Mrs. Besant and others.

A public meeting at Gobichettipalaiyam.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 12th, 1917.

89. Adverting to the conduct of the Police Sub-Inspector of Avadi in tearing off a Home Rule notice pasted on a carriage at Tinnanore on the 8th September 1917, a correspondent of the Swadesamitran, of the 12th September, observes:—I hear that several persons are warned not to take part in the Home Rule agitation. The reason for the authorities acting in this manner is not known. If it is said that the Home Rule agitation is not opposed to law, why should the Police and other Government officials give trouble to the people in this matter? If, on the other hand, this is considered to be opposed to law, it would be proper for the Government to openly declare it as such.

Home Rule and the authorities.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 12th, 1917.

90. The Hindu Nesan, of the 12th September, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the substance of a lecture said to have been delivered by the Hon'ble Mr. V. K. Ramanuja Achariyar at Trichinopoly on this subject, in the course of which he is reported to have stated that the Home Rule movement was necessitated, as the voice of the elected members did not prove to be of any avail in the Legislative Councils and as the power of veto vested in the Governor acted as a clog upon the objects of the popular representatives being fulfilled and that, if the swadesi vow was taken by everyone, it would make the Englishmen treat us with sympathy, as it would lead to a reduction in the quantity of foreign articles imported into the country and thereby put them to a material loss.

The Home Rule movement and its origin.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 12th, 1917.

91. Referring to the circular letter addressed by the Government of India to the Local Governments and administrations formulating a new scheme for enabling students in schools and colleges to invest the small savings from their pocket money in the Post office five-year cash certificates, the Hindu Nesan, of the 12th September, observes:—We heartily approve of this scheme and the students are also bound to show their loyalty by purchasing the cash certificates. But it is a point to be considered whether the Indian students in schools are all of them in a position to put by small amounts like As. 2 or As. 4 and buy these certificates. Many are the students who are not able to pay their school fees. How can parents, who cannot afford to pay the fees of their children, give them pocket money for expenses? The scheme now proposed by the Government of India should not lead to poor students being compelled to pay anything towards the purchase of cash certificates along with their fees. If any such thing should happen, it will subject the parents of these students to much hardship. In this connection, we would dwell upon another point also. The motive of the Government of India in introducing this scheme seems to be that the students should be actuated by a feeling of loyalty to render financial assistance towards the conduct of the war and that the idea of India being a portion of the British Empire should be brought home to them. If this is a fact, it is wrong on the part of the Government to prevent the students from taking part in politics. The students will have an attachment to the British Empire only if they take part in politics.

Students' saving certificates.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry. Aug. 29th, 1917.

Special Provincial Conference. Mr. Govindaraghava Ayyar criticised the speech of His Excellency in May last, and said that the present commotion is mostly due to it. Mr. Kesava Pillai said that the grounds on which Mrs. Besant was interned are not yet known. The resolution that has roused the emotion of the audience and the leaders is the one relating to passive resistance. Everyone of the audience insisted upon the adoption of passive resistance as a reply to the repressive policy followed by the Government. Being greatly incensed at the repressive policy of the Government, Mr. Ramanuja Achari said that we should necessarily adopt passive resistance, and that we should not be so ungrateful as to look helplessly on without following Mrs. Besant and others who are suffering internment for the sake of India. . . The resolution was at last approved by the meeting. From this it will be plain how indignant the people are at repressive measures, and how persistent they are in the matter of the adoption of passive resistance. We hope that the Government will at least now understand that not only the educated but the whole population unitedly are clamouring for reforms. . . If as desired by some of the leaders, the people refrain from adopting passive resistance till the arrival of Mr. Montagu, will the rulers, as asked by one of the speakers, give up the enforcement of repressive laws till Mr. Montagu's arrival.

Mrs. Besant.

93. The Desamata, of the 29th August, referring to the election of Mrs. Besant as President of the Congress, has a note which says:—The present commotion has made the Indians show unusual affection for Mrs. Besant. Her pure life and her self-sacrifice are the chief cause of this unusual affection.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 5th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu.

94. The Andhrapatrika, of the 5th September, says:—It is the opinion of the Christian Patriot that it is not a good policy to centre all our hopes in one individual. From our past experience, it will be seen that, however liberal hearted and great the person might be who controlled the Government of India, he was not able to satisfy the wishes of the people. When even such a great man as Lord Morley was not able to rise above the circumstances and give the people suitable powers, it is not possible to expect others to do greater wonders. The Christian Patriot, therefore, says that the mere announcement of Mr. Montagu's visit does not warrant the Indians to conclude that their wishes have been fulfilled and that they will do well to think that the political salvation of the country lies in the hands of the Indians themselves. The Patriot says that the Christians will do well to meet and point out that self-government is not the ideal of the educated only, but that that ideal is appreciated by all the Indians. . . It is now plain that to attain self-government is the ideal of all the communities in India. . . If all the communities prepare a scheme of self-government which will meet with the approval of all, and place it before Mr. Montagu, he will easily understand the Indian problem.

Mrs. Besant's birthday.

95. The Andhrapatrika, of the 5th September, reports a correspondent to New India to have written to that paper exhorting the public to go to Coimbatore and confer presents upon Mrs. Besant on the occasion of her next birthday, in case she is not released by that time, and stating that we will be blamed if we do not so show our gratitude to Mrs. Besant who is suffering for our sake.

Passive resistance.

96. The Andhrapatrika, of the 7th September, reports that Mr. Deobhanker delivered a speech at Bezwada on passive resistance:

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 7th, 1917.

The passive resistance movement.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 7th September, writes:—While the Indians would resort to passive resistance, if the Government should do anything to oppose the Home Rule movement, some of the Anglo-Indian journals suggest that in case Mr. Montagu should grant any concessions to the Indians the authorities in India should also resort to passive resistance by defying the orders of the Secretary ofState. Have not the Government the strength to punish the officers who disobey their orders? If the Government and the Indian people should combine, what can the Anglo-Indian authorities do? This swaggering, therefore, can be of no avail. If the British Government should act justly, the Indians can have no need of resorting to passive resistance, and in the latter case, there can be no need of a counter-movement to oppose passive resistance. It would, therefore, be well if the Government should adhere to British traditions.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sept. 7th, 1917.

Passive resistance.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 8th September, reports Mr. Deobhanker to have said as president of a meeting at Bezwada, that the constitutional methods heretofore adopted were not enough, that the people should endeavour to start the constitutional agitation of passive resistance and that unless they do so, they could not get any liberty. It says that he criticised the view of some that the Indians should refrain from passive resistance as Mr. Montagu was coming to India, and said that Mr. Montagu should know the real state of things in this country, that it was injurious to create in him an impression of false peace, and that the people should be ready to adopt passive resistance at any cost. The paper says that among other things a resolution urging the necessity of the adoption of passive resistance was passed.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 8th, 1917.

Certain opinions regarding the Government of India.

97. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 7th September, writes as follows under this heading :--Sir Dinkar Rao who showed unequalled love for the British Government at the time of the sepoy mutiny gave up writing and speaking English for the reason that the English failed to do justice to India.

It is the educated Indians that can explain well the policy of the British Government, and being able to adapt that policy to the genius of the Indians, can co-operate with us (Sir Bartel Frere) such men are now found in large numbers in the Congress and in the Home Rule Leagues. The bureaucracy does not allow them to approach it.

The voice of real and living representation should be heard in the councils of the Indian Government (Gladston).

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 7th, 1917.

The unity of the Empire.

98. The Andhraprakasika, of the 6th September, says in its leader:—His Excellency the Viceroy said that opportunities would be afforded for promoting the friendly relations between the rulers and the ruled in India. But before such opportunities are afforded, the internments should be annulled. The bonds of affection between the rulers and the ruled should be made stronger. The rulers should understand the attitude of the people towards political questions. Some of the people are enthusiastic about reforms while some others are not. But it may be asserted that none of the political agitators is disloyal. . . We hope that there will no longer be the enforcement of repressive laws. . . The Times of India says:—The continent of Asia is developing new aspirations. If the British Empire and India that is included in it work unitedly, they will thrive greatly. If they do not work unitedly, it is not possible for them to use their whole strength. His Excellency the Viceroy said that the present generation should see that they are not accused of spoiling matters for want of earnestness in the love for the Empire, when the time has come for the uplifting of the Empire. The Prime Minister stated that for such union, liberty is the chief means. His words deserve to be recorded in letters of gold. He said that if Russia had enjoyed greater liberty in times of peace, she would have shown greater union in the time of war. To set to work in a spirit of union, he said, did not mean the suppression of liberty, but it was the culmination of the spirit of liberty. . . If according to this principle of Mr. Lloyd George, the authorities begin to grant self-government to India also, India will shine as a jewel in the British Empire, and will serve as a bulwark of the empire. The Anglo-Indian papers do not appear to help to the attainment of this end. The Rangoon Gazette requests His Excellency the Governor of Madras to resign. The Madras Mail asks how Mrs. Besant can be released if she prosecutes the agitation which has been curbed. . . We pray that the rulers will pay no regard to such threats but will restore peace to the country, lay the foundations of self-government in India soon and strengthen the unity of the empire.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 6th, 1917.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 8th, 1917.

The Andhra students of the Law College.

99. The Andhrapatrika, of the 8th September, says that the Andhra students of the Madras Law College have sent the following telegram to the temporary committee of non-Brahmans, Cocanada:—The committee has to support zealously the reforms demanded by the Congress and the League. But it should ask for class representation. It has to work more in social and educational matters. We wish that it may publish a scheme on these lines.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 8th, 1917.

Rao Bahadur P. Thiagaraya Chetti's message.

100. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 8th September, refers to the message of Rao Bahadur P. Thiagaraya Chetti addressed to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for India, stating that the message sent to them, as embodying the opinion of the Madras Provincial Committee and the Home Rulers, was opposed to the opinion of most of the non-Brahmans, and says:—O! Mr. Thiagaraya Chetti? Did we elect you as our representative to give our opinion or did you understand the opinion of the South India non-Brahmans by some occult power? Have there been in any country at any time people who have done harm to the country against the wishes of the people by assuming such false authority? . . . We represent to the Secretary of State for India and to the Prime Minister that the opinion contained in the message of Rao Bahadur P. Thiagaraya Chetti is not the opinion of the non-Brahmans of South India.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 8th, 1917.

A new non-Brahman movement.

101. Under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 8th September, contains some correspondence in which the writers endorse the appeal of Mr. Sabhapathi Pillai for starting a new non-Brahman movement as the present one does not really represent the interests of the non-Brahmans.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 10th, 1917.

A new non-Brahman movement.

Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 10th September, publishes a letter from the pen of several non-Brahmans, in which while endorsing fully the reform scheme published by the Congress and the Muslim League, the signatories urge the necessity of the grant of separate representation to the difierent classes of people in South India.

The paper observes:—Mother India will have her object accomplished, because all the Indians are in full agreement with the scheme of the Congress. The Indians may hereafter represent their aspirations unanimously to Mr Montagu.

Our duty.

105. The Desamata, of the 5th September, contains under this heading a gist in Telugu of the letter of Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar regarding what the Indians should do next if Mrs. Besant should be elected as President of the Congress by a greater number of the Provinces.

106. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 10th September, refers to a second circular of the District Judge of Guntūr and says:—There is a strong rumour that the second circular prohibits not only the Home Rule and the swadeshi movements, but also every political agitation, and suggests an enquiry about not only the pleaders but also all men. . . This may engender partiality even in the administration of justice. Such an evil will entail a very great loss to the parties. Within ten days of the meetings of pleaders, it appears that the judicial officers of the district met in Guntūr. It is surmised that they did so to consider about this circular. It is not possible to know how far this is true. The District Judge was a member of the Legislative Council on behalf of the Andhra country, and worked for the welfare of the people. Is the change in his opinion due to change in his position? Or did the Government require him to make the enquiry about pleaders and others? It is not known why the Government, who have established the Criminal Investigation Department at a great cost to do this work, should require the Judges to help them in this matter.

The District Judge, Guntūr.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 10th, 1917.

107. The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th September, says in its leader under this heading:—The Nation says: An Empire that observes colour differences cannot be said to be one that is pervaded by freedom. We are naturally disposed to grant liberty. So long as the great question of the grant of self-government to India remains unsettled, such a natural disposition of ours will not be revealed. . . The liberty that is enjoyed by the different parts of the British Empire shall be an ideal for all the Empires in the world. Progress is a law of nature, and time will not allow anything that is calculated to retard progress. Mr. Montagu is coming to India to settle the Indian problem. Those who know his previous history can presume that the views of the Nation will find favour with him. We hope that the great ideals suggested by the Nation will be realised through Mr. Montagu.

The way to an empire pervaded by freedom.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 10th, 1917.

106. The Andhrapatrika, of the 6th September, publishes in Telugu a letter written by Hon'ble Mr. M. Ramachandra Rao on this subject. It contains the following:— . . . It would be desirable to divide the country into provinces on race and language basis. Division on language basis would facilitate administration as well as the imparting of education. That is why some of the Anglo-Indian rulers supported this division of the country on language basis. In 1879 Sir George Chesney recommended that Orissa should be made a separate province. Sir Francis Young Husband also recommended that Sindh should be made a separate province. . . If therefore the division of the country into provinces is remodelled on the basis of races and languages, progress would be made in the formation of a federal form of Government in this country. . .

Method of federation.

109. The Andhrapatrika, of the 6th September, publishes a note from the New Era under this heading which contains:—Mr. Gulam Hussain received a number of wounds and was bleeding profusely. Before he lost his senses, he urged his country-men to carry on a keen agitation.

Mr. Gulam Hussain's last message.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 6th, 1917.

110. The Andhrapatrika, of the 6th September, publishes in Telugu a note from the Madras Mail regarding the interference of the authorities in the matter of the flying of the Home Rule flag, which contains:—"Unless circumstances make it clear that the flying of the flag will create much disturbance of peace it is not desirable that the authorities should interfere. It sometimes proves to be wisdom to connive at petty indications of agitation." Our comment on this is unnecessary. But is the Madras Mail also changing its angle of vision?

The Madras Mail and pacifying methods.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 6th, 1917.

In an article under this heading, Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 12th September, writes:—The Madras Mail writes to the effect that in case Mr. Montagu sides with those who are working for Home Rule in India, the uneducated and backward classes in India would side with the opponents of Home Rule, and that the Home Rule party and Mr. Montagu will all get plunged in the huge ocean of Home Rule opponents and come to grief. Many of the Anglo-Indian journals also express the same view. It is generally regarded that those who write in this manner are in truth the enemies of the empire. That is quite so. The uneducated and backward classes will never side with the Anglo-Indians. They will side with whomsoever they think to be patriots. Do they not know that, in the event of the grant of Home Rule, a large part of the hard-earned wealth of the people will be spent in promoting the interests of the people themselves? Will they not understand the point at least when they are told about it? Will not the Home Rule party try to explain it to them? However uneducated the people may be, can they not at least discriminate between what is truth and what is untruth and what is just and what is unjust? Is it necessary to know chemistry in order to find out that sugar is sweet? Ango-Indians, like the editor of the Madras Mail, should not allow themselves to be thus blinded by their selfishness. The Anglo-Indians too, like the Indians, have ample opportunities of advancement. It would never do to think: "No matter if the masses suffer and remain under autocracy. Let us be autocrats! Let the people have only so much as is needed for their sustenance. Let us indulge in festivities from year to year's end!" God would never grant such selfish wishes. It behoves all haughty and selfish persons to ponder over these words and reform themselves.

We cannot attain salvation until the day when our country emerges from the hands of the bureaucracy. . ."

The Anglo-Indian papers

112. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 6th September, publishes in Telugu an extract from the Hindu which contains the following:—Mr. P. S. Venkatchalam Nayudu, a merchant of Madras has written to us saying that Dr. T. M. Nair wrote to the Madras Standard on 24th April 1906 as follows:—". . . I wish that you, my countrymen, will not believe, but will thoroughly condemn the useless writings which the Anglo-Indians publish out of jealousy. They consume a large amount of our money and try to treat us with dishonour today. My countrymen, can decide how long we can put up with such a state of affairs." Thus did Doctor Nair write in those days. He says today that the Indians should respectfully bow to the orders of the bureaucracy. May my countrymen and the Anglo-Indians as well note this writing of Doctor Nair.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 6th, 1917.

The Home Rule meeting at Vizagapatam.

113. The Andhrapatrika, of the 6th September, publishes in Telugu a letter from its own correspondent at Vizagapatam, which contains the following:—Mr. G. Harisarvottama Rao Pantulu, M.A., delivered a lecture about swaraj in our Victoria Town Hall under the presidentship of the Hon'ble Bhupatiraju Venkatapathiraju. . . The lecturer said ". . . As the Indians had not the opportunity to have their powers of independence developed and under the rule of foreign Governments they have been reduced to an unhappy condition. He pointed out how the trade of our country suffered owing to the competition of westerners amongst themselves and owing to their desire to secure their own gain. He supported the statement that our country was rich even at the time of the advent of the English, and said that our country had self-government up to the time of the death of Aurangazeb. There is no doubt that the people in those days were happy and contented. . . Direct election has not been granted to our people, and public opinion cannot make itself felt. . . As the whole power of administration lay in the hands of the bureaucracy, the endeavours of our representatives did not succeed. Our Legislative Council members became therefore helpless, and having become aware that unless the people possessed controlling power in the Government nothing could be gained, they published the scheme of the National Congress and the Moslem League. . . While even uncivilised nations in the British Empire are enjoying the powers of self-government, it cannot but be curious to state that the people of India which had a great ancient civilisation of their own are unfit to carry on the administration of their country.

When Canada was granted self-government the residents of villages there were not very much educated. When the Phillippine Islands came under the rule of America, it cannot be said that the people of the Phillippines were so enlightened as the Indians. It does not stand to reason to say that we who have been under the administration of the English for hundred and fifty years are unfit for self-government. The bureaucracy in our country are under a delusion. Their delusion is not the result of ignorance but that of selfishness. . . Unless we follow the methods of the English and carry on agitation we cannot attain salvation.

The president, praising the lecturer, said that simultaneously with the benefits derived from the English rule, helplessness and poverty has overtaken us. . . If the bureaucracy be brought under the control of public opinion, we can come to a happy condition. Such a state of affairs exists in other countries. They say we are incapable of self-government. If after living for 150 years under the British Government we are incapable of carrying on self-government what shall we become after 150 years more? The speaker condemned the present system of government and explained the indigent condition of the ryots.

The letter addressed to His Majesty.

114. The Kistnapatrika, of the 25th August, publishes in Telugu the letter addressed to His Majesty by an Irish leader regarding the internment of Mrs. Besant.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Aug. 25th, 1917.

A great amendment.

115. The Kistnapatrika, of the 8th September, in its leader under this heading, writes:—". . . The Government has not been known to have committed such a blunder as that of interning Mrs. Besant and her co-workers ever since the partition of Bengal. . . Lord Hardinge did not yield to prestige. As soon as he recognised the fault he employed his matchless political wisdom and became worthy of the eternal gratitude of the Indians.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Sep. 8th, 1917.

A like situation has been created by the internment of Mrs. Besant. It is 84 days since this punishment was inflicted. Owing to this untoward act the whole country from the Himalayas to the Cape Camorin received a rude shock. All the provinces in one voice cried out "wrong!, wrong!". The Hindus and Muhammadans were one in condemning it. Even such a modest man as Mr. Malavya became agitated and commenced his tour. . . Representations were made to the English people by wire from every province. The noble ideals of Mr. Lloyd George encouraged the hopes of the Indians; and friends of India such as Mr. Snowdon and Mr. Wedgwood promised support and all people looked up to the Parliament. Mr. Montagu's intervention strengthened this hope. . . So long, the bureaucracy stood as a barrier obstructing the sight of the people and causing them mental disturbance and now with the internment of Mrs. Besant the Indians have scaled over this and established a direct relation with those countries which are at the very root of the British Empire. . . The Indians have determined to hold a respectable position in the British Empire. And the British people also have expressed their consent through Mr. Montagu.

Under such circumstances the Government of India cannot allow their mistake to continue. It need not be expressly stated that if the mistake were not corrected the country would be in danger. The Indians are not responsible for the people losing their trust in the bureaucracy. It is the bureaucracy that is responsible for it. If the bureaucracy do not lend their ear to the advice of such British statesmen as Mr. Montagu, and do not put an end to repressive measures the Indians will lose their confidence in the British people as well. . . If the British statesmen properly explain the state of circumstances in this country, we firmly believe that the British people will render justice. The object of the Indians in being prepared for passive resistance is also the hope that thereby the condition of things in this country will be brought to the ears of the people living in the British Isles.

It may be assuredly stated that the Viceroy consented to release Mrs. Besant, etc., because Mr. Montagu advised him to do so. . . The wish of the Indians to obtain swaraj has received Mr. Montagu's consent. The repressive measures of the authorities have been discountenanced by him. Let the Anglo-Indian papers cry out as they like. There is none to be afraid of their threats. . . Mr. Montagu knows all about the pious life of Mrs. Besant. He has complete trust in the staunch devotion of the Indians. The blunder has at last been corrected and truth has triumphed.

The condition for the release of the interned laid down by the Government of India is ridiculous. Can any one break the law even after the close of the war. No. This condition has been invented only to save their prestige. We need not, therefore, examine it closely. . . Now Mr. Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali, etc., will also be released. The orders given to Messrs. Tilak, Pal, Karandikar, etc., will also be cancelled. There is room for believing that the repressive measures of the bureaucracy will end now. The visit of Mr. Montagu undoubtedly augurs good for the country. The Viceroy at the end of his speech addressed the Indian leaders as follows:—"Owing to certain circumstances certain doubts and differences arose amongst us. . . We shall hereafter settle them amicably." In these words there is a sort of repentance expressed. The people will also give up opposition and work with trust. . . Mrs. Besant and Mr. Muhammad Ali will again enter their field of activity. May our political evolution progress under their leadership with spotless glory.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 7th, 1917.

116. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 7th September, writes:—Educated people are being enlisted in the Defence Force; and educated persons are heartily enlisting themselves in large numbers. There is nothing extraordinary in joining an army which is intended for the defence of our own country. One Mr. T. Vasudevayya writes that in the Military department there should not be one rule for the white men and another for the Indians, and that British delinquents are not punished with whipping while the Indians are. Although this may probably apply to the common recruits, it cannot apply to the educated among the Indians. Nevertheless, it is desired that educated Indians should get this rule cancelled before they enlist. It is imperative that the rule regarding whipping should be repealed.

The Defence Force and whipping

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Sep. 7th, 1917.

117. Referring to the publication of the resolution passed at the recent conference in London regarding Indian emigration, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 7th September, observes:—The abolition of the system of indentured emigration from India, as stated in that resolution, is doubtless a most welcome piece of news. Some of the significant matters which are dealt with in the report appended to the resolution, however, are not quite so satisfactory. Although there are signs here and there of the liberal nature of the policy to be followed for the future, none of the points in the report which relate to the house accommodation for the indentured labourers, the hours of work, the education of their children and other social conditions deserve to be reproduced. One or two other matters referred to in this report will be commented upon on another occasion.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Sep. 3rd, 1917.

The Qaumi Report, of the 3rd September, has an item under the heading "the end of indentured labour." It refers to a Simla report regarding the prohibition of emigration of coolies after the war and says:—It is well known that the treatment of Indian coolies in the Colonies has been savage and brutal. It is high time, therefore, a period was put to this cruelty and ignominy.

The end of indentured labour to the Colonies.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Sep. 7th, 1917.

118. In an article stating that Doctor Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar has very ably condemned the manifesto issued by some (seven) of the popular leaders against the passive resistance movement and referring to an article in the Madras Mail on the possible effect of the reversal of the internment orders, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 7th September, writes:—Seeing the resolution passed at the Provincial Conference and the resolute attitude of leaders like Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar, the Mail is feeling blistered all over. To make matters worse, the news that Mr. Montagu is contemplating the release of Mrs. Besant, etc., is like salt thrown over the blisters. It is too early to predict what value can be attached to the Mail's threats that Lord Pentland might resign his office, etc. We had sometime back apprised our readers of the possible danger of change in Mr. Montagu's attitude under Anglo-Indian influence. True to our fears, the Mail has already offered its menacing criticism. But Mr. Montagu is not one to feel afraid. Nobody need fear that the prestige of the Government will be affected in case they should adopt a change in their present policy of repression and thereby cause public opinion to triumph; on the other hand, by acceding to the popular demand in a situation like the present, the Government will only augment their prestige. Despite the fact that the Mail is a semi-official organ, its predictions and threats that His Excellency the Governor might resign are useless. Lord Pentland is personally a Liberal; and although under the retired Mr. Chamberlain he had embarked upon a policy of repression, under the present Liberal Mr. Montagu His Excellency might change his policy accordingly. We, therefore, trust that His Excellency Lord Pentland will not have to resign.

119. In a lengthy philosophic article dwelling on the evolution of the human race, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 7th September, proceeds to observe:—When it was asked why Bhisma, Drona and others joined the Kauravas and not the Pandavas, Bhishma replied that it was because man was a slave to wealth. This mercenary serfdom can effect anything. The man who hankers after wealth, however much he may talk of high ideals of reform and advancement, he only professes; and further, goes counter to his own former enunciations. It is impossible to enumerate all the extraordinary things that have happened as the result of servility to wealth. Still who can help being reminded of those words of Bhishma, when it is seen that just as a drum is tuned by a little paste on its (sur) face, the very champions who were the authors of extraordinary agitation at the once famous partition of Bengal and who even sent cablegrams to Europe, now, the moment they are fettered by an appointment under Government, tell us: "Beware! Be cautious! Don't be imprudent! Follow the advice of your elders! Youthful pranks can do no good!!." SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Sep. 7th, 1917.

The fetters of service.

120. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 11th September, writes:—Numerous persons are taking the swadeshi vow in the Madras Presidency. To improve the economic condition of our country, it is important that our industries, agriculture and trade should all three improve. Whenever we promote foreign activity in any of these directions we render our economic condition worse. To prevent this it is indispensable that our industries should be helped to improve. In order to render this help, the people are vowing that, as far as possible, they shall create a demand only for articles of indigenous manufacture; numerous patriots are thus taking this swadeshi vow. We hope that as this movement goes on spreading our industries will be greatly improved. SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 11th, 1917.

The swadeshi vow.

121. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 10th September, says:—Owing to a wide spread belief among the western people that a large number of persons in India die of snake-bite, they are afraid of coming here. We learn that a good many scientists are engaged in discovering a radical cure for snake-bite. If, side by side with this attempt, the Government were also to grant a reward of a rupee for every snake killed, it would be easily possible to extirpate the race of reptiles in four or five years, just as when Europe was infested with wolves, they arranged to accept wolves' heads in lieu of the taxes and thus warded off the menace. SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 10th, 1917.

Snake-bites in India.

122. Referring to His Excellency the Viceroy's recent speech in the Legislative Council, the Vrittanta Patrike, of the 13th September, in a leading article exhorts the people not to embarrass the Government by cries of Home Rule, but to do their utmost to serve them in a spirit of friendly co-operation and thus to show a true sense of gratitude to the rulers who have protected this vast country even in a crisis like the present, when their own men, women and children at home have to suffer untold hardships on account of the war. The paper next observes that, as His Excellency the Viceroy has pointed out, the manner in which local self-government is carried out in this country is itself a sufficient indication of the fitness, or otherwise, of the people to exercise the right of self-government, and however clever our people may be in making speeches and writing articles to the press, they have VRITTANTA PATRIKE, Mysore, Sep. 13th, 1917.

Self-government.

yet to acquire those qualities which the responsibilities of self-government imply and that Government would only be too glad to grant the privilege of self-government when they are convinced that the requisite capacity has been gained.

The proposed visit of the Secretary of State to India.

123. While pointing out that the visit of the Secretary of State will be advantageous to the country in more ways than one and set at rest the present unrest in India, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 5th September, doubts whether the excitement in the country is not due to the antagonistic views of the Indian and the Anglo-Indian parties on some of the important questions relating to Indian Administration and observes that the writings of some of the Anglo-Indian papers lead one to believe that they hate the idea that Mr. Montagu should, in conformity with the wishes of the people, effect certain desirable changes in the administration of this country. It then suggests that Mr. Montagu should be invited to attend the next sessions of the Congress.

UTTARA TARAKA, Parur, Sep. 8th, 1917.
LOKAPRAKASAM, Trichur, Sep. 10th, 1917.

The Uttara Taraka, of the 8th September, and the Lokaprakasam of the 10th September, also note with pleasure the proposed visit of the Secretary of State for India. The latter suggests that a deputation from the Congress, the All-India Muslim League and other public bodies should wait upon Mr. Montagu and explain to him the needs and aspirations of the people.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Sep. 7th, 1917.

The present condition of India.

124. In a leader under the heading "The Present Condition of India" the Manorama, of the 7th September, dwells at some length on the controversy regarding passive resistance and the election of Mrs. Besant as the President of the ensuing Congress, refers to the threats of the Anglo-Indian papers to Mr. Montagu regarding Mrs. Besant's release, and says:—What should be the procedure of the Secretary of State at this juncture? He should in the first place release Mrs. Besant and others. Secondly, he should put a stop to the repressive policy of the Government. Thirdly, he should accept the loyal welcome of the Indians, and attend the ensuing Congress in order to ascertain what the opinion of United India is on the changes which should be effected in the Indian Administration. If he does all this, Indians will be quite satisfied and he will be able to carry out the reforms without difficulty.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Sep. 5th, 1917.

Mr. Bhupendranath Basu.

125. The Desamata, of the 5th September, says:—Mr. Bhupendranath Basu who is one of the signatories of the memorandum of the nineteen, has, since his appointment as a member of the India Council, changed his political opinions, as is evident from his utterances at the meeting of the Bombay Presidency Association. How soon has his opinion of the memorandum changed as a result of his appointment. He said that that memorandum was drafted in a hurry. Should our leaders be like this at this juncture?

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Sep. 7th, 1917.

The Hon'ble Mr. Basu and the political situation.

The Swadeshabhimani, of the 7th September, writes:—The fact that the Hon'ble Mr. Basu, who was a champion of the popular cause in the Supreme Legislative Council and one of the most ardent members of the Congress, now takes up service under Government means a great loss to the public. This loss can somehow be borne. But what is impossible to bear is the ungracious manner in which he would fall foul of the popular cause. Addressing the Bombay Presidency Association on the eve of his departure to England, Mr. Basu said that in view of Mr. Montagu's proposed visit to India it would not be expedient to send an Indian deputation to England, and continuing, advised the people not to resort to aggressive methods of agitation or be on unfriendly terms with the Government. Mr. Basu has made a few more observations besides. But seeing that the trend of his opinion will be sufficiently clear from what we have stated above, we do not propose to reproduce the rest of his speech. It is impossible to guess what Mr. Basu was driving at in particular. If we take the term aggressive methods to refer to the Home Rule movement, then we must say that the object of this movement is hardly different from that of the Congress resolution on self-government. The latter embodies the very principles to which Mr. Basu has himself subscribed as one of the 19 signatories to the memorandum on the subject.

It is thus impossible to make out what it is that he called aggressive methods. If he alluded to the passive resistance movement, we wonder how it can be styled unconstitutional when it is seen that Mr. Sastri, Pantulu (?) and others who are moderates of the same school of politics as Mr. Basu's have declared it to be both constitutional and lawful. It is difficult to see how the two statements can be consistent with each other. In short, we must say that the Hon'ble Mr. Basu's speech is indefensible from whatever point of view we may regard it. We must not regret that one who is to take up office under Government has changed his views. But we cannot help regretting that he should so soon accuse the very people whose cause he has been espousing all this time in the Imperial Legislative Council.

Writing on the same subject, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 8th September, observes that it is very practical advice that Mr. Basu has given that tact and friendly co-operation are bound to be more successful than aggressive methods, and that it behoves all Indians to bear his words in mind and to remain loyal to the British in aiming at Home Rule under them.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 8th, 1917.

Mr. Basu's stay in India till Mr. Montagu's arrival.

Referring to the telegram of the Secretary of State asking the Hon'ble Mr. Basu to stay in India till the arrival of the former, the Kerala Patrika, of the 8th September, observes that the company of an Indian with the Secretary of State to acquaint him with the views of his countrymen at a time when the Anglo-Indian papers are trying to misrepresent matters to him will, no doubt, be of great advantage to the country.

KERALA PATRIKA, Calicut, Sep. 8th, 1917.

If Mrs. Besant be released.

126. The Qaumi Report, of the 2nd September, referring to the prevailing idea that Mr. Montagu will arrange for the release of Mrs. Besant, suggests that, if for some reason or other, or on grounds of expediency, Mrs. Besant be released, interned Muhammadans also, who have fallen victims to the Defence of India Act, should most certainly be given their liberty. We do not wish to throw obstacles in the way of Mrs. Besant's release, nor are we against the question of her personal safety, but we will never tolerate the authorities using two pairs of spectacles, one for observing noisy agitation and the other for observing calm silence. It is true that Muhammadans did not make use of any legal or constitutional weapon to secure the release of their interned brethren, but this should not be interpreted to mean that they do not believe in the innocence of their co-religionists, or that they are wanting in spirit and self-respect. No, it is due to other causes.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Sep. 2nd, 1917.

We consider that the authorities have already thoroughly tested the Muhammadans interned, and every moment of their absence has served to strengthen the belief that they were not guilty of any conspiracy, either to crush the British power, or secretly to undermine it. They formed no secret committee, nor left behind them a policy calculated to prove injurious to the Empire. Their aspirations and feelings have been checked since those unfortunate men have fallen into the clutches of the law. Neither is their work alive, nor are their objects in course of fulfilment. In these circumstances how can it be proved that their release will not be a matter of satisfaction to the country and the Empire? These legal doubts and suspicions should come to an end and they should be set at liberty.

On the other hand although Mrs. Besant's mission is working successfully, the Secretary of State for India is prepared to consider the papers connected with her internment, and possibly he may adhere to his opinion regardless of the feelings of the authorities. But why have the papers of interned Muhammadans not been called for? As far as we see the Government of Madras is favourably and leniently disposed towards interned persons within its jurisdiction, but no such treatment has been extended to the interned Muhammadans.

We are sure that if Mr. Montagu were to read the papers of those unfortunate interned Muhammadans together with those of Mrs. Besant, he would readily admit that the treatment meted out by the Madras Government is far more satisfactory. Perhaps Mr. Montagu is not aware that there are some unfortunate Muhammadans, situated like Mrs. Besant, whose case deserves looking into.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, Sep. 7th, 1917.

Mrs. Besant's release.

The Yagakshemam, of the 7th September, expresses joy at the reply of the Government of India to the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah's interpellation regarding the release of Mrs. Besant, which, it thinks, will conciliate the people.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Sep. 7th, 1917.

Referring to the same subject, the Manorama, of the 7th September, says that the decision of the Government to release Mrs. Besant before the arrival of Mr. Montagu will have a tranquilising effect, and will remove the various obstacles which would otherwise be thrown in the way of his getting a clear and candid opinion of the different communities and representative bodies in India.

KERALA PATRIKA Calicut, Sep. 8th, 1917.

Writing on the same subject, the Kerala Patrika, of the 8th September, points out that the reply of the Government of India to the question regarding the release of Mrs. Besant is in effect the same as the advice which the Governor of Madras gave her before her internment which has caused considerable unrest among a certain section of the people, and that, as such a state of affairs is not conducive to the welfare of the country, the Government should, even at the sacrifice of a little of their prestige, try to allay this excitement, and observes that, if Mrs. Besant be, as her followers contend, a friend of India at heart, she should agree to the terms proposed by the Government of India as a condition of her release.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Sep. 8th, 1917.

The announcement of release.

The Qaumi Report, of the 8th September, refers to the Viceroy's speech at the Legislative Council regarding the release of interned persons, and observes that India will gradually be given freedom and Indians will forthwith be given higher and more responsible appointments, and says:—Some envious people began to twit the Government with acting unwisely in having yielded to public agitation and directing the release of interned persons, and that it should certainly have done no such a thing. Both the Statesman and the Englishman have given expression to these traditionally hostile views and we know that some other papers of the baser sort are secretly gnashing their teeth at Lord Chelmsford's announcement.

The editor, commenting on the views of other papers, observes that those who criticise the Government action in such envious, mischievous and selfish terms, will, if they calmly and dispassionately consider, understand that their interference in the matter is quite gratuitous.

We consider Lord Chelmsford has acted with extreme foresight and forethought and we hope that His Excellency will show a little more leniency and fairmindedness in dealing with the question of the release of interned Muhammadans; for, the business of the community is suffering owing to the absence of certain sympathetic and energetic workers. These persons have not committed any illegal act nor was it possible for them to do so. Rebellion and discontent are strictly prohibited by Islam and if any one should break the law our community will never support him. We anxiously await the glad tidings of the early release of interned Muhammadans.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Sep. 5th, 1917.

Position unchanged.

127. The Qaumi Report, of the 5th September, writes:—The war telegrams sometimes contain the statement "position unchanged." Whatever idea this may convey to the military mind, it accurately describes the state of affairs with reference to our community.

The self-same position, we held in the Government service twenty-five years ago, we occupy today, that is to say, most of the chappraris are Muhammadans while the majority of officers are Hindus. Muhammadans are still candidates for appointments, while Hindus get preferment and enjoy pensions. Hindus come, and go, are appointed, and promoted.

We do not deny that perchance Muhammadans occasionally vegetate in the same department for ten or twenty years, and that the same avenues are open to them today, but those that have been closed are still closed to them by force of circumstances. Hindus have ancestral and hereditary grip of them, and frequently the Government itself confirms that grip. No Muhammadan dares to presume to occupy a position in an office or department which has once been held by our Hindu brethren.

The Small Cause Court, in the Judicial department, is a case in point. It consists of four places, and since its establishment in Madras by the late Queen Victoria, up to the time of her grandson, these have been exclusively occupied by Hindus, and if Muhammadans should, by the operation of some extraordinary law make an application to the learned Judges of the High Court, to deprive the Hindus of their possession, we are sure that the European and Muhammadan Judges will unanimously declare and decide that, as the Hindus had been in absolute and practical possession of these posts from time immemorial, the claim of Muhammadans is absolutely extraordinary and is, therefore, rejected. We are sure that even Justice Abdur Rahim, who is generally inclined to take the opposite view, would make no attempt to oppose it.

When formerly a seat fell vacant, we invited attention to the fact that the claims of the Muhammadans might be admitted, but the Government appointed a Hindu. Again when, by the retirement of Mr. Sambamurthi Ayyar, a third place became vacant, the Government sent for Mr. Kothandaramanjulu Nayudu from Coimbatore and gave him the post, and impressed on us that the right of the Hindus had been given to the Hindus, although it could not be said that the right had come to the rightful.

We do not wish to involve ourselves in a discussion as to why a Muhammadan has not been nominated for that post, or whether these four seats will always be occupied by Hindus. If this principle be considered a fairly sound one, why should not some other department be set apart for Muhammadans? Apparently there is no advantage in either monopoly or decentralisation.

We are unable to give expression to our feelings of disappointment on the present occasion. Although this is a new defeat which our community has sustained, we are not concerned much about it. We advise our community not to worry about deprivation of rights and loss of national dignity. These punishments are from God. The community's first sin is want of trust in the Almighty.

128. The Qaumi Report, of the 6th September, has a leader on the marginally-noted subject of which the following is an excerpt:—

Qaumi Report, Madras, Sep. 6th, 1917.

Mussalmans and education.

It is an open secret that the progress made by the Mussalmans as compared with that of the Hindus is in the ratio of 1 to 11. If the Hindus are advancing the Mussalmans are receding.

In order to mend matters, first of all we require education, but religious education throws obstacles in the way of English education. It is true, the Government is not to blame in this respect, but it is surely responsible to this extent that it has not removed existing difficulties and complications, nor facilitated religious teaching.

The Hindus begin their English studies without learning about their religion, but this is not the case with Mussalmans and hence the Government should permit the teaching of Kôrân as the Bible is taught in schools, thus all difficulties may be removed.

With these remarks the editor thinks that it is high time for the Government to have regard to the importance of the Mussalmans and not to allow them to be absorbed by other great countries.

129. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 10th September, in a leading article giving a summary of His Excellency the Viceroy's recent speech in the Legislative Council, proceeds to observe:—We heartily rejoice to see that His Excellency made a speech so teeming with democratic principles and that steps are being taken to carry them into practice. His Excellency also stated that Mrs. Besant would be released, if she would confine herself to constitutional methods. High handedness is always reprehensible, whether it be found in the Government or in the people. Mrs. Besant and her party affirm that their methods have always been lawful, that Lord Pentland and others were autocratic, that this led to the passive resistance movement, that this latter led to an immediate announcement by Mr. Montagu that he would visit India personally, and also constrained the Imperial Government to advise the Government of Madras to keep to democratic methods. The Government of India, on the other hand, had to explain that Mrs. Besant and others overstepped the bounds of the constitution,

Sampad Abhyudaya, Mysore, Sep. 10th, 1917.

The Imperial Legislative Council.

that this necessitated the restraint over them, but for which they would have gone to further enormities, and that they would be released if they would keep within the bounds of the law. The Government and the people have alike acted in an unrestrained fashion. The people seldom take the initiative in opposing the Government. It is only under unbearable irritation, if they are unable to obtain proper redress of their grievances, if they come to think that they would rather lay down their lives than bear those hardships that they seek to ward off autocratic methods by means of a counter-movement. If the Government are kind, the people are ready to show their gratitude. It is in order to strengthen the British rule that Mrs. Besant and others urged the adoption of democratic principles in the shape of Home Rule. Some short-sighted persons thinking that the grant of Home Rule would affect their power, raised an uproar. Numerous patriots of the type of Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar resented this. This led the Home Government and the Government of India to realise that it was necessary to render the administration more democratic. It is natural that those in high authority should sometimes allow themselves to be swayed by passion and prejudice, and it is also natural that the people should allow themselves to be equally irritated thereby. But time heals these sores and even leads to mutual cordiality. We are glad to see that the situation had led up to this welcome change. Our one word of advice to the Government as well as to the people in this connection is not to be precipitate, but to take time to calm their feelings before they rush to action.

III.—Legislation.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Sep. 3rd, 1917.

Rate-payers' Association, Royapetta.

130. The Swadesamitran, of the 3rd September, publishes in Tamil the proceedings of a meeting of this association held under the presidency of Rao Bahadur G. Narayanaswami Chettiyar, on the 2nd idem, to protest against the passing of the emergency law by the local Government to raise the property-tax, which appear in New India of the same date.

IV.—Native States.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Sep. 10th, 1917.

The Pudukōttai Representative Assembly.

131. Referring to the report of the administration of Pudukōttai as laid before the 16th annual meeting of the Representative Assembly, the Hindu Nesan, of the 10th September, observes:—It is seen from this report that the prayer of the people that, on account of the failure of rains during the last season, they might be exempted from paying kist for fasli 1326 and that the same might be collected from them at a future favourable season, has not been granted by the Darbar. There is no Government in these days which admits the necessity of remitting or postponing the collection of land assessment, when the people pray therefor on account of the failure of rain or crops. With the Governments of today, the expenditure always exceeds the income. How can, then, any Government admit the necessity for a remission or postponement of the collection of taxes? They will only expect the ryots to pay down the kist at any cost. The opinion of Governments is always that, if the least concession is given to the ryots, they will claim for more. It is in pursuance of this opinion that the Pudukōttai Darbar, too, has now refused to grant the prayer of its subjects.

V.—Prospects of the Crops and the Condition of the People.

Vartakamitran, Tanjore, July 26th, 1917.

Sir Alexander Cardew's speech at the Coimbatore Agricultural College.

132. Adverting to the speech delivered by Sir Alexander Cardew on the occasion of the celebration of the Coimbatore Agricultural College Day, in which he is reported to have attributed the low yield, compared with western countries, from agriculture in India, to the ignorance, the superstition, the caste principles and the poverty of the Indian, the Vartakamitran, of the 26th July, remarks:—This is a very fine speech indeed, and a European could not have delivered a cleverer speech. These make the Indians themselves responsible for their poverty and attribute it to their caste principles. We cannot see how caste principles can operate against agricultural improvement. It is no doubt true that, while the agricultural yield is 33 bushels per acre in England, it is only 12 bushels per acre in India. The reason for this disparity is the incapacity of the Indian ryot to cultivate the land with the aid of manures and this in turn is due not to his want of faith in manures but to his want of money to purchase them. The poverty of the ryot is due to the excessive land tax he is paying and to its gradual increase. Though the Government are making a good profit out of their irrigational projects, the people have no rights whatever in this matter. What have the Government done till now to improve the condition of the ryots? They have organised an Agricultural Department. Has this department demonstrated till now to the people that it is possible to raise as much from land in India as it is in England, or has it pointed out the defects in the methods of cultivation followed by the Indians? They have established agricultural farms in different places. The officials in these farms have no idea whatever of the Indian system of agriculture and have only a theoretical knowledge of even the English system, and these go on complaining that the Indian system is faulty. Sir Alexander Cardew says that the system of dividing property in a family leads to an increase in the cost of cultivation. For agriculture which is conducted without the aid of machinery, the smaller the plot the better, and the larger the plot the greater will be the difficulty of irrigation and manuring. In Japan the plots are very small in extent, and yet agriculture is carried on to a large extent there. All these are vain excuses. The truth is that we hardly come across European officials taking a sincere interest in the improvement of India. If we complain of anything, they browbeat us by stale arguments such as that we spend away money in marriages, etc. As a matter of fact, the amount spent for marriages, funerals and such special ceremonies in India comes on the average only to Rs. 2 per year. This amount will not do for one day's wine and one week's cigars consumed by an ordinary European. What is the use of blabbing, without bestowing any attention on figures? Calculating the land assessment in Bombay, it works at 72 per cent in some places and 80 per cent in other places. How can Indian agriculture improve under these circumstances? It is terrible to think of the extent to which the Indian agriculturists are indebted. It amounts to nearly 500 crores of rupees. Will the Indian agriculturist pay interest for this huge debt, or will he pay the land tax, or will he apply manures for his land? What can he do? What is thé reason for all this? Ponder over it yourself. With all these defects, is Sir Alexander Cardew justified in finding fault with the Indian ryot?

1. The following appears in the West Coast Spectator of the 15th September:—"The District Magistrate of Coimbatore has, after hearing counsel for the counter-petitioners, confirmed his ex parte order in the flag case. The Madras Mail was correct, at least once, when it said the other day, that a little official blindness to the minor antics of the Home Rulers would be beneficial. We have carefully read the Magistrate's judgment, and we must confess that we are not convinced of the propriety of the order, which will no doubt be taken to the highest tribunal in the province for revision. It is our honest belief that much of the Home Rule activity would have died from boredom but for the over-zealousness of some officials."

2. Justice, of the 20th September, writes:—"We see from the reports of the Corporation meeting that was held on Tuesday evening last that Mr. Molony and the Commissioners have once again become a 'united family'. . . Mr. Molony's defence of his remark that he had the discretion to select the date of a special meeting was at least candid. It was made more in anger than in sorrow, quite the reverse of the case with the ghost. Local self-government in this country will be worth very little if it has to depend on the uncertain temper of an Irishman. Whatever the nature of Mr. Molony's defence may be he was certainly fortunate in having had the opportunity of making his defence after the acting period of the Brahman Deputy Collector. To escape another dose of that functionary the Commissioners were prepared to swallow anything, even Molony's mixture, and thus it came about that Mr. Molony became popular with the Commissioner's, thanks to his locum tenens while he was away at Kodaikanal."

3. The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 12th September, states:—"Any lengthy reference by His Excellency to Mrs. Besant's internment was obviated by Sir William Vincent's comprehensive answer to Mr. Jiunah's question on the subject. The Viceroy contented himself with saying that Lord Pentland's Government took action against her with the greatest reluctance and after trying to dissuade her from the course which she was pursuing. The Madras Government ought not to be blamed if Mrs. Besant refused to give the guarantee required of her, and the Government had to proceed against her as a last resort. . . It now rests with Mrs. Besant to avail herself of the consideration shown to her by the Government, and she would be well advised if she gave the necessary guarantee. The Government of India's reply is not to be construed as a climb-down, or as truckling to the amour propre of the agitators. The India Government uphold the action of the local Government and impose precisely the same conditions on the interned for their release."

Mrs. Besant's release.

Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, Sep. 12th, 1917.

The Malabar Herald, for the week ending 15th September, writes:—"The report in connection with the impending release of Mrs. Besant from internment is being talked about by the Home Rulers with a vehemence that is worthy of the cause. . . In the course of the Viceroy's speech at the recent meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council His Excellency said that unless Mrs. Besant made a promise that she would abstain from violent and unconstitutional political agitation, she would not be released. In face of this declaration it is improbable to believe the report that Mr. Mantagu's order of cancelment of the internment is that she should be released unconditionally. The Madras Government could not have acted in this important matter independently of the Government of India, and to our way of thinking Mr Montagu, as Secretary of State for India, would not issue an order, the execution of which would compromise the position of the Government of India and that of the Provincial Government to a lamentable extent."

Malabar Herald, British Cochin, Sep. 15th, 1917.

New India, Madras, Sep. 17th, 1917.

Writing under the heading, "How long are the innocent to suffer", New India, of the 17th September, observes:—"On 5th September 1917, His Excellency the Viceroy spoke from his place in the Imperial Legislative Council of the release of Mrs. Annie Besant and her two colleagues in particular and of the other interned in general. True, the spokesman of the Government of India in making the announcement spoke of a certain condition to their release, viz., that the Government of India should be satisfied that the interned patriots would not hereafter indulge in unconstitutional and violent agitation during the period of the war. But we took it that it was merely the official way of undoing an inexcusable wrong and that the condition was a formal insertion made in the interests of the prestige of the Government. . . We thought that the Government of India would at once have communicated their decision to Mrs. Besant and received from the interned, perhaps, some such answer as follows: 'It is foreign to our nature to take part in unconstitutional and violent agitation. We have never done so in the past and do not propose to do so hereafter.' It was generally expected that the Government, conscious as they are of their strength and power, would have been pleased to take this declaration as a sufficient fulfilment of the condition imposed by them and ordered the immediate restoration to liberty of the interned martyrs. . . If the Government of India meant anything more than what we have tried to describe above by their condition, we must say that their promise of realese was a mere sham. To subject loyal and law-abiding patriots to unjustifiable internments and to expect to get from them a confession of having done or said something which they have never done and which as honest persons they can never say they did are surely ways of procedure in keeping with mediæval methods, but are quite out of date today when so much is talked about freedom and justice and by none more loudly than by our Rulers. . . The Government seem to have no idea how strong the feeling of the country is about these internments and every day's delay is like adding fuel to the fire. It is not statecraft to drive the people to despair by continued disregard of their united prayers for the release of the interned. . . The Government should remember that while, perhaps, to them time is not of much consequence and they are considering how and when their orders of release should be given effect to, the internment is literally killing our noble leader, Mrs. Besant, and that the people are in no mood to bear her agony with equanimity."

Hindu, Madras, Sep. 18th, 1917.

The Hindu, of the 18th September, remarks:—"The order of release from internment reached Mrs. Besant and her companions at 11 o'clock last night and there will be a thrilling sense of relief and joy among the Indian public throughout the country at the receipt of this news. . . The result has showed the signal triumph of popular agitation in a just cause. The menacing howls of a local Anglo-Indian paper have wasted themselves in the air. We shall now await the outcome of the threat of revolt and resignation of the high official dignitaries in Madras, which the Madras Mail had the audacity to flaunt before the public—those momentous events to form the percursor of the ejection from office of Mr. Montagu, the Secretary of State. . . Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford have laid the Indian public under a deep debt of obligation for their brushing aside the empty threats of the Anglo-Indian reactionaries, and for doing justice as demanded by the united voice of the people of India. We welcome back Mrs. Besant and her co-workers to the ranks of active public workers from the scene of their unjust internments. We have no doubt Madras will give Mrs. Besant an ovation and public demonstration of rejoicing of such a description as cannot be restrained by the petulant interference of little men dressed in brief authority."

In a leader under the heading "The end of the internments," New India, of the 18th September, says:—"In the history of modern India the seventeenth of September 1917 will ever be reckoned as red-letter day not because three individuals however close to the heart of a grateful people, however eminent in their service to the motherland, have been allowed to breathe again the free air of liberty of which they should not have been deprived; but because the order which unconditionally cancels the internments symbolises the ultimate triumph of shining spirituality, manifested in the towering sacrifice and the stupendous services of Mrs. Besant in the cause of suffering humanity which have won for her a unique position and rank among the illustrious benefactors of the world, and because it also symbolises the triumph of the real British instincts. . . We rejoice because of the supreme satisfaction felt by every Home Ruler that his faith in the British conscience and the Britain's love of liberty and in the sufficiency of constitutional agitation to rouse these is vindicated in such a striking fashion." NEW INDIA, Madras, Sep. 18th, 1917.

New India, of the 19th September, has the following:—"Neither the Press communiqué nor the order relating to the release of Mrs. Besant can be deemed to have placed the Madras Government in any favourable light before the public in respect of what is universally acclaimed as an act of justice. . . The Government of India, it will be recollected, undertook to release Mrs. Besant and others, if they were satisfied that they would not take part in any violent or unconstitutional agitation during the war. The order of release being unconditional, we are entitled to assume that the Government of India have satisfied themselves not only that they will not in the future, but also that they have not in the past, taken part in any violent or unconstitutional agitation. It is only on this view that that statement in the communiqué is explicable, which states that 'the Government of India are satisfied that the restrictions imposed may now be removed'. That the Government of India should have, from the outset, taken upon themselves the task of satisfying themselves on whatever points they desired to have satisfaction, was in itself clear notice to the Madras Government that they felt that an independent dicision by themselves as to the need of the continuance of the internment orders was necessary. . . The additional statement in the communiqué, therefore, that they have acted 'in deference to the strong recommendation of the Government of India', adds but little strength to the legal position and introduces no grace into their 'deference' where none really existed, or was claimed before. If the Madras Government was prepared loyally to carry out the desires or recommendations of the Government of India, it should have accepted them and adopted them as its own and acted upon them, as is usually done. If it wanted, on the other hand, to throw the responsibility on the Government of India, it should have done so straight away as it has done in the first part and disclaimed any credit for showing any 'deference to the recommendations' which it has not really shown. . . . Anyhow, we much wish that the exhibition of a protest where none is openly made, had been avoided by a Governor in Council who continue to make themselves responsible for the carrying out of the order protested against orders which have reversed arbitrary executive action on a matter of policy so vital to the liberties and good government of the people." NEW INDIA, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

In an article under the heading "a Dummy Government," Justice, of the 20th September, writes as follows:—"Our contemporary the Madras Times in its leading article on Wednesday morning said that 'the Government of India are responsible for the administration and the good order of the country'. That appears to be so, and the Madras Government seem to have ceased to exist or exist only as a mere dummy. We were under the impression that provincial Governments were the responsible authorities for maintaining law and order within their jurisdiction. But that theory has vanished. In the exercise by the Government of India of what the Decentralisation Commission calls the 'constant and general supervision' over the provincial Governments the responsibility of the provincial Governments has dwindled down to nothing till the Government of India stand forth as the authority responsible in name and in fact for the maintenance of law and order all over India. The question now arises as to what is the use of a provincial Government. . . In the present case (i.e., Mrs. Besant's JUSTICE, Madras, Sep. 20th, 1917.

release from internment) there has been no evidence of a tendency for non-interference with the details of Indian administration on the part of the Secretary of State for India, and instead of making a beginning in the direction of provincial autonomy a very good demonstration has been given of provincial extinction. Within the last few weeks we have had installed a Government by cablegrams. . . . We do not think the authorities who have overruled the Madras Government in the present instance are likely to consent either to provincial autonomy or to the reduction of the powers of the Secretary of State for India. That is our view. And without provincial autonomy it will be extremely difficult to devise any satisfactory scheme of self-government for India. It may be said that the present action of the higher authorities was only intended to prepare a placid political atmosphere for Mr. Montagu. If that is really the case we should have thought that there would have been a general amnesty to all persons interned under the Defence of India Act, at least that is what one would expect from the Irish parallel of the release of the Sinn Feiners which our Home Rule friends are never tired of quoting. . . . The patriotic outburst of Indian Home Rulers seems to have been spent in getting the release of an Irish lady. There is nothing left to be used in the interests of hundreds of their own countrymen."

Hindu, Madras, Sep. 17th, 1917.

Sir Michael O'Dwyer's speech.

4. In a leader under the heading "A Hymn of Hate," the Hindu, of the 17th September, writes:—"It is difficult to speak in measured terms of Sir Michael O'Dwyer's extraordinary outburst in the Imperial Council. The author of the 'Hymn of Hate' could hardly have concentrated more venom into his diatribes than has Sir Michael in a speech which will probably pass down into history as the last despairing shriek of a school of bureaucrat which, in the evolution of Indian political life is rapidly passing away. It is the voice of the 'heaven born,' the kind of tin god who bases his conceptions of his office on the Providence in rough holland and a solah topee that Kipling loved to portray. To such a man criticism is disloyalty and it is not surprising that Sir M. O'Dwyer, perhaps, the most typical exponent of this school, should have let himself go in as bewildering a mixture of half-truths, untruths, false comparisons and savage sneers as ever we remember to have come across, familiar as we necessarily are with the daily efforts in this direction of Anglo-Indian journals.' . . . It is hardly possible to treat the Lieutenant-Governor's ferocious sneers as serious arguments but in so far as that is possible we shall try to reply to them. . . . A bureaucrat quoting Mill is as rare a phenomenon as a certain other person quoting scripture, but expediency often dictates disagreeable tasks. . . . It is hardly possible for us to go point by point into his speech, but such a proceeding is entirely unnecessary for the violence of the language is sufficient to rob his arguments of any effect that they might otherwise have had. Such phrases as 'the sinister attitude of those who would take advantage of the embarrassments of the empire in her hour of need': sneers like those in the passage 'There was no hesitation or sitting on the fence, no mawkish sympathy with red-handed crime, no insincere apologies for so-called misguided youths persuing noble ideals, no subtle distinctions between evolutionary and revolutionary patriotism;' his attempt to indentify Home Rule and anarchism on the ground of community of ideals; these constitute only a few samples from a speech from which the tub thumper will cull choice morsels for use for many a long day. Sir Michael's last effort is beneath of contempt as a piece of reasoning. As an effort at vituperation it can claim to rank beside that other 'Hymn of Hate', which is supposed to express the feelings of Germany for Britain."

New India, Madras, Sep. 17th, 1917.

Writing on this subject, New India, of the 17th September, says:—"Evidently Indian Members of the Supreme Legislative Council did not relish Sir Michael's manuscript eloquence. Nevertheless a second thought will convince them that they ought to be grateful to him, firstly, for relieving the monotony of the proceedings by his reckless frankness, and, secondly, by furnishing them an excellent proof of the demoralising effect of the Indian system of Government on British character. . . . In our opinion, the chief merit of the speech is the perfection with which it mirrors forth in its nakedness the average type of the bureaucratic soul. Whatever may be said against it, there is no doubt of the blunt frankness of bureaucratic purpose. When we say this, we have said all that could be said in its favour. Its spirit is mediæval and thoroughly un-English and is an anachronism so extraordinary at a time when all the four corners of the world are ringing with the cry of freedom. Its mental outlook is that of the proverbial frog in the well and its logic smells of Mother Earth—It is rustic and primeval. . . As to the inappropriateness of the present juncture, when almost all the countries engaged in the war are busy revising their constitutions, the man who tells us that we should allow this great opportunity to slip by, cannot be honest He must be asked to speed to his superannuation promptly and peremptorily."

WEDNESDAY REVIEW, Trichinopoly, Sep. 19th, 1917.

The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 19th September writes:— "Perhaps the most sensational event of the week has been Sir Michael O'Dwyer's speech in the Imperial Legislative Council. His Honour has made up for his four years' silence as a legislator by a single speech which has evoked an outburst of criticism to which he might not have been subjected if he was an habitual speaker. . . To keep such sturdy silence in the midst of so much talk is indeed a feat of no mean merit and only under a strong sense of duty Sir Michael must have broken his habitual silence and made a speech. We cannot help saying, however, that the intensity of his local patriotism has led him into being unfair to the other Provinces. . . Sir Michael has evidently been misled into taking a slightly prejudiced view of other provinces by the noise raised by a handful of agitators followed perhaps by a mob which counts for nothing in the public life of the country. The noisy agitator is abroad and has not spared the Punjab from his attentions. But nowhere has he been able to capture the better mind of India and have him taken seriously. It is true that the Home Rule movement looks as if it had a large following. But a close analysis of the affair would show that it is being engineered by a small clique for various reasons, personal and otherwise. The Punjab is not alone in repudiating the claims of Mrs. Besant to guide Indian public life. Bengal has proved that it can do without her. Bombay and the United Provinces have in their attitude to passive resistance proved how slight is Mrs. Besant's hold on them. Madras, it is true, appears to be more largely influenced by her than any other province; and that is easily explained. . . If Mrs. Besant's following is closely analysed, it will be found that only a negligible part of it is for Home Rule and that mostly composed of students. So that Sir Michael need not claim for the Punjab any exclusive credit for political soundness. . . Sir Michael said that self-government was put forward as a panacea for all the evils of India but he was sceptical about it. A very large number of us share his scepticism. Except a few perfervid orators on the platform and an equally small number of enthusiasts in the press, nobody said self-government was a panacea for all evils. . . The shibboleth that is in such vogue that no Government can be a substitute for self-government is only beloved of the agitator. The average citizen who is enjoying the blessings of a settled rule like the British is content with good government and has no ambition to live under an indifferent rule albeit it is styled self-government. That is the central fact of the Indian situation and it cannot be hidden under any quantity of frothy orations."

Andhrapatrika, Madras, Sep. 13th, 1917.

The Russian situation.

6. The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th September, says:—While the news that the Russians have opposed the German offensive and have successfully arrested the German advance have filled us with great hopes, the frightful news of internal dissensions gives room for agitation. It is regrettable that difference of opinion prevails between Commander Korniloff and Kerensky, which may lead to a civil war. Korniloff is trying to assume the reins of the Government. He is marching his army on Petrograd. . . We think that the internal dissensions will soon disappear. The incapability of Russia cannot change the issue of the war. The issue will be settled in the western theatre. In that theatre the English, the French and the American armies will meet with success.

Desamata, Rajahmundry, Sep. 12th, 1917.

Russia.

7. The Desamata, of the 12th September, says:—Internal dissensions having passed all bounds on account of German intrigues, Russia has suffered much and is a source of disappointment to the Allies. As at this juncture, America has come to the help of the Allies there is no need to fear even if Russia's help is not secured.

Ravi, Cocanada, Sep. 13th, 1917.

The Servians.

8. The Ravi, of the 13th September, says:—The Servian Press Association has represented to the Allies that all the crops in Servia have been taken away by the enemy, that bread is available at only one loaf a week, that thousands of children are dying for want of milk, that the 80,000 Servians detained in Austria-Hungary have died, and that therefore help is urgently needed.

Kistnapatrika, Masulipatam, Sep. 15th, 1917.

The war.

9. The Kistnapatrika, of the 15th September, in its leader, writes:—Russia is now immersed in an ocean of sorrow. The Germans have crossed the Dwina and taken Riga and thence they are trying to march to Petrograd along three routes. Petrograd is the capital of Russia. The inhabitants are panic stricken and are leaving it in crowds to other parts of the country. In this city there are a large number of Manmalists who are friends of Germany and traitors to Russia. They are trying to turn the Russian armies to their side and are encouraging anarchy. There are no foodstuffs in the city. Famine is raging. The ryots are revolting against the landlords and are dividing the land amongst themselves. There is to be seen no law and order. Under such circumstances the Russian Government has transferred its seat to Nizimi-Novgarod, an ancient town near Moscow. The banks have also been removed thither and the people are every day leaving their homes and are proceeding to other places.

It is not known whether the enemy really intends to march on Petrograd or not. As the Germans possessed a greater number of guns than the Russians they were able to cross the Dwina. But in their future progress they will have to meet with many obstacles in their way. There is no good road to Petrograd. There are many rivers, lakes and hills and the winter is approaching. . . Even if the enemy reaches Petrograd what is it that they can gain? Though the Russians are in such a critical plight, they are not willing to enter into a separate peace with the enemy. When the new Government in Russia is not yet properly established, it is certain that the conduct of the affairs of war is a difficult matter. Dissensions within and war without would incapacitate any statesman. All this is true. But if Russia enters now into a separate peace, it will bring upon itself perpetual danger. The Germans will have become its masters and there will be no limit for German tyranny. . . Germany already wields much influence in Russia. . . It was the great endeavour of Germany to convert Russians into Germans. The great statesmen of Russia therefore declare that no separate peace should be entered into by Russia. . . It was the ambition of Germany to become the mistress of the whole of Europe, which was the cause of war. Though, therefore, Russia is not moved by any desire to acquire new territory or any such ambition, unless and until the avarice of Germany is frustrated, Russia cannot retire from the battlefield. Even if Germany takes advantage of the disturbed condion of Russian armies and marches against Petrograd, it may be stated with certainty that Mr. Kerensky, the Russian statesman, who is administering the affairs of Russia, will never agree to a separate peace with Germany. But the internal dissensions, however, gave a great advantage to Germany. The German machinations, it may be supposed, were to some extent at least the cause of these dissensions. It is very regrettable that such great Russian General as Kornilof should revolt against the Government of Mr. Kerensky. . . But the Cossacks, the heroes of the Russian army, are trying to effect a compromise between the Russian General and the Prime Minister. . . A compromise may most probably be brought about. Otherwise, it is feared that Russia will be involved in a series of dangers and prove an eternal menace to the liberty of humanity.

We learn from a telegram that though the Government dismissed General Kornilof from service, he is marching against Petrograd with a portion of the army. . . All armies except those in the south are under the control of the Government. The several societies in Russia passed resolutions condemning Kornilof. We hear that the Government of Kerensky is gaining strength. The traitors who revolted against the Government are being imprisoned one after another. The newspapers publishing the declarations of the traitors are being stopped. And Kerensky proclaimed in every town that the revolt would be put down by drastic laws.

The Ministers in France have resigned their offices and the new Ministry has not yet been formed.

Jaridah-i-Rozgar, Madras, Sep. 14th, 1917.

10. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 14th September, referring to Mr. Lloyd George's speech on the present situation in Russia and France, writes :—Obviously Russia is not a little kingdom to be easily converted into a German colony or her territories captured one after the other. It should be borne in mind that the capture of a couple of cities in the largest country in Europe, or the abandonment by the Russian army of some of its positions, does not mean a decline in military strength. Russia is a powerful State and is able to recover her lost territories, if not today, then tomorrow.

Viveka Bodhini, Madras, July 1917.

11. While welcoming the news of the increase of the number of permanent Judges in this court to ten, as being conducive to the speedy disposal of cases here, the Viveka Bodhini, for July, refers to the reduction of the seats available for vakils on the Madras Bench, if the number of permanent Judges is to be ten, on account of the operation of the statutory restriction that not less than a third should be Barristers and not less than a third civilians, and suggests the desirability of avoiding this evil result by either fixing the number of permanent Judges as nine or altering the law in such a manner as to secure three seats for vakils.

The Madras High Court.

Yogakshemam, Trichur, Sep. 14th, 1917.

12. The Yogakshemam, of the 14th September, points out that the District Judge of South Malabar is against the Government's policy of exempting certain persons from personal attendance in Civil Courts, and that, in the opinion of the Judge, those, who are so exempted and who, therefore, refuse to attend the Courts, would be guilty of contempt of Court, and says :—In our opinion the Judges have only to administer justice in accordance with law, and that it is not their duty to make laws. Besides, we do not believe that the Judges who sit under a punkah, can appreciate the difficulties, which the parties or witnesses undergo in the British Courts (in India). As on account of frequent adjournments, it takes the life-time of a person to get justice done, the credit which the Court may get by causing unnecessary inconvenience to those that are not parties in a suit, is not in our opinion a desirable one.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 12th, 1917.

13. The Dravidan, of the 12th September, writes as follows on this subject:—

Students and politics.

The students of Trichinopoly, Kumbakōnam, Guntūr and Coimbatore have grown so bold as to defy the order of the Government. Deobhanker and Shivakama Ammal have become famous in Trichinopoly. The heroes of Bombay have come out prominently even in Guntūr, and the editor of the Young India is conspicuous in Coimbatore. At a meeting of the Literary Society attached to the Kumbakōnam College, students propose to discuss on the present necessity for Home Rule for India and the possibility of its acquisition. In the History Association attached to the same college, the editor of New India is going to deliver a lecture on the poverty of India. Much harm will be caused if the Government should quietly witness these things. Are the college authorities sleeping? What is the Director of Public Instruction, Madras, doing?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 13th, 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 13th September, publishes from the pen of a correspondent an abstract of the proceedings of a meeting held by 200 students of the Rajahmundry College, under the presidency of Mr. Sri Ram, who is said to have spoken on the position of students and their right to maintain their freedom. A resolution is reported to have been unanimously passed at the meeting protesting against G.O. No. 559, which prohibits students from taking part in politics.

a public meeting held at Kumbakōnam on the 13th idem, under the presidency of Rao Bahadur N. Krishnaswami Ayyangar to protest against the calumnious reports spread against the students of the local Government College by the Madras Mail that speeches on such subjects as swaraj and "Poverty of India" are delivered in the Students' Association attached to that college. The president and several others who addressed the meeting are reported to have said that the observations of the Mail in its issue of the 10th idem on the conduct of the students of this college are contrary to facts and that the Government and the Educational Department should not take notice of the babblings of that paper.

Desabhimani, of the 9th September, says:—The readers themselves have to see whether the Government order regarding students and politics is for the good or evil of the students. It is not proper on the part of the Government to interfere unnecessarily in such matters, instead of resting satisfied with the spread of education. The duty of setting right the conduct of students should rest with the heads of the respective schools. Unnecessary interference on the part of the Government and the readiness with which the school authorities submit to their orders, appear to have driven the students to seek the means of their own salvation. The students in Trichinopoly and Guntūr have set an example. If this should spread, nobody could stop the current. The Government will do well to cancel their order at least now. It is not our intention that the students should be allowed to take an active part in political meetings. Our idea is that if they attend meetings and comprehend the things discussed therein, such education will be useful to them when they leave the school and begin to serve the country. . . If the Indians had self-government, such orders would never have been passed.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 12th September, reports the proceedings of a meeting of students held at Masulipatam, in which it was resolved to submit a memorial to Government requesting them to rescind the order prohibiting students from attending political meetings. He asks the students in other towns to convene similar meetings and submit similar memorials to Government.

Students and politics.

The Manorama, of the 14th September, refers to the determination of about 200 students in Trichinopoly to attend political meetings, and to the possibility of those in Coimbatore, Guntūr and Rajahmundry following their example, and hopes that the order on the subject will be so modified as to make it unexceptionable to them.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Sep. 14th, 1917.

While expressing regret at the decision of the students of the eastern districts to protest against the Government order on the subject of the "students and politics", which none who has their welfare at heart would regard as out of place, the Kerala Patrika, of the 15th September, points out that, while grown-up and educated students may be in a position to think of the consequences of their acts, younger ones are likely to do mischief in the name of liberty, and observes that, if it be held that the students should quietly accept the present system of education, then they cannot be said to be wrong in holding meetings and protesting against the order in question, and that what the Government should do is to make the necessary changes in the system.

KERALA PATRIKA, Calicut, Sep. 15th, 1917.

Students and politics.

A student correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th September, says:—It is satisfactory that although the leaders are silent, the students are working for the repeal of the Government Order regarding students and politics. The Guntūr students and some people of Masulipatam and other places have held meetings and sent memorials. On this account 120 students in Guntūr have been turned away from the school for a week. This has been a source of irritation to the students. We hope the rest of the students also will follow their example. It rests upon students to get this unreasonable order rescinded. . . Therefore, O brother students! Muster courage, and think of your future duty without being afraid of the small threats and punishments of principals.

Students and politics.

A correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 13th September, referring to the conduct of the students of Trichinopoly, who are reported to be evincing great interest in Home Rule processions, and to the steps taken by the Principal of St. Joseph's College, when he found that the students of that college were committing a breach of G.O. No. 559, trusts that proper measures will be adopted by the authorities in cases of disobedience on the part of the students to the Government order referred to above.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 13th, 1917.

The Dravidan, of the 14th September, reports that a meeting was held at Trichinopoly on the 11th idem, under the auspices of the Coimbatore Students' Association, when the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar is stated to have addressed the students on Home Rule.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 14th, 1917.

Education of Sengunthars.

14. In the course of a long article contributed by a correspondent to the Dravidan of the 14th September, describing the present low condition of Sengunthars, a weaving community in South India, and attributing this to want of education and to certain social restrictions imposed on them by the headman of the community, makes the following observations:—Even in these days of the benign English Government, the headmen of certain communities are imposing undue restrictions upon the members thereof, which cause several kinds of hardships to the poor people and affect their freedom. The Government would do well to interfere in such cases and enact some law which would put an end to these hardships. It is hoped that the benign Government would soon better the condition of these Sengunthars by introducing compulsory primary education and giving them instruction in industries, and by granting scholarships to enable the members of this community to secure higher education.

The educational salvation of the country.

15. The Vivcka Chintamani for August publishes the following extract on this subject from a speech delivered by Mr. V. Srinivasa Achariyar, Chairman, Municipal Council, Madura, on the 27th July 1917:—"In the great agitation now made throughout the country for universal education, we are apt to overlook the vital issues regarding the nature and the amount of learning which is to be regarded as the minimum qualification for a claim to education. The three R's, VIVEKA CHINTAMANI, Madras, August, 1917.

reading, writing and arithmetic, are generally regarded as the ideal of popular education. But this ideal is miserably low. Of what use is education if owing to neglect of ordinary sanitary precautions a man is afflicted by pestilential diseases which are sources of danger to himself and his neighbours. Again, if a man is untruthful, does not discharge his obligations to the society, wants improperly to benefit himself at the expense of others, the education has served no purpose. There is no charm in statistics. The number of schools in the country may be increased, the expenditure on education may be enhanced, and the rise in number of students attending schools in the country may be very satisfactory. But these figures, however dazzling in themselves, have no real significance if the education imparted is not such as to improve the physical and the mental happiness of the students and to elevate the general condition of the society."

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 15th, 1917.

16. The Andhrapatrika, of the 15th September, has the following note:—

The students of Madras are contemplating to send a memorial to His Excellency the Governor requesting him to cancel G.O. No. 559. The conference of students has at present stopped.

DESABHIMANI, Cuddalore, Sep. 15th, 1917.

17. The Desabhimani, of the 15th September, has the following leaderette on this subject in its English columns:—"We are glad that the Madras Government have at last taken the bold step of nominating non-official president to district board as an experimental measure in a few selected districts, viz., Vizagapatam, Gōdāvari, South Arcot and Trichinopoly. We are really proud that among the districts selected by Government for making this experiment, our district has earned the distinction and privilege of being one. This evidently signifies at once the importance which the Government attach to this district from the administrative standpoint and the fitness of our district people for getting increased privileges and responsibilities in the administration of their own affairs. The presidentship of a district board is one of the most onerous and responsible offices that a non-official can hold, and we venture to say that the regime of Diwan Bahadur Mr. A. Subbaroyulu Reddiyar as the President of the South Arcot District Board will so run as to not only justify the regard and esteem which the Government have for this district but also the high expectations which the people of South Arcot would entertain at his nomination to the presidentship of South Arcot District Board. It must be conceded on all hands that Mr. Reddiyar's tenure of office as the non-official president of the Cuddalore Taluk Board was one of continued success. But we would like to point out in this connection that the presidentship of the taluk board is not the same as that of the district board. On the other hand, there is much distinction between the two, not only in point of their jurisdiction but also in the nature and degree of their administrative responsibilities, which, we trust, a non-official president shall realise. In the old condition of things, the District Collector who was, at the same time, the president of the district board was almost solely responsible for the framing of the policies of the local boards' administration in the district and by virtue of his position and experience served as a wholesome guide to non-official presidents who newly entered into their office. Under the present instalment of this trial reform, the old order has essentially changed and a new condition of things has come in. We, therefore, look forward with eager expectations to the beneficial results accruing from this increased privilege which the Madras Government have been pleased to grant to the people as an experimental step."

Non-official presidents for district boards.

The same paper publishes a note in Tamil on this subject expressing the hope that these non-official presidents would discharge the duties of their office satisfactorily and avail themselves of the opportunity to prove that they are themselves capable of managing their own affairs.

KERALA PATRIKA, Calicut, Sep. 15th, 1917.

Referring to the appointment of non-officials as presidents of the Gōdāvari, South Arcot, Trichinopoly and Vizagapatam district boards, the Kerala Patrika, of the 15th September, fails to understand why the Malabar District Board was not included in the list, though more qualified persons are to be found in Malabar which is in no way behind the other districts.

Non-official presidents of district boards.

18. The Swadesamitran, of the 19th September, refers to a resolution brought by a member of the Tanjore District Board, that the Board should be given the right to elect its Vice-President, which has been approved by a majority of the board and submitted to the Government, and observes that though the Government have the power to accept or reject it, they will do well to approve of the resolution, considering its nature and the wish of majority of the members of the board.

19. The Andhrapatrika, of the 14th September, says:—The Bezwada Municipal Council is notorious for quarrels between its members and the Municipal Chairman. In 1916-17 a sum of Rs. 3,208-5-0 remained uncollected, of which a portion was due from the Railway authorities and the Revenue Divisional officer. It is not encouraging to the common people that responsible people do not discharge their duties. . . The Sub-Collector, the Collector and the Government have blamed the municipal members for the misunderstanding between themselves and the chairman. They have not shown proper grounds for it. There is no ground for throwing the whole blame upon one side. The chairman should be elected so that such misunderstandings may be obviated. An elected chairman cannot but co-operate with the representatives of the people. The Municipal Councillors request that the chairman may be elected. We pray that the Government will grant this request.

20. Writing under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th September, says:—The Government have written that the Cuddapah Municipal Council itself should attend to the drainage of the municipality. We cannot agree with them. It is regrettable that the Government avoid their responsibility in regard to the drainage channels.

21. The Desamata, of the 12th September, regrets that while the Municipality of Rajahmundry is already unhealthy and insanitary, the municipality is going to sanction the establishment of rice mills in the heart of the town, paying no heed to the protests of the Khaji, the Doctor, and the Principal, of the Mosque, the hospital, and the Training College respectively, which will all be disturbed by the noise of the mills. We pray that the Government will not follow the opinion of the Municipal Council, but will act according to the opinion of the Khaji and the officers referred to above.

The Rajahmundry Municipality.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Sep. 12th, 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th September, says:—It appears that the Municipality of Rajahmundry is thinking of extending the vegetable market that is now in the heart of the town. As the municipality could not do so without help from the Government, it is the duty of the Government to render it pecuniary help, for a convenient market is a desideratum at Rajahmundry. . . We hope the municipality will themselves set right the other defects of the town.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

22. The Andhrapatrika, of the 18th September, says:—It appears from the report of the Nellore Municipal Council that taxes were collected from the people by force to some extent. We hope that the municipality will not resort to coercive measures in the collection of taxes at least hereafter to any large extent. . . The municipality has not expended the grant separately given to it by the Government largely on works tending to the welfare of the people. The chairman has tried to justify this, but we are not satisfied with his explanation. We hope that in the future at least the municipality will spend the grant of the Government for the good of the people and not disappoint them. For providing the people with a good supply of drinking water, the municipality require large funds. It is impossible for the municipality to provide it without pecuniary help from the Government.

24. Under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 13th September, says:—Before the Assistant Deputy Commissioner goes out on tour, he sends notice to the Circle Inspector to keep everything ready. He requires that such and such things to be kept ready on such and such a day. The Inspectors in their turn send for the Sub-Inspectors and ask them to keep all things ready awaiting the arrival of the Assistant or Deputy Commissioner. The difficulties of the Sub-Inspectors from that moment are beyond description. They have to keep ready eggs, sodawater, milk and fruits. They have to supply peons for the Assistant or Deputy Commissioner's tappal . . . If any one thing is not supplied because it is not available, the officer waxes wroth, and an order transferring the Sub-Inspector in default is issued immediately or some time afterwards. But the reason of the transfer will never be revealed. The Inspectors have to provide the officer with the services of a washerman, a barber and a cobbler. He has to supply him with fodder for his horse. Are these the things that a Sub-Inspector should attend to when his range is inspected? There is an order of the Separate Revenue Department directing that the Inspecting officers should get their supplies through the village officers. The Inspecting officers violate this order, and annoy their subordinates for the supplies.

TRAVANCORE ABHIMANI, Nagercoil, May 11th, 1917.

India and Home Rule.

25. Referring to the special session of the Madras Provincial Conference recently held and the speech of Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao delivered therein justifying the immediate demand for Home Rule to India, the Travancore Abhimani, of the 11th May, expresses its surprise at Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao, who, as the Diwan of three self-governing States, should have noted how the grievances of the people were never redressed in these States, pleading for Home Rule and dwelling upon the hardships still suffered by the depressed classes, says that it will be a gross injustice to these classes if Home Rule is granted to this country and thereby entrust the well-being of the poorer classes in the hands of a handful of people.

DRAVIDABHIMANI, Salem, Sep. 14th, 1917.

India and Home Rule.

Anent the cry of Home Rule in the air now, the Dravidabhimani, of the 14th September, expresses its surprise at even some non-Brahmans indulging in this cry along with their Brahman brethren, when the people here are not able to control their own homes and have to learn the principles of self-government only hereafter, and is of opinion that Home Rule should not be granted to this country until and unless each community here confines itself to the duties ordained for it and all classes become united, without each reviling the other.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 15th, 1917.

Home Rule.

After stating that Mr. Sriram delivered a speech on the 12th September on behalf of the Rajahmundry Home Rule League on "Home Rule and the present situation", a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th September, gives the following:—Home Rule should be had at least for maintaining self-respect. Without Home Rule, self-respect cannot be maintained. . . In South Africa and in Canada our self-respect has been violated. When 1,500 years ago, the other countries were uninhabited, and the Romans were savages, India was enjoying self-government and prosperity. How can it stand to reason to say that such a country is now unfit for Home Rule. Although the British have been ruling this country for a hundred and fifty years, it has not made that progress in education which Japan has made in forty years. All the industries have declined. This shows that the present system of administration should undergo a change. Some say that the educated are treading the masses under foot. Who was it that introduced the Educational Bill? and who rejected it? Endeavours are being made to see that the lawful wishes of the Indians are not granted. They (the Government) are not responsible to anybody, but act as they please. Mr. Montagu also expressed the same idea in the Mesopotamia debate. The attention of the Government of India has been fixed upon suppressing the agitation for Home Rule. We must all accept the resolutions of the Congress and the Moslem League and say that we do not want anything short of what they wanted. If we submit to smaller boons, we will be playing with the wheel of time. The Government are imposing restrictions on us needlessly and without reason. They are increasing day by day. G.O. No. 559 and the Madras internments are improper. It has been the practice since the time of Lord Lytton to deprive (?) us of our liberty by such improper means. But we were then sleeping, and now we have awakened. The improper methods of the Government have led to union among the Indians. We have to be grateful to the Government for this. The Government do not pay any heed to agitation. So we must take proper steps. Only one thing is left for us. It is passive resistance. It succeeded in Africa and in England. It has succeeded in India also. This passive resistance which is full of love and is characterised by fearlessness, and forbearance will grant the Indians all their wishes. This is the ultimate weapon of the Indians. As soon as we carry that weapon, endure difficulties and go to jail, God will hear our representations and open the gates of Home Rule to the Indians.

Home Rule.

The Bharatamata, of the 29th August (received on the 14th September), gives a brief summary of the Vizagapatam speech of Mr. Harisarvottama Rao on the subject of Home Rule.

BHARATAMATA, Vizianagram, Aug. 29th, 1917.

The Home Rulers.

26. The Tamilian, of the 22nd August, makes fun of the new phase of the activity of the Home Rulers in deciding to resort to passive resistance, characterising it as a mad idea, and observes that these make much noise because the Government are keeping quiet, thereby creating an impression in their minds that they are afraid of them. This paper approves of the action of the Government in declaring the security of Rs. 2,000 paid by the editor of New India to be forfeited, and observes that this editor is here reaping the fruits of his own mistake.

TAMILIAN, Madras, Aug. 22nd, 1917.

The political situation.

27. The United Church Herald for September has the following in its English columns:—"It is impossible to avoid some reference to the present political situation in India, even in a paper which, as a rule, keeps clear of politics It is quiet clear that a considerable measure of reform is needed in India for the administration of this country. The Government also is evidently alive to this need and is preparing for it. It has been suggested that a conference should be called of Indian and English leaders in India, both official and non-official, for the purpose of drawing up some plan for the development of the Indian Government towards a real self-government. This suggestion seems to us eminently sensible and likely to result in the adoption of the best plan for the political progress of India. . ."

UNITED CHURCH HERALD, Nagercoil, Sep. 1917.

Present political situation.

The Swadesamitran, of the 17th September, publishes in Tamil the speech delivered on this subject by Mr. A. Rangaswami Ayyangar, the editor of the Swadesamitran, at a public meeting held in Tanjore on the 14th September 1917. The speech appears in English in the Hindu of the 17th idem.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 17th, 1917.

The present political situation.

The Swadesamitran, of the 17th September, writes:—Every one who bestows some thought upon the political events of last week will know that the wheel of time in this country is now revolving very fast. Those who have tried to arrest the speed of this wheel, be they Anglo-Indians or Indians, have only accelerated it. Sir Michael O'Dwyer's speech in the Imperial Legislative Council can be quoted as a most recent instance in point. How can the Secretary of State and the Viceroy be pleased with the responsible head of a province forgetting his responsibility and status and using the worst language possible about the popular leaders in other provinces and their work? As Mr. Montagu has sufficient experience of such officials, we doubt not that he will condemn the speech of Sir Michael O'Dwyer without paying any heed to it. This speech has again given an opportunity to our Viceroy to understand the real attitude and opinion of the majority of the officials. We, therefore, hope that he will hereafter at least take prompt steps to control his subordinate officials properly in view of the obstacles which they may throw in the way of the introduction of reforms in this country. Telegrams received today show that the consideration of the reforms to be introduced will be taken up very shortly, and representatives and institutions desirous of offering suggestions in the matter, have been asked to submit their definite proposals through the local Government before the Secretary of State discusses the points with them. We find it necessary to lay stress on one point here. If every one begins to offer suggestions, the number of suggestions may swell and they may not also agree. As far as our people and our country are concerned, this is not the time for offering individual suggestions. What we should do first is to make the Secretary of State and the Viceroy have a correct idea of the sincere aspirations of the people and the main characteristics of the reforms demanded by them, and note the unanimous determination of the people to accomplish their objects. The best means of doing this has been suggested by Mr. Gandhi, and we hope all the patriots of the country will act upon his suggestion. Experience shows that those who are engaged in the service of the country, have always to meet with many obstacles, and the activities of the few self-constituted leaders of the non-Brahman community here may be quoted as an instance. But the conduct of the adherents of Mr. Thegaraya Chettiyar at the meeting held last Saturday in the Gokhale Hall is sufficient to give the lie direct to the claim of Mr. Chettiyar and others to voice the opinions of forty millions of people. We hope that, even as those assembled at that meeting, kept their heads cool and are trying to accomplish their object, the people in the mufassal will also take such steps as will spread the Home Rule principles and secure the reforms connected therewith, without minding the obstacles that they may meet with.

LOKAPRAKASAM, Trichur, Sep. 17th, 1917.

The situation.

Under the heading "the situation," the Lokaprakasam, of the 17th September, has the following in English:—Following in the wake of Mr. Montagu's pronouncement, the speech with which His Excellency Lord Chelmsford, our Viceroy, opened the autumn session of the Imperial Legislative Council, has agreeably surprised the public by going a great way in relieving the tension of the present situation. For some time past the situation before the country was causing serious misgivings to one and all. The atmosphere was charged with mistrust and suspicion, and dark clouds so banked up in the horizon that the signs produced serious uneasiness and grave apprehension in the minds of all who could read them aright. The policy of repression upon which the Government of the new Viceroy embarked, greatly despaired the public, who having expressed their keen resentment at it began, in a helpless manner, to talk of the last weapon in their armoury—passive resistance. The situation thus created was ominous in all conscience, and required careful and delicate handling. It was at such a critical period Mr. Montagu made his debut to preside over the destiny of India, and it was hailed with great satisfaction throughout the country. For, his past credentials as Under Secretary of State during the memorable regimé of Lord Morley had brought out his noble qualities of statesmanship in a pre-eminent measure so as to exhibit to the world his ardent sympathy with India and her aspirations towards a larger, fuller and higher life. The new Secretary's advent was responsible for creating feelings of expectancy in the minds of the public, and agreeably to it he did not let the grass grow under his feet before he set himself to the task of initiating a policy of conciliation. His initial act was therefore the salutary announcement on the future of India and the lines on which that future was to be realised; and like the magician's wand the announcement had the desired effect of immediately dissipating to a large extent the unwholesome atmosphere of prejudice, passion, mistrust and suspicion. The noble utterance of the Viceroy who has exhibited alacrity in putting into operation the fresh policy of conciliatory statesmanship deserves commendation, and the confident note that he wants his administration to be judged on work accomplished and not on promises made, has so pleased our countrymen that they have commenced cherishing high hopes on the new regimé which, it is ardently expected, will synchronise with the new era of progress and political development. The quiet thus restored does not seem to have pleased certain Anglo-Indian wobler, and the two remarkable but unhealthy outbursts, one from Sir Michael O'Dwyer, Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab in the Viceroy's Council, and the other by Mr. Beatson Bell, the Senior Member of the Bengal Government, have been responsible to fan the fire so as to rouse considerable criticism at a time when peace, contentment and co-operation are badly needed. The flag imbroglio at Coimbatore and the fuss created at the Calicut public meeting for both of which Messrs. Macmichael, I.C.S., and Evans, I.C.S., were responsible also deserve mention in passing. Small incidents like these strengthen the hand of croakers of evil who prognosticated all manner of disasters to attend upon Mr. Montagu's visit to this country in December hinting darkly at an open collision with the Viceroy the consequent clash of authorities and the paralyzation of Government. Mischievous attempts such as the above which go a great way in creating unrest and commotion deserve to be put down premptorily.

Turning also to our own public men and our affairs the situation does not seem to be cheery. The unfortunate Congress-split which have manifested itself hopelessly is deeply to be deplored. The chaos and confusion for the creation of which some of the prominent leaders of Bengal were responsible have now to take an earnest effort for effecting a reasonable compromise upon a constitutional basis. The election of the President has now been referred to the All-India Congress Committee which meets on the 6th proximo, and so it might to a certain extent, be expected, that all cause of difference have disappeared so as to prepare the ground for a satisfactory settlement. With the differences thus made up, it will be for all classes of the community to join hands and lend their willing and whole-hearted co-operation for the political advancement of the country. The arrival for the first time of the Secretary of State in India, it may be presaged, will herald the dawn of a new life to our people in all diverse directions and place us high in the scale of nations as a strong self-governing unit of the British Empire with which we are indissolubly bound.

Authorities and Home Rule.

28. Referring to the action of the Sub-Inspector of Police and the Sub-Magistrate of Sivaganga in making enquiries to find out the persons who pasted the Home Rule notices in the several streets of the place, a correspondent writes as follows to the Swadesamitran of the 12th September:—It is not understood what great harm these Home Rule notices have caused to these officers and the people to require such action being taken by these officers who are responsible for the maintenance of public peace. It is rumoured that these notices were not only an eyesore to Mr. Miller, who is the Assistant Manager of the lessees in this place, but also wounded his feelings much, and that, as a result of his writing to the Collector on the subject, these officers are obliged to make the enquiries. It is, indeed, very strange that the subordinate authorities of this place should act in such a provoking manner, especially when His Excellency the Governor-General has been pleased to notify that all of us should maintain a calm atmosphere without giving the least room for any disturbance or confusion in consideration of the proposed visit of Mr. Montagu to this country to discuss questions regarding the present Home Rule movement.

29. The Swadesamitran, of the 13th September, publishes from the pen of a correspondent the proceedings of a public meeting held at Conjeeveram on the 11th idem, under the auspices of the local Congress Committee and the Home Rule League, when in addition to the resolution passed regarding the public reception to be accorded to Mr. Montagu during his visit to this country, resolutions are also reported to have been passed praying for the release of the interned patriots and the repeal of several oppressive laws and orders, and advocating the adoption of the policy of passive resistance in case this prayer is not granted.

On the 10th Mr. Sri Ram is stated to have delivered a lecture on Home Rule, in the course of which he is said to have advocated the adoption of the policy of passive resistance until the persons interned are released. Many students are reported to have attended this meeting. On the 11th idem the Home Rule members of the locality are said to have assembled in the office of the Manorama Press and resolved to hoist Home Rule flags.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 13th, 1917.

The judgment in the Home Rule flag case.

31. The Swadesamitran, of the 13th September, characterises the judgment of the District Magistrate of Coimbatore in the Home Rule flag case as a curious one and observes:—No one can say that the procedure adopted by him is warranted either by the Procedure Code or by the statutes in force, or will be upheld by the High Court. Both Mrs. Besant and Mr. Macmichael, who tried her case, belong to England. Both have been accustomed from their tender years to regard their houses as their forts and to feel that the Government are bound to safeguard the enjoyment of their rights, without the least restraint. Forgetting completely that common feeling, this Magistrate denied to Mrs. Besant the rights she has in her own house and used an extraordinary power, vested in him only for the purpose of preventing an imminent riot, to deprive British subjects of their natural rights. Every one of us having a high regard for the English system of Government has to condemn this with a fallen crest. Only one argument is adduced in this lengthy judgment for depriving Mrs. Besant of her rights, and no evidence is sought for or desired regarding the truth or otherwise of the facts on which this argument is based. The Magistrate says that he is personally aware of these facts. But the question is whether in a sound system of judicial administration, a witness can be a Judge, and we need not point out what importance can be attached to a judgment delivered by one who is both a witness and a Judge. But some may think that, though the fact of a witness being the Judge cannot bespeak a sound administration of justice, we should examine this judgment in the light of the emergency of the order issued by the Magistrate and the regard which we are bound to have for his evidence, and accept it, if we find it to be all right. Let us see if, according to this test at least, the curious judgment can stand. The point of which the Magistrate said he was personally aware was that, on account of the misunderstanding that existed between the Brahmans and the non-Brahmans at Coimbatore, the hoisting of the Home Rule flag or the exhibition of red and white lights in the residence of Mrs. Besant would immediately lead to a riot. The first thing to be noted is whether this statement is the opinion of the Magistrate or a piece of evidence. If evidence, it is not direct, and if it is taken to be hearsay, it cannot be admitted by courts, even though it is offered by the District officials themselves. Besides this, if the statement had been made on hearsay, it can indicate only the opinion of those who could have expressed such a view, for no one could have pried into the hearts of others. So if the opinion of officials is, by itself, deemed to be sufficient justification for the deprivation of the rights of the people, the condition of men will become very awkward. To whom are our people to complain of this and seek a remedy? What connection is there between the non-Brahmans of Coimbatore and the Home Rule flag in the residence of Mrs. Besant? This is not explained anywhere in the judgment. If there are any in Coimbatore, who, for some unknown reason, will commit a riot as soon as he sees a flag, what is the remedy for it; the deprivation of the rights of owners or the suppression of the rioters? When, about 35 years ago, there was a big riot in Salem, the then officials hastily passed an order, as has been done now, and this order was severely criticised by three of the then Judges of the Madras High Court, who are reported to have observed as follows:—

"If, without securing for the people the enjoyment of their rights, restrictive orders like this are passed one after another, the person whose liberty is affected thereby is not in a position to understand the justice of it. It will only create the impression that the authorities are not able to suppress those who, they are afraid, will commit a riot. Such an impression in the minds of the people may lead to serious consequences".

Mr. Macmichael does not seem to have noted this judgment at all. It is necessary that the Madras High Court, on whom rests the responsibility of maintaining the prestige of judicial administration and redressing the grievances of the people in this matter, should once again impress the principle laid down in the above judgment on their subordinate officials and also invite the attention of the Government to the mistakes committed by them.

Railway stationmasters for Mesopotamia.

32. Adverting to the statement made by a correspondent to the leader of Allahabad, that the pay of the European stationmasters of the first grade in Mesopotamia is Rs. 400, while that of the Indian stationmasters of the same grade is only Rs. 135, the Hindu Nesan, of the 13th September, writes:—Should a difference in the matter of pay between Indian and European stationmasters be observed even in Mesopotamia? It is but proper that the Europeans and the Indians, who have left their country for service in a foreign country, should be treated alike. Besides we would venture to say that the work turned out by Europeans will not be of the same quality as that turned out by Indians. Under these circumstances, it is really unjust that there should be different scales of pay for Europeans and Indians in Mesopotamia. Would the Indians like to proceed to that place, if they come to know that they would only receive a lower scale of pay than that given to Europeans? It is really undesirable that, even in these days of war, distinctions should be made between Indians and Europeans proceeding to work in the battlefields.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 13th, 1917.

The Lokopakari, of the 17th September, also remarks on this subject in the same strain.

A Home Rule meeting at Trichinopoly.

33. The Hindu Nesan, of the 14th September, publishes, as reported by its own correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held at Trichinopoly on the 10th idem, under the auspices of the local Home Rule League, when the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar is reported to have delivered a speech on Home Rule. In the course of his speech he is stated to have made the following observations:—The Government allow, only if they like, certain matters to be brought by the members of the Legislative Council for consideration at the meetings of the Council and reject other matters. They have declined to grant me leave to move a resolution about Mrs. Besant in the council. Land assessment has invariably been raised in all districts which have recently been resettled. Discussions in the council in this matter have been of no avail. In the Nilgiris district, where there are a large number of English residents, the original assessment has been retained without any enhancement in the recent resettlement.

The correspondent adds that many students attended this meeting, and that they have of late been making themselves conspicuous in almost all meetings held at Trichinopoly.

The proposed visit of Mr. Montagu.

While approving of the proposed visit of Mr. Montagu to India to have a personal knowledge of the country and its conditions, the Tamilian, of the 12th September, observes that as, whenever high officials visit this country, they see only urban areas and move with the richer classes and do not enter into the rural tracts and witness the condition of the poorer classes, the Panchamas who stand outcasted by the other classes and as these richer classes and especially the Brahmans allure these officials by their deceptive words and get everything done to serve their own interests, without caring to represent the cause of the poor and the suffering, the Secretary of State can be taken to have introduced real reforms in this country only if he cares to see for himself the hardships suffered by the depressed classes and takes steps to improve their condition.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th September, reports Mr. Harisarvottama Rao to have said at a meeting held on the 7th instant at Bezwada:—It is sure that as soon as Mr. Montagu comes to India, the bureaucracy, which is self-interested and which weilds unlimited authority, will tell him many things against us. It is, therefore, supremely necessary that we should acquaint him with our desires with greater zeal. Our advantages will be in proportion to the agitation we make, and so the people should make up their minds to agitate in a constitutional manner. . .

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Aug. 23rd, 1917.

The Secretary of State for India's visit.

The Qaumi Report, of the 23rd August, referring to Mr. Montagu's visit to India, writes:—We are at a loss as to whom he will listen and how, when he comes to India. The seal of silence has been set on the mouths of our newspapers and some of our intelligent brains and thinking minds are interned. Some of our committees have disappeared, or have been absorbed by larger ones. What is there left in us for him to see or listen to?

No doubt there are some robust, hale and well-dressed Muhammadans in official, semi-official and private circles, who will welcome him, and who will attend meetings and maintain their dignity by saying aye, aye to everything. But we do not understand how an enlightened and liberal-minded person, like Mr. Montagu, will be satisfied with such superficiality and outward show.

Mr. Montagu knows that the world of us, Indian Muhammadans, is dark and inert. Our bodies have no life and souls have no vitality. Those who possess the right or privilege of shaking hands with him are separated from their community, while those who are connected with the community are remote from him. It is exactly a case of—

The generous have no money.
The rich have no generosity.

Probably Mr. Montagu will interview and discuss matters with those Muhammadans who are either real or pseudo leaders. But, perhaps, this open secret is not known to him that, at present, the Muhammadan community has no leader. Besides the condition of Muhammadans varies in different provinces.

It would be better if the Secretary of State were to see editors of leading Muhammadan newspapers, for they are the real leaders and hold the reins of the aspirations of the community. Many of this class, however, are engaged in running papers on a commercial basis, while others depend on the contribution of a chief or the aid of Government. Others there are again who have succumbed to the wiles of a wise enemy and become the foolish friends of the community. Today we have neither the Comrade to espouse the cause of international relations of Muhammadans, nor the Hamdard to represent national rights, nor the Alhilal to defend religious aspirations.

The prospect of the release of the interned.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 17th September, reproduces the comments of the Dravida Patrika of the 12th idem abstracted in the last paragraph on page 2351 of the above report.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 17th, 1917.

Referring to the strong rumour that has been current in the city that the order interning Mrs. Besant and her colleagues has been cancelled, the Swadesamitran, of the 17th September, dwells upon the controversy raging between the Anglo-Indian and the Indian press regarding the conditions precedent to such cancellation and remarks:—On the whole, there is everywhere an excitement and anxiety regarding the internment. If the state of affairs is allowed to continue long, it will doubtless lead to serious consequences. It is really surprising that the Government should, knowing that the internment day would be celebrated everywhere today, delay this matter further. Let them note that any reforms introduced after the proper time lose their value.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep 17th, 1917.

Rumours of the release of the interned.

Adverting to a telegram reported to have been received by Mrs. Besant that the correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette has written to that paper to say that the grant of amnesty to all political prisoners in India was expected, the Swadesamitran, of the 18th September, observes:—During the last two years, many, who were carrying on political agitation on lawful and constitutional lines, have been subjected to the stringent application of the Defence of India Act, and we trust that the Government will immediately release all of them. Our readers should realise that the reason for all this is indeed the unnecessary worry to which Mrs. Besant was subjected and the incessant agitation carried on by us on constitutional lines to express our sense of indignation.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 18th, 1917.

Release of political prisoners.

Anent the news of the release of the interned, the Swadesamitran, of the 18th September, writes:—That there is no greater virtue than truth is the conviction of our people. We are glad, therefore, to announce, for the edification of the whole world, the news of Mrs. Besant, who has based her work for this land of Bharata on this principle, having demonstrated the maxim that truth will win. As she was convinced, on account of her long association with the Indians, that they were fit to have Home Rule and were also entitled to it, she began to work for it. As every good work meets with obstacles, her work also met with them. The authorities ruled that she should not get into this place and that. The Europeans became angry. But nothing daunted her and she continued her work with the faith that truth would win. Then came the internment orders. By following the lesson she taught us and carrying on a mild and constitutional agitation, pointing out, at the same time, our rights and the mistakes of the officials with a confidence in the British democracy, we have secured her release. In the midst of this agitation, many were the occasions on which we were provoked to give up constitutional means and take to violence and the fact that we did not yield to this temptation and that we have accomplished our object by sticking to the right path shows that our people have become experts in conducting constitutional agitation. Our agitation has made the British public, in the midst of their numerous anxieties, bestow some thought on this matter and repair the injustice done to one with whom they are well acquainted. Our opponents made all possible endeavours to browbeat us. But our people were not shaken by this. So let those who, either because they have the power in their hands or because they have got the ear of the officials, advise the curtailment of privileges, know that it cannot be done hereafter. This may also be stated to be the first time when we have accomplished our object by means of constitutional agitation. Before this, whenever the Imperial Governmant was inclined to act upon the suggestions of our leaders, the policy observed by them has been to make the officials offer to carry out the suggestions themselves. But now, the officials have from the beginning been so hostile to our aspirations that they could not accept the defects in the British administration and offer to remove them themselves. They had evidently flown too high and they could not come down with dignity. Pity! If it is possible for them to realise their mistake at least hereafter and to refrain from acting on the opinion of papers like the Madras Mail, let them join the work of reconstruction of the empire with a clean conscience. Whether they consent or not, this work will go on. Our agitation which has changed the policy of the bureaucracy has a rare strength which has come to be understood only now. The arguments that the prestige of the Government will go, that the admission by the Government of having acted on the opinion of the people, will lead to dangerous results and that the Government can do no wrong, will no longer hold water. Therefore the lesson that we have learnt from our work till now is, that we should continue our service to the country with a confidence in constitutional agitation. The internment of our leaders and their subsequent release have impressed the strength of constitutional agitation on the minds of not only the educated few but also the masses. We should not allow our courage to wane gradually. Let us continue our work with enthusiasm and confidence.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 18th, 1917.

Release of the interned.

Referring to the release of Mrs. Besant, etc., the Andhrapatrika, of the 18th September, says:—The Anglo-Indians may deem this action of the Government as a sign of weakness. But it is the duty of the Government to restore peace and earn the affection of the people instead of trying to maintain their prestige by aggravating the agitation of the people. In the same way in which Germany stands for the ideal of brute force and arbitrariness, England stands and works for the maintenance of liberty. At present, in India also, England has not forgotton her traditions, but has acted in such a way as to satisfy the people. The Madras Mail says that a certain gentleman, who once bore the responsibility of the Government in India and is now enjoying a pension has agreed to work in England against the agitation in India. We surmise that he is Lord Sydenham. It is indeed charitable on the part of one, who is maintaining himself with India's money, to do this good turn to India. . . Conditions have now been created which will enable Mr. Montagu to view the Congress scheme from every standpoint and do justice to India. We pray that the Government may entirely give up their repressive policy in order to make the political atmosphere more favourable. Repression on one side and conciliation on the other cannot thrive in India. Lord Morley tried such a policy but failed. There is no use reviving it. If the bond of love between the rulers and the ruled should be strengthened, the policy of repression should be entirely given up. . . The work of Mrs. Besant, Mr. Arundale and Mr. Wadia has given a new impetus to political life. The true methods of constitutional agitation have been explained. Indians have been taught what it is to work incessantly for political advancement. England is evincing an interest in the affairs of India. . . It needs no saying that Mrs. Besant's endeavours are the cause of this great stir.

Internments.

The Hitakarini, of the 9th September, observes as follows under this heading:—The reply of Sir W. Vincent to the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah's query referring to Mrs. Besant's internment served the time but it is unintelligible. When we said that "no agitation of an unconstitutional character should be made until after the war", does he mean that such an agitation may be made after the war? If not, what does he mean by that? Have Mrs. Besant and her party gone beyond what the Congress and the Muslim League agitate for? How can Sir Vincent's unintelligible utterance be explained? We think it advantageous to the Home Rule movement, not to release Mrs. Besant and her co-workers at this critical juncture; for a movement gains strength only when the leaders are under restraint.

Sir Michael O'Dwyer's speech.

39. The Swadesamitran, of the 17th September, reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Tribune, the Punjabi, the Amrita Bazaar Patrika and the Bengalee and those of the Simla correspondent of the Amrita Bazaar Patrika on the speech recently delivered by Sir Michael O'Dwyer at the last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, which are published in the Hindu of the same date.

The speech of Sir Michael O'Dwyer.

Referring to the speech delivered by Sir Michael O'Dwyer in the Imperial Legislative Council, the Swadesamitran, of the 14th September, observes:—In the course of this speech Sir Michael O'Dwyer stated that a sufficient number of Indians had not come forward to join the army in this time of war and that the people in all other provinces than the Punjab had not translated their oral expressions of loyalty into action. The opinion of one of the position of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, no doubt, deserves our best consideration. But two Viceroys, many Provincial Governors, two Prime Ministers, three Secretaries of State for India and hundreds of members of Parliament have, on several occasions till now, spoken in praise of the great help rendered by India. As all of these based their statements on facts and figures, we think that it is only Sir Michael O'Dwyer that has, owing to intense excitement, given expression to this view. He pointed out that one-half of the men in the Indian army belonged to the Punjab. It is only the fault of the Government that they did not recruit men for the army as much from other provinces as from the Punjab. True it is that the Punjab has helped the Government with sepoys. But other Provinces have helped them with money. When the Viceroy and the Governors, who are aware of the condition of other Provinces, have appreciated the help of these Provinces, Sir Michael, who is in one corner of India, has spoken disparagingly of them. We hope that his denunciation of the representatives of other Provinces than the Punjab will be promptly condemned by the Viceroy. Sir Michael has declared that the demand of the Home Rulers is not clear. Evidently he is unaware of the resolutions passed by the Congress and the Muslim League last year. Their demands have been very clearly stated. He then quoted three principles laid down by John Stuart Mill and concluded that according to them we were not fit to have Home Rule. We have again to say that Sir Michael has not understood the people of this country or our aspirations. The people in every village are now demanding Home Rule and the fact of our capacity to conduct the affairs of the Government has already been proved. The third principle of Mill need be thought of only if we wish to separate from the British Empire. The same arrangements that have been made by Canada, Australia and other countries to protect themselves will be enough to protect us. In fine, Sir Michael's observations have no relevancy to the subject on which he spoke, nor do they indicate a knowledge, on his part, of the attitude and capacity of this country. But, as he is also one of the members of the Civil Service, we should only be surprised if he had spoken in a different strain. Another point to be noted here is that the President of the Council did not pay any heed to the interruptions of the representative members, who plainly showed their displeasure at Sir Michael's speech, and dissolved the meeting without permitting them to reply to it. We leave it to our readers to judge of the fairness of his conduct. How can the public think that the liberal views expressed by the Viceroy in his opening speech would be given effect to by such action as this?

Sir Michael O'Dwyer.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 14th September, says:—Just at a time when Mr. Montagu is to visit India and enquire into the wishes of the people, it is audacious that provincial rulers like Sir Michael O'Dwyer have expressed themselves against self-government. Sir Michael O'Dwyer took part in the discussion in the Imperial Legislative Council on the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi's resolution. Every one knows what sympathy he has for the aspirations of the people. His utterances need not surprise us. The Indians should unanimously make representations to Mr. Montagu about the reforms proposed by the congress, so that gentlemen like Sir Michael O'Dwyer may not stand in the way of our aspirations being realised.

Neither the Anglo-Indians nor their papers approve of Mrs. Besant's release. . . And so unless we carry on our efforts with greater zeal, there is no prospect of Mrs. Besant and others who have joined in political agitation being released.

The coming tour of His Excellency the Governor.

Adverting to the Press communiqué recently issued by His Excellency the Governor of Madras dispensing with public receptions and addresses during his tour, the Swadesamitran, of the 18th September, remarks:—We need not say what amount of satisfaction this communiqué will give to the people in the mufassal. We have heard of and seen persons borrowing money for contributing to the expenses of public reception in the mufassal, so as to continue to be in the good graces of the local officials. So the issue of this communiqué made us hope that the people would no longer have to incur the expenditure they used to incur on such occasions. But from a speech delivered by the Collector of Malabar on this matter in a meeting convened by him, our hope seems to be after all a vain one. He has said that the people need not subscribe for display but may do so for the hospital-ship. Is this the ingenuity of the Governor or the cleverness of the Collector? Should help for the hospital-ship be sought only during the tours of the Governor? Is it not natural that such a procedure would result in unnecessary restrictions and strange scenes? The people have been helping the war-funds and the hospital-ship, and rendering aid in other ways, as far as it has been possible for them, and they are always ready to render this help. So it will be, in our opinion, entirely wrong on the part of the officials to interfere on any account in matters in which the people are voluntarily and freely rendering assistance.

Home Rule and the non-Brahmans.

In a lengthy leading article, exhorting the non-Brahmans not to oppose the agitation for self-government, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 14th September, writes:—The agitation for self-government or swaraj which began in the shape of the Home Rule cry has now taken firm root. It is now well-known how a few Anglo-Indian oppositionists have been moving heaven and earth to put an end to this agitation both secretly and openly sometimes by creating differences among the people and sometimes by threats. The truth of this statement forces itself on the attention of even those who casually glance at the dailies which come to us from Madras. Although we must admire the way in which these great Anglo-Indian personages succeed in inciting some persons and the manner in which the latter, blind to national interests, work themselves into a frenzy and dance like puppets, we cannot at the same time help regretting that these allow themselves to be caught in their snare. The two most heterogenous communities in India, namely, the Hindus and Muslims have learnt to look upon each other as compatriots and joined in the work of driving the chariot of Home Rule. The Anglo-Indians could not bear the sight. They lighted up another beacon, and called into play fresh elements of discord. Let us leave the other provinces alone. Here in Madras even, some of the dailies proclaim that the Home Rule movement has been started in the interests of the Brahmans; some Panchamas have joined the chorus and the Anglo-Indians are encouraging this music.

45. Referring to the currency notes for one rupee and two and a half rupees proposed to be issued by the Government, the Hindu Nesan, of the 17th September, reports the Swadesaparipalini to have expressed that the alternative proposal to coin rupees with silver for 4 annas or 6 annas in them, to get over the present difficulty in obtaining silver owing to the war and the disturbed condition of Mexico, China and other places where silver is dug out, would have been better than the issue of currency notes of lower denomination, and added that when the people were using currency notes freely and were expected to receive the new notes also easily, they would surely be more ready to use rupees, even though the silver in them was less than what it is now. — HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 17th, 1917.

The scarcity of silver.

46. The Mahavikatadutan, of the 31st March, is against the issue of one-rupee currency notes on the ground that the people of India, being mostly uneducated, prefer rupees and sovereigns to currency notes and that, therefore, some difficulty may be experienced in getting the people to use the one-rupee currency notes. — MAHAVIKATADUTAN, Madras, Mar. 31st, 1917.

Tit-bits.

47. The following is an extract from an article contributed by Mr. P. Varadarajulu Nayudu to the special supplement to the Swadesamitran of the 17th September:—For the last few years there has appeared a spirit of awakening in the country and the heart of every Indian is throbbing with the eager desire that his country should acquire its legitimate status among the great civilised powers. Like Europeans, our people, too, are actuated by a sense of mutual confidence and an undaunted spirit of patriotism and demand Home Rule for India. This has terrified all the Europeans working in this country and they are losing their mental balance. There is no room whatever for bewilderment. Just as ignorance is the cause of all troubles in the world, it is the ignorance on the part of the English bureaucracy of the nature of the Home Rule agitation that makes them frightened at the very sound of "Home Rule." We pray that, after sometime, India may be granted the same kind of self-government, that is enjoyed by the colonies like Australia and Canada in the British Empire. All that we immediately demand is the predominance of the representative element in the Legislative Councils and the subordination of the Executive to these councils. The mere conferment of higher appointments on Indians will not improve the industries in India or remove the hardships of the Indian ryot. The official class should be responsible to the people and this is the type of Home Rule that the Indians ask for. Why should this cause bewilderment?

In addressing the students of Bareli College on the last war anniversary day, Mr. Henderson, the Principal, stated that those working for the political advancement of this country were self-interested persons caring only for fame and honour. Many are the Europeans who say like this. If Messrs. Lloyd George, Asquith and Henderson working for the welfare of England are selfish persons, that vice can be attributed also to our patriots such as Messrs. Gandhi and Tilak and Mrs. Besant. It seems there are not persons in India to manage the administration, if she were granted Home Rule. Alas! This gentleman who has no idea of the ancient history of India is a teacher! The number of Indians who have the necessary administrative capacity to rule even the whole world is even larger than that of Englishmen. He is reported to have added that the Government were aiding his institution with an annual grant of Rs. 12,000. This money is not brought from England. It is only the money of the Indians. It will not be possible to speak in this manner hereafter. Times are changing. It is really mischievous on his part to have made these statements before students.

Swadeshism can be described as the attempt to shape the education, the industries and the Government of a country in accordance with its conditions and customs. Swadeshism took shape in this country for the first time when Lord Curzon partitioned Bengal, and spread throughout leading to many good results. But after the annulment of the partition, it began to wane and eventually disappeared altogether. The internment of Mrs. Besant and her colleagues has brought it again to the front and many swadeshi enterprises have come into being. Glad indeed! But there is a fear whether this will be given up again if the internment orders are cancelled. It would be most shameful to give up the swadeshi movement this time. It will not only make our enemies laugh, but will also prevent the economic condition of India being set right in a way. It is, therefore, imperative that no patriot should give up this movement.

The words Vande Mataram mean obeisance to one's mother land. As there are numerous divisions among us on account of distinction of caste and creed, the only deity that can infuse a sense of patriotism and co-operation among all of us is the land in which we are born. Therefore let us take to the excellent habit of greeting one another with the words Vande Mataram. It may not be to the taste of Mr. Johnson and the Rao Bahadur who seeks his favour. But patriots, who deem the regeneration of the country to be their duty, should keep the words Vande Mataram always in their mind.

Lord Islington on Indian reforms.

48. The Swadesamitran, of the 17th September, reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Westminster Gazette of London on the views expressed by Lord Islington about the Indian reforms in a lecture recently delivered by him before the students of Oxford. The following observations occur in the course of the comments:—We expect that the deliberations relating to Indian reforms would soon be concluded, for we have witnessed in Ireland and other places the harm caused by the delay in introducing reforms. It is the result of experience that the postponing of matters, setting a high value on the difficulties to be faced in compromising the conflicting views of various parties, always results in evil. It has been held that it is only the British rule that could maintain unity in India and that the administration could be well and impartially conducted only by the bureaucracy, who have the interest of the people at heart. However true this view might have been in the beginning, one cannot ignore the change of circumstances which is likely to take place in the order of time. The upright administration carried on by the British and the rapid advance of education have resulted in a great awakening of the national consciousness among the people of India, which became patent as soon as the war began. Failure on our part to adequately apprise this consciousness in time may result in harm to us. When the Minto-Morley Reforms were introduced in India, Lord Morley thought of them as the first of a series of reforms proposed to be introduced here. These reforms have now produced beneficent results and attention should, therefore, be bestowed on the further reforms to be introduced, which may be grouped under three heads. The first is the admission of Indians into the Civil Service more freely than at present, the second is the maintenance of the ideal of Home Rule in the constitution of the Legislative Councils in India, and the third is the grant of commissions in the army to the Indians. The first item has been well considered by the Public Services Commission and the recommendations made by that commission should be given effect to immediately. As regards the second, reforms should be introduced on the lines indicated by Lord Islington in his speech under reference. As regards the third, the present provisions connected with appointments in the army, which are opposed to a sense of justice, should, at once, be repealed. No doubt, there are several difficulties in giving effect to these reforms. All those matters, which are referred to in the memorandum of the nineteen non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council, cannot be attended to now, as they give rise to several intricate problems for consideration. It will, however, be possible, to a great extent, to give effect to the spirit underlying the memorandum. At any rate, anything that is proposed to be done should be done wholeheartedly and without delay, as otherwise it will not be productive of good results.

Spies in the Judicial Department.

49. In the course of an article under this heading, the Swadesamitran, of the 18th September, refers to the circular said to have been issued by the District Judge of Guntūr to ascertain the Home Rulers among the vakils in that district, which seems to have been followed by some of the high officials in other districts also, and to the report in the Amrita Bazaar Patrika of a vakil who is the Secretary of a Home Rule League having been threatened by the Police and the District Judge and observes:—Perhaps this is the outcome of the secret circular said to have been issued by the Government of India to all provincial Governments in March last. One of the bright features of the British administration is the rectitude of the courts of law. If this is affected in the least, it will create great changes in the minds of the people. There can be no greater mistake than to make the Judicial Department an instrument for detection.

The internment day meetings.

50. The Swadesamitran, of the 19th September, publishes the proceedings of a public meeting held at Kumbakōnam on the 16th idem to celebrate the day on which Mrs. Besant and her colleagues were interned. One of the resolutions passed at this meeting urged upon the Government and the members of the Legislative Council to take action against the Madras Mail under the Indian Penal Code and the Press Act in respect of its repeated writings calculated to promote hatred and dissensions among the different classes of His Majesty's subjects.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

The Hindu Nesan of the same date publishes the proceedings of a public meeting held on the 16th September 1917, at Tiruvannāmalai for the same purpose, when a lecture on Home Rule is reported to have been delivered by Mr. C. G. Jayaram Ayyar, in the course of which he is said to have remarked that the grant of Home Rule under the British Government was the panacea for all the evils in this country. An abstract of these proceedings appears in the Hindu of the 19th idem.

An Anti-Home Rule meeting at Erode.

51. The Swadesamitran, of the 19th September, reproduces in Tamil a telegraphic communication from a correspondent published in the Hindu, of the same date, of an Anti-Home Rule meeting, which is said to have been convened at Erode on the 17th idem at the instance of the authorities.

DRAVIDA PATRIKÁ, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

Transfer of a tahsildar.

52. Adverting to the sudden transfer of Mr. Sethu Ayyar, the Tahsildar of Erode to Udamalpet, the Dravida Patrika, of the 19th September, infers that his transfer is perhaps due to the idea that, being a member of the Theosophical Society, he may be favourable to the Home Rule movement, which is now carried on vehemently at Erode.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

The quarantine camp, Mandapam.

53. Adverting to the satisfaction expressed by the Times of Ceylon at some of the important causes that led to the passengers from India to Ceylon being put to much hardship in the quarantine camp at Mandapam, the Swadesamitran, of the 19th September, says that though some reforms have now been introduced in this matter, the main point for consideration is whether the new rules are observed in practice and adds that neither the passengers nor the public can be satisfied unless all the causes of complaint have been entirely removed.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

Closure of a grazing ground.

54. Referring to the order reported to have been issued by the Revenue Board that the Sanankuppam Reserve Forest in the Ambur circle of the North Arcot district, should no longer be used for grazing purposes, the Swadesamitran, of the 19th September, writes:—This reserve forest is the only grazing ground available for the cattle in the surrounding villages. Need we, therefore, dilate upon the hardship and loss that will be caused to cattle, agriculturists and agriculture by an order preventing cattle grazing therein? It is stated that similar orders have been issued in respect of some other reserve forests also, and we learn that the villagers have wired to the Collector of the district on the hardships caused to them by this order. As agriculture is the main source of living, and cattle form the life and soul of agriculture, it is the foremost duty of the Government to consider about the serious consequences which may ensue from closing a grazing ground and satisfy the agriculturists.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

The Madras Mail and the present situation.

55. The Swadesamitran, of the 19th September, refers to the attitude of the Madras Mail and the Anglo-Indians regarding the release of Mrs. Besant and her colleagues and its threats that the one cable sent by it would have the effect of raising a storm of opposition against Mr. Montagu and even unseating him, and adds:—The very hostility of the Madras Mail and its supporters to our agitation is proof positive of the justice of our aspirations. Many of the Anglo-Indians, who have been enjoying unlimited influence in India as a matter of right feel that the time is nearing for their influence to go down and get excited. Alas! What can be done? We can only compare the attitude of the Mail to a guardian, who is loath to part with the property of a minor after the latter comes of age. It does not seem to understand the meaning of what it writes. In its issue of yesterday it gives the following advice to the officials:—"If any high official, feeling his position impossible after the unconditional release of the interned agitators, offers to resign and is met with the argument that he should continue, as this is a time of war, let him reply that this being a time of war is exactly the reason why higher authorities should have respected the measures taken by the local officials in the interests of the peace of the country." Why cannot the Government try to get this paper punished for the offence of inducing the local officials to disobey their superiors? The opinion expressed by the other Anglo-Indian paper in this city, the Madras Times, is in healthy contrast to this, and this paper seems to think that the policy to be adopted by the Mail will lead to serious results. The Indians are only going to take steps quietly to represent their wants to the Secretary of State for India, relying on the traditional principles of the British public. If the forces like the Mail pay some regard to the Government and the rights of the people and keep quiet, nothing serious will happen. If not, it is the Mail that will be responsible for whatever may happen in the future.

56. The Swadesamitran, of the 19th September, publishes a speech said to have been delivered at Madura by Mr. A. Rangaswami Ayyangar, the Editor of the Swadesamitran, on the 16th idem, on the reforms necessary for India in which he briefly traced the history of the development of the constitution of the Government of India and, referring to the scheme drawn up by the Congress and the Muslim League, observed that the main aim of the Indians was that the executive Government in this country should be subordinate to the Legislative Council, the members of which would be elected by the people. It appears that the meeting at which this lecture was delivered was attended by a few students among others.

Political reforms for India.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 15th September, says:—Democracy is the very soul of the reforms asked for by the Congress and the Moslem League. Though the Indians are glad that the British Government is a good Government, yet they want self-government. The people believe that reforms that are not means to self-government are useless. For the establishment of self-government, political authority should be centered in the Indians. Until that is done, no reform will be of any use. . . Parliament does not take much interest in the affairs of India. Only 30 out of its 600 members are present when the Indian budget is discussed. Being situated 6,000 miles away, it has neither the ability nor the opportunities to carry on the administration of India. The authority that it now exercises over India is feeble. Even if India should be represented in the Parliament, such representation would not be of much use in the establishment of self-government. In order that self-government or responsible Government may be established in India, administrative reforms have to be effected in India. Unless individual freedom is granted to India in India, self-government will not be possible. It has been decided by the Congress and the Moslem League that self-government should be established in India and that India should be made a partner in the British Empire. It will be plain to those who have examined political history that there is nothing absurd in these ideas. There is vast difference between self-government and independent Government. In the former, the bond of connection with the British Empire will not be broken. It is plain to those who have reviewed the scheme of reforms laid down by the Congress and the Moslem League, that the object of the reforms is to strengthen the bond of the British Empire and establish self-government. . . The Secretary of State for India and his Council have vast powers over Indian administration. . . The Parliament has power to control the authority of the Secretary, but it seldom exercises that power. The Secretary may be said to be an arbitrary authority. Neither the Parliament nor the Indians have the means to limit his authority. If he should be held responsible to the Parliament for his actions, the means will be afforded for a diminution of his authority and for the establishment of responsible Government. If the reforms laid down by the Congress and the Moslem League regarding the Secretary of State and his Council should be carried out, the Secretary would be responsible to the Parliament like the Colonial Secretary. If the authority of the Secretary should diminish, the powers of the rulers in India would increase and the establishment of self-government would be possible.

Political reforms.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 15th, 1917.

57. The Andhrapatrika, of the 11th September, reports Mr. Polak to have written as follows to the Indian Review after referring to the resolution of the Imperial War Conference approving of the proposed policy of reciprocity between India and the colonies:—The report presented by the Indian representatives to the conference appears to every one to be disappointing. . . It remains to be seen if the Government of India will act according to the Union Immigrants Regulation Act in the case of persons who have from other countries come to reside in India. The colonials do not approve of Asiatics taking up their residence in the colonies.

India and the colonies.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 11th, 1917.

Will the Government in India also forbid the colonials coming to India? Can the Government of India prevent the Canadians from setting their foot in India unless they come direct from their country? Can they say that no Australian can come to India unless he has learned Sanskrit and other languages? It is to be seen what shape reciprocity is to take. Why should not the Government of India demand that greater regard should be paid in the British Empire to Asiatics in British territory? The Japanese have been carrying on immense trade in South Africa since the commencement of the war, but the Government of South Africa forbade two Indian students who studied in Cambridge staying at Cape Town while allowing the Europeans and the Japanese entering the town. . . The Indian representatives have in their report stated that an ordinary member of the Sikh community going out from his country to earn money would not regret to leave his wife behind. This is rather hard to hear. It does not appear that the Secretary of State and his assistants have understood that it is natural that an Indian should take his wife and children with him wherever he goes. . . Why should not educated Indians reside anywhere in the British Empire? The Prime Minister of Canada said that this is injurious to social progress. It is difficult to see how the Indians will prove harmful to society.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 11th, 1917.

A separate non-Brahman Association.

58. Under this heading a non-Brahman correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th September, says:—The non-Brahman papers do not take our side and work on our behalf. . . How can those who disregard the resolutions of our Coimbatore Conference against our wishes be our leaders? Excepting those few men, all non-Brahmans are longing for self-government. It is opposed to our self-respect to call them our leaders. Their publications and the acts they have done are for themselves and we are not responsible for them. . . The existence of a separate association is necessary which can impartially publish the wishes of non-Brahmans fully. There should be one English paper at least which can, on behalf of that association, place our views before the Government. We request that the non-Brahmans will carefully read the letter of Mr. Sabhapathi Pillai published in the Andhrapatrika of the 7th. The papers that we now call ours and the leaders whom we call ours are not our papers and our leaders. They are selfish. We have to start an agitation requiring the resolutions of the Coimbatore Conference to be put into force.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 11th, 1917.

The new non-Brahman movement.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 11th September, publishes a letter from the pen of Mr. A. Sabhapathi Pillai stating that a meeting will be held for constituting a new non-Brahman Association, that Diwan Bahadur P. Kesava Pillai has approved of the new non-Brahman movement, and that the message sent by Rao Bahadur P. Thiyagaraya Chetti will be discussed in the meeting. The paper wishes every success to the meeting.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 13th, 1917.

The new non-Brahman Association.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th September, publishes letters from three correspondents disowning Mr. P. Thiyagaraya Chetti as their representative, and advocating the establishment of a new non-Brahman Association.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 15th, 1917.

The new non-Brahman movement.

Under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th September, publishes a letter from a correspondent disowning leadership of Rao Bahadur P. Thiagaraya Chetti and his cablegram.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 12th, 1917.

The new non-Brahman movement.

Referring to the cablegram sent by Mr. P. Thiyagaraya Chetti as representative of the 40 millions of non-Brahmans, a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 12th September, asks whom he consulted or in which meeting a resolution was passed in support of it. . . Those who bow to the patronage of the Government and prove traitors to our country in the name of non-Brahmans can never be our leaders. . . Unless, therefore, a true non-Brahman association is formed in India under the leadership of Diwan Bahadur Kesava Pillai and others, before Mr. Montagu arrives, our real aspirations will not be known.

The non-Brahman movement.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 15th September, writes under this heading:— From the letters published elsewhere it has become clear that the non-Brahmans are not opposed to the Congress. A hundred non-Brahman leaders in Madras, 500 in the Tanjore district and Vannikula Kshatrias who are so numerous in the south of India have given their support to the Congress reform scheme. And in several places the cablegram sent by Mr. Thiagaraya Chetti has been condemned. . . The opinions of papers such as the Justice and the Andhraprakasika are not the real opinions of the non-Brahmans. Though the non-Brahmans for the time being demand separate representation, they agree with the rest in wishing for Home Rule. Who can stem the tide of Home Rule agitation.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Sep. 15th, 1917.

The non-Brahman meeting.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th September, says:—The non-Brahmans convened the meeting of Saturday last with the object of disapproving of the cablegram of the President of the South Indian People's Association and expressing their approval of the Congress scheme of reforms. . . The Vannikula Kshatriyas, the Arya Vysias, etc., have plainly expressed to the Secretary of State their solicitude for political reforms.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 17th, 1917.

The non-Brahman movement.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th September, reports the West Coast Spectator to have written:—A leader of non-Brahmans has justified the opinions of the Anglo-Indians and ventured to send a cablegram to the Secretary of State for India. We can assert that, being disappointed in other directions, these leaders have started this movement to gain their selfish ends. No self-respecting and patriotic Indian will join such a movement. . . The course that we, non-Brahmans, should follow is plain. Selfish people will try to misguide us. We must not yield to their influence, but after satisfying ourselves that our interests have been safeguarded, we must approve of the Congress scheme. We cannot agree to all the reforms proposed by the Congress and the Muslim League, but there is room for effecting a compromise between the two parties.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 17th, 1917.

The new non-Brahman movement.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th September, says:— It is audacious on the part of Rao Bahadur Thiagaraya Chetti to have sent a cablegram to Mr. Montagu criticising the cablegram of Sir S. Subramania Ayyar stating that no importance should be attached to the threats of the Madras Mail, who appointed him leader of the South Indian non-Brahmans? It is absurd that he should act without consulting us. Mr. Chetti and Doctor Nair! We no more want your leadership. It is not proper on your part to gather around you some men who do evil to the country, to bring dishonour to us, by putting forth absurd contentions. We cannot endure this. The writings in Justice, the Andhraprakasika and the Dravidan which you publish do evil to the country. Even when such a gentleman as Dr. Pattabhi Seetaramayya says that five members for every one hundred will be enough in the Legislative Councils on behalf of the Brahman community, you, out of envy, say that the Brahmans should not be trusted and advise their destruction. This is very treacherous. . . O! My non-Brahman brethren! We have nothing to do with their absurd arguments. The sooner we reject their leadership the better. We must necessarily start another non-Brahman Association with Diwan Bahadur Kesava Pillai as President.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

The non-Brahman movement.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th September, publishes a letter in which the writers disown the leadership of Doctor Nayar and Rao Bahadur Thiagaraya Chetti, and remark:— The present crazy actions of these gentlemen are deemed by the people to be calculated to please the bureaucrats. . . We are in full agreement with the Congress scheme and as for separate class representation we are at one with Diwan Bahadur Kesava Pillai and others. We say that the contents of the cablegram of Rao Bahadur Thiagaraya Chetti are false.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep 14th, 1917.

The new non-Brahman movement.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 14th September, writes as follows on this subject:—. . . These patriots who, till yesterday, were against a separate communal representation for non-Brahmans, are now for it.

They have taken with them the non-Brahmans who have subscribed to the manifesto, and are representing to the world "these are the best of the non-Brahmans"

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 11th, 1917.

59. The Andhrapatrika, of the 11th September, says:—The words of advice contained in the speech of the Viceroy have satisfied the country. While the people are happy that the country is growing quiet, the Madras Mail is doing its best to prevent such a thing. It is writing strong articles about this every day. . . The Mail does not like the creation of favourable circumstances before the arrival of Mr. Montagu. . . The writings of the Mail will only increase the agitation in the country. It is the duty of the Government to establish peace. When they have undertaken to establish it and make the people happy, they have to warn the Mail against unnecessary agitation. It is necessary that the country should be peaceful before the arrival of Mr. Montagu. Only then will his arrival bear fruit.

The Madras Mail.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 13th, 1917.

60. The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th September, in its leader under this heading, says:—It is admitted all over the civilised world that the root principle of self-government is the administration of the country in accordance with the wishes of the people and the establishment of a Government which is responsible to the people. . . The Congress scheme of reforms does not require that such a Government should be established all at once. . . Some are under the impression that the reforms proposed by the Congress will result in a revolution, and some others think that the reforms suggest the grant of self-government immediately. . . It betrays ignorance to say that the Congress scheme has been drafted without consideration. . . At the time of Lord Morley's reforms, the Congress leaders thought that Lord Morley granted them supreme bliss, and the leaders of the people were glad that the way has been paved for the establishment of responsible Government. . . Speaking about the object of the introduction of the India Council Bill on the 1st of April 1909, the Prime Minister said that the Indians should be freed from the idea that the officials were pulling the strings of the Legislative Councils from behind, and that these Councils were like puppets worked by machines. The people entertained great hopes, but Lord Morley stated plainly that the introduction of parliamentary institutions into India would be a loss to the country. The Indian leaders in their great enthusiasm failed to understand the full meaning of those words.

The Congress scheme of reforms.

What was the result? Till 1909 the Indian was not given any share in the Government. Though thereafter Indians were admitted into the Councils, they were not able to do much good to the people. The people had no influence over them. Indian bureaucrats have taken the place of some foreign bureaucrats in the Government. The reforms of the Legislative Council have proved to be a mirage. Powers have been conferred on the representatives of the people to make some more speeches, but no authority has been given them to change the policy of the Government. They have no rights in the matter of preparing the budget. The Hon'ble Mr. Ramachandra Rao and the Hon'ble Mr. Ramanuja Acharyulu despaired of doing any good to the people and expressed their helplessness. The privilege of a majority of non-officials in the Provincial Councils has become useless. . . Having no share in the Government in their own country, the Indians have met with contemptuous treatment in foreign countries. So what India needs is self-government but not mere good government. The terrible war that is being waged for the establishment of independence has brought out the latent desires in the Indians. The object of the memorandum of the nineteen is to set right the present political situation. It is with such ideals in view that the Indians have desired the reforms proposed by the Congress. We shall show tomorrow how the congress reforms will serve as a foundation to self-government.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 14th, 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 14th September, explains in its leader under this heading the reforms contained in the scheme drawn up by the Congress, supplying the grounds that dictated the changes in the constitution and the functions of the Legislative and the Executive Councils and the other parts of administrative machinery.

The Congress scheme of reforms

The Congress scheme of reforms.

The Andhrapatrika, ofthe 15th September, briefly sketches in its leader the Congress reforms relating to the Imperial Legislative Council, the Secretary of State and his Council, and the Executive Councils and makes the following remarks incidentally :—There can be nothing more absurd than to say that these reforms mean the grant of Home Rule all at once. . . In the scheme, there is nothing which is revolutionary. In order to mislead the people in regard to this scheme, it is falsely stated that it implies the grant of Home Rule all at once.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 15th, 1917.

The Congress scheme of reforms.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th September, publishes in Telugu the reform scheme drawn up by the Congress and the Muslim League and makes the following comments thereon :—There can be no greater untruth than to say that the Congress scheme demands the grant of self-government all at once. This scheme does not contemplate the grant of complete financial independence to the representatives of the people. . . The Congress does not wish that self-government should be granted completely now. It is plain that the object of the Congress scheme is to teach the first lessons in responsible self-government. . . The Home Rule Leagues also have adopted the resolutions contained in the Congress scheme. The endeavours to create a difference between Home Rule and self-government have failed. . . The ideal of self-government within the British Empire is better expressed by the word Home Rule than by the word self-government. . . The chief principle that underlies representation by the people is that the Executive Councils should carry on their administration in accordance with the resolutions of the Legislative Councils. The Justice says that this is impossible. It is no use to increase the powers of the Provincial Governments without extending the powers of the representatives of the people. The arbitrary authority of the Provincial Governments and of the Government of India will then increase. If the powers of the Secretary of State also should diminish, there will hardly be any authority who will listen to the grievances of the people. So before extending the powers of the Provincial Governments, facilities should be afforded for the people taking greater part in the administration. Provincial autonomy involves freedom of popular Government. The two are inseparably connected. The Congress scheme of reforms should have added to it the division of the country on a language basis. Otherwise there can be no efficient administration. The masses will not evince an interest in the administration unless education is imparted and the administration carried on in the vernaculars. For that, the country should be divided on a language basis. Such a division is indispensible for national self-government.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 17th, 1917.

The Guzerat Sabha.

61. The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th September, contains the following in English. With a view to convince the Secretary of State that it is the burning desire of every educated Indian to have self-government or Home Rule, the Guzarat Sabha under the guidance of its president Mr. M. K. Gandhi has resolved to present a petition to Mr. Montagu signed by the people of Guzarat. The petition contains a statement that the signatory has understood and approved the reform scheme framed by the All-India Congress Committee and the All-India Moslem League, and unanimously adopted last year by both, and further intimates to the Secretary of State that there will not be the dawn of true era of contentment in India unless the reforms are granted. Every volunteer who goes out for signatures is strictly asked to conform himself to Congress scheme and is to take signatures satisfying himself that the signatory has fully understood the same and also a Telugu translation of the same.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 13th, 1917.

Proscription of New India.

62. The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th September, represents the Rangoon Mail to have said :—Many came to our office and asked if New India had been proscribed. We did not believe that the Government had done so without reliable information from the authorities. But the copies of New India which arrived here by the Calcutta mail having not reached the subscribers, it is to a large extent certain that the Government have proscribed them. If the Government found that that paper tried by its seditious writings to upset the British Government in India and promoted race hatred, they might proscribe the paper. But they ought to have entered upon their course of action after first publishing their decision. They did not do so. The Government seems to empower the Censor to proscribe the future issues also. We are at a loss to know on what grounds the Government have done so. We shall await the clearing of these doubts, but there will certainly be some commotion among the people.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 14th, 1917.

An Andhra Province.. The Scheme of Federal Government.

63. The Andhrapatrika, of the 14th September, says:—We have published elsewhere the letter of Mr. Venkatappayya Pantulu, the Secretary of the Standing Committee of the Andhra Conference addressed to the Secretaries of the Congress Committees, urging on the necessity of constituting a separate Andhra Province. Mr. Venkatappayya Pantulu exhorts the Indians to place before Mr. Montagu the division of the country into provinces on a language basis, as one of the political reforms to be carried out. In the issue of the Empire Review received today, there is an article on the federal Government obtaining in Canada. As a result of the revolution of 1842, the English and the French were placed in one province. From that time. they had been in strife with one another. It was found impossible to bring them into friendly relations with one another. Sir John McDonald separated the English from the French territory, and introduced the federal system of Government into Canada on the 1st July 1867. It was a success. The English and the French gave up their strife. The writer of the article in the Empire Review says that a federal system of Government is the only lawful means to carry on the democratic form of Government successfully in a big country. India is a big country with a variety of languages. The federal system of Government is the only means by which that country can be efficiently administered.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 5th, 1917.

Telegrams to Mr. Montagu.

64. The weekly issue of the Andhrapatrika, dated the 5th September, says:—The telegram sent by Rao Bahadur P. Thiagaraya Chetti on behalf of the South Indian People's Association is favourable to the bureaucracy. The ideas contained in the telegram cannot but appear curious. It is audacious to say that the telegram sent by Sir S. Subrahmania Ayyar represents the opinion of Brahmans, who are a few, and that the telegram sent by Rao Bahadur P. Thiagaraya Chetti represents the opinion of the non-Brahmans, whose number is large.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 14th, 1917.

The non-Brahmans

65. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 14th September, says:—What right has the South Indian People's Association to call itself the representative of all the non-Brahman communities? Is it not treacherous to the country and to society to be selfish, to act like a wolf in the sheep's skin and to make common cause with the Anglo-Indians. . . Is there any difference between the policy of Lord Curzon who partitioned Bengal and separated the Hindus from the Muhammadans, and the policy now pursued by the Madras Government in order to justify their action? Doctor Nair and Rao Bahadur P. Thiagaraya Chetti are undoubtedly the organisers of this association. Who gave authority to Rao Bahadur Thiagaraya Chetti to send a telegram opposed to the telegram sent on behalf of the Indians? When the people clearly know that as in the Philippine Islands there will be no land tax that as in the colonies there will be independence, that there will be no tax on salt which is used by the poorest people also, that there will be less taxation, and that the panchayat system will be revived, will there be any who will not like to have self-government? . . . Let us suppose that sometime hence, some members of the association become capable and ask for swaraj. Will not the Government impose restrictions then as now? Cannot some statesmen influence some community to say that it does not want self-government? It is very regrettable that this association does not see such a miserable prospects. . . It is not an association which can be approved of by all the non-Brahmans as their representative body. I am also a non-Brahman. I pray that as stated by Mr. Sabhapathi Pillai, endeavours may be made to start a really representative association.

66. The Bharatamata, of the 29th August (received on the 14th September), publishes in Telugu the Lucknow declaration about the Madras internments and Home Rule, already reported from the Desamata on page 2119 of the weekly report.

67. The Andhraprakasika, of the 11th September, writes under this heading: —. . . Though the Marine Superintendent stated that, during his 17 years' experience, he heard no complaint, the Deck Passengers' Committee have expressed that the condition of the passengers travelling from Madras to Rangoon is miserable. In the case of even Indian passengers emigrating with legal passports, the condition will be the same. . . What is wanted is officers who will show sympathy towards them and manage affairs tractfully. When His Excellency the Viceroy observed that, above all the rules of this committee, the same rules prescribed for the Indians proceeding to Canada must be also made to apply to those going from Canada into India, he expressed an excellent truth. If the people of the Colonies are accorded the same treatment in India, they will not misunderstand it.

Emigration.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 11th, 1917.

The Swadeshabhimani, of the 14th September, says that it is highly laudable that the changes now effected in the conditions of Indian labour emigration do away with the cruel indenture system.

68. Referring, under this heading, to the proposal made by the Chairman, Calicut Municipality, to honour His Excellency the Governor of Madras with an address, etc., and the countermove by some citizens, the Andhraprakasika, of the 12th September, remarks:—His Excellency the Governor has published a notification that people in these hard days need not at all spend money on his account and present addresses. When His Excellency himself wanted to avoid these unnecessary honours, the Chairman and the Collector would have done well not to have moved at all in this matter.

Calicut confusion.

69. The Hitakarini, of the 9th September, writes under this heading:— . . . If all that His Excellency has said in his speech is not encouraging, some at least may be said to inspire hope. It has been made manifest by his speech that His Excellency is not one who would give out empty words. We cannot say that the reform regarding the Indian army is completely discouraging. Granting eight commissions in the army to the Indians is something which is better than nothing. . . The reform in the indentured labour system is gratifying, of course, but that it shall be in force only till the end of the war and six months after cannot but be disappointing.

They cannot be called reforms which fail to give entire satisfaction. . .

HITAKARINI, Ellore, Sep. 9th, 1917.

In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika (weekly), of the 12th September, says:—The reply given by Sir William Vincent to the interpellation of the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah regarding the release of Mrs. Besant is not easy to understand. . . The people think that Mrs. Besant is carrying on only constitutional agitation and not unconstitutional agitation. Mrs. Besant also is giving expression to this same fact. . . How can the rulers of India be satisfied that Mrs. Besant's political agitation is not unconstitutional? Even if they be satisfied, how can the rulers of the Madras Presidency have any confidence? Even if the rulers of the Madras Presidency be satisfied, it is difficult to satisfy the angry Anglo-Indians. When we consider the writings of the Madras Mail in this connection, the difficult plight of the rulers will become plain to us. . . Lord Pentland will do well to show the peaceful attitude of Lord Chelmsford and help to promote the welfare of the country. The welfare of the Madras Presidency depends on Lord Pentland's peaceful administration. The commotion in the country is growing day by day. Lord Pentland is able to remove this growing commotion. We hope he will use his skill in restoring peace and gain the gratitude of the people. . . His Excellency the Viceroy deserves the gratitude of the people for speaking with a peaceful mind unlike Lord Pentland, who is partial to the Anglo-Indians and who showed disregard for the Indian leaders. . . . To gain self-government it is necessary to have political reforms carried out on the lines indicated by the Congress and the Moslem League. It is essential that the Legislative Councils should have a non-official majority and also financial independence.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Sep. 12th, 1917.

The speech of His Excellency the Viceroy.

The Desamata, of the 12th September, says:—Whatever may be the defects in the speech of His Excellency the Viceroy at Simla, it cannot but be admitted that it has satisfied the people to some extent.

MYSORE STAR, Mysore, Sep. 16th, 1917.

The Viceroy's speech.

The Mysore Star, of the 16th September, giving a summary of His Excellency's recent speech, observes:—The speech was as notable as it was long. It is evident that the authorities would do everything in their power to promote peace and advancement. His Excellency's words are very touching when he said that he is not only in full sympathy with the political aspirations of the people but would be readier to perform than to promise. This is the type of administrator we want. His Excellency's attitude towards India is thus seen to be hardly different from that of Lord Hardinge. His is not a policy which would ignore Indian public opinion and subordinate Indian interests to those of the Empire. It is equally clear how solicitous His Excellency is to make mutual cordiality the foundation of all progress. Is it not imperative that now at least there should be no further trace of extremism in India? We may be sure that there is no one among us who is so thick-skulled as to think that the conciliatory attitude of the Government is due to the fear aroused by the extremists. There can be no doubt therefore that the political tranquility and sobriety displayed by the people during Mr. Montagu's proposed visit to India will create a good impression on our administrators and lead to the adoption of a policy best calculated to promote our advancement.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Sep. 14th, 1917.

Writing on the same subject, Swadeshabhimani, of the 14th September, writes:—Although owing to the Viceroy's silence all this time the provincial authorities may have naturally been led to believe that His Excellency was conniving at their policy of repression, now that he has made a frank and open statement on the important political questions of the day, it would not be wrong to suppose that His Excellency was really on the side of the people. It is immaterial whether the present liberal attitude of His Excellency is due to the force of popular indignation or to the influence of the new Secretary of State. The considerable measure of sympathy expressed by His Excellency on the present occasion is indeed laudable. There is immense difference between His Excellency's attitude when the press deputation waited on him and His Excellency's attitude now. Whatever the cause of this change, it would be ungracious to dwell at the present moment on His Excellency's past rigour and thus spoil the custard by throwing salt into it, as it were.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 15th, 1917.

70. Referring to the rumour that Mrs. Besant will be released, the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th September, says:—Mrs. Besant was able to show in the course of two years greater results in politics than what the Congress has been able to show in the course of many years. She showed that constitutional agitation does not mean meeting once in a year for three days and spending the time away in an easy-going manner. She has shown what it is to work incessantly for the realisation of an ideal. We welcome Mrs. Besant who has shown self-sacrifice for the advancement of India. We trust that she will continue constitutional agitation and render help towards the grant of the reforms. . . . If the rumour of release is true, we thank the Government for fulfilling the wishes of the people. The true strength of a Government lies in the fulfilment of the wishes of the people.

Mrs. Besant.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Sep. 18th, 1917.

Release of Mrs. Besant.

In expressing satisfaction at the unconditional release of Mrs. Besant, which shows that she was quite innocent and that the higher authorities were satisfied that she had been interned on baseless grounds, the Manorama, of the 18th September, rejoices that the authorities have, now at least, paid heed to Indian public opinion, hopes that this day of release of Mrs. Besant, who has suffered so much for the sake of others, will be regarded by all Indians as a red-letter day, and congratulates all persons who had a share in the rescinding of this order.

Writing on the same subject, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 19th September, observes that there can be no doubt that the just and sympathetic action of the Government of India in releasing Mrs Besant and her co-workers, will go a great way to allay the present unrest in India.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, Sep. 19th, 1917.

71. Under this heading the Desamata, of the 12th September, says:—The rulers of Canada have appreciated the loyalty and devotion of the Indians fighting on behalf of the Empire, and are giving them the rights of citizenship. The Indians in Colombia are being granted the right to vote along with the whitemen. . . But we are confronted with the question why here in India the Anglo-Indians do not adequately love the Indians, who have shed their blood in the present war.

Canada and the rights of the Indians.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Sep. 12th, 1917.

72 A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 12th September, writes:—"The swaraj and the swadeshi movements have much to do with each other. If our country gets swaraj, our countrymen may levy a heavy duty on foreign cotton goods just as the English levied, about the year 1787 a prohibitive duty of 75 per cent on the cost of the Dacca muslins which were imported into their country or our countrymen may pass a law imposing an adequate amount of fine on one who wears and one who sells a foreign cloth just as the English did in 1821 imposing a fine of £5 on one who wore and £20 on one who sold cloths imported from India. . . The Englishmen will love England. It cannot be natural for them to love India. . . The Englishmen cannot therefore encourage our industries to the detriment of English trades men and English industries. The Mysore and the Baroda States which are enjoying swaraj to some extent are encouraging their industries by giving bounties. About a year ago, when the Indian Government, in the interests of India, levied a certain duty on cotton goods imported into India from England the owners of cotton-mills in Manchester carried on a violent agitation to remove the duty which they supposed would entail loss to them. The Parliament therefore ordered that the said duty, which the Indians thought would be permaneut, should continue only during the war. . . It is clear from what Mr. Kola and Sir George Birdwood have written, that unless the foreign goods are boycotted the swadeshi industries cannot find sufficient encouragement. And no other measure can be so efficient for the boycott of foreign goods than to levy a duty on them. If our country get swaraj, the people in our country will have the power to levy a tax on foreign goods.

The Swadesi movement.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 12th, 1917.

73 The Andhrapatrika, of the 12th September, in its leader under this heading refers to the recommendations made by a meeting held in London, that the indenture labour system should be abolished and voluntary emigration encouraged and observes:—. . . It does not appear that the Indians would be satisfied with the new system. The principles underlying the recommendation would appear to be more favourable to the colonies. The lamentable aspect of the indentured labour system is that some agents are employed to secure and send labourers. They hide the truth, give the labourers false hopes and send them to distant countries. The new system will not be free from such difficulties. On the other hand they may be even aggravated. For, under the old system no help was given by the Government to the convassers. Under the proposed system they are to be appointed by the Government. It is certain that the people will be afraid of those that are employed by the Government. If they commit any irregularity, the people will hesitate to proceed against them. . . This system of free labour carried on with the help of the Government is already in vogue in Ceylon and Malay States. The unbearable condition of things brought about by this system in those countries has been so well depicted by Mr. Karimuthu Thyagaraju. Giving a number of illustrations, he stated that, as the masters are powerful, they subject the labourers to great hardships, that their crimes are not brought to light and even if they become public, the masters escape with a light punishment. We represent to the Government that if the same system is introduced in other countries, the state of things will not at all improve. . . Whatever system is introduced, it cannot but be more favourable to the people of the colonies. As the Mahratta observed: "Until the present system of Government is changed and Home Rule is established these difficulties will continue." It is, therefore, desirable that both the rulers and the ruled should work together for obtaining self-government. It is only the grant of self-government that can satisfactorily solve all political problems. We believe that the colonial Governments will then show proper regard to the Indians.

Free labour.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 12th, 1917.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 12th, 1917.

The Arya Vaisya community's dissent.

74. The Andhrapatrika, of the 12th September, states that information has been received that the Arya Vaisya community will meet to express their dissent from the cablegram sent by Rao Bahadur Thiagaraya Chetti to Mr. Montagu and observes that it need not be expressly stated that it is absolutely necessary that all sections of the Indians must express their assent to the scheme presented by the Congress and achieve their end.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 12th, 1917.

The Presidentship of the Muslim League.

75. The Andhrapatrika, of the 12th September, writes under this heading:—It is but proper that our Muhammadan brethren should intend to elect Mr. Muhammad Ali as the President of their league. The hardships which the patriot suffered are well known to all. He has been undergoing internment for the last three years. In return for the service he has rendered, it is right that he should be honored by being made the President.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 12th, 1917.

The Presidentship of the National Congress.

76. The Andhrapatrika, of the 12th September, expresses its regret for the disagreement of the Bengalis in the matter of electing Mrs. Besant as the President of the coming session of the National Congress and observes:—It is good that Sir Rabindranath should try to establish amicable relations between the two parties. We believe that he will succeed in his endeavours.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 12th, 1917.

The wickedness of a westerner.

77. The Principal, National College, Masulipatam, writes to the Andhrapatrika of the 12th September:—I wish to report through the columns of your paper the following railway incident, to the Anglo-Indian and the European community. I cannot say to which of the two communities he (the passenger in question) belongs. He only said that his wife who was travelling with him was an English lady. . . I cannot but say that he assailed me without the slightest provocation, and solely out of the height of racial pride. I shall set forth all that passed between us and would bear mention, reserving only such expressions of abuse as honorable men cannot utter or hear. On the evening of the 9th I bought a second-class ticket from Coimbatore to Madras to travel in the Mail Train that night. I and another passenger asked the stationmaster at Podanur to show us room to sit and he consented to seat us in a second-class carriage. In that carriage had already been seated on two berths a white-faced man and his wife. He indignantly told the stationmaster that it was objectionable that he should seat an Indian in the same carriage in which he was sitting. I cannot write here the vulgar language he used. . . We somehow managed to get into the train with our luggage. When the train was about to move, the male representative of those white persons rose and heaped upon us such vulgar abuse as I had never before heard in my life. I have heard of westerners who bitterly hated Indians whom they called black-men and who smarted at the Indians claiming to be treated with respect, but the harsh words of this white-man were most unbearable. . . He threatened to throw us down through the window. But as we did not mind his threats he approached me, and, opening a box, took out a pistol and put it in his pocket. As soon as the train stopped at the next station, I got down and reported the matter to the stationmaster and the chief guard. He was much incensed and turned towards me as if preparing to assault me. He again abused me and threatened to beat me if I got into the train again. By that time a crowd gathered round us. Had such a thing happened in any free country, the people would have dragged the man who acted so wickedly out of the carriage and taught him a good lesson. But there the guard only shut the door of the carriage and, thrusting me into the next carriage, gave the whistle. It was well that I got into another carriage. For by that time there were three more friends in the first carriage and we would have got him under our control if he had recourse to any violence in word or deed; and if it had happened so, we would have been deprived of a clear ground for condemning the cowardly cruelty that has disarmed a peace-loving people.

78. The Kistnapatrika, of the 15th September, referring to the conduct of the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the National Congress to be held at Calcutta observes: —Some of the leaders of the Congress are habituated to such autocratic methods of conduct for a long time. What they want is democracy but what they exercise is autocracy. They want the Government to pay heed to the opinion of the people, but they themselves disregard popular opinion. . . Mr. Surendranath Banerji and Mr. Vaikuntanath Sen have surpassed even the bureaucracy in their autocratic behaviour. Autocracy wherever found, whether in the rulers or the ruled is reprehensible and condemnable. We commend the members of the Bengal Reception Committee for condemning Messrs. Surendranath and Vaikuntanath and for electing Rabindranath, the great poet of Bengal, as the President of the Committee. It is a sight for angels to see Rabindranath who carries the divine message to the world, as the President of the Reception Committee and Mrs. Annie Besant, the renowned head of the Theosophical Society, as the President of the Congress. . . The Congress cannot but be held in Calcutta and Rabindranath cannot but be recognised as the Chairman of the Reception Committee and it is certain that Mrs. Besant will preside over the deliberations of the Congress.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Sep. 15th, 1917.

The Reception Committee of the Calcutta Congress.

79. A correspondent to Kistnapatrika, of the 15th September, writes:—It may happen hereafter that there may be a large number of representatives directly elected by the people in the Provincial Legislative Council. We all expect that the British Parliament will, on the recommendation of Mr. Montagu, enact a law making the Executive Councils subordinate to the Legislative.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Sep. 15th, 1917.

Election of popular representatives.

But before Montagu arrives in India it is necessary that the details of the scheme of reforms formulated by the Congress Committee and the Muslim League should be discussed and settled. . . We should not be carried away by the sweet words of Mr. Montagu and our Viceroy. Do you see one enthusiastic word in their speeches regarding compulsory education or representation in the Legislative Councils? It would be a fault to give up our political agitation depending on these empty pacifying words. If it is not carried on constitutionally and with the usual zeal, believe me, we will not gain any advantages. Self-government will not be so easily obtained as some of us suppose. It is very necessary that the discussion of the above points should be taken up immediately and a unanimous opinion arrived at. . .

80. A correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 15th September, writes on this subject:— . . . Some suppose that the opinions expressed in Justice and the Andhraprakasika and the Dravidan are the opinions of the 40 millians of non-Brahmans of this presidency. This is not at all true. . . I can emphatically assert that the non-Brahmans are not opposed to Home Rule.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Sep. 15th, 1917.

The non-Brahman movement favourable to Home Rule.

Another correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 15th September, writing on this subject, observes:—Mr. Thiagaraya Chetti and Doctor Nayar have brought discredit to the whole country and exposed the non-Brahmans to ridicule. . . Whatever difference of opinions the Indians may have in other matters, it is their duty to be unanimous in what relates to the Congress and to represent that the scheme of Home Rule drawn up by the Congress held at Lucknow should be granted. . . The correspondent exhorts the non-Brahman leaders to muster under the Congress banner and not prove traitors to their own country.

Non-Brahmans and the internments.

81. Another correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 15th September, writes:—It is shameful and regrettable that Mr. Thiagaraya Chetti should send a cablegram to England stating that the non-Brahmans do not like the release of Mrs. Besant. . . . The cablegram despatched by Mr. Thiagaraya Chetti reflects discredit on the whole community of non-Brahmans. We must immediately convene meetings and declare that we do not agree with Mr. Thiagaraya Chetti. Otherwise we deserve dishonour.

82. A female correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 15th September, expresses her sorrow for the internment of Mrs. Besant, and exhorts the Indian women to contribute their mite to the Besant fund. "It was through her endeavours", she observes, "the great Home Rule movement has spread throughout the country".

Internment day, Guntūr.

84. The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th September, publishes a telegram stating that the action of the Collector of Guntūr, who stopped a procession that was to be held at Guntūr caused great indignation to those who attended the meeting held on Sunday last to celebrate the internment day. It says that the meeting which was attended by 2,000 men passed resolutions condemning the delay in liberating the interned, and criticising the order of the Collector and the speech of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab.

Home Rule Service.

85. The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th September, reports Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar to have said at the inaugural meeting in connection with the Home Rule service training:—Though the English language has done us great good since the time of Macaulay and deserves to be a factor in our education, it must not be the first language. Prominence should be given only to the vernaculars. Even in the matter of administration, the country should be divided on a language basis. With that end in view, the members of the Home Rule service should receive training in the languages and history of the country and work with patience and courage.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 17th, 1917.

A Home Rule League.

86. Another correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th September, says:—When the Potlapudi Home Rule League was started, eleven people joined it. Twenty people joined it of late including some women. An illiterate man was first refused admission, but when he said that he was also enthusiastic like others and that he would bear any difficulties, he was admitted as a member. We are glad to hear that his mother also expressed the same desire.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

A meeting of the Home Rule League, Vizagapatam.

87. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th September, reports the president of a meeting of Home Rulers at Vizagapatam to have said:—The release of Mrs. Besant and others cannot be said to be an act of grace on the part of the rulers. They have only cancelled an improper order of theirs. . . . To request the parents or guardians of students to help the authorities in carrying out the order regarding students and politics and deem that the parents or guardians will do so betrays shortsightedness and not farsightedness on the part of the rulers.

88. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th September, reports a speaker to have said at a meeting of the Masulipatam Home Rule League:—Mrs. Besant of unsurpassed courage and daring entered the field of Indian politics two years ago. . . The bureaucracy could not endure to see this political agitation. The Government interned Mrs. Besant to separate her from the other political agitators. But they were disappointed. Commotion prevailed everywhere. . . No Government in this world can deprive the right of the people to represent their grievances to them—the right to tell them, "your actions are wrong. We are suffering hardship." But our Government did that also. At such a juncture the cry of passive resistance was heard from all sides. We thought that such resistance might be begun if there were a thousand people prepared to resort to it. In two weeks 1,400 people became ready in Bombay, 2,000 people in Madras and 30 in Masulipatam have given their signatures. In Sind, 3,000 people made themselves ready to resort to passive resistance. When Mr. Lajput Rai was deported, the charms of Swadeshi, swaraj, boycott and national education came into existence. Now as a result of the punishment of Mrs. Besant, there has been added the fifth charm, namely, passive resistance.

The Home Rule League, Masulipatam.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

89. The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th September, says in its leader under this heading :— . . Mrs. Besant having entered Indian politics at such a critical juncture, introduced new methods and conducted constitutional agitation on the lines adopted in England. She published the aspirations of the Indians without hesitation. . . The desire for Home Rule has spread all over the country with the speed of wind. The English who have been indifferent to the aspirations of the Indians, have now begun to pay their attention to Indian affairs English papers, both conservative and radical, now see justice in the aspirations of the Indians. Mr. Montagu is coming to India to enquire into such aspirations. . . Indians should be prepared to endure any difficulties in conducting constitutional agitation to attain self-government. They have to learn such lessons from the history of Mrs. Besant. . . The Madras Mail has not given up its threats. . . The life history of Mr. Montagu is positive proof that he will not yield to the bureaucracy who act in violation of peace, but will work having in view the advancement of the empire. . . Educated men should go to villages also, speak to the villagers on the subject of Home Rule and obtain their consent. Mr. Gandhi is prepared to be the leader in carrying out this work to a successful end. When the whole nation of Indians are determined to have the Congress scheme of reforms carried out who can stand in the way of their realising their desires.

Our duty in the future.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

90. The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th September, says:—As days pass on, it becomes plain that the Andhra movement helps the Home Rule movement. . . With farsightedness, Mrs. Besant recognised the separate individual existence of the Andhras, and earned the gratitude of the Andhras by establishing a separate Home Rule League for the Andhra country. . . Sir S Subrahmania Ayyar said yesterday in a speech that the division of the country on a language basis is a means to self-government.

The Andhra movement.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

91. Referring to the order of the Government on the report of the committee appointed to enquire into the Kistna floods, the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th September, remarks that it is not right on the part of the Government to rely on the words of the Superintending Engineer who is against the views of the people, and to disregard the opinions of the people and the Conservator.

The Kistna Floods Committee.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

92. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th September, says with reference to the proposed special Andhra Conference:—The conference should move a resolution about passive resistance. The mere release of Mrs. Besant and Messrs. Wadia and Arundale will not grant all that we want. Peace will not be restored until those who had previously served the country are also released, and the Defence of India Act which is a stain on the country is repealed. We must be prepared to continue the sort of agitation we began three months ago. The Andhras should not hesitate, and should not be satisfied with small reforms, but should adopt a resolution on passive resistance.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

Executive Engineer Mr. Srinivasa Ayyangar.

93. Referring to the transfer of the Executive Engineer, Mr. Srinivasa Ayyangar, from Kistna Eastern Delta to Cuddapah, the Andhraprakasika, of the 19th September, observes as follows:—There would be no cause for complaint if, instead of transferring Mr. Ayyangar at the instigation of his enemies, the authorities cancelled the changes proposed by him to the satisfaction of those that did not like them. We do not approve of the unnecessary transfer without redressing the real grievance. Several respectable people say that 90 per cent of the people in Mr. Ayyangar's jurisdiction like him very much. We, therefore, humbly request the Government to retain Srinivasa Ayyangar in the Kistna Eastern Delta for some time.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

Kistna Eastern Delta.

94. The Andhraprakasika, of the 19th September, publishes some particulars about supply channels, drainage channels, etc., in the Kistna Eastern Delta, for the immediate attention of the Government.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 14th, 1917.

A child's play.

95. A correspondent writes to the Andhraprakasika, of the 14th September, under this heading:—With a view to break the non-Brahman movement, the Brahman Home Rulers have set up some non-Brahmans, by means of influence or of deceit to start another non-Brahman association. . .

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 18th, 1917.

India's political future.

96. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 18th September, writes:—Much speculation is going on in various quarters as regards India's political future. The Indians claim that they are competent to have a democratic system of Government on the lines of the Colonial Government and add that even if some mistakes be made at the start, they will right themselves before long. The view of some like Lord Islington is that India is as yet not fit for political privileges such as those enjoyed by the Colonies and that these privileges should be extended only gradually. The Anglo-Indians also share this view. But the Indians do not regard it as correct. They think that they are declared unfit for Home Rule, because those in authority are not willing to give up their unrestrained powers. This has led to mutual misunderstanding. There were autocratic methods in England too. But the people also had constitutional authority in their hands. Numerous persons had to lay down their lives to gain this authority. Here too it would be wrong to suppose that the authorities will grant parliamentary institutions calculated to control their authority the moment the people ask for them. In the first place, as Lord Islington observed, we should be fit to exercise such authority. We should next submit our demands in a constitutional manner. We should fight for them in a constitutional manner until they are granted. If still our efforts fail, we should send a deputation to England and address the British public. We should enlist the sympathy of the British Parliament. The British are on the whole democrats by principle. With their help we shall be sure to have a democratic constitution. If even this attempt fails, we shall have to resort to Mr. Gandhi's passive resistance principle. In all these efforts if our people work calmly and peacefully, we shall eventually obtain Home Rule. Caste and religious differences are great obstacles in our path. We should learn to be cordial at least in political matters. There are numerous persons who are trying to prevent the growth of such cordiality. Unless we refuse to be led away by their arguments and realise the importance of self-reliance, it will be impossible to obtain Home Rule.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 15th, 1917.

The Hon'ble Mr. Basu.

97. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 15th September, in an article in English, writes:—"It is thought that Mr. Basu's assistance is indispensable to Mr. Montagu in his mission in India. The mission is that of a peace-maker. It is no ordinary business. There are a number of Anglo-Indian officers in India who have lost touch with the constitutional instincts of England. They are opposed to all political reform.

They are for keeping India under leading strings. They have no faith in the principles of British constitution. They want to put down all Indian efforts at constitutional Government. They ignore the lessons of the constitutional history of England. They have forgotten the circumstances that led to the terrible political revolutions that have taken place all over the world in times past.

* * * * * *

Mr. Bhupendranath Basu is a great statesman, trained in the school of adversity. He, more than any other in India, is fit to be the Indian representative. It is probably on this account that Mr. Montagu wants him to be in India, so that the chances of his being misled by interested parties may be minimised. We sincerely wish that his stay in India will lead to the triumph of the sacred political traditions of England and to the triumph of the righteous British policy."

The triumph of true British Imperialism.

98. In an article in English under this heading, the Samvad Abhyudaya, of the 19th September, writes:—The whole of India is ringing with the praise of the British Government and the Government of India on learning that Mrs. Annie Besant, Mr. G. S. Arundale and Mr. Wadia have been released. The whole of India welcomes them back to the sphere of their patriotic activity. We congratulate the British Government and the Government of India on the lofty spirit of magnanimity that has induced them to take this really imperial step. We are glad that the spirit of Anglo-Indian gingoism has not been able to influence the wise counsels of the Empire on which the sun has never been setting and will never set. We look upon this benevolent Imperial act as the harbinger of Home Rule for India.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 19th, 1917.

In another article on the same subject, the same paper of the 15th September, says that although we rejoice to learn that Mrs. Besant will be released, we must emphasize the point that it behoves popular leaders like Mrs. Besant, no less than the Government, to exercise the fullest calmness, self-restraint and mutual forbearance.

Delay in releasing Mrs. Besant.

99. Referring to the delay in releasing Mrs. Besant, as ordered by the Government of India, the Yogakshemam, of the 14th September, observes that the delay in the carrying out of the decision of the Government in any matter will make the people lose their confidence in their love of justice.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, Sep. 14th, 1917.

The recent town hall meeting in Calicut.

100. In condemning the action of Barrister Kesava Menon and other Home Rulers and Theosophists in leaving the hall on the occasion of the meeting, held in Calicut in connection with the ensuing visit of His Excellency the Governor, the Kerala Patrika, of the 15th September, thinks that the Collector also was wrong in prohibiting Mr. Kesava Menon from addressing in Malayalam the audience, composed mostly of persons who had no knowledge of English, points out that, if the speaker indulged in violent and objectionable language, the Collector could have stopped him at once or he could have called upon others to speak and remove any misunderstanding which might have been created by Mr. Menon's speech, and observes that the Collector's action will tend to minimise the seriousness of the fault of the opposite party and enable outsiders to make much of this small incident and shower abuse on Government officials.

KERALA PATRIKA, Calicut, Sep. 15th, 1917.

The Calicut town hall meeting.

In deploring the unfortunate incident at the recent meeting held in Calicut in connection with His Excellency's visit thereto, the Manorama, of the 18th September, doubts whether the suggestion of the Collector that a sum of money should be raised and presented to the Governor for the maintenance of the Hospital ship "Madras" is not contrary to the wishes of His Excellency himself, and points out that a far larger amount than what is required for decorations, etc., will be required for the carrying out of this suggestion, and that, in any case, some expenditure, however small, on account of the visit itself, will be unavoidable.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Sep. 18th, 1917.

Writing on the same subject, the Supprabhatam, of the 19th September, takes exception to the suggestion of the Collector to raise a sum of money and present it to His Excellency the Governor, and thinks that, if at all such an amount should be raised, it should be collected from amongst the wealthy classes, but that the Governor's policy seems to be quite the contrary.

SUPPRABHATAM, Trichur, Sep. 19th, 1917.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, Sep. 10th, 1917.

101. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 10th September, referring to the internment of Mrs. Besant and others for having infringed the Press Act and the Indian Defence Act, says:—The action of the Viceroy, in giving special attention to the question of the release of these people, is a manifest proof of the wisdom and moral courage of the British authorities, worthy of all appreciation. The system of administration also demands that the interference of the Viceroy should be regarded as a predominating factor in the matter of amending and revising laws proposed by Provincial Governors.

The Rangoon Times.

The editor, in criticising the adverse opinion of the Rangoon Times, observes:—It has enrolled itself in the list of ingrates who fail to see the reasonableness of the Viceroy's interference. When the Government of India is seeking some effectual means of quenching the fire of agitation, the Rangoon Times is planning to spread the flames with the luckless sparks of its shortsighted views.

The editor, in conclusion, says:—We expect it of those qualities of head and heart, which Lord Pentland possesses, that in carrying out the orders of his superior officer he will pay no heed to the barking of few village dogs. There is no doubt that he (the Viceroy) is loyally devoted to his Emperor and possesses a genuine affection for the Indian people.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Sep. 10th, 1917.

102. The Qaumi Report, of the 10th September, writes:—A gentleman has asked us to say whether Mussalmans may maintain affectionate or loyal relations with polytheists and what Islam teaches Mussalmans on the subject of idol worshippers (polytheists). The answer, we have given him, is inserted below; for we find, under lying the idea, a very important Islamic problem. Apparently some have the difficulty in understanding that how Hindus, who are polytheists can be friendly with Mussalmans when the Koran has declared them to be unclean and prohibited them from approaching Kaba.

Mussalmans and polytheists.

In our opinion, it is a case of false reasoning on the part of certain gentlemen. If the gist of the argument is, whether or no friendly relations with idolators are lawful, even a mulla of a mosque can say, it is lawful, when business is concerned, but unlawful when it touches religious questions. Nothing more can be said even by a highly educated divine.

Islam is neither oppressive nor destructive, that it should be inimically disposed towards other nations. It is evident that the relations of Mussalmans with the followers of Hazrath Isa (Jesus Christ) Son of Mary, Peace be on them! have always been of a friendly character. Islam makes special mention of certain Christian virtues and has frequently supported the Christians against the Jews to a degree that, had there been no Koran, their immaculateness and holiness could never have been so clearly established.

Nor is this all! In the day of its sway Islam showed consideration to Christians and threw no obstacles in the way of their religious freedom.

In the history of the world the memory of the tragedy of Jerusalem is fresh even today, and who can deny that Mussalmans have themselves frankly accepted many Christian principles and publicly acknowledged many of its tenets, while openly opposing many Christian practices and articles of faith. But as there have been friendly relations between Mussalmans and Christians, so also there has existed mutual enmity and antagonism. This friendship and hostility have existed between them not since wars of the crusades merely, but ever since the time of the Prophet himself, on whom be peace! In the Koran where they are praised, they are also blamed. Where mention is made of love, antagonism is also referred to. From this it would appear that Islam has adopted a just and philosophic policy and calls a spade a spade. How fairly has it been said—

"Thou has enumerated all the evils of wine, tell us some of its virtues too."

Similarly with polytheists. If they are prohibited from approaching the Kāba so are the people of the Book. But the affection and antagonism, referred to, are not personal or prompted by selfish motives but are the outcome of religious zeal for the unity of God.

In the sura of the spider (Koran, chapter XXIX Tr.) God says—

"Mussalmans dispute not against those who have received the scriptures, unless in the mildest manner, except such of them as behave injuriously towards you. We believe in the revelation sent down unto us, and also in that which hath been sent down unto you. Our God and your God is one, and unto Him we are resigned."

The mention of affection and antagonism, with reference to the people of the Book, made by us, is based on the same principle. But this affection and antagonism do not apply to all Christians but merely to those who merit such treatment. This affection or antagonism is not restricted to any one nation or religion. Even among polytheists the good are good.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Sep. 13th, 1917.

Mussalmans and polytheists (Chinese and Mussalmans).

The Qaumi Report, of the 13th September, writes:—We have proved that the relations of Mussalmans with Zoroastrians have been extremely friendly and fraternal in character. We will endeavour to show that the attitude of Mussalmans with the Chinese has also been friendly. It is admitted that these people are polytheists (idolaters). But their idolatry has not tended to keep them and Mussalmans apart.

In support of the above statement the editor cites evidence from Professor Arnold's Preaching of Islam, and says that the Holy Prophet, on whom be peace! and his successors treated the Chinese in a friendly manner.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Sep. 15th, 1917.

India's trinity.

103. The Qaumi Report, of the 15th September, writes:—Mr. Montagu has admitted that the goal of India is self-government, and last week Lord Chelmsford announced that India would gradually obtain self-government. We are glad that there are no obstacles in the path of the attainment of these ideals and aims.

We now have three parties: (1) the first one is desirous of getting self-government in the twinkling of an eye, (2) the second is opposed to self-government, and has no desire to acquire this right for another century or so, (3) the third neither knows nor wants to know what self-government is.

Lord Chelmsford has founded a trinity of first principles in opposition to the political triad and has plainly told the people of India that the procedure will be—(1) extension in, and advancement of, the limits and powers of local municipalities, because these are the only institutions that afford any political training; (2) appointment of more Indians to higher posts in order that they be accustomed to bearing the burden of responsible Government and (3) enlargement and expansion of the Legislative Councils so that public aspirations and aims may find scope. We are sure that these three draughts will prove an exceedingly powerful tonic and stimulant for those who are suffering from the malady of liberty.

The editor adds: We cannot, at present, accept this trinity, as a whole, or its component parts, unless and until some separate measures are adopted for the benefit of our community. We should be given separate and distinct powers in each of the directions above mentioned.

III.—Legislation.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Sep. 14th, 1917.

The Usury Bill.

104. The Swadesamitran, of the 14th September, comments in the following strain on the provisions of this Bill:—The Bill authorises the Judges to use their discretion in declaring the rate of interest charged in any particular transaction to be heavy, taking into consideration the circumstances under which the debt is incurred and the status of the party who incurs it. We doubt if this discretionary power vested in the Judges may lead to an increase of litigation. A rate of interest pronounced to be reasonable by one Judge may be deemed to be heavy by another. It is a matter to be considered by the Select Committee whether it would not be more convenient to have the current rate of interest obtaining in banks as the standard for fixing a reasonable rate. But what is once fixed as the maximum rate of interest chargeable may, in course of time, come to be the minimum rate. The provision in the Bill that civil courts may reopen completed transactions and decide on them may, we think, swell litigation. In response to the suggestion made by Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya that the Japanese system of establishing Agricultural and Mercantile Banks for advancing loans to agriculturists and merchants might well be adopted here, Sir William Vincent stated that it was beyond the province of the Government of India. This is not a satisfactory reply. As Agricultural Banks, Commercial or Industrial Banks and Co-operative Credit Societies will be helpful to various classes of people and wean them from evil habits, there will not be much work for courts. Though it is necessary to put a stop to heavy rates of interest being charged, we would impress on Lord Chelmsford that the proposed Bill will give only temporary relief, and it is only Banks of the type suggested by Pandit Malaviya that would do permanent good. Lord Chelmsford has stated that he intends to improve the agriculture and industries of India during his time. The establishment of these banks is the best means of carrying out that idea.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 18th, 1917.

The Usury Bill.

Referring to the discussion in the Imperial Council in connection with the Usury Bill the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 18th September, says that it must be remembered that much of the abject condition of the ryots, labourers and traders at present is due to the ruthless dealings of the sowcar and that Travancore has already prescribed 12 per cent as the highest rate of interest that can be granted by the courts and that Mysore might set an example to the Government of India as well as to sister Native States by fixing 9 per cent as the highest rate allowable to courts or might at least follow the example of Travancore.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, Sep. 14th, 1917.

The Usury Bill.

In commenting upon the "Usury Bill" to be introduced into the Imperial Legislative Council, the Yogakshemam, of the 14th September, refers to the differences of opinion on the subject, and says:—Before passing such a measure into law what the Government should really do, is to make arrangements for an easy obtainment of loans at a reasonable rate of interest. If the Government of India who now keep lakhs and lakhs of rupees in England and lend them to the English merchants at 3 per cent per annum, were to bring them back to India and lend them to Indians at 6 per cent, how excellent it would be!

MAHAVIKATA DUTAN AND SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 15th and 18th, 1917.

The Village Panchayat Bill.

105. A correspondent of the Mahavikata Dutan and the Swadesamitran, of the 15th and the 18th September, respectively, echoes almost the same sentiments as those expressed by a correspondent of the Swadesamitran, of the 18th August, regarding the clause in the Bill relating to the nomination by the Collector of the members of a panchayat, and abstracted in paragraph 95 of Report No. 34 of 1917, and suggests that provision should be made in the Bill for proper records being maintained in writing in civil and criminal cases, for the transfer of cases from the file of one panchayat court to another, should a party to the suit so desire, and for appeals being preferred against the decisions of the panchayat.

IV.—NATIVE STATES.

TRAVANCORE ABHIMANI, Nagercoil, Aug. 30th, 1917.

A terrible murder.

106. In a leader under this heading, the Travancore Abhimani, of the 30th August, refers to a gruesome murder which is said to have been committed in a place 4 miles to the south-west of Nagercoil and, remarking that such murders have of late been frequent and attributing these incidents to the neglect of the Police and to the lenient punishments awarded by Magistrates in such cases, observes that the only remedy for this is the inflictment of exemplary punishments by Magistrates, whenever they are satisfied that the offence has been proved, and suggests that the Darbar should remove such Magistrates as cannot do this and replace them by smart and efficient men.

ENGLISH PAPERS OWNED BY INDIANS.

II.—Home Administration.

(k) General.

1. The West Coast Bulletin, of the 14th September, remarks:—"His Excellency Lord Pentland is coming to the West Coast once more in accordance with his "business as usual" policy. . . Many responsible people on the West Coast are much against giving any public welcome to His Excellency, as his lordship has identified himself with a nefarious sort of repressive policy. . . It is a pity that our civilian officers are ever on the alert to foment trouble and disaffection without any cause whatsoever. Since His Excellency the Governor has also fallen a willing victim to arrogant civilian influences, there is no other go but to take things as they come. The Calicut meeting shows how the people welcome the Governor's visit, if we leave it here without further comments."

West Coast Bulletin, Mattencherri, Sep. 14th, 1917.

His Excellency the Governor's forthcoming tour on the West Coast.

2. Justice, of the 22nd September, has the following:—"A prospective Brahman oligarch, the Hon'ble Mr. Srinivasa Sastri, put in a claim in the Imperial Legislative Council the other day for the Brahman oligarchy for preference over the European oligarchy. 'He had never been able to understand', said Mr. Srinivasa Sastri, 'how that a Brahman oligarchy, if oligarchy it was, rising from the soil and rooted to the soil and with interests far more permanent than those of the British oligarchy would be the less acceptable of the two.' Perhaps Mr. Srinivasa Sastri may not understand it. It is not in his interest to do so. But we can tell him the reason why. The people in India who object to the Brahman oligarchy have learned from painful past experience that the Brahman oligarchy is narrow-minded, intolerant, selfish and oppressive. They have also found out that the European oligarchy, whatever else may be said against it, is broadminded and anxious to do its best for the people who are placed under its care. That is why the Indian people prefer the European oligarchy to the Brahman oligarchy."

Justice, Madras, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

"Oligarchies—Swadesi and Videshi."

3. The Hindu, of the 22nd September, observes:—"The debate on the resolutions of the Hon'ble Mr. B. N. Sarma and the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya in the Imperial Legislative Council, regarding the recommendations of the Public Services Commission, was of more than ordinary interest. The Commission is of opinion that in the Indian Civil Service and the Police department, 'the nature of British responsibility for the good governance of India requires the employment in the higher ranks of a preponderating proportion of British officers.' This is a recommendation suicidal to our legitimate interests and subversive of our constitutional rights; the principle underlying it implies that British sovereignty in India cannot exist without official power being for ever concentrated in men of British birth; and the lesson conveyed by it is the pernicious one that the maintenance of British rule in India is incompatible with the highest development of Indians."

Hindu, Madras, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

The Public Services Commission Report.

4. The Malabar Herald, for the week ending 22nd September, writes:—"At last, Mrs. Annie Besant and her two co-workers Messrs. Arundale and Wadia have been released from internment. . . The order of release issued by the Government of Madras 'in deference to the strong recommendation of the Government of India' is silent as to the condition under which the release has been ordered. In face of this silence we are forced to the conclusion that Mrs. Besant and her colleagues have been released unconditionally. If it is so, and there is no ground to warrant any other conclusion, the position of the Madras Government has become extremely ludicrous. Anyway, it may be taken as a 'settled fact,' unlike that of Lord Morley's in connection with the partition of Bengal, that Mrs. Besant wields an influence with the British Cabinet which is much stronger than that of Lord Chelmsford or Lord Pentland. Mr. Montagu's first 'shot' has riddled the authority of both, and the next developments will be watched with intense anxiety."

Malabar Herald, British Cochin, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

Mrs. Besant's release.

NON-BRAHMAN, Madras, Sep. 23rd, 1917.

The Non-Brahman, of the 23rd September, observes:—"We do not think that any Government anywhere in India had the same justification to intern or even to deport a person than the Madras Government had in their action against Mrs. Annie Besant. The Highest Court in the land had condemned her campaign of Home Rule in unmeasured terms. The strongest portion of His Excellency Lord Chelmsford's speech in reply to the press deputation was his reference to the condemnation of the Besantine ways of carrying out her propaganda. Her persistent attack of officials, her contemptuous reference to high officials, not excluding even His Excellency the Governor, and her systematic downpour of calumny against everything official had started a storm of hate throughout the Presidency. . . Such was the extent to which this remarkable Irish agitator had carried things that to be a moderate in politics was almost akin to being a criminal in society.

"The fate that overtook the moderate has overtaken the Government. Today the Government of India stands condemned for bringing Government into contempt — the crime for which a journalist or a public man ought to be hanged. Either the Government of Madras was right or it was wrong when it interned Mrs. Besant. If it was wrong it ought never to have been allowed to take that step. But the Government of India, and the Secretary of State both supported the Government of Madras in its action against Mrs. Besant. We do not permit ourselves to be overwhelmed by any false patriotism when we assert that a very large body of public opinion did sympathise with the Government, and although it is galling to any man that the freedom of any one should be restricted, there are occasions when such a measure must be taken, when delay in taking such a measure would be a confession of weakness. It is our opinion that the Government of Madras showed its weakness when it delayed action. But it took it. . . We are not sorry that Mrs. Besant is released; but we are sorry that the Government has covered itself with disgrace in the eyes of the common people. Already the Home Rule flag betokens to the illiterate villager a new Government; and this release of the interned has a meaning in it which will not be lost on the people. . . 'Be bloody, bold, resolute' as the witches told Macbeth and you can bring down the Government of India on its knees. That is the lesson of the Besant internment and release and no community in India has more reasons to remember this than the backward ones. And when we attack the Government and cover it with calumny, we hope that the Government will not come down upon us. . . Because we may not have, on our side, Ramanuja Acharis to grow their beards or Deobankars to threaten passive resistance, we hope the Government will not trample upon us like worms. Treat all alike, unless it becomes an accepted theory that the Government of India is afraid of agitation and passive resistance. Then the first duty of our leaders is to form associations in every village and at one pressure of the button from Baluchistan to Siam, from Simla to Tuticorin, our voice must be heard. . . Meanwhile we stand at the humble feet of Her Majesty Annie Besant and most fervently pray that she would pardon us our mistakes and would lend us her organisation and strength when we have to attack the Government. Greater than Great Britain is to the Allies in this war against Germany will be Mrs. Besant to us in any war against the Government. Let us ever remember the lessons of the Besant internment and release."

JUSTICE, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

Justice, of the 24th September, states:—"We pointed out in these columns a few days ago that the most honourable course open to Lord Pentland after the unconditional release of Mrs. Besant on the 'strong recommendation' of the Government of India was to resign, to go home and ask his fellow Peers in the British House of Lords to hear him in his defence. Since then the Brahman Besantine organ in Madras has come out with its barefaced sophistry pointing out that there is no reason why Lord Pentland should resign. . . The attempts made by the Brahman sophist to make out that the Governor of Madras is practically a permanent official is worthy of the reputed capacity of that class for splitting hairs. . . Lord Pentland may remain at his post out of a sense of duty and loyalty to the Crown, but his usefulness is gone. He has become powerless to enforce order. Take, for instance, the Government order about students and politics. Does anyone believe that the Madras Government can enforce it now? The Government of Madras is being openly defied in almost all big educational centres in this Presidency, and in the face of the 'strong recommendation' of the Government of India in connection with another case, the Government of Madras dare not take steps to enforce their own order for fear that they would get another snub. There is no knowing what the Government of India will do in their pursuit of that will-o'-the-wisp, the placid political atmosphere for Mr. Montagu. . . The spectacle of a British Government in office in India afraid to say Boo to a goose is rather degrading. We put forward the suggestion that Lord Pentland should resign in the best interests of Lord Pentland himself. As one of his Lordship's sincere well-wishers we feel sorry to see him remain as the head of the Government of Madras when all round him open defiance of the orders of his Government is manifested. Under those conditions none but his Lordship's enemies would urge him to remain in office and put up with all this humiliation. . . It will be undignified for Lord Pentland to remain in Madras powerless and helpless. Time was when the Governors of Madras occupied a very high position indeed. Lord Pentland by further continuing in office will only serve to indicate 'from what heights he fell'—to drag on the remaining portion of his official existence with 'none so poor to do him reverence.' The position must be extremely painful to Lord Pentland's friends and well-wishers, and hence our request to Lord Pentland is, 'Please go.'"

5. The Indian Patriot, of the 27th September, writes as follows:—"The speech with which His Excellency Chelmsford closed the Simla session of the Imperial Legislative Council will be yet another call to the Europeans to agitate more bitterly, for that speech is highly conciliatory, statesmanlike and calculated to rally the people to the side of the Government. The report that we publish elsewhere of an enthusiastic meeting of the European Association, which is said to partake of the features of the Ilbert Bill days, will be read with interest by the people of India. With the efforts of Europeans to safeguard their own interests, no one will quarrel. If the interests of Europeans should clash with the interests of the people of this country, the well-known law of majority will prevail. . . What exactly is the grievance that has drawn thousands of them into a meeting? If it is as a protest against the new chapter which the Viceroy mentioned, and of which we had the most convincing sign in the release of Mrs. Besant, they are at a losing battle. They can surely never make headway against the solid ranks of Indian public opinion which has been mobilised and which is flushed with its victory. The day has gone by when a handful of Europeans could have deflected the policy of the Government, and howsoever much we may refrain from making any straight and open reference to it, we feel bound to reply to the cry of Europeans that their day is over. They can only rouse opposition in India, and intense opposition, if they should persist in magnifying their alleged grievances. The price of jute would not have fallen if Mrs. Besant had not been released or Sir Michael O'Dwyer not apologised, and except as traders the non-official European community in India have been never known to take much interest in politics. . . Why was Mrs. Besant released? Why was Sir Michael O'Dwyer persuaded to apologise? Because a new chapter is ushered into Indian history after the definite announcement by the Secretary of State of the goal of self-government. The time has most dramatically changed and Mrs. Besant, to whom Lord Chelmsford paid a well-deserved tribute, is now an ally of Government. And in spite of the scorn and suppressed jealousy with which this remarkable lady is mentioned by the entire Anglo-Indian Press, there is no use denying the fact that educated India is behind her: her strength is the strength of her following, and it is a greatest acknowledgment of the force of public opinion in India when His Excellency Lord Chelmsford pays a public tribute to Mrs. Besant. . . We warn Europeans in India against any desperate attempt to stem the current of progress. They will only rouse another agitation. Let them remember that at the present time the Government is on the side of the people, and that both Moderates and Extremists will rally to its side. . . They are out against the Government. Why? Because the Government has placed itself at the head of progressive force in India. Indians will not tolerate any effort on any one's part to stand between them and their goal. And Indians know how to act in concert and gain their end by constitutional agitation."

I.—Foreign Politics.

Hitakarini, Ellore, Sep. 16th, 1917.

6. Referring to the fall of Riga, the Hitakarini, of the 16th September, observes as follows:— . . . This necessity for a change in the capital is due to the want of a strong fortress between Petrograd and Riga. In the fall of Riga, the Russians have certainly sustained a great loss.

The fall of Riga.

7. No wise man will doubt for a moment that the endeavours of the Allies will sooner or later be crowned with magnificent and complete success, saving Europe and the whole world from the unabating strength of Germany. Even if America had not entered the war, the Allies could not but gain the victory. It is unwise on the part of anybody to calculate as to how soon success may be met with. Sometimes, writing articles which auger good and prophesying as if Germany's material and other strength has become spent, newspapers say that for this reason Germany cannot continue to fight.

Germany's strength.

But those who know more about the strength of Germany have nodded their heads in doubt. Mr. Gerard, who was the American Ambassador in Berlin and who spent two years during the war there, is writing a work regarding his four years' experience of Germany. He tells us that Germany can still put forward 9,000,000 of soldiers in the war and that she is adding annually 400,000 new soldiers; and it does not appear that her material power has suffered. There are five crores of Germans to support her armies in the various theatres of war and to maintain them. Every inch of German soil is being cultivated by old men, women, children, and 200,000 prisoners of war. They are similarly cultivating the portions of France and Roumania which they have taken. Mr. Gerard says that there is greater fear of the Allies suffering from hunger than Germany. Germany has recently entered into an agreement with Switzerland. Switzerland has agreed to export ten thousands of her cattle and pay eight lakhs of pounds in exchange for Germany's iron, steel, agricultural products, sugar, seeds, cholam, grass, benjoin, zinc, etc., every month. It appears that Germany has enough of all these things and to sell. Viewed in this light, there does not appear to be any diminution in her material resources. If Germany makes up her mind to march her armies into Russia, which is in a confused condition, she will have new resources also.

From these facts, it does not appear that we can win victory owing to any material exhaustion on the part of Germany. Her overthrow requires a long time and will be gradual. Certain large successes in the Western theatre may considerably change the situation and lead to the early termination of the war. But the chances are for driving back the Germans mile by mile by means of well-organised and big offensives. There is need for all the men and resources of Great Britain and her Allies in this war. The entry of America into the war, more than any bold confidence that the Allies will win the victory, has to bring about an early victory of the Allies. If America can soon send her 40 lakhs of well-disciplined soldiers across the sea, the war may terminate in a few months. It is not without difficulty that America, where there is not much military enterprise, can raise such a large army, train it and arrange for its safe transport over 3,000 miles of sea. Before the final fight, America will have fully entered the war. Then the affairs will be settled soon. After America sends her soldiers to the war, the Allies will have an army double that of Germany.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 22nd September, reproduces from the Ravi the article on "Germany's strength" already reported on supra.

Germany's strength.

8. The Kistnapatrika, of the 22nd September, says:—On the 4th of last month an English paper ventured to say that the third war anniversary was not a happy one. "Last year we thought that the means of determining the issue of the war was with us. We were more confident in this matter last year than in this year". These words appear to breathe some discouragement. But this year we secured some results which were not existent last year. Russia had been freed from arbitrary rule. America joined the Allies. Internal dissensions have sprung up among our enemies. . . Though in Russia Korniloff and his followers were arrested, it cannot be said that the trouble is over. Even in the Russian navy some treachery has prevailed. Until these internal dissensions die out, Russia cannot devote her whole attention to the war. The enemy have taken the Riga region and is marching towards Petrograd. The traitors who have been waiting for an opportunity are trying to revolt against the Government and gain their object. Unless the Russian army strongly resists the enemy near Riga, it will not be possible to save the Petrograd road from the clutches of the enemy. It may certainly be said that Russia will not be a help to the Allies at present. It will be enough to see that Russia does not help the enemy.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

The war.

There is a greater source of fear than Russia. However we may explain the matter away; it is not well to underrate the havoc caused by the German submarines to the ships of the Allies. If the Allies should win a complete victory in France, they have to put an end to this danger from the submarines. The loss from the sinking of the British vessels every week is not accurately given. Vessels of "1,600" tons or more may mean 5,000 or 10,000 tons. The exact amount of loss can only be known by tons. The Germans have published how many ships of the Allies they have sunk. According to their figures 5,041,100 tons of Allies' vessels were sent to the bottom of the sea till the end of June last. . . It may be said that more than a seventh of the merchant vessels was drowned. . . If the Germans should act in the future as they have done hitherto, it will not be possible to supply the deficiency caused by the loss. The Americans also should set about constructing new vessels. America has undertaken to send at least ten lakhs of soldiers to Europe. If such an army should come to Europe with the necessary war material, ships to the extent of 50 lakhs of tons are required. In 1916, the Americans were able to construct only 531,000 tons. They say that they will be able to construct 1,400,000 tons this year, and 20 lakhs in 1918. This augurs good.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 25th September, says with reference to the terms of peace proposed by the enemy:—No self-respecting nation will accept such disgraceful terms. The Americans and the French think that such peace proposal is but an imposition. It is said that the Pope will send another peace proposal. . . The English have scored some successes. The Germans were not able to maintain their positions. The enemy's soldiers were slain in large numbers. . . We thought that under the authority of Kerensky, the army question would be satisfactorily settled and the internal dissensions will be reduced. But such a result was prevented by the quarrels between Kerensky and Korniloff. Then we hoped that all disputes would be settled under the leadership of Alexoff. But he and Kerensky did not agree and therefore he resigned. The resignation was accepted. . . The Russians persist that in the proposed democratic conference in Russia, all energy should be concentrated on the war. The decisions of this conference will help on the advance of the Russians. The Germans are seeking peace in despair. But the Allies should not enter into a peace until their object is gained. They should put down German militarism, maintain the independence of small States and see that war is not waged once again.

II.—Home Administration.

(a) Police.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

The Madras Presidency Police.

10. In commenting on the report of the work of the Presidency Police in 1916 and the review of the Government thereon the Hindu Nesan, of the 24th September, observes:—A copy of the "interesting" report of the Inspector-General of Police, as the Government characterise it, has not been received by us. The Government usually do not send copies of Departmental Administration Reports to the vernacular papers. These receive only a copy of the Government review on these reports. We do not see why copies of the reports themselves should not be sent to the vernacular dailies, while they are sent to other dailies conducted in English. Coming to the review, we see therefrom that the cost of the department in 1916 exceeded that in 1915 by 2 lakhs, though there were not many changes in the establishment. This excess is attributed to the increase of the salaries of constables. True, the pay of the constable has been raised. But we will confidently say that it has not been raised to such an extent as to make the post of a constable sufficiently attractive to educated persons. As even a labourer earns not less than Rs. 10 a month, we do not think educated persons will come forward to enlist as constables unless the pay of the appointment is raised to not less than Rs. 15. It is the low pay of the present day constable and his illiteracy which account for his taking bribes, without feeling the ignominy of it. It is on account of this again that the constables now are not able to act on their own initiative. If, on the other hand, these have read up to the Matriculation or the school-final standard and if their salaries are also increased, the report of the work of the Police of this Presidency will be a different one from what it is now. According to the existing system, the head constables are recruited from the constables; but the head constables are not promoted as Sub-Inspectors. We understand that a scheme of recruiting head constables from educated youths and promoting some head constables as Sub-Inspectors is under consideration. This is no doubt a desirable reform.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

Adverting to the same subject, the Swadesamitran, of the 25th September, says:—It is stated that the increase of two lakhs in the cost of the department is due to the increase of the pay of the constables. But the said increase does not seem to have improved the condition or the nature of the constabulary in any way; for there has been practically no tangible increase in their pay, as while their original pay has gone up a bit, they have lost the famine batta which they were getting before. The expectation of the authorities that an increase in the pay of the constabulary will attract proper men does not seem to have been fulfilled. The reason for this is the arduous nature of the duties of the constables and the restrictions imposed on him, which are not present in other avocations. All those entering the Police Department should have had some education and should be capable of realising their duties and performing them with the consciousness that they are the servants of the public, and the constables and the head constables should, it will be admitted by all, know at least to read and write. From the report for 1916, we see that out of 3,416 head constables and 26,373 constables, 29 and 3,035 persons respectively are entirely illiterate. The Inspector-General of Police himself admits that these figures cannot be relied upon and that of those who are said to be literate, many actually know only to sign their names. But the work to be turned out by people with these qualifications is not an ordinary one. It is due to their lack of proper education, that they do not realise the importance of their work and lose their regard by taking to corrupt practices. Therefore the respect of the people for this force cannot increase, unless their pay and other conveniences are such as to attract sufficiently educated men.

Coming to the village police, though the rules insist upon these being treated with courtesy and regard by the ordinary police, the question is whether the complaint that these rules are not observed in practice has entirely disappeared. Generally speaking, if the work of the Police is to be done satisfactorily, the co-operation of the public is also necessary. The Police complain that they do not have the co-operation and support of the public. But the question is whether they really seek such co-operation and support. If they do, there will be no lack of it. They should also have a confidence in the public. Though we heartily concede that the members of the police force should be given proper salaries and conveniences, we have to ask whether the condition and nature of the force have improved and the regard the people have for the force has increased in proportion to the annual increase in the expenditure incurred for it. If, without mutual confidence, the number of the secret police is increased with a distrust in the people and unnecessary annoyance and hardship are caused to them, how can they be expected to be satisfied or pleased with the police force?

11. Referring to the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Sadasiva Ayyar's remarks in his judgment in the Erode "Home Rule flag" case, the Manorama, of the 25th September, writes:— This opinion of the Honourable Judge deserves the attention of all the Magistrates and Police officers. All the unrest that we hear of is the result of their unnecessary interference in petty matters, which rouse those that are sleeping into action. It will be a good thing indeed if they will yet learn that such actions of the Magistrates and the Police tend to create breach of, rather than maintain, peace.

12. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 21st September, says:—The education now given by the Government to girls is not only unprofitable but it also introduces into our society the evil customs of the west. If our sister should be trained like Sita and other great women of puranic fame, the present education should be shoved aside. They should be given national education if they are to be made real Indian women.

14. Adverting to the statement said to have been made by His Excellency the Viceroy at the recent Educational Conference held at Simla that English and not the vernaculars should be the common language of this country, the Vaisyamitran, of the 3rd September, observes:—If, as suggested by the bureaucracy, all the people of this country should, without any exception, learn English and understand the political affairs of the country, it will take fifteen centuries more to do so; for, according to their own figures, only 10 per cent of the population have learnt English during the last 150 years, and there is no doubt that it will take about 1,500 years more for the remaining 90 per cent to learn English and become experts therein. These will, thereafter, become fit for Home Rule. The hardships experienced by our students in acquiring this education or really indescribable. their seventh year, night schools should be started in every village to impart free and compulsory education to these children. It is also essential that, in addition to this education, instruction should be given to them in such minor industries as their means would permit them to follow without any help from others. Similarly, in the case of secondary education also, should industrial education be imparted to the students along with English education, it will indeed be a great help to such of the youngsters as cannot successfully prosecute their studies beyond their secondary school course. It will be highly beneficial to translate into the vernaculars and prescribe as text books lessons on industrial subjects to the coolies receiving elementary education. If education on political affairs and instruction in industries are given to the people in the vernaculars and if they are generally allowed to use their own vernaculars restricting the use of the English language to all correspondence with higher officers only, it is quite certain that even men residing in the rural parts will soon become fit to exercise their right to elect such educated men as are desirous of entering the Legislative Councils in the Presidency towns.

PURNA-CHANDRODAYAM, Madura, August 1917.

The present system of education.

15. The Purnachandrodayam, for August, complains that the education now imparted in India is such that no Indian can, with raised head, claim his nationality and that, as the Indian element is not prominent in the subjects taught, the teachers who teach them or the officials that control education, the Indians get denationalised by this system. The paper also says that the evils of the existing system arise from the fact that, when schools were established here originally by the English Government, it was more with the idea of getting English-knowing clerks to do their work than to inculcate western civilisation to the people.

The vernaculars and the provincial autonomy.

16. In reproducing in Tamil an article contributed to the London Times by Mr. J. D. Anderson of Cambridge under this heading, in which he condemns the present practice in India of setting a higher value upon English than the vernaculars, attributing it to the Universities insisting on education being imparted only through English and to the recognition by the State of English as its language for all purposes and suggests that, if steps are taken by the Government to encourage the study of the vernaculars, it will help the smooth progress of the administration, the Swadesamitran, of the 22nd September, observes that the remarks of this gentleman can, with advantage, be pondered over not only by the educational and administrative authorities but also by the people.

The Vaisyamitran, of the 10th September, says that the Indian Universities of the present day are only such in name, as, instead of imparting instruction in Indian sciences and arts, they are only preparing people to be clerks or vakils for generations, and remarking that many eminent men, actuated by the new spirit that has arisen in this country and feeling that the modern universities conducted by foreigners are not so very suitable to the life of the people, are spending their lifetime in improving the state of affairs, refers to the Préma Maha Vidyalaya started in 1909 at Brindhaban by a philanthropist, where every kind of education is given to all classes irrespective of caste or creed, as an instance in point.

Indian Universities.

19. The Andhrapatrika, of the 25th September, reports Mr. Jinarajadas to have said in a meeting at the Gokhale Hall:—The Universities should help students to realise Indian ideals and maintain Indian character. The Indian Universities rest satisfied with turning out clerks, but a true University should devote all its energy in training men to be patriots. Indian Universities should try to make the minds of students at one with the minds of their ancestors, and for this education should be imparted through the medium of the vernaculars. But where should the English Professors go if education is imparted in the vernaculars. If they wish the welfare of India, they should show self-sacrifice.

Students and politics.

20. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 22nd September, writes:—As a result of the order of Government forbidding students to attend political meetings, numerous students, in the belief that national service is better than working for University degrees, are giving up studies in order to join political work. The "Home Rulers" are taking them into their fold. Students would do well to obey the order of the Government until they complete their studies and take their degrees and then join Home Rule. The orders of Government should be obeyed even if they be unjust or autocratic. We should persevere in such a way that the Government may alter such orders of their own accord.

Educational progress in India.

21. Swadeshabhimani, of the 21st September, writes:—The rate of educational progress in India as indicated by the statistics for the year 1915–16 which have just been issued is profoundly disappointing. While some would urge that there should be two or three schools in every village, it will be admitted that it is reasonable to expect that there should be at least one school for every village. At present, however, there is one school on an average for three villages; one for every 11 square miles; which shows how deplorable is the prevailing state of things in this respect. We must observe that this rate of progress is hardly complimentary to the authorities concerned.

But the Government have not yet sent their orders. They, perhaps, mean to say that this will not be possible during these war times. When it was possible during the war to widen the bridge on the Hugli, it is ridiculous to say that we have to wait till the war is over to widen two small bridges on the Cooum. May the Government pass orders soon in this matter and free the people from inconvenience.

25. The Swadesamitran, of the 20th September, writes:—The vituperative speech of Sir Michael O'Dwyer in the Imperial Legislative Council has caused unbearable pain to the people throughout the country. Mr. Lowndes, who presided on the day, allowed Sir Michael, either because he did not realise his responsibility or because he wanted to oblige Sir Michael, to abuse the representative members as much as he liked. As if to add fuel to the fire, several Anglo-Indian papers applauded Sir Michael. Our monitor, the Madras Mail remarked that Pandit Malavya, Mr. Jinnah and others, who, unable to put up with the insult, tried to condemn the speech, were not aware of the respect due to a Lieutenant-Governor. We do not know what the papers like the Madras Mail think, after seeing the proceedings of the Imperial Legislative Council yesterday, when Sir Michael expressed his regret for some of the views expressed by him on the previous day having caused pain to some people, and added that he never meant to wound the feelings of the Honourable Members of the Council. We do not know if he thought the Honourable Members were statutes made of stone, or he did not understand the meaning of the words used by him. It is a point to be noted that, while he posed to express regret for his words, he did not accept that there was anything wrong in them. Sir Michael is a member of the Civil Service, which thinks that it can never commit a mistake. So the Viceroy should have taken a good deal of trouble in making Sir Michael do even this. The subsequent speech of the Viceroy shows that he himself thought that the words of Sir Michael were not enough. The statement of the Viceroy that, if he had the least inkling of what Sir Michael was going to say, he would not have been absent from the meeting on the day, indicates the opinion of the Viceroy that Mr. Lowndes should not have allowed Sir Michael to proceed as he did. When the Honourable Members rose to a point of order on the ground that Sir Michael's speech was irrelevant and unnecessarily vituperative, Mr. Lowndes ruled that it was quite in order. So, Mr. Lowndes seems to lack the required capacity to preside at the meetings of the Council in the absence of the Viceroy. Leaving this alone, our people are sure to appreciate the present attitude of the Viceroy, as he has begun to show that he realises the feelings of the Indians and has understood that the Indians have to be pacified in the interests of the Empire. Once he listens to our prayers and accepts them, we become obliged to him and we will be not only helpful to the Government but also be a tower of strength to it. It is because Lord Hardinge understood this secret that India came forward to render mighty aid to the Empire at a critical juncture. The fact of Lord Hardinge having respected us and our aspirations did not result in even one among the crores of Indians slighting the Government of India, and the Government of the country was not rendered impossible. But our wise and experienced Madras Mail thinks that the course persued by the Government of India now will make the Government of the country impossible. It says that the question now to be decided is whether we are to be governed by a Government or by random public meetings. We will answer this question by another, and that is, "should this country be governed by the bureaucracy acting on the advice of the Anglo-Indians of the type of the Madras Mail, who stand aloof from the people, or should it be governed, as is the case in England, by public opinion as expressed throughout the country"? This paper, which has found out that it is impossible to govern a country in accordance with public opinion, makes a proposal and that is the resignation of all the members of the Government in order to maintain their own dignity and the dignity of their seats. This country is being ruled in the name of the British public, so, there is nothing unconstitutional in the Government of Madras having released Mrs. Besant on the advice of the Government of India, which acted on the responsibility of the Secretary of State for India, who is finally responsible to the Parliament, comprising the representatives of the British public, for the administration of India. Why should the authorities in Madras resign on account of this? Why not the Madras Mail, which is angry with the Government for not acting on its advice, and the Anglo-Indians, who agree with it, move away to a country where Government can be conducted in accordance with their opinion? Then the Government of this country would become very easy. It is clear that the Madras Mail is seriously afraid that, if the Indians are granted Home Rule, its adherents will have to face many disadvantages. Therefore, it is but natural that it should kick up a row. But is it really impossible to apply the Indian Press Act, the Defence of India Act or the Indian Penal Code to this Mail, which is actively inducing a subordinate Government to resist the authority of a superior Government?

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Sep. 20th, 1917.

A lecture on Home Rule.

26. A correspondent of the Hindu Nesan, of the 20th September, reports that Mr. Seshasayi, an Engineer, delivered a lecture on Home Rule at Palakkarai in the Trichinopoly district.

27. The Swadesamitran reproduces in Tamil in its issues of the 20th and 21st September the comments of the Englishman of Calcutta and the Civil and Military Gazette of Lahore on the release of Mrs. Besant and her colleagues, which appear in the Hindu of the 20th and 22nd idem, respectively.

Release of Mrs. Besant and her colleagues.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 20th & 21st, 1917.

The Mahavikata Dutan, of the 22nd September, cannot understand the reason for this release, and questioning the statesmanship underlying it, observes:—This will give dissatisfaction to the Government of Madras, who may complain that their prestige has gone, and the Governor and others may offer to resign. Besides this, some European Associations and others say that this order interferes with the rights of the local Governments and they may send a cable to England and bring pressure to bear upon the authorities there. We do not know what further mischief is in store.

MAHAVIKATA DUTAN, Madras, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

A correspondent of the Hindu Nesan, of the 24th September, reports that some of the students of Trichinopoly held a picnic party on the banks of the Cauveri to celebrate the release of Mrs. Besant from internment. He also observes that, in a procession conducted on the 20th idem under the auspices of the local Home Rule League, the students present taunted Dr. Rajan, when he advised them not to take part in the procession in contravention of the Government Order, which prohibits them from taking part in politics.

Mrs. Besant's release.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd September, says with reference to the celebration of the day of release of Mrs. Besant at Guntūr:—The president of the meeting of that day remarked as follows:—Christ was subjected to many troubles and was crucified and killed. After his demise, his importance has become manifest. When a great deed has to be done, some sacrifice has necessarily to be made. In yagnams our countrymen make sacrifices. In the present great yagnam of political agitation, Mrs. Besant was the offering and she sacrificed her body. . . Mr. Montagu was the chief cause of Mrs. Besant's release. He is a friend of the people. He heard our representations and released the interned unconditionally. . . . Another speaker said:—The authorities here troubled us just as many crocodiles troubled the lord of elephants in the Puranas. Just as Krishna protected the elephant, Lord Montagu came to our rescue. But Lord Pentland did not yield. . . Another speaker said:—It is a shame that certain men have posed themselves as the leaders of non-Brahman Association, saying that they do not want Home Rule. This is a clamour raised by Doctor Nayar and others with a view to get knighthoods or be admitted into the Councils. But there is no truth in it. . . Another speaker said:—Our joy is no greater than the joy experienced when one regains what he has lost. We did not get anything new. We must have Home Rule, which is our goal. Only then must we feel really happy. Mrs. Besant suffered on our account. . . We must not give up our agitation but must work till we attain swaraj. Another speaker said:—Popular power will always triumph over that of the Government. We have to develop that strength. A few white-men and a few Indians have thrown obstacles in our way. The English did not get the country by fighting with us and conquering us. Doctor Nayar, Mr. Thiagaraya Chetti and others despatched in the name of a non-Brahman Association a telegram stating they did not want Home Rule. Threats were held out by them that His Excellency would resign if Mrs. Besant was released. There is a saying that a man seated on an elephant will not fear dogs. Mr. Montagu will not yield to their threats. A resolution was passed to the effect that the agitation should be continued as ever till swaraj is obtained.

Mrs. Besant's release.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

Another resolution was passed requesting the Government to release others also who were interned for carrying on political agitation.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 22nd September, says:—The interned were released. Constitutional agitation was crowned with success. The natural love of independence on the part of the British has been maintained. The self-confidence of the people has been confirmed. . . The power of the rulers cannot but yield to that of the people. This is a good sign for the future acquisition of self-government, and is a means of attaining liberty.

The release.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Sep. 19th, 1917.

Release of Mrs. Besant.

The Desamata, of the 19th September, says:—Mr. Tilak is the only great man in our country who heretofore had suffered great hardships for the sake of the country and who boldly manifested self-sacrifice. Mrs. Besant today not only showed great self-sacrifice along with her friends on behalf of a great movement, but she engendered enthusiasm and real patriotism in the heart of every one who had joined the movement. . . Until we reap complete good, we must not give up the Home Rule movement, but should support it, and with the help of our leaders carry on constitutional agitation.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

Mrs. Besant's release.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 22nd September, observes as follows under this heading:—The people are labouring under the doubts, whether Mrs. Besant and her co-workers have been released as the Government came to know that they were interned by mistake, or whether the lady has given a guarantee to the Government of India that she did not intend to conduct agitation as before. We wish that the Government of India at least will clear these doubts.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 24th, 1917.

The release of Mrs. Besant.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 24th September, writes:—The Indian Press is unanimous in applauding the action of Government in releasing Mrs. Besant. The Anglo-Indian Press on the other hand is deriding the Government. It is deplorable that the Anglo-Indians have not even a hundredth part of the loyalty of the Indians.

The same paper in another article on the subject, referring to the adverse comments of the Englishman, remarks:—The Indian public do not share the view that the Government have made a great blunder in releasing Mrs. Besant. On the other hand they are led to believe more firmly than ever that even if the ordinary officials make a mistake the Imperial authorities are resolute in vindicating justice.

The paper next referring to the comments of the Madras Mail on the release of the interned, remarks:—The release has served to establish more firmly than ever the ultimate triumph of the British traditions of justice and has evoked good wishes for the glory of the empire in every heart.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

The release of Mrs. Besant.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 22nd September, writes:—Some of the Anglo-Indian journalists were urging that Mrs. Besant ought not to be released, and that in case Mr. Montagu orders her release, he should himself be kept in confinement. Those who say these things in regard to the Secretary of State would not hesitate to say that even the King should be put into prison if perchance he does anything against their wishes in order to uphold justice. The Secretary of State is not the person to feel afraid of these useless threats. These journalists may have felt dissatisfied with the release of the interned. But we do not think it possible that they can succeed in sending Mr. Montagu into prison. The traditions of British justice are supreme. The British public would always maintain their traditions and can never be led away by the sophisms of those who subvert them. This is why their empire is the most glorious in the world.

SAMPAD ABHYUDYA, Mysore, Sep. 25th, 1917.

Writing on the same subject, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 25th September, remarks:—The release must certainly have been made with the consent of the British Cabinet; and nobody can disobey the orders of the Cabinet. We cannot help deploring the ignorance of the Anglo-Indians which makes them boast that they can restrain even them. India as well as the Empire has resources ample enough to enable both Indians and Anglo-Indians to prosper peacefully together. It is scarcely fair therefore that the Anglo-Indians should think that they alone should prosper and that the Indians should remain their servants. We must affirm that this attitude on their part can never do them good. Is it possible for a few thousand people to remain in opposition to a population of 30 crores and live without its co-operation? We regret to see that this point did not occur to them.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Sep. 21st, 1917.

The release of Mrs. Besant.

After announcing in prominent headlines the news of the release of Mrs. Besant, etc., the Swadeshabhimani, of the 21st September, in a leading article (under the heading "The eclipse is past. What next!"), expressing its exultation at the release, observes:—The authorities are as much entitled to our congratulations for ordering the release, as they were responsible for the accusations regarding the internments. We must also congratulate Mrs. Besant, etc., on their being able to renew their work for the cause to which they have pledged themselves. Her constitutional methods had been enveloped in the clouds of suspicion on the part of the authorities. The release makes it evident therefore that these clouds have been dispelled and that her methods are considered unobjectionable. This recognition of the righteous and constitutional nature of the cause ought therefore to give us greater joy than the release itself; and that is why there is so much rejoicing in every corner in the country. The release of Mr. Mahomed Ali and his brother as well as the 500 political prisoners of Bengal which is shortly to be effected will redouble these rejoicings. Both the sorrow caused by the eclipse and the joy caused by its termination are but passing phases of the mind. It is unmanly to engross one-self too long in these things. The eclipse is past. What next. Are we to remain revelling in this joy or have we any further duty to do? Shortly Mr. Montagu will come to this country. It behoves our leaders now to direct their attention to matters of greater moment, such as the formulation of the demands in regard to Home Rule, and to the importance of causing Mrs. Besant, who has suffered so much for the cause, to be the President of the next Congress and of making their representations to Mr. Montagu through her.

The paper also repo rts demonstrations of the joy in the town of Mangalore, such as the distribution of sweets by the traders at the port and of placards with band playing.

The release of Mrs. Besant.

In an article announcing the news of the release of Mrs. Besant, the Vokkaligara Patrike, of the 26th September, dwells on the magnitude of the reception given to her on her arrival at Madras, and remarks that it points to the extent to which the feeling of patriotism has been aroused among the people. The paper congratulates the interned on their release.

Vokkaligara Patrike, Bangalore City, Sep. 26th, 1917.

The release of Mrs. Besant.

Referring to the Madras Mail's adverse comments on the release of Mrs. Besant, etc., the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 27th September, writes:—The Anglo-Indians write to the effect that the Home Government was wrong to have granted the prayer of the Indians regarding the release and that Mr. Montagu should be kept in confinement. If this is done, the Cabinet Ministers who gave him the order, and His Majesty the King who sanctioned the order and the Members of Parliament and the British public shall all have to be confined likewise. People who argue in this fashion can hardly be deemed sane. They should be sent into a lunatic asylum. Else they should be required to give security against any untoward results of their vituperations. Mr. Montagu thinks of coming to India after ascertaining the views of the Parliament at its sitting next month. If the haughtiness of these people should continue as at present, Mr. Montagu will obtain powers to deal with these journalists as he should. It is imperative that there should be no distinction of race, caste or creed in the British empire and that all should be treated alike. All Anglo-Indian journalists should therefore be required to furnish security which they should forfeit in case they write against the Government.

Sampad Abhyudaya, Mysore, Sep. 27th, 1917.

Mrs. Besant's release.

Referring to the release of Mrs. Besant, the Yogakshemam, of the 21st September, writes:—Some people say that the Madras Government tried their best to make the release a conditional one, to which, however, the Government of India did not agree, and that the delay in setting her at liberty was due to the correspondence on the subject between the two Governments. How much truth there is in all this, we do not know, and it is no use dwelling upon the past. The lady had to lose her freedom for 93 days; the Indian leaders had to labour hard for her release; and they have achieved what they desired. What remains to be done is for the Government and the people to join hands and work for the advancement of India.

Yogakshemam, Trichur, Sep. 21st, 1917.

LOKAPRAKASAM, Trichur, Sep. 24th, 1917.

Mrs. Besant's return.

Under the heading "Mrs. Besant's Return", the Lokaprakasam, of the 24th September, has the following in English:—

The unconditional release of Mrs. Annie Besant and her co-workers in Messrs. Wadia and Arundale from the unpopular internment, as well as their return to the scene of their active labours last Friday morning, is a sufficient testimony to the splendid triumph of lawful, constitutional and persistent agitation in which the whole Indian Empire has been ceaselessly engaged. Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford have now laid the intelligent Indian public under a deep debt of obligation disregarding the empty threats of Anglo-Indian reactionaries, who have been chiefly instrumental in jeopardising the peaceful administration of the country, and by releasing the great personality whose life of austerity and self-abnegation has been solely devoted to the social, religious, educational and political advancement of Indians.

It then quotes Mrs. Besant's message to New India. Such is the noble view she takes of the whole matter, even though the reactionary Mail and its votaries are still taking the uncompromising attitude by inciting His Excellency Lord Pentland and his colleagues to tender their resignation in protest against the release of that venerable and venerated lady. That omniscient Anglo-Indian journal which pretends to be in the secrets of the authorities should so construe the present order is to set at naught the authority of the Provincial Government is indeed to be pitied. According to the constitutional position of affairs, the Government of this country, Imperial and Provincial, are subject both, to the control of a higher authority, which they are bound to obey. Here, in the present instance, the Supreme Government has proclaimed a kind of amnesty to certain persons, and it is none of the business of the local Government to stand against such a declaration of amnesty. It is a matter of policy embarked on by that Government when they are satisfied that the restraints on the liberty of certain people may be removed for allaying discontent and restoring agreeable conditions. The occasion for exercising such a prerogative occur few and far between, and any senseless protest against the exercise of that is bound to meet with ignoble failure which is rightly its due.

The unprecedented demonstration of popular confidence, love and esteem that was manifest on the occasion of the arrival of the three patriots at Madras, was a sufficient proof of the popularity of the authorities' action.

* * * * * * *

Further, the agitation as well as the magnificent reception is proof positive of the awakening of the political consciousness of our great countrymen, irrespective of creed or class. It was more than enough to substantiate that it is not a "microscopic minority", or "a small but noisy clique" that stood at the back of the strong movement Mrs. Besant has been leading. We very gladly welcome back Mrs. Besant and her associates to the front ranks of active public workers from the secluded scene of their internments and wish them and their noble cause all strength and success. We congratulate the authorities concerned also on the wisdom they have brought to play in the recent act of theirs, and fully hope that as a result of this act of statesmanship, which is a sufficient proof of the earnestness of Lord Chelmsford's promise of forward policy to be followed in the Indian administration. Our country will enjoy greater peace, contentment, progress and happiness in a remarkable measure so as to vouchsafe the harmony between the Government and the governed.

Om Bande Mataram.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

Welcome to Mrs. Besant and her two colleagues.

28. The Swadeshamitran, of the 24th September, reproduces in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting held at Gowri Vilas, Royapet, on the 23rd idem to welcome Mrs. Besant and her two colleagues, in which Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar, as chairman, is reported to have invited the attention of the audience to the words of Ghulam Husain just before his death, "Agitate, victory is nigh", and to those of Dadábhai Naoroji, "Agitate, agitate until the goal is reached," and appealed to them to continue agitating until Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali were released from their internment.

29. The Swadesamitran, of the 22nd September, reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Civil and Military Gazette and the Pioneer on the regret expressed by Sir Michael O'Dwyer about some of the observations made by him in the course of a speech recently delivered by him in the Imperial Legislative Council, which are published in the Hindu of the 22nd and 21st idem, respectively.

Sir Michael O'Dwyer's speech.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

Referring to Sir Michael O'Dwyer's speech in the Imperial Legislative Council and to his subsequent apology, the Manorama, of the 21st September, observes that Sir Michael must have now learned that if one were to blurt out something thoughtlessly, one would have to regret it afterwards.

Sir Michael O'Dwyer's speech.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Sep. 21st, 1917.

Referring to Sir Michael O'Dwyer's speech in the Imperial Legislative Council, the Uttara Taraka, of the 22nd September, writes:—It is said that certain pro-Besantists in the Imperial Council have not relished this speech. These people will not like those who express their views so openly and candidly. At this crisis of the British Government our duty is to help them in all possible ways. When a man is ill, would it not be very ungrateful on the part of his sons to be pointing out his mistakes, instead of attending to his wants?

Sir Michael O'Dwyer's speech.

UTTARA TARAKA, Parur, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

30. The Swadesamitran, of the 21st September, reproduces in Tamil the proceedings of the meeting of the non-Brahmans held on the 20th idem in the Gokhale Hall appearing in the Hindu of the 22nd September, and comments thereon in the following strain:—It is the telegram sent by Mr. Tyagaraya Chettiyar to the Secretary of State for India supporting the repressive measures of the Government and objecting to the introduction of political reforms, that has stirred up all the people to activity, irrespective of educational qualifications, wealth or status. Yesterday's meeting was in a way indicative of the patriotic fervour of the people of this Presidency and their excitement at the cable sent by Mr. Chettiyar in their name. If the English officials, who say that others than Brahmans do not want political reforms, had been present at this meeting, they would have realised how they have all along been acting under a wrong notion. We are really glad that an association has been formed with the name of the Madras Presidency Association with the object of promoting the educational, social and political advancement of the non-Brahmans of this Presidency. Though we accept the view expressed by Lodd Govinda Das that there was no necessity for a separate association for the non-Brahmans and that the interests of the non-Brahmans could well be safeguarded by existing institutions such as the Madras Mahajana Sabha, no one can deny that the bureaucracy, either believing the deceitful tactics played by some in the name of the South Indian People's Association, which claims to represent 40 millions of non-Brahmans, or pretending to do so, began to ignore our political aspirations. It is clear from the speech delivered by Lord Pentland in May last, making light of our political agitation, that he believed the traitorous movement set on foot in Madras by some pretenders to be a true one. In replying to the resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. B. N. Sarma in the Imperial Legislative Council condemning the recommendation of the Public Services Commission that there should be a preponderance of Europeans in the Civil Service and the Police Department, the Hon'ble Mr. Couchman, who represents the Madras Government in that Council, stated that, as there was a difference of opinion between the Brahmans and non-Brahmans in Madras, Mr. Sarma's resolution could not be taken to have the support of all the Indians. The Hon'ble Mr. V. S. Srinivasa Sastriyar gave a proper reply to this. When, at the very moment that Mr. Srinivasa Sastriyar stated in the Imperial Legislative Council that the party of Justice represented only a few, that the real non-Brahman party was in the forming and that the latter would uphold the views of the Congress, a new association of non-Brahmans was started in the Gokhale Hall, no other argument is needed to prove the necessity for this association. We, therefore, heartily approve of its having come into existence.

The non-Brahman meeting.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

A new non-Brahman movement.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 24th September, publishes a resolution of the Madras Presidency Association over the signatures of the President, etc., which says:—Those who have signed below criticise the "ridiculous" words of the Hon'ble Mr. Couchman in the Imperial Legislative Council. . . His statements are groundless. The persons who, according to his words, represent 97 per cent of the population of South India are, in the opinion of non-Brahmans, hostile and insincere in representing the views of the non-Brahmans of South India, in matters conducing to the welfare of the people.

The Pudukkōttai War Loan Lottery.

31. Adverting to this lottery, the Hindu Nesan, of the 20th September, observes:—We cannot but say that on account of this lottery, many poor people will have to lose the little savings of their hard labour. Should similar lotteries be started in quick succession in the Native States, great hardships might be caused to the poor people who get no prize Further, in Pudukkōttai a large amount does not seem to have been realised through this lottery, and with this, we trust, will subside the eagerness to run public lotteries.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 20th, 1917.

A Home Rule meeting at Tiruvannāmalai.

32. Adverting to a meeting of the Home Rulers reported to have been held at Tiruvannāmalai on the 16th September to celebrate the "Home Rule Day", a correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 20th idem, characterises the Home Rule flag said to have been hoisted on that day as the flag indicative of danger and observes:—Some of the words uttered by the Home Rulers in the course of their speech on the occasion created hatred towards the Government. These Home Rulers are carrying on their work so boldly that others begin to doubt the existence of Government, and it is expected that this doubt will be cleared soon. Why have not the Government come forward to haul down the Home Rule flags flying in this place, while similar flags were hauled down in Erode and Coimbatore?

A Home Rule meeting at Gobichettipalayam.

33. Referring to a Home Rule meeting reported to have been held at Gobichettipalayam on the 9th September 1917 and to the speeches delivered at the meeting by Mr. B. V. Narasimha Achariyar (sic) and Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu, a correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 20th idem, says that he left the meeting the moment he found that Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu's speech was likely to create hatred towards the Government and to wound the feelings of those who sympathised with the Dravidians.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 20th, 1917.

Triumph.

34. In the course of a leaderette under this heading, the Dravidan, of the 20th September, refers to the public meeting held in the Gokhale Hall by the Home Rulers to convey their congratulations to Mrs. Besant on her release at which Sir S. Subrahmania Ayyar is said to have spoken vehemently, condemning the trend of the order (of release) and the weakness of the Government, and dwelling upon the advice conveyed to New India by Mrs. Besant not "to crow" about the release, hopes that Home Rulers would act upon this advice and avoid unnecessary disturbance.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 20th, 1917.

Erode and Home Rule.

35. A correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 20th September, invites the attention of the Government to the conduct of Mr. S. S. Venkataramana Ayyar of Erode, who is alleged to have arbitrarily entered the municipal choultry at Erode, stuck to it on the ground that he was a Brahman, in the absence of Mr. Sambasiva Mudaliyar, the new Tahsildar, who was halting there with the permission of the municipal vice-chairman, tracing the incident to the displeasure of the Home Rulers at the new Tahsildar having replaced Mr. Setu Ayyar, who was transferred from the place on the ground that he was a Theosophist and as such was favourable to the Home Rule party.

36. A correspondent of the Bulletin of Co-operation, for July, dilates upon the necessity and advisability of the Co-operative Societies in this Presidency investing their reserve funds in the War Loan as desired by the Registrar, as those in other Presidencies have done, as they would thereby have a better security for their funds, in that the security offered by the Urban Bank where their funds are now invested is only the funds of the Bank while the security, if they are invested in Post Office Cash certificates, will be the Government of India and the entire wealth of India.

Co-operative Societies and the war.

37. Another correspondent of the Bulletin of Co-operation for July, attributes the unsatisfactory work of the credit side of the Co-operative Societies and the large amount of unrecovered loans to the apathy of the panchayats on account of their not being remunerated for their services, and suggests that the existing state of affairs can improve only by the members of Co-operative Societies being all of them educated, which will be possible only if they get out of Government control.

BULLETIN OF CO-OPERATION, Madras, July 1917.

The Credit department in Co-operative Societies.

38. Referring to the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. B. N. Sarma in the Imperial Legislative Council that the recommendation of the Public Services Commission that the Indians should not be given more than 25 per cent of the higher appointments in the Police and Civil Services, the Swadesamitran, of the 22nd September, observes:—The object of this resolution was only that the number of higher appointments available for any community in these services should not be based on a racial distinction and that the Indians should be given these appointments whenever capable hands were available. Till now, the administration was carried on in this country with an apparent difference between the rulers and the ruled, the latter being always suspected a little by the former. That this time is past is betokened by the announcement of the British Government that the aim of their administration is that the Indians should have Home Rule in course of time and that is why the elected members urged in the Council for the appointment of duly qualified Indians to higher posts in the service, which are now held by Anglo-Indians. But the Hon'ble Mr. Bray, the Chairman of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, opposed the resolution and pleaded that the British should preponderate in the administrative services in order to safeguard the interests of Anglo-Indians. But in the same breath he accepted the ideal of the grant of Home Rule to India. How can these two views be reconciled? If Home Rule is granted, then Indians will naturally preponderate in the services, as they form a large percentage of the population, and we do not know how Mr. Bray expects the interests of the Anglo-Indians to be safeguarded then. Is not the announcement that Indians can have Home Rule based on the confidence that they would properly attend to the interests of the British Empire? That confidence by itself should be taken to be a guarantee for the interests of the Anglo-Indians here being safeguarded. Neither the administrative work nor the political principles of the Indians till now give room to any suspicion to the contrary. There is no justification whatever for thinking that the moment they get the responsibility of the Government in their own hands, the Indians will begin to impede European trade. So the reasonable cause for the Anglo-Indians is to seek for their community being properly represented and not to plead for their influence being maintained in the services, just when the principle of conferring responsible appointments on Indians in view of the ideal of Home Rule, is given effect to. We think Mr. Bray voiced only the opinion of a few members of his community, in the strong language he used in opposing the resolution; for, though Sir Michael O'Dwyer vehemently criticised the principles of Indian leaders and the Home Rule movement some days back and the Madras Mail, posing to maintain the prestige of the bureaucracy, calls upon the Governor of Madras, nay the English officials in all provinces, to resign immediately as a protest against the action of the Government of India and the Secretary of State in having compelled the Government of Madras to release Mrs. Besant and her colleagues—which advice, we may state definitely, for aught we know, will not be acted upon by His Excellency the Governor—the sympathetic speech of the Viceroy, the statement of Sir Michael

Indians and higher appointments.

O'Dwyer that he would abide by the views of the Viceroy and the refutation of the attitude of the Madras Mail by the Madras Times, the Times of Ceylon and the Capital of Calcutta show that the majority of the Anglo-Indians have a broader outlook of things.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

The internment orders and the bureaucracy.

39. The Swadesamitran, of the 24th September, reports the National Weekly, an English paper, to have written as follows on the internment orders and the bureaucracy:—What happens to Mrs. Besant and her colleagues may not appear so important. But the world may be surprised at Great Britain, which has drawn its sword for doing away with despotism in foreign countries, allowing excesses to be committed in countries subject to her. This should be noted by the British public. So those who are anxious that the good name of Great Britain should not be tarnished and those who wish that the British Empire should consist of free races, should insist upon the immediate release of Mrs. Besant and others. Leaving this alone, the bureaucracy in India has transgressed its bounds. The British public should note how much the members of this bureaucracy have got spoilt on account of the consciousness of their official influence and to what extent they are prepared to commit excesses. The bureaucracy in India stands condemned with one voice by the people.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

"Hurry-curry."

40. In the course of a leader under this heading in the Dravidan of the 24th September, in which the paper dwells upon the unwisdom of Mr. Kesava Pillai in starting a new non-Brahman association by joining the Brahmans and condemning his own brethren, the following observations occur:—Will Lord Pentland care for his post if anything is done which may be derogatory to his dignity? Though our friends are aware of Prime Ministers and the Members of the Cabinet in England resigning their appointment at junctures like this, it is indeed strange that they should plead ignorance of this practice now.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

The new policy.

41. The Swadesamitran, of the 24th September, refers to the withdrawal, by the Bombay Government, of the order issued by them against Mrs. Besant nearly one year back, prohibiting her entry into that Presidency, and writes:—Every one will trace this order as well as that issued by the Madras Government last week to the decision of the Government of India that the restrictions imposed on Mrs. Besant need no longer exist. But there is a noteworthy difference between the wording of the order of the Local Government and of that of the Bombay Government. The Madras order shows that the Governor and his Councillors have acted either in deference to the opinion of or under the compulsion of the Government of India. But the Bombay order indicates the hearty approval of that Government of the present attitude of the Government of India and the Secretary State, that, in view to the calm and dispassionate discussion of the proposed reforms, all causes for heartburning among the Indians of every class should be removed. We anxiously pray that the Government of India should give effect to this broad view in its entirety. Our friends know that some other patriots have also been interned like Mrs. Besant on account of their having worked actively in the service of their country, and Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali are two among them. In reply to a question by the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah about these two patriots, it was stated that the matter was under the consideration of the Government. We need not point out that the delay in publishing the decision of the Government is causing anxiety not only to the Muhammadans but to all people here. We would respectfully urge upon the Viceroy the inadvisability of making unnecessary delay or coming to undesirable conclusions regarding the release of these two. He need not hesitate in the least to release them. Public peace in the country will improve immensely on account of their release. We will assert that it is only a delay in their release that may lead to agitation and unrest and it is impossible that their release should lead to any such results.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Aug. 9th, 1917.

The currency crisis.

42. In a leader under this heading the Vartakamitran, of the 9th August, dwells upon the various steps taken by the Home Government to meet with the currency crisis caused by the war and observes:—The Secretary of State for India has announced that the value of currency bills sold in England every week will henceforward be reduced from 120 to 90 lakhs of rupees. This step seems to have been taken only to provide for the expenses to be incurred in India on account of the war. But, this may hamper the trade between India and England. Ever since the beginning of the war, the quantity of gold imported into India has been gradually going down. Last year gold to the value of £750,000 went out of India. As the amount of gold in circulation is going down, they have begun to issue a larger number of rupees. But this causes hardship to the people. Firstly, there is a loss incurred by them in that the Government take away pure silver and issue the one-rupee coin containing only silver worth 9 annas. Secondly, trade with Japan, America and other countries will be hampered. We cannot pay for the articles purchased from them by our notes or rupees, for they will put only the value of 9 annas on our rupee. Even the silver and gold received in lieu of the articles exported by us will be taken away by the Government and given back to us as rupees or notes. The excessive circulation of currency notes will raise the prices of all articles. There is room for various other difficulties also to crop up. Judging of the situation, the increased circulation of currency notes may not only curtail foreign trade, but also create several hardships in internal trade.

The issue of 1 Re. and Rs. 2½ notes.

43. Referring to the decision of the Government to issue 1 Re. and Rs. 2½ currency notes, the Vartakamitran, of the 9th August, observes that it is not advisable to increase the bulk of paper currency in India, as the people, being generally uneducated, prefer coins to currency notes and that the issue of the proposed notes may therefore lead to a decline of the confidence of the people in the Government.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Aug. 9th, 1917.

The Englishmen and Indian political progress.

44. The Swadesamitran, of the 25th September, writes :—When we, Indians, urge that we should have a form of Government which will be responsible to the people, and that the popular influence should prevail in the administration of the country, some of the Englishmen are annoyed at us, some obstruct us, and some are silent, while a very few support us. Why is this? It is only because they are not only ignorant of our aims and ideals but are also disinclined to understand them. Besides this, there is also the unfounded status they create for themselves, as being members of the ruling race. The statement made by Sir Hugh Bray in the Imperil Legislative Council a few days back, that as the Anglo-Indians and their ancestors had sacrificed their life and wealth for the welfare of India, they were alone entitled to bring about the progress of India, would surprise many Indians. Can Sir Hugh Bray or the members of his class have a better interest and ardour in the advancement of India than us, the children of the soil. As for their claim that they and their ancestors had sacrified their wealth for India, we will repeat here the remark of the Indian Social Reformer that the Government of India can raise a huge loan and return the amount said to have been contributed by them. The Indians longing for political progress neither forget nor ignore this class. Such being the case the words of Sir Hugh Bray can only cause laughter and surprise.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

Simultaneous examinations.

45. Referring to the resolution moved by Pandit Madan Mohun Malaviya in the Imperial Legislative Council on this subject, the Hindu Nesan, of the 25th September, observes that the resolution was lost because a number of members merely favoured the Government Member without having an independent opinion of their own, and remarks :—When the principle of this resolution is upheld even by the Muhammadans, it will not do for the Government to persist in denying the request of the people. The holding of the Civil Service examinations simultaneously both in England and India is a thing which is bound to happen and an attempt to prevent its happening will resemble only an attempt to block a big flood by a dam. The waves of political reforms have begun to surge in the ocean of the Indian community. No one can prevent these waves from beating the shore or their washing away portions of it. It is not possible for the Anglo-Indian Civilians to monopolise the appointments in the Civil Service, in order to preserve the British nature of this service. No good will come out of imposing hard and fast rules preventing Indian Civilians holding appointments in this service. It is only a system in which facilities are afforded for educated Indians also to enter the Civil Service and share the administration of the country that will do credit to the British rule. The Indians do not selfishly want the Civil Service examination to be held only in India. Their demand is only that it should be held simultaneously both in England and in India, and we cannot see how this demand is unreasonable. It is a vain fear that, if this prayer is granted, the Indians would secure the required qualifications and carry away several of the appointments now held by the members of the Civil Service, and that the effect of it would be the reduction of Anglo-Indian civilians thus altering the British nature of the administration in India. We can safely assert that the loyalty of the Indians will not be reduced in the least by this. On the other hand, the conferment of higher appointments on Indians will only strengthen their attachment to the British Empire.

DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 26th, 1917.

A prophecy.

46. The Dravida Patrika, of the 26th September, reports a famous songstress in New York to have predicted long ago that a new era would begin after 1916, when the people of the several countries in the world would wake up, that kingdoms would then be in danger, that kings would lose their brains, that several democracies would come into existence in Europe, that there would be many revolutions, that the whole world would be welded into one kingdom, that all these would be brought about by the force of a great saint, who would come in the east and who would control the whole world, that Mr. Woodroe Wilson, the President of the United States of America, would be his first disciple and that the future would witness many strange events.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Aug. 9th, 1917.

Post-war trade.

47. The Vartakamitran, of the 9th August, has the following short note on this subject:—If a tax is to be levied in India, there is the loud cry of the Lancashire mill-owners. For similar taxation in China, there is the cry of the Japanese mill-owners. It is said that the representatives of these two countries, England and Japan, are going to reform the conduct of trade after the war. Our readers can themselves understand how far the decisions arrived at by these representatives would be productive of good to other countries. People, though they profess to work for the good of others, seem to care only for their own interest.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Aug. 9th, 1917.

Soap-factories in India.

48. Adverting to the attempts made by the Lever Brothers of Manchester, the proprietors of a big soap factory in England, to establish a soap factory in India, the Vartakamitran, of the 9th August, observes:—It is clear that the above company intends establishing a factory in India itself to escape the import duty which may be levied after the war in the interest of the Indian industries. There has also been a rumour that the Government soap factories at Calicut and Tanur would be sold to this firm. We do not know if there is any truth in this rumour. If, however, this happens to be true, no other harm can there be that our Government can do to the Indian industries.

What is the use of rendering help to those who can conduct great industries without any aid from the Government? If the firm referred to above begins to establish factories here, the soap industries already existing in this country will be completely ruined. Though it may not be possible to prevent foreigners from starting industries here, it is enough if the Government refrain from rendering any assistance to them.

THOZHIL, Madras, August, 1917.

The present situation.

49. In reviewing the present condition of the people in this country, the Thozhil, for August, remarks that they have not yet realised the importance of performing their duty for duty's sake but are only eager to draw their salaries idling away their time, and observes that such people should be methodically reformed and taught to co-operate with each other and conduct themselves impartially and faithfully in the discharge of their duties, and that the confirment of Home Rule or high offices on those who cannot act impartially, would only result in many an internal dissension among the people and great hardship to them.

50. The Vaisyamitran, of the 10th September, while publishing an abstract of the proceedings of the public meetings held at Guntūr under the auspices of the local Home Rule League on the 1st and 2nd idem, says that, at the second meeting, Mr. Sri Ram of New India office delivered a lecture on passive resistance and advocated its adoption by the people as the sure means for the progress of the country, seeing that petitions submitted to Government are of no avail.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakottai, Sep. 10th, 1917.

51. The Hindu Nesan, of the 24th September, publishes the proceedings of a public meeting held at Tiruvarur on the 19th idem to congratulate Mrs. Besant on her release, when one of the speakers, Mr. P. K. Subrahmanya Ayyar of Pazhayavalam, is said to have made the following observations:—Within a few years of English education, our country almost reached a stage of atheism. Mrs. Besant, by her endeavours in the Theosophical Society, began to instil a feeling of devotion into the minds of the people and organised the universal brotherhood with a view to eradicate all religious hatred. Then seeing that reform is needed in the constitution of the Indian Empire, she has come forward to work in this direction. The Emperor is always a good person, while those who carry on the administration for him here, do not know what should be done. As the authorities are not performing their duties properly, Mrs. Besant has taken a vow to point out the mistakes committed by them.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

52. The Swadesamitran, of the 25th September, publishes the proceedings of a public meeting held at Satyamangalam in the Coimbatore district on the 21st idem, under the auspices of the local Home Rule League, to congratulate Mrs. Besant and others on their release from internment. A resolution is said to have been passed at this meeting requesting His Excellency the Viceroy to condemn the action of the Anglo-Indian papers, which publish mischievous comments, obstruct political movements, induce the official class to take such action as would cause excitement in the minds of the people and, without paying due regard to the national progress, attempt to disturb the harmony between the rulers and the ruled, and of the other papers which create hatred between one community and another, and warn them to abide by law in future.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

53. The Lokopakari, of the 24th September, writing, in almost the same strain as the Swadesamitran of the 19th idem, the comments of which are abstracted in paragraph 55 of Report No. 38 of 1917, observes:—The Madras Mail, which commands considerable influence with the authorities and which was also responsible for the internment of Mrs. Besant and others, is bent upon obstructing the attempts made by the Indians for their progress. The object of this paper is that the Indians should continue to be slaves even in these days of high civilization. It never thinks that the Indians also, as British subjects, are entitled to exercise the same rights, but its aim has always been to insult them by creating several differences between the Anglo-Indians and the Indians, speaking of the former as the ruling race and the latter as the subject race and by assuming a favourable attitude towards the authorities. It is action like these that has now caused an agitation among the public. Instead of taking the views expressed by such papers for gospel truth, the Government should put them down as causing excitement among the people. If the authorities assume an impartial attitude in their actions, there will be no cause for agitation in this country and the internment of Mrs. Besant and others also would not have happened.

54. One P. S. Muhi-ud-din Bacha writes to the Swadesamitran of the 24th September, controverting the facts contained in the telegraphic communication published in the Swadesamitran, of the 19th idem, and referred to in paragraph 51 of Report No. 38 of 1917, and, in doing so, contradicts, in particular, the statement made therein that the anti-Home Rule meeting held at Erode on the 17th idem was convened at the instance of the authorities.

DRAVIDABHIMANI, Salem, Sep. 21st, 1917.

Railway stationmaster for Mesopotamia.

55. The Dravidabhimani, of the 21st September, also thinks that it is undesirable to make any distinction in the matter of pay between Indian and European stationmasters in Mesopotamia, so long as there is no difference in the quality or quantity of work turned out by them.

DRAVIDABHIMANI, Salem, Sep. 21st, 1917.

Communal representation.

56. The Dravidabhimani, of the 21st September, writes, on this subject as follows:—India is a thickly-peopled country consisting of people of various castes and creeds. If, therefore, members are to be elected on the basis of caste or creed to the Council which conduct the administration of this country, the number of elected members would be unduly large. But there is no relation between our caste principles and the Government; nor do we follow the respective professions as required in our caste regulations. The Brahmans have given up their pontifical functions and taken to every kind of business, and the people of other castes also are doing the same. It is, therefore, desirable to elect, as is done in England and other places, members to represent every profession. If this is done, those following even the most menial profession, though illiterate, can choose among the members of their community an educated person, who can represent their interests in the Council.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

A lecture on chastify.

57. A correspondent writes to the Dravidan, of the 24th September, that when a lecture on chastity was delivered at a meeting of the Kottaru Vidya Vardhana Samajam on the 21st idem, one of the speakers remarked that the English language and the British administration alone were responsible for the decline of moral rectitude in India, but that this remark met with indignant protests of "No," "No" from the audience.

The correspondent further adds that after the close of the meeting informal discussion ensued between certain Home Rulers and others about the merits of Home Rule and that, as the former could not maintain their cause by arguments, the matter passed from words to blows.

SWADESAMITRAN & HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

Sir Rabindranath Tagore and Mrs. Besant.

58. The Swadesamitran, and the Hindu Nesan, of the 25th September, reproduce in Tamil an extract from a letter written by Sir Rabindranath Tagore to a friend in England, explaining his conduct in sending a message of sympathy to Mrs. Besant, as it appears in the Hindu of the same date.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 20th, 1917.

His Excellency the Governor of Madras.

59. The Andhraprakasika, of the 20th September, says in its leader:—The rumour is afloat that Lord Pentland is going to resign his office. We do not say it is incumbent on His Excellency to inconvenience the British Government by doing so. But if he thinks of doing so for maintaining his self-respect, we cannot say he is in the wrong. It is a fact that the Madras Government have lost their prestige. It may be true, that, unless a change takes place in the personnel of the Government, confidence cannot be restored. . . Whether the action of the Government of India is right or wrong will not be known until the last scene in the drama is exhibited.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 20th, 1917.

Mail peons and runners.

60. The Andhraprakasika, of the 20th September, publishes a letter in which the mail peons and runners complain that the remuneration paid to them is too small, that some of them have to run 20, 30 or 40 miles a day, and that their appeals for an increase of pay have hitherto been unheeded, and pray that the authorities will at least now raise their pay.

The Kistna Eastern Delta.

61. Under this heading the Andhraprakasika, of the 20th September, gives some particulars for the immediate attention of the Government, relating to the proposed conversion of wet lands to dry, the field channels in zamindari villages, repairs of drainage channels, etc.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 21st, 1917.

The Kistna Eastern Delta. Things deserving Government's immediate attention.

Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 21st September, says:—Ever since the appointment as Executive Engineer of Mr. V. T. Srinivasa Ayyangar, who is famous as the Project Engineer, we have not only been hopeful that the delta troubles will be over, but we have been happy to hear that he has been endeavouring to remove those troubles. We have been expecting that his proposals about drainage channels and supply channels, which are profitable to both the ryots and the Government will be carried out. . . The ryots are thunderstruck to hear that he has been transferred on account of certain secret petitions charging him with bribery. We are sure that he is not a man of such a nature. We can assert that these charges are the result of intrigues against him. . . If he is again made the Executive Engineer of this Division or the Special Duty Executive Engineer again in this division, our troubles will be removed.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

The Kistna Eastern Delta.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 22nd September, publishes for the immediate attention of the Government some suggestions about the irrigation of the Kistna Eastern Delta relating to field supply channels, drains, new darkhasts, etc.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

The Kistna Eastern Delta.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 24th September, publishes proposals for the immediate attention of the Government relating to "field supply channels", "drainage arrangements", "new darkhasts for water", "the necessity for an Executive Engineer who is able and who wishes the welfare of the people", etc., in the Kistna Eastern Delta, already noted from the Kistnapatrika and the Andhraprakasika.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 21st, 1917.

Home Rule and the Dravidian.

62. The Andhrapatrika, of the 21st September, reports Mr. Kalyanasundara Mudaliyar to have said in a speech in the Gokhale Hall on the 19th:—The Dravidian deliberately engenders wrong impressions in the minds of the Dravidian brethren by stating that Home Rule means Brahman government and by warning the non-Brahmans against it. The paper decries Indian religions, politics and languages, and states that India is not in a fit condition to receive self-government. May not the non-Brahmans be polluted by the improper writings of this paper.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 21st, 1917.

Reception to Mrs. Besant.

63. Referring to the "welcome" given to Mrs. Besant on her release, the Andhrapatrika, of the 21st September, says:—It is talked of that such a reception was not accorded even to the Viceroy. . . It is now becoming plain what great deeds may be done by popular power. As such power increases, the desires of the people cannot but be realised. The people have therefore to promote union among themselves and persevere in their constitutional agitation for self-government. Mr. Montagu will not fail to note the unanimous voice of the people. The reform scheme will certainly then be carried out. . . The agitation of the people to have the interned released has borne fruit. . . The Anglo-Indians and the few Indians who follow them are trying to excite the anger of the Provincial Government. They are decrying the farsightedness of His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State. They say that they will strike work and obstruct the peaceful conduct of Government. The people should soon gain their object by co-operating at this juncture with His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State, who have undertaken to work for the advance of India.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 21st, 1917.

The mischief of the Mail.

64. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 21st September, says:—The Mail has not given up its threats. It says that it will obstruct the Government doing their work peacefully. The Anglo-Indians do not like the people obtaining privileges. The Anglo-Indian papers complain whenever any restrictions imposed on the people are removed. These papers are highly indignant at the release of the interned. The Pioneer, the Englishman and the Mail are urging Lord Pentland to resign his office. . . We cannot see how the Provincial Government have been dishonoured when the Government of India have cancelled their own order. . . Lord Pentland may resign with pain of mind. But it should be remembered that the welfare of the country is more important than the resignations of Government authorities. The strength of the Government depends on the loyalty of the people. If there be any the least commotion among the people, the strength of the Government will decline. The present act of the Government has manifested their strength. Nothing can be more unwise than to deem this act a weakness on the part of the Government. Whatever change the Government may intend to effect, they must have as their goal the advancement of the people. They must not heed the threats of the Madras Mail which has undertaken to obstruct the progress of the people. Whatever may be the critical situation in which the Government may be placed on account of the misdeeds of the Anglo-Indians, the people will certainly be ready to sacrifice their all to ward off such a situation. Whichever officer may resign, Mr. Montagu has to give the same answer which Lord Morley gave when Sir B. Fuller threatened him. . . . The Mail will note that answer and behave more wisely.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 21st, 1917.

The new non-Brahman meeting.

65. In commenting on the proceedings of the meeting of "the new non-Brahman meeting" held on the 20th September in the Gokhale Hall, the Andhrapatrika, of the 21st September, says:—All sections of the Indians are in agreement with the Congress scheme of reforms. It is impossible for anybody to oppose the ideal of self-government voiced forth by thirty crores of people.

The same paper, elsewhere, gives in Telugu the proceedings of the meeting above referred to and gists of the speeches delivered therein, to be found in the Hindu of the 21st September.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 21st, 1917.

The Home Rule training classes.

66. The Andhrapatrika, of the 21st September, reports Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar to have said at the meeting held on the subject of Home Rule training classes: It may be said that nobody else is more loyal to the British Crown than the Home Rulers. We are not loyal towards the bureaucracy only. The present connection between India and England must continue.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

A separate Andhra Conference.

67. Under this heading the Andhrapatrika (weekly), of the 19th September, says:—The present great war has unsettled settled institutions. . . The Home Rule agitation has spread fast all over India, and has created panic in the minds of the rulers, so much so that they resorted to repressive measures. The direct result of this was the internment of patriots like Mrs. Besant, and the indirect result is a forcible impetus given to the Home Rule agitation. When the whole country was made the butt of repression, the people have begun to show courage and daring. Political agitation has spread with force all over India and in the British Isles too. As the agitation increased, the indignation of the rulers also increased. The bond of sympathy between the rulers and the ruled has begun to be relaxed. At this juncture, Mr. Montagu entered into Indian administration. This entry of Mr. Montagu, political agitation, and the repressive policy of the rulers, have been the cause of organising this special Andhra Conference.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 21st, 1917.

A dumb Government.

68. The Andhraprakasika, of the 21st September, says under this heading:—The Decentralization Commission remarked that the Government of India would do well to have an eye always on the Provincial Governments. This remark is now ruining those Governments by depriving them of their authority. Relying on this remark, the Madras Times said the other day that the Government of India are responsible for the administration and welfare of the country. If that be so, what is the use of the Provincial Governments? Why should Governors and the members of Executive Councils be paid thousands and maintained? What is the use of local Legislative Councils? It was the belief of the people that the Provincial Governments had to look after the welfare of the territory in their charge. Now it has to be said that the Provincial Governments are not responsible for this, and that that responsibility has been shifted to the Government of India. Our countrymen expect some reforms. But it is a pity that these reforms will begin with the deprivation of the authority of the Government of Madras. . . It does not appear that the Secretary of State for India is of opinion that it will be well to curtail his powers of interference in the administration of India. There is no need to describe the step-motherly love of Mr. Montagu in the matter of giving independent authority to the Provincial Governments. . . Those very Indians who have greatly agitated for the abolition of the office of the Secretary of State for India, now praise to the skies the arbitrary rule of the Secretary of State. The Provincial Governments and the Government of India are now subjected to the Government of cablegrams. . . From what has happened of late, it appears that neither the Government of India, nor the Secretary of State will agree to the grant of independent authority to Provincial Governments and the curtailment of the powers of the Secretary of State. . . Hundreds of Indians have been interned in Bengal. Many who have committed the same offence as Mrs Besant are suffering internment. It is to be regretted that the Government of India who deemed Mrs. Besant innocent and ordered her release have not released them.

69. Under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 21st September, says that the meeting of the non-Brahmans who are in favour of the Congress scheme of reforms did not allow any discussion at all, but simply witnessed among other things the passing of a resolution that the meeting approved of the congress scheme, and wanted separate class representation. It is thus a sectarian meeting.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 21st, 1917.

The non-Brahman swarajist meeting.

70. A correspondent to the Andhrapatriku, of the 22nd September, publishes incidents in connection with the anniversary of the Berhampur Home Rule League and remarks:—We regret to say that the antagonists of the Home Rule League have not been able, after having distributed their loyal handbills, to hold a procession.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

Berhampur Home Rule League Anniversary.

71. The Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd September, says:—When with swaraj as the goal the whole country is with one voice urging the necessity of the immediate introduction of the Congress scheme of reforms, we do not see the use of the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma proposing a resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council recommending that no difference should be made between the Indians and the Europeans in conferring appointments, and the Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya moving a resolution recommending the holding of Indian Civil Service examinations simultaneously in England and India. . . A new era has begun in Indian politics. Even if the above recommendations are carried out and some more seats in the Legislative Councils are granted to the Indians, the time has gone when the Indians would rest satisfied with small reforms. The people are desiring powers. The representatives of the people want administrative and financial powers. . . When we make small requests, the Government will give us smaller boons. There is no use of repenting afterwards. . . The people should concentrate their attention on the ideal of self-government, and see that their attention is not distracted. . . In whatever way we consider the resolutions referred to above, they do not appear to be useful. When the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma's resolution was being discussed, the Anglo-Indians and the bureaucracy expressed their narrow views once again. . . Did the Hon'ble Mr. Couchman give his reply to the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma's resolution in earnest or in jest? The gist of the reply is that when the Brahmans and non-Brahmans do not agree, and have misunderstandings, the Europeans should enjoy the offices in their stead. . . The reply of the Hon'ble Mr. Couchman brings into memory the story of the two cats which quarrelled over a loaf and applied to a monkey to settle their dispute. . . We must enlist the sympathy of the Secretary of State and the Parliament. Our future welfare is not in the hands of the Indian Civil Servants. Unless there is a thorough change in the system of administration, the bureaucracy will not like to give privileges to the people. Not only will our representation to them go in vain, but our ideal also may be made more distant.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

The recent session of the Imperial Legislative Council.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd September, says:—They are the enemies of the British Empire who retard the growth of mutual affection between the subjects and the rulers in the Empire, and who try to break the peace of the country at this juncture. It is most despicable to try to engender commotion again in this country at a time when Mr. Montagu is coming to India to remove political restrictions and grant reforms to India. The Mail has set about this work. It is regrettable that Justice is playing the second fiddle to the mischief of the Mail. At the instigation of the Mail, the Calcutta European Association and the Bangalore Association have sent a telegram objecting to the release of the interned. . . The Mail asks who is responsible for the maintenance of peace in the Madras Presidency. . . The maintenance of peace has not been affected by the release of Mrs. Besant. The sun and the moon have not changed their orbits. . . It is only the Mail that has undertaken to disturb the peace at this juncture. The Government of India have now to cure this mischief of the Mail. We are sure that there is no other violent agitator at present. The Mail says:—"The idea is fast spreading that Mr. Montagu should resign his office. . . We think that the most important reform should be the removal of Mr. Montagu from office." The chief object of the Mail is to see Mr. Montagu removed from his office. Justice also is supporting the Mail in this matter. . . We must let Mr. Montagu know that excepting a few all the Indians are praising him for his generous spirit. . . The Mail and Justice put a wrong construction on the expression "provincial independence" They think that it consists in increasing the arbitrary authority of the Provincial Governments without increasing the powers of the people. By the sort of provincial independence which these papers wish for, the only result derived will be that the happiness of the people will suffer.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, Sep. 16th, 1917.

Regarding exodus of Governments to the hills.

72. Referring to the discontinuance this year of the practice of the Government of Bombay proceeding to the Mahabaleswar Hills in October, the Hitakarini, of the 16th September, observes as follows:—We cannot understand why the Governments of other provinces also should not follow this example and prevent the useless expenditure of thousands of rupees.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, Sep. 16th, 1917.

Lord Kitchener.

73. The Hitakarini, of the 16th September, reports as what is published in a Bengali newspaper the following:—It is being talked about in England that Lord Kitchener was not drowned but is a prisoner in Germany. The Government do not at all support this rumour.

Of course, we should be gratified to hear that our British War Minister is still alive.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

The Congress scheme of reforms.

74. The Kistnapatrika, of the 22nd September, publishes in Telugu the particulars of the scheme of reforms laid down by the Congress.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

The discontent of subordinate officers.

75. Under this heading a correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 22nd September, says:—The chief reasons for the discontent of officers are worry, annoyance, overwork, disrespect, mistrust and poverty. The evils of this dissatisfaction are many. They affect not only the discontented, but also the people and the country. Administrative power also will be affected. The Government also will be put to loss. It must therefore be said that to get work done by discontented officers is a loss to all and never an advantage.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

Wickedness of a westerner.

76. Under this heading a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd September, says, with reference to the assault on Mr. K. Hanumanta Rao Pantulu by a westerner:—When we are brought face to face with such evils, we must maintain our self-respect. When life is in danger, it is natural to put up with the mischief of a westerner, and rest satisfied with some temporary remedy. . . The westerner has some privileges in criminal law, and so it is found difficult to get their outrages tried in Criminal Courts. As I took some trouble some time ago to put down the mischief of some Europeans, I personally know such difficulties. I was able to gain my object in the case of about ten Europeans by resorting to passive resistance or by dragging them to courts. Unless we persevere in our undertakings, the westerners will not give up the mischiefs they do to us. There is no difference in the legal procedure in the Civil Courts. . . It is not proper to look upon mischievous acts with forbearance. Especially when such perverse conduct is seen in Europeans, it is necessary to resort to a proper legal remedy. . . We must always follow peaceful methods. I do not advise that we should resort to demoniacal acts and meet mischief with mischief. We should not give up our attempt to drag a bad man at once to the law courts. Great will be the commotion in the political world if an Indian had assaulted a whiteman. The Indians should understand this secret and maintain their self-respect.

77. The Andhrapatrika, of the 24th September, says:—The Anglo-Indian papers are endeavouring to create confusion in the country at a time when Mr. Montagu is to visit it. The Mail says that it will not agree to the people being satisfied, that there is no need for the prevalence of peace on the eve of Mr. Montagu s visit, and that the country will not sustain any loss even if he does not come. It says that it will do its best to see that Mr. Montagu is removed from his office, and that this attitude is not disadvantageous to India and hostile to reforms. The Pioneer and the Civil and Military Gazette express the same opinion. While, on the one hand, the Indians are trying for reforms, the Anglo-Indians on the other are trying to frustrate the endeavours of the Indian by showing a hostile attitude towards Mr. Montagu. We should support Mr. Montagu in his good endeavours, and see that the Anglo-Indian papers do not succeed in their attempt to frustrate them.

Anglo-Indian papers.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

78. The Andhrapatrika, of the 24th September, says:—The brother of Sir H. Cotton, according to the Leader, wrote in 1883, in a work of his, that it was necessary to grant Home Rule to India. So, those who are opposed to the aspirations of the people should know that the desire for Home Rule is not one newly awakened by discontented agitators. . . By the establishment of Home Rule the stability of the Empire will be ensured, and there will be no room for its decline. By granting Home Rule, the Government will help on the union of the Empire.

Home Rule.

ANDHRAPATRIKA Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

Home Rule.

The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 26th September, in a leader on the marginally-noted subject, writes:—

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, Sep. 26th, 1917.

When will a wise man do that which will bring disgrace upon himself?

We have, often in these columns, proved that the participation of Mussalmans in the Home Rule propaganda is not expedient now. We give its explanation to enable Mussalmans to understand readily that at present it is impossible for Home Rule to benefit Mussalmans.

Home Rule means the government of the people by the people of the country. It grants full power of action. Higher educational qualifications are required in order to derive benefit from this form of Government. We have, in the community, only a few Mussalmans possessing the necessary qualification. Their number is comparatively small. Participation is neither legally nor otherwise allowed. Even if allowed, expediency does not permit it. Participation will tend to benefit the other party most. There does not appear to be any instance of the Hindus having sided with the Mussalmans to obtain any Mussalman rights.

From the above statement it is clear Mussalmans will be the losers. Hence expediency demands that we should leave our compatriots alone. If they are endeavouring to get Home Rule, we should try to lay our claims before the Government, which being fully aware of our loyalty, will never ignore them.

We have often heard from Mussalmans that in the matter of preferment their rights are ignored. It is on this account that we bring to the notice of the Government what the Mussalmans desire—(1) one Mussalman should be appointed to the Executive Council, (2) the number of Mussalmans elected for the Legislative Council should be raised from three to six, (3) one Mussalman should be appointed as Judge to the City Civil Court, (4) one to the Small Cause Court, (5) two to the High Court, (6) one Mussalman Member to the Revenue Board, (7) one Mussalman either as Assistant, or Assistant Secretary to the Salt Department, (8) one Mussalman to any important appointment in the Corporation, (9) one Mussalman either as Assistant or Deputy in the Police Commissioner's office, (10) one Mussalman Registrar in the Chief Secretariat, (11) one Mussalman, at least, as Superintendent in the Accountant-General's office.

In short, there should be appointed one Mussalman to some superior post in each and every office in the city as well as in the districts.

Moreover measures should be adopted for the amelioration of the lot of Mussalmans in any of the offices where their claims have suffered, or where promotion has been blocked.

To such higher appointments Mussalmans in the Government service can be raised with regard to the wishes of the community. We believe the Government know their names, and are aware of their qualifications and abilities (to be continued).

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Sep. 19th, 1917.

Indian industries.

79. A correspondent to the Desamata, of the 19th September, says:—Our country which was formerly famous for its industries, and enjoyed great eminence, is looking for foreign industries. Our country is a market for the manufactures of the west. This is the abode of the Goddess of Prosperity. Our wealth is passing into the hands of foreigners. Our daily life depends upon the mercy of the westerners. We are at their mercy. . . In order to develop their trade, the English imposed heavy duties on the articles they imported from India and light or no duties on their articles. Thus they sold their manufactures at cheap prices, with the result that our industries have declined. . . It is not possible to impose heavy duties on foreign imports without the sanction of the Government. The Government of India have no complete independence. They cannot do such things without the approval of the Secretary of State for India, who is a Member of the Cabinet. If he acts against the wishes of the people of Lancashire, who manufacture piece-goods, his position will be at stake. So even Viceroys like Minto, who wish the welfare of the people are unable to impose heavy duties on foreign goods. We need not dwell on the commotion caused by the Lancashire merchants some time ago. So the swadeshi vow is the only means for the development of our industries.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 21st, 1917.

A meeting at Coimbatore.

80. In giving the proceedings of the meetings at Coimbatore on the occasion of the release of the interned, the Andhrapatrika, of the 21st September, reports Mr. Wadia to have said:—Mr. Montagu's speech surpassed the speeches which Mr. Lajput Rai made in England. Mr. Lajput Rai was not allowed to come to India. He is therefore spending his time in America. But the bureaucracy has not been able to prevent Mr. Montagu coming to India. . . Lord Pentland has arranged to stop the telegram which Mrs. Besant had sent. But has he been able to stop lakhs of telegrams, etc., sent from India? . . . Mr. Arundale has stated that the quarrel with the bureaucracy has commenced today, but the fact is that this war commenced as soon as Mrs. Besant purchased the Madras Standard and christened it New India.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

Confusion in Erode.

81. The Andhraprakasika, of the 24th September, says under this heading:—Those who have joined the Home Rule League at Erode have the upper hand. It is not known what attitude the Government are going to take towards the non-Brahmans who do not advocate Home Rule, but are loyal to the Government. We hope the Government will do them justice.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

Sir Rabindranath Tagore's views.

82. Under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 25th September, contains the following in English and in Telugu:—Sir Rabindranath Tagore sends to the press a copy of the letter which he has written to a literary friend in England. In course of the letter he writes:—In your letter you seem puzzled at my conduct in sending a message of sympathy to Mrs. Besant. I am afraid compared with your own troubles it may appear to you too small but yet sufferings have not lost their keenness for us and moral problems still remain as grave in all parts of the world. Constant conflict between the growing demand of the educated community of India for a substantial share in the administration of their country and the spirit of hostility on the part of the Government has given rise among a considerable number of our young men to methods of violence bred of despair and distrust. This has been met by the Government a thorough policy of repression. In Bengal itself hundreds of men are interned without trial, great number in unhealthy surroundings, in jails and in solitary cells, and in a few cases driving them to insanity or suicide. The misery that is carried into numerous households is deep and widespread. What I consider to be the worst outcome of this irresponsible policy is the spread of contagion of hatred against everything western in minds which were free from it. In this crisis the only European who has shared our sorrow incurring the anger and derision of her countrymen is Mrs. Annie Besant. This was what led me to express my grateful admiration for her noble courage. Possibly there is such thing as political exigency just there may be a place for utter ruthlessness in war; but I pay my homage to those who have faith in ideals and therefore are willing to take all other risks except that of weakening the foundation of moral responsibility.

A request to the I.C.S. officers.

83. Reviewing the article under this heading in the East and West, the Andhrapatrika, of the 25th September, says:—In deciding the present political problem, the powers of the I.C.S. officers will necessarily be reduced. They do not like such an event and so they are hostile to political reforms. If they forget their own interest and look to the interest of the country, such a hostile attitude will disappear. They have, therefore, to broaden their views. They exercise arbitrary authority at present over the people, and in every branch of Government in the district. The welfare of India is in their hands at present. The writer of the article in the East and West asks if it is just on the part of the rulers to refuse to grant self-government to the Indians on the plea of their unfitness, in spite of the fact that they have had India under their protection for a century and a half. He states that if the Indians are unfit the rulers should make them fit and not delay till the end of the world. He remarks that if the Indians have not become competent, it is the fault of the rulers. He writes that the I.C.S. officers should show some self-sacrifice. How far has the proclamation of Queen Victoria been carried into effect? What help have the I.C.S. officers rendered in this matter? It is not merely high offices that the Indians want. Their aim is that the administration should be carried on according to the wishes of the people. They want that their industries, trade, etc., should thrive, and that the country should emerge from its present poverty. It is true that after the establishment of the British Government, peace was established in India. It is true that the raids of Pindaris, etc., were put down. But should such events which should have been dwelt upon half a century ago, be narrated now? The rulers said that there were no funds for free and compulsory education. Village panchayats with powers have not been established. Opportunities have not been afforded for successfully carrying on local self-government. The administrative machinery is exceedingly costly. James Mill wrote that in India the land assessment alone would be enough to meet all the expenditure of the Government. There is no use holding the I.C.S. officers responsible for this bad state of things. Being habituated to the present policy of the Government, their views have become narrow. Their powers should pass into the hands of the people. That may pain their minds. But such a change is very necessary for the progress of the people. So it will be well if the I.C.S. officers begin to show self-sacrifice.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

The Anglo-Indians.

84. The Calcutta correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 25th September, says:—Though the attitude of the rulers has changed, that of our Anglo-Indian friends remains venomous without changing. The release of Mrs. Besant is a great source of fear to the Statesman and the Englishman. The Anglo-Indians in our city have sent a telegram to the Secretary of State for India as if the release would be followed by an earthquake.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

Mrs. Besant's speech.

85. In giving the proceedings of the meeting held to welcome Mrs. Besant, the Andhrapatrika, of the 24th September, gives in Telugu a gist of the speech of Mrs. Besant on that occasion, which appears in the Hindu of the 24th September.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

The co-operative movement.

86. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 25th September, says:—The question as to whether Government should or should not have control over co-operative institutions is being discussed in the Madras Presidency at present. Despite the withdrawal of such control, the affairs of these institutions have not been seen to improve. Our people are, as yet, unable to realise the full importance of the movement, and to manage their institutions with their own arrangements as to audit, etc. It is therefore imperative that the system of Government audit should be continued for some time.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 25th, 1917.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 25th, 1917.

87. In an article under this heading, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 25th September, writes:—At a recent meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council Sir Michael O'Dwyer behaved most high-handedly, transgressing the rules of the Council, and caused resentment among the members. As soon as His Excellency the Viceroy came to know of this, he reprimanded him and made him apologise to the members. We have never known any situation in the past in which a Lieutenant-Governor was constrained to tender an apology. The British are just administrators. They do not care for even their king when he is at fault. They are practically the rulers themselves. They have even beheaded their King Charles I for going astray. This was a long time ago. The people were thinking that autocratic methods were again beginning to prevail. The British are naturally a democratic race. The release of Mrs. Besant itself goes to prove this fact. We do not share the view of the Amrita Bazaar Patrika that it is the present circumstances that led to the vindication of justice. Constitutionalism is bred in the very bones as it were of the British people. May their glory live for ever!

Sir Michael O'Dwyer's apology.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Sep. 21st, 1917.

Writing on the same subject, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 21st September, in an impassioned article, observes:—It is most surprising that almost at the same moment when His Excellency the Viceroy had succeeded in pacifying the people who had been perturbed by irresponsible action on the part of the authorities, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab who is only a subordinate of His Excellency should have spoken so contemptuously of Indian public opinion. When the Council Hall was still reverberating the conciliatory words of the Viceroy, Sir Michael poured forth his venom. But his words were derogatory to His Excellency rather than to the public; for, when the host is asking for popular co-operation, would it bring shame on the guests or the host, if a mere subordinate of the latter should drive away the guests? Sir Michael showed himself as bureaucracy incarnate. His speech, though bitter, should at least have shown strict regard for truth. But there is neither truth, nor tact, nor love of justice nor sympathy in it. It has only a full measure of false statesmanship. When the whole country from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin is swayed by one idea, it is only false statesmanship that can seek to sunder the Punjab from the rest of India. What does the Punjab gain after all by this device for creating disunion, by appearing to sing the praise of this province and its loyalty and vilifying the other provinces? What is the reward you have given or are going to give to the Punjab in recognition of her invaluable services in the present war? Pubjab will not be slow to see through your devices. O friend, the Punjab! Don't you get caught in that snare! If you know the story of the wolf which induced a poor calf to leave its herd, don't be led away by this O'Dwyer. We feel sure you will not allow yourself to be taken in. For, as our contemporary the Hindu has pointed out, Sir O'Dwyer's intention is to assign to the Punjab the rôle which Ulster is playing in Irish politics. But we are confident that you will not agree to it and make yourself a laughing stock. It does not occur to Sir Michael however that others can see through his false statesmanship. These thick-headed people, blinded by their power, do acts which undermine the prestige of the entire class of officers.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 26th, 1917.

88. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 26th September, observes:—Those who fearlessly demanded democratic institutions in the country and were meanly styled extremists by some after the split at the Surat session of the Congress are all now Home Rulers whose patriotism is unparalleled. Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar is the leader and Mrs. Besant is the very soul of the party. The blunders she committed as President of the Theosophical Society and which her enemies are seeking to magnify have now been completely forgotten.

Extremists and Home Rulers.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Sep. 21st, 1917.

89. Referring to the attitude and counsels of the Madras Mail in respect of the release of Mrs. Besant, the Manorama, of the 21st September, writes:—Is it not seditious on the part of the Madras Mail to think that the Government of the country should be made impossible? Would it not be bringing the

Mrs. Besant's release and the Madras Mail.

Government into contempt, if Government officials were to adopt the above-mentioned evil and perverse suggestions of the Mail? In that case, does not this paper which brings the Government into contempt deserve to be punished under the Press Act? These are the doubts which arise in our minds when we read of the impudence (wicked suggestions) of the Mail. We trust that the Secretary of State will pay no heed whatever to these meaningless croakings of the Madras Mail.

LOKAPRAKASAM, Trichur, Sep. 24th, 1917.

His Excellency the Governor's visit to Calicut.

90. Referring to His Excellency the Governor's visit to Calicut, the Loka-prakasam, of the 24th September, observes that, while it is proper that all expenditure on account of the Governor's reception should, as desired by His Excellency, be avoided, it is not right that the people should be deprived of an opportunity to represent their grievances to him through addresses, or, that in view of their having already contributed and still contributing much towards the war fund, they should be called upon to present a purse on the occasion towards the maintenance of the Hospital ship Madras, which will be a bad precedent, though what the people intend to give in his behalf irrespective of His Excellency's visit, may be handed over to His Excellency at the time.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Aug. 28th, 1917.

A movement for the violation of law.

91. The Qaumi Report, of the 28th August (received on the 20th September), referring to the resolution on passive resistance, passed at the Special Conference held at Madras the day before yesterday, regretfully raises its voice of protest and observes:—We do not oppose it on the grounds that the violation of law, called "passive resistance", is illegal. On the other hand, we consider disobedience to an unlawful enactment to be legal, and, as far as possible, it should be honoured in the breach.

In our opinion India has not yet reached the stage of passive resistance. The orders issued by the Government have interfered with the liberties of a few people. We have, however, shown that it is only such persons have the right to disobey the law, whose freedom has been interfered with.

Islam allows disobedience to commands, provided public peace is not disturbed. Otherwise there is the other commandment that the orders of tyrant should be obeyed albeit, reluctantly.

But neither condition exists in India. There is nothing wrong with the policy of the Government, nor are the rulers oppressive. We have no use for passive resistance.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Sep. 18th, 1917.

The Government and the goddess.

92. The Qaumi Report, of the 18th September, referring to the carrying of Mrs. Besant's effigy by Hindu ladies in the procession, the day before yesterday at Madras, writes:—"This spectacle has produced a very depressing effect on our perplexed minds, and we submit, with sorrow and regret, that the responsibility of such a deplorable sight rests with the Government. Mrs. Besant is an ordinary woman divorced by her missionary husband and enlightened by the Mahatmas of the Himalayas.

"The Government, in interning her, transformed Mrs. Besant into missionary goddess Besant. We are sure, even if Mrs. Besant had dropped alive from the tops of the Himalayas or had disappeared by drowning in the river Ganges or had ascended into heaven and changed herself into the planet venus, she could never have been reborn in any state as missionary Besant".

The Editor, in attributing all this to the leniency of the Government, observes, "It is really not leniency but a blunder on the part of the Government in having connived at an English woman assuming the rôle of a Brahman lady and an ordinary mortal being to find a place in the Hindu Pantheon."

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

The first dawn after the night of the release.

93. The Qaumi Report, of the 19th September, has a leader on the release of Mrs. Besant and her two associates, in which the editor appreciates the action of the Government in releasing them, and says that this episode will shine in the annals of Britain like the stars for ever.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, Sep. 18th, 1917.

Aspirants to Home Rule. Read carefully.

94. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 18th September, writes:—We have often proved that the plant of Home Rule cannot thrive and bear fruit in India. The Mussalmans, who are said to have gone over to the Home Rulers, have not done so on behalf of the community.

The Editor quotes the definition of Home Rule given by Moulana Hakim Zainulabdin Sahib Bahadur that it connotes government by the indigenous inhabitants, and not by foreigners, and asks its readers not to be misled by the misrepresentation of self-interested persons.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 19th September, has a lengthy leader against the Home Rule ideal.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Sep. 20th, 1917.

The capacity of some Englishmen for understanding affairs.

95. The Qaumi Report, of the 20th September, writes:—It was in deference to the strong recommendation of the Government of India, that Lord Pentland, the Governor of Madras in Council cancelled the order of internment, passed on Mrs. Besant and others. The step taken by His Excellency the Governor of Madras suggests, even to the man in the street, that His Excellency's action was based on deliberation, foresight, and independence, and that His Excellency deserves all praise and commendation in this matter. An anti-campaign is, however, being started by a few Englishmen who suggest to Lord Pentland that he should resign, because, just to please the Secretary of State, he and his Council have effaced themselves.

The Editor, commenting on the opinions of some English papers, e.g., the Englishman, Calcutta, and the Madras Mail, says that they are making a mistake in singing a song of contempt and disaffection and are hostile to the progress of the country which is the real aim of Lord Pentland. His Excellency is not an inexperienced young man, or a novice not to be able to maintain his dignity. If there had been any truth in this absurd apprehension, His Excellency would have at once recognised it and urged the Government of India to accept his resignation.

It is regrettable to find that the Press Act does not apply to such English papers, otherwise these Editors, whether Englishmen or Indians, who are creating disorder in the country and difficulties for the administration, deserve to be severely dealt with under the Defence of India Act. This can be easily understood; if Lord Pentland were to resign his office today, there would be a veritable hurricane of deplorable aspirations in the country and it would be very difficult to find anyone in the empire to succeed to him. Do the Englishman and the Madras Mail not wish to create disorder in the country? Are not such suggestions and advice calculated to create rebellion or unrest?

We submit to His Excellency that naturally we are better acquainted with public opinion and assure His Excellency that his honour and prestige are what they were before and that the opinion of those, who indulge in such flights of the imagination, is worthless.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, Sep. 24th, 1917.

Friction between Hindus and Muhammadans.

96. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 24th September, refers to the intelligence from Poona, dated the 21st instant to the effect that disunion still continues between Hindus and Muhammadans of Barsee, and that on Monday night the former passed a mosque with a funeral procession accompanied by music owing to which a quarrel ensued and a Muhammadan was seriously injured, and observes:—"It remains to be seen what reply our nominal leaders, who demand self-government and Home Rule along with Hindus and urge that co-operation exists between them both, are going to give."

The same paper of the same date enquiring into the cause of the continuance of the internment of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali and others remarks:—Does it not show selfishness on the part of our compatriots who made such persistent efforts in obtaining the release of Mrs. Besant and her two associates but beyond indulging in a little lip-sympathy made no endeavours on behalf of poor Muhammadan detinus. If Muhammadans had also been regarded as the natural children of their mother country, Mrs. Besant and others would not have moved from Coimbatore unless all interned Muhammadans were also released. Can we rely on these compatriots and expect betterment at their hands. No! emphatically, no!!

97. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 26th September, writes:—Today we wish to throw some light on a subject regarding which it is generally believed, the Government is not acquainted with those who really deserve honours; for the Government ignores the claims of those who, in the opinion of the public, merit distinctions by virtue of their services, position and influence In our opinion His Excellency Lord Pentland should appreciate the merit of those who deserve honours, and honour them by giving them titles. We mean those who are considered by the country and community to be respectable, important and influential.

"Honours."

Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, Madras, Sep. 26th, 1917.

The editor divides the persons deserving of Government honours into three classes and observes:—"In the first class consisting of the members of the Carnatic family, the names of the following can be included:—(1) Raof Ahmad, Khan Bahadur. He is a respectable member of the family of Azim Jah. His respectability and nobility are admitted. He is in receipt of a substantial stipend from the Government, and is an enthusiastic supporter and advocate of the cause of the Government and the community. He holds the honorary appointments of President of the Urdu Society, Vice-President of the Presidency Muslim League and is an Honorary Presidency Magistrate. There is scarcely any society in Madras in which he does not hold some honorary position. In spite of his possessing all these honours, the Government have not yet granted him the title of "Nawab" which by virtue of his family he deserves. On the other hand, some people have been granted these honours who have had no connection with the Royal Family. He is a poet and his nom-de-plume is "Purthas". He should be granted the title of Nawab at least.

(2) Abdul Qadir Sahib Bahadur, son of the late Muhammad Mahmud, Khan Bahadur, who held the post of Persian Consul, is a member of the family of Aziz-ul-Mulk and is the shrotriemdar of the village of Nunjampaukam. He is an Honorary Presidency Magistrate. He takes an active part in public affairs, and is engaged in business. The Government has not yet honoured this respectable member of the Carnatic family.

In the second class, consisting of men of literary pursuits, may be included the names of Moulana Tajam-ul-Husain, Khan Bahadur (Iman), Moulavi Muhammad Abdur Rahman Sahib, Shaer, etc. These gentlemen, by their writings and lectures, are spreading sentiments of loyalty and peace in the country and are creating interest in, and desire for, education and literary tastes.

Among divines the name of Moulana Alhaj Mahmud Sahib deserves mention. He has given his life to teaching. He is a certificated, and an excellent, expounder of Muhammadan law.

The third class consists of liberal gentlemen, who help to serve the country and the community and endeavour, with the aid of money, writings and personal services, to promote the welfare of the Government and the people. For example, Moulana Abdus Subhan Sahib, Honorary Presidency Magistrate, Sahukar Haji Muhammad Hanif Sahib, Hakim Haji Muhammad Abdul Aziz Sahib, Sahukar Muhammad Sáad-ulla Badshah Sahib, etc. These gentlemen are held in high esteem by the country and the community. It is desirable that they should be honoured by the Government with some titles.

In addition to these men, there are several others among the Muhammadan officials of the Government, who in spite of the fact that they are popular, respectable and have rendered excellent services to the State, have not been granted by the Government any titles or if they have been given any, they are far beneath their dignity or the regard in which they are held by the public. As for instance, Khan Sahib, Muhammad Abdul Karim Sahib Faroqi, although he has rendered conspicuous and meritorious services, possesses admitted ability and is a respectable man, he has been given only a "Khan Sahib." Besides he is still only a Deputy Superintendent of Police. The public values him highly. Likewise Mir Muzhar-ud-din Sahib, B.A., Personal Assistant, Postal Department, and Munshi Ahmad Kabir Sahib, who is an able, excellent and respectable member of the Translation Department. These gentlemen stand high in the public estimation. It is true that the men, who really work, do not like to get titles. The suggestion we make is based on the opinion and desire of the public who likes to appreciate their merit, and it is for this reason that we request the Government to show their appreciation of public opinion by bestowing honours in the directions indicated.

98. In offering their hearty and respectful congratulations to His Highness the Maharaja of Travancore on the unique event of his Shashtipoorthi, the Malayalam papers received so far, especially those of Travancore, refer to the great progress in all directions which the State has made during His Highness' thirty-two years of rule, pay a glowing tribute to His Highness' high and excellent qualities of head and heart, and pray for his long and prosperous life.

The Shashtipoorthi of His Highness the Maharaja of Travancore.

V.—Prospects of the Crops and the Condition of the People.

Vartakamitran, Tanjore, Aug. 9th, 1917.

99. In an article under this heading the Vartakamitran, of the 9th August, observes:—Eighty per cent of our people are agriculturists, and as, especially in this Presidency, the Government are the owners of the land and they raise the land tax at every settlement once in every 25 or 30 years, the condition of the ryots is gradually going down. The reason for 50 lakhs of people having died in this Presidency in the famine of 1876–77 was that the balance of the yield from the land after paying the kist was not sufficient for maintaining the people even for six months. Though the Revenue Board had declared in 1857 that the land tax would not be increased as long as the Government kist was paid regularly, they announced in 1895 that the tax would be increased in proportion to the income. Now we understand that the North and South Arcot districts will be resettled and the land-tax raised. Numerous are the difficulties suffered by the ryots in India. What remains to them after paying the kist is indeed very small, not to mention the fact that most of them have to borrow even for paying the kist. Going back to ancient days, the land assessment under the Muhammadan Kings was one-sixth of the produce and it was one-fourth under the Mahrattas. But how is it now collected in India? It works at 33 per cent in Bombay, at 50 per cent in this Presidency and at 60 per cent in the Central Provinces. It is this promiscuous collection of land assessment without any principle that has led to India becoming poorer day by day under the British rule, while it ought to grow richer. Mr. Digby has calculated that the daily income of an Indian was $2\frac{1}{2}$ annas in 1850, $1\frac{3}{4}$ annas in 1875 and $\frac{3}{4}$ anna in 1900. It is this pitiable condition that made Lord Canning, Sir Charles Wood and Sir Stafford Northcote recommend the fixing of the land assessment permanently. But nothing came of it. On the whole the monthly income of an Indian will not be enough for the expenses incurred by an English official in smoking. The price of a bat purchased by the latter will be equal to the income of an Indian for six months. While this is the condition of our agriculturists, it is really strange on the part of the Englishmen to say that agriculture should be improved in India and that it will be advantageous to her to produce a larger quantity of raw products and export them. Funny indeed! We are to starve and produce cotton seeds, etc., and send them to Europe. They will give them back to us in the shape of cloths and soaps and, distributing them also to others, reap a profit thereby! Look at their idea.

The miserable condition of our ryots.

Dravida Patrika, Madras, Sep. 26th, 1917.

100. Dwelling at length upon the rapid progress achieved by Japan and adverting to the arrangements made in that country for the improvement of agriculture by establishing agricultural colleges and opening experimental farms and institutes for breeding cattle, a correspondent of the Dravida Patrika, of the 26th September, observes that the lack of such arrangements in India is attributed by many to the absence of a democratic Government here, and that it is not to the credit of the Government that they should give room for such a statement.

Agriculture in India.

101. Adverting to the order of the Collector of Chingleput district reconverting the grazing ground in the Maiyur village of the Conjeeveram taluk, into a reserve forest, Mr. Kuppuswami Pillai, one of the Mirasidars affected by the order, writes to the Swadesamitran, of the 25th September, as follows :—The hardships caused by the Forest department to the ryots of Maiyur, who pay a kist of Rs. 7,000 a year and have to maintain about 1,200 heads of cattle, are indescribable. There being no pasturage for their cattle, the ryots submitted several petitions to the Board of Revenue, and in 1915 their grievances were redressed by the Government, who were pleased to convert the reserve forest in the village into a free grazing-ground for the cattle. But, now, on the wrong reports of the Tahsildar and the Revenue Inspector, this ground has been reconverted into a reserve forest. This unexpected order has fallen like a bolt from the blue on the Maiyur public, who just then petitioned to the Collector to improve the grazing-ground by removing the barren trees therein. The order will only result in the poor cattle dying in tens and hundreds for want of pasturage. When the Tahsildar visited the place in August last, he told the people that the land would be handed over to them again, if they agreed to (the formation of) a panchayat, and, by force and threat, has taken the signatures of about 30 out of 320 pattadars in the village. The Tahsildar was informed that, as the chief men in the village had other work to do outside the village and it was not possible for them to be at the place except during the harvest season, the panchayat system would not work there satisfactorily. But he would not hear us. We are prepared to execute an agreement to pay with our kist to Government annas two for every mango tree and annas four for every tamarind tree in the forest, which yields fruits, if the Government would fell all barren trees therein and sell them by auction. We, therefore, request the Government to consider these facts and pass favourable orders in the interest of the Maiyur people and their cattle.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

ENGLISH PAPERS OWNED BY INDIANS.

II.—Home Administration.

(d) Education.

1. In the first of a series of articles on this subject Justice, of the 5th October, observes:—"The present educational system in India has done grave social injustice to the large masses of the population of this country. It has denied them equal opportunities with others; it has smothered capacity; it has weaned men from the plough and the loom and enticed them away into the region of clerkships there to remain as unproductive consumers, and thus has injured the economic progress of the country very largely; it has perpetuated class tyranny; and it is making any rational system of political reconstruction impossible. The best interests of the people are being sacrificed at the altar of class selfishness. And the most depressing circumstance of all is that there is no immediate way out of the present state of educational misery."

Justice, Madras, Oct. 5th, 1917.

The social injustice of the Indian educational system.

(k) General.

2. United India and Native States, of the 27th September, has the following:—"No one who has noticed the high tension that characterised the feeling of the country during the period that Mrs. Besant and her associates in political work were under orders of internment and the marvellous outburst of enthusiasm that greeted the cancellation of these orders can fail to raise the question—where was the Indian Member of the Executive Council all along? . . . It is painfully clear that either in failing to rise to a proper sense of duty in protesting against the action of the Government or in totally misjudging the effect of the action, he has shown himself perilously incapable as an Indian Member of Government.

United India and Native States, Madras, Sep. 27th, 1917.

Mrs. Besant's release.

"We have, in making these observations, argued on purely a priori assumptions, but the public have a right to call for facts also in this connection. The raison d'etre of the creation of the office which is now being held by Diwan Bahadur Rajagopala Achariyar was and is that the Indian Member would be a truer guide of the aspirations and of the state of feeling of the Indian community. His is not merely an administrative place; on the other hand, it is a political appointment in the governing body. How has he shown his fitness for it in the events that have taken place? Did the Governor, as a matter of fact, consult him, or did he fail to do so? . . . If Lord Pentland consulted his Indian colleague, the public have a right to know, particularly in his case, what advice he tendered to a chief, who, with all his five years' stay, must be taken at best as a stranger to this country. . . Whatever the actual fact might be, the opinion of the public is that Diwan Bahadur Rajagopala Achariyar, far from counselling His Excellency to desist from the step, extended to it the weight of his support, which coming from an Indian the Governor should have valued more than it could have been intrinsically worth. The public go the length of believing that he is just one of those who would have assured the Governor that the entire Home Rule agitation could be scotched out of recognition if a few of the leaders could be interned. Their belief primarily rests on his Travancore policy—which, sad to say, succeeded for the time being in Travancore—and Mr. Rajagopala Achariyar has been aware how well it succeeded. . . It is an open secret in Madras that he called upon our most distinguished leader Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar as an emissary in the interests of the internment, that is the only way we can describe his position in this humiliating connection. He left the venerable presence crest-fallen and feeling, we suppose, somewhat enlightened for his enterprise. He had never before met with an obstacle which he could not overcome, but in this instance, he made an entirely erroneous calculation and found perhaps that the world did contain enlightened specimens of human nature of which he was not aware. These tactics are certainly not very reputable for anybody and least of all for one in the position of a member of Government, and much less for one in the position of a trustee member on behalf of his own countrymen. . . We are bound to say that Diwan Bahadur Rajagopala Achariyar has played his part too fully to continue with advantage in his office. He could have taken the tide at the crest and established a claim for popular respect and public admiration either by staying the hands of the Government or by dissociating himself from them at the time. He not only failed to do either, but went one better in an attempt to canvass for the success of the policy of repression. He has done this without cause and knowing that his is a place of singularly peculiar trust and responsibility. If he thinks he can continue in office, he must be told that it is a place won by popular agitation for public good that he is wrong in occupying it any longer and that the only way by which he can re-establish his claim for regard is by resigning it without delay."

Non-Brahman, Madras, Sep. 30th, 1917.

3. The following appears in the Non-Brahman of the 30th September:—

The dawn of Home Rule.

"The release of the interned, the apology of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, and the concluding speech of His Excellency the Viceroy have brought to Home Rulers the feeling that Home Rule is near. . . Lord Chelmsford stands arm in arm with Mrs. Besant: 'She has passed her word on to me that she will collaborate with me. And she has remarkable energies.' There is no use shutting our eyes to the change. Even Lord Pentland has slided away, leaving those whom he called out to shift for themselves, for does not His Excellency the Viceroy say that his relations with the local Government are good. . . That is the general feeling—one of discomfiture. The finger of scorn is as much against the Government as against us; it is more against us than against the Government. They have captured the Government and they have begun the attack on us, and a wing has succumbed. . . Let us not hide it from us that Mrs. Besant's Government has set in. But that she has passed her word on, and other influential people have also passed their word on, she might have snapped her finger at the Government. . . Since we have discovered that the best way to rouse John Bull is by agitation, we should be incapable, indeed, and fit only to be dragged by the Brahmans if we do not agitate. Boldly formulate our plans. Insist that for every appointment in any department only non-Brahmans shall be recruited until the proportion in the service between Brahman and non-Brahman is just. Take a census of qualified non-Brahmans and place it before the public, so that the Government may choose. We want official influence—and for official influence we want Nayudus and Mudaliyars and Pillais in places where we have Ayyars and Ayyangars and Sastris. Boldly formulate your demands—the boldest of our demands cannot be as rash as Home Rule. And invent a non-Brahman flag and strike out into processions and public meetings where we shall abuse Lord Pentland and the rest as incapable and worthless. Some one may intern us, but some one else will order our release, and we can pass our word on to keep a quiet atmosphere. Our duty is plain. Agitate."

Hindu, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

4. Writing on this subject the Hindu, of the 1st October, says:—"The reply given by the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent to the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah's question in the Imperial Legislative Council in regard to the internment of Mr. Muhammad Ali and Mr. Shaukat Ali has caused bitter disappointment among all classes of Indians throughout India, and as it is quite natural, our Muslim brethren feel the acutest discontent over the matter. . . From all that we can gather Muhammadan opinion in Madras seems fully to support the line of action taken by the two Muslim brothers and their mother, and much surprise is widely felt in Indian circles as to why adherence to their faith in Islam, by the interned, when they expressly undertake to eschew all recourse to unconstitutional and violent methods of agitation should disentitle them to the concession which the Viceroy promised to all those interned for political reasons in his opening speech at the last session.

The Moslem interned.

The West Coast Spectator, of the 2nd October, remarks:—"Elsewhere we publish a statement issued by the mother of Messrs. Mahomed Ali and Shaukat Ali which gives the reason why they are still detained. . . . We are afraid the way the Government have dealt with the two will not satisfy the public who very rightly demand that no difference should be made between Mrs. Besant and the two brothers. The circumstances of the case will lead the man in the street to the irresistible conclusion that Mrs. Besant was released because there were powerful forces behind her, and that the Government are unwilling to release the two gentlemen because their case is not powerfully backed up. We think that there will be a considerable rally to the side of the two patriots, and we have no doubt that the Government will yet see their way to consider their case."

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

5. New India, of the 2nd October, has the following:—

New India, Madras, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

"Sada's Suicide.

Deaths of internees.

"When will this slaughter of the innocents cease? Who can read the simple and, for that very reason, most pathetic letter of poor Sada without tears in his eyes? Those that tarnish the fair name of free Britain by such Russian (of a day that is past) methods—are they loyal or are we, who, being driven by our belief in the responsibility of a community for the Karma of the individual, agitate for saving the British nation from the dire effects of such slaughter—unintentional, undoubtedly—and risk the displeasure of the bureaucrats and its usual consequences of suspicion and persecution? Can any man in his senses pretend that, in the moral government of God, no one, as a matter of course, will be called to account for this loss of a budding life of great promise? . . . Does not that letter cry aloud to the four corners of the world that such merciless treatment of any spirited boy of highly-strung nerves must necessarily make him either a suicide or an anarchist? Does not this instance throw a lurid light on the manufacture of Bengali anarchists? If it is so harmful to the victim of the espionage, what a moral pest it must be to those that have to do the spying? Speaking purely from the standpoint of human nature, does not such espionage kill all humanity in them and create in the pursuer the hunter's callousness to the sufferings of the animal marked down by him for his shot?"

6. Justice, of the 5th October, writes:—"Mrs. Besant has been elected President of the next session of the Congress. With Mrs. Besant in the chair the next Congress will be a Home Rule Congress. Why should the Indian Home Rule Congress be presided over by an Irish lady? Could not the Indians who imagine that they are fit for Home Rule select one from among their number to guide the deliberations of the Congress in the very year in which the Secretary of State has been invited to frame a scheme of Home Rule for India? Is the election of Mrs. Besant to the presidential chair of the Congress one of the effective ways of demonstrating the capacity and fitness of Indians for Home Rule? . . . By electing Mrs. Besant, whose past we know so well, as President of the Congress, that institution has indeed lost its position. It will hereafter be regarded as a miscellaneous collection of emotional visionaries who have no place whatever in the region of practical politics."

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

Yatharthavachani, Kumbakōnam, July 27th, 1917.

7. The Yatharthavachani, of the 27th July, writes:—Germany has not been defeated nor has she admitted that there is room for her being defeated. She is zealously carrying on her fight with the allies in the different theatres. Under these circumstances it may appear strange that there should be a talk of peace in the German Parliament. The motive of the Kaiser in mentioning about peace is only to impress upon his subjects that he is ready to conclude it and that he is forced to continue the war, because the allies would not come to reasonable terms. He promises the grant of all privileges demanded by his subjects. Wonderful indeed! He is a monster of monsters. He flies in the air, steers a ship under the water, destroys enemy ships in 5 minutes, annihilates the army of the enemies by the use of poisonous gases, ferrets out the most secret information by means of spies and gains over every individual to his side by means of money. How can he be an ordinary individual?

The war.

The same paper reports the Zodiac to have predicted that the sound of cannon would not be heard in the field of war after October next, that permanent peace would be concluded only six months thereafter, that the Kaiser would run away to South America in a submarine and that Little Willie would remain demented by the dream of a world-empire until 1931, when he would meet with a most ignominious death.

Nagai Nilalochani, Negapatam, July 2nd, 1917.

With reference to the severity of the war in the western front, the Nagai Nilalochani, of the 2nd July, writes:—The war has been vigorously carried on for the last one month and a look at the British casualty list will prove the truth of this statement. Yet it must be said that the allies have met with success. In the eastern theatre the war is not so vehement. It is sated, however, that the Germans are transporting armies in very large numbers by land and sea with the object of capturing Petrograd. If, at this critical juncture when France and Russia are in a tottering condition, the American Government send all their forces and render assistance to the allies, it may be thought that the war would soon come to an end. But there is no reason for expecting this. It will be enough if at least an attempt is made to suppress the atrocities caused by the submarines, but there is not sufficient ground for expecting even this help in the near future. It may, however, be inferred that the English and French officers, who had gone to America with several objects in view, have impressed upon the Government of the United States the importance of their co-operation in the matter.

The war.

Janamukulan, Tanjore, Aug. 15th, 1917.

The Janamukulan, of the 15th August, in summarising the progress of the war, says that, while the British have captured the villages attached to St. Julian and the places to the south of Haulafksy and the Russians have captured Czernowitz and some other places, Warda and fourteen other places have fallen into the hands of the enemy.

The war.

Sampad Abhyudaya, Mysore, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 29th September, purporting to accuse the Madras Mail of being inconsistent and pessimistic in a recent review of the war, proceeds to remark that the truth of the situation lies in the fact that Germany succeeded only at the outset; because she has been equipping herself for war for the past forty years, while the Allies were indifferent, that the moment the British entered the field they checked the German onslaught, that the enemy has conquered no territory during the last two years, that the Germans, like the atheists, had trusted wholly to the power of science, that the end which awaits them can alone bring home to their minds the truth which can be learnt from history that every tyrant who hoped to conquer the world has had a fall, that the history of Egypt, Babylon, and of the ruins of Hampé pointing to the greatness of the Vijayanagar kingdom at one time all prove the same truth, that those who have unjustly begun the war and are causing this enormous devastation, bloodshed and misery, despite their temporary success, can never give any serious cause for anxiety, that recent events all go to show that the Allies will triumph in the end, and that when the Allies, as is so well known, are fighting in a just cause, and in humanitarian interests giving all possible succour even to the enemy subjects in distress, only atheistic persons can fear of any reverse.

8. The Ravi, of the 27th September, says:—A Copenhagen telegram announces that the Germans have introduced submarines of 1,500 tons, 340 feet in length, that they will hold 50 men, 40 torpedoes, and many shells and mines, and that they will place the mines in the Atlantic, and, if possible, on the British Coast.

The German submarines.

Ravi, Cocanada, Sep. 27th, 1917.

9. The Kistnapatrika, of the 29th September, has the following under this heading:—On the 25th of this month, German aeroplanes endeavoured to raid the eastern coast of England and London and caused some loss. But the loss has not been great. . . So far as we know, there were 15 deaths. Seventy persons were wounded. On the whole the lost is very little.

Kistnapatrika, Masulipatam, Sep. 29th, 1917.

10. Referring to the despatch of lunatics to the front by Germany, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 26th September, writes:—This is evidently a sign of Germany's military and other difficulties, which are increasing day by day, and of her present madness.

Despatch of lunatics to the front by Germany.

Kerala Sanchari, Calicut, Sep. 26th, 1917.

II.—Home Administration.

(a) Police.

11. In commenting favourably on the police administration report for the year 1916-17, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 3rd October, notes with satisfaction the decrease in the number of grave crimes in South Malabar as well as in the other parts of the Presidency, and the order relating to the granting of "compensation leave" to police officers, points out that more care should be bestowed on the selection of competent persons for the posts of constables, and that their salaries should be sufficiently attractive, hopes that, when the question of "direct recruitment" of head constables, and of some of them being promoted as Sub-Inspectors, is taken up for consideration, the claims of capable and experienced head constables, now in service, to such promotions will also receive the attention of the Government; and observes that, if the powers granted to the police under section 324 of the Indian Penal Code are to be increased, as suggested by the Inspector-General, the authorities ought to see that such powers are not abused by them, so as to be a source of hardship to the poor innocent people.

The Madras police.

Kerala Sanchari, Calicut, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

(b) Courts.

12. The Yatharthavachani, of the 12th August, disapproves of the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. V. K. Ramanuja Achariyar in the local Legislative Council, that appeals against the decisions of District Munsifs should be presented in the sub-courts, instead of in the District Courts, as is done now, on the grounds that the proposed system would lead to great inconveniences while minimising the work of the District Courts very much and that, as Sub-Judges and District Munsifs usually move with each other freely, it may also lead to miscarriage of justice. This paper is of opinion that it will be better to insist on original suits filed in Sub-Courts being disposed of finally by the same courts and that, instead of conferring the final appellate jurisdiction on sub-courts, the better course would be to prevent original suits being transferred from sub-courts and to abolish the temporary courts or to transfer such suits as have to be transferred from District Courts to temporary sub-courts. It also suggests that the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Oldfield may be consulted in regard to any reform to be introduced in this matter.

Yatharthavachani, Kumbakonam, Aug. 12th, 1917.

YATHARTHAVACHANI, Kumbakōnam, July 27th, 1917.

Indian History in schools.

13. The Yatharthavachani, of the 27th July, complains that Indian History has been relegated to the background while English History has come to occupy a prominent place in the curricula of studies, ever since the School Final and Intermediate examinations came into being, and remarks that it is not desirable that students should go through their educational course without having any idea of the history of their country.

YATHARTHAVACHANI, Kumbakōnam, July 27th, 1917.

The Rajkumar College, Madras.

14. The Yatharthavachani, of the 27th July, writes on this subject in almost the same strain as the Hindu Nesan and Swadesamitran of the 25th July, the comments of which are abstracted in paragraph 26 of Report No. 31 of 1917.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

Simultaneous examinations.

15. The Dravidan, of the 25th September, while approving of the principle underlying the demand of the Indians that the Civil Service Examination should be held simultaneously in England and India, and remarking that there need be no fear of a large number of Indians getting through the examination if it is so held, observes, however, that the present system may be continued until the time when there will be qualified persons in every community in India to compete for this examination, so that any one class may not preponderate in the Civil Service.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 26th, 1917.

The Palghat College muddle.

16. The Hindu Nesan, of the 26th September, writes:—Troubles in colleges have of late become frequent. The Principals of Colleges, not realising how and when to exercise the powers entrusted to them, treat the students, who pay for their education, worse than slaves, and the students suffer unable to put up with this treatment. The recent disturbance in the Victoria College, Palghat, can be quoted as an instance. If Mr. Shankunni, the Principal of this College, had been a little patient, there would have been no trouble. He turned out three students of the Intermediate class for having gone with a procession. His action would have been justifiable, if he had issued a notice beforehand that the students should not join the procession, and the latter had disobeyed his orders. For the fault of one of them having demanded a written order, he seems to have been asked to be shoved out. Unable to bear this insult, the students of the higher classes of the college have stopped going to the college. A public meeting, which was to have been convened in Palghat to discuss the situation, stands adjourned on the offer of the Sub-Collector to interfere and set matters right. The Principal will do well to act upon the advice of the Sub-Collector and evince some sympathy with the students.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 26th, 1917.

The Palghat College muddle.

The Swadesamitran, of the 26th September, reproduces in Tamil a telegraphic communication on this subject as it appears in the Hindu of the same date.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 28th, 1917.

The Palghat College.

The Swadesamitran, of the 28th September, narrates the events that have led to the present impasse at Palghat and observes:—If the Principal took exception to his students having followed a procession, he could well have followed the precedent set up by Mr. Statham of the Kumbakōnam College, who, understanding that his students had followed a procession, admonished them not to do so and refrained from punishing them for the first mistake. In a letter to the Hindu, Mr. Shankunni says that every statement that has appeared in the press about this incident is false. Which is false—his having expelled some students, or their having demanded a written order, or the Police having been sent for, or their having arrested a boy, or the students having walked out unable to bear the insult, or the Principal having notified that the students would be readmitted only if they paid the fine imposed and tendered an apology? Granting that the students committed a mistake, is it not the duty of the Principal to control them? Why should the Police come in? Is not the fact of calling in the Police by itself an admission on his part of his incapability to manage the students, which is the first duty of the Principal? The Principal has no doubt immense powers. But his skill consists in discharging his duties without exercising these powers. If the students are treated with some sympathy, they will do anything for the Principal.

The Swadesamitran, of the 1st October, reports, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a meeting of the students of Salem held on the 25th September 1917, to protest against the action of the Principal of the Victoria College, Palghat, and to sympathise with the students that have been expelled from the college. These proceedings appear in English in the Hindu of the 28th September 1917.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

The Palghat College.

The Swadesamitran, of the 27th September, writes:—A telegram has been received that the condition of the Palghat College gives room for great anxiety. Everyone does not appear to possess the tact to manage the students properly by evincing sympathy for their feelings. With a little skill the Principal could have brought them round. But we are led to believe that he has from the very beginning borne an hostile attitude towards them and acted like the old pedagogues who ruled with the rod. We trust that, hereafter at least, he will send for the students and remove this pitiable condition.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 27th, 1917.

The Palghat College.

Adverting to the refusal of the Director of Public Instruction, Madras, to interview the members of the committee appointed to represent to the authorities the grievances of the students of this college and seek a redress, the Swadesamitran, of the 29th September, writes:—The Director said that he was willing to hear the students and insisted upon hearing them alone, although he was told several times that they felt nervous to speak with him. He declined to interview the members of the committee, who were appointed at a public meeting of the leading citizens of the town and the parents and the guardians of the students. Is it not, therefore, strange that the Director should have refused to speak with the members of such a committee? While it is stated that G.O. No. 559 was issued in pursuance of the wish of the parents, we are at a loss to know what explanation the Director will offer for his refusal to interview the members of a committee appointed by these parents. What for did he go to Palghat? Did he go there merely to say that he would not interview the members of this committee, or with the object of learning the true state of affairs and bringing about a reconciliation?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The Palghat College.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 2nd October, expresses its regret at the Director of Public Instruction, who was at Palghat, having refused to receive a deputation of the parents and guardians of the boys affected by the recent action of the Principal, and hopes that the Syndicate at least will show some compassion to these students and dispose of the memorial submitted by the parents and guardians in a sympathetic spirit. It adds that there can be no difficulty whatever in restoring friendly relations between an Indian Principal and his Indian students, and observes that if the Principal of this College had himself been a little patient, the trouble would not have assumed such serious proportions and that, even subsequently the matter could have been squared up easily, if the Municipal Chairman of Palghat had evinced some interest in this affair.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

The Palghat Victoria College incident.

Referring to the Palghat Victoria College incident, the Manorama, of the 28th September, points out that, be the cause of the disturbance what it might, the Principal was wrong in calling in the assistance of the Police to expel the students from the college, whose guardians it was that he should have informed of the matter, and questions the fitness of such a person to be a teacher.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Sep. 28th, 1917.

Students and politics.

17. A correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 25th September, reports that the students of the colleges in Trichinopoly met together at Chinnayya Pillai's Choultry on the 20th idem and took a vow not to abide by G.O. No. 559, which prohibits students from taking part in politics.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

In the course of the proceedings of a public meeting held at Madura on the 18th September to condemn Sir Michael O'Dwyer's recent speech in the Imperial Legislative Council, published, from the pen of a correspondent, in the Dravidan of the 25th idem, it is reported that 98 per cent of those present at the meeting and the procession which followed were Brahman vakils and students.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakottai, Sep. 24th, 1917.

Students and politics.

The Vaisyamitran, of the 24th September, reports that the Educational authorities at Guntūr had arranged for the suspension of about 256 college and 150 high school students, who are said to have attended the meeting convened at the place to protest against G.O. No. 559, which prohibits students from taking part in politics, that the Principal of the College has suspended the college students, that, in consequence, 600 students have refrained from attending the college from the 11th idem, and that some of the leading citizens of the place are trying to restore order in consultation with the Educational authorities.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Sep. 13th, 1917.

The present system of education.

18. In the course of an article under the heading "Our educational position", the Vartakamitran, of the 13th September, observes:—The education imparted in our schools and colleges is not fit to inculcate true knowledge to our students. The fact that the amount of money spent on education for each individual is Rs. 7½ in the case of the Englishman and 1 anna in the case of the Indian indicates clearly the efficiency of education in India. So if we desire sincerely to improve the condition of our industries and trade as the westerns have done, the present system of education should be thoroughly changed. The vernaculars should be the first language and the medium of instruction generally. Steps should be taken to impart instruction in our history and the industries that can be carried on in this country. If, for learning industries, one has to read four or five years after finishing a course of fifteen to twenty years for getting proficiency in the English language, one is past the age of study and does not find it feasible. So if our youths are to have sound industrial education, instruction on such subjects as industries, agriculture, chemistry, etc., should also be begun to be imparted in the vernaculars along with the general education, as soon as primary education is completed. The general rules for handling machinery of different kinds as well as those about agriculture should be learnt by students in the course of their secondary education. A student beginning his university career should start with the work of research regarding different industrial processes and be in a position to suggest reforms in their working. Unless our system of education is changed on these lines, our industries cannot improve.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakōttai, Sep. 24th, 1917.

National dress.

19. The Vaisyamitran, of the 24th September, reports that much discontent prevails at Calicut on account of the Principal of the Zamorin's College having expelled all the students of the college who attended in their national dress and threatened to close the college unless they apologised before the next day, and traces these trouble to the action of the Principal in having suspended a student belonging to the Zamorin's family for two weeks, on account of his having attended the college without wearing a neck-tie.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakōtai, Sep. 24th, 1917.

Condition of teachers.

20. The Vaisyamitran, of the 24th September, writes:—The first thing to be attended to in securing the progress of education is the improvement of the condition of the teachers. Though steps have been taken recently to increase the salaries of the teachers, there is room to think that this may not benefit the teachers much, considering the present high scale of prices. It is really pitiable that the salary of the teacher in elementary schools is not equal even to the wages of the coolie. As we learn that the Government are now prepared to incur greater expenditure to promote education, we trust that a major portion of this money will be utilized in raising the salaries of the teachers. Permission to appear for University examinations in private should also be given to teachers after some years of experience, if they are capable of handling the higher classes. If the Educational authorities improve the present condition of the teachers, many will doubtless take to this profession with enthusiasm.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 27th, 1917.

Elementary education.

21. Adverting to a resolution which is said to be on the agenda for the meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council on the 25th and 26th September 1917, that sanction should not be accorded by Government for enacting any laws and regulations relating to local self-government and free primary education and that orders should be issued to defer giving effect to any recommendations already made to Provincial Governments regarding these laws, until a definite scheme is prepared of the reforms to be introduced after the war, a correspondent, of the Dravidan of the 27th September, writes:—If such a resolution is to be brought before the Council it should meet with a strong opposition, as it is tantamount to disregarding the benefits which are expected from Government. While the country is anxiously expecting the introduction of free education to obstruct it will cause a great loss to the illiterate non-Brahmans. The Hon'ble Mr. B. N. Sarma, who is desirous of moving this resolution, is a Brahman and the Brahmans as a class are fully educated and do not need free education, while the non-Brahmans require it at once.

22. The Desamata, of the 26th September, writes under this heading as follows:—Anyone who looks into the endeavours made in India towards education would certainly be discouraged. . . From these figures it will be clear that there is not one school for every village. . .

Progress of education.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Sep. 26th, 1917.

The above returns are not at all encouraging. . . It will not do if 11 crores and 11 lakhs only are expended in our country for education. This amount is spent in London itself for the education of her children. . . They (the Government) say that a large majority in India is uneducated and that only the educated few ask for self-government, but they do not show much interest to spread education widely. Who are responsible for the masses not being given the education, the lack of which has been pointed out as the excuse for not granting self-government? . . .

How can education spread in our country if the encouragement shown to private institutions by the Government is so meagre? If these institutions should thus disappear whose mistake is this? Unless proper encouragement is given to these institutions started by large-hearted people and interest is evinced in the matter of education, the progress of education will be slow as it is now. If this progress should be in the same condition, the people cannot but think that swaraj is necessary to improve matters, educational.

23. Adverting to the conduct of the Principal of this College in demanding an unconditional apology from the students, who met together on the 9th September 1917 at the residence of Mr. C. V. Venkataramana Ayyangar, to pray for the repeal of G.O. No. 559, which prohibits students from taking part in politics, a correspondent of the Hindu Nesan, of the 1st October, observes that it is most regrettable that the Principal should cause affliction to the students in this manner, when they have done nothing in contravention of the order.

The Hindu College, Coimbatore.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

24. The Andhraprakasika, of the 2nd October, remarks, upon this subject, as follows:—Why should not the wealthy and educated Brahmans help their brother-Brahmans, the Sourashtras? It is not proper that the Government should still try to help these educated classes alone. All people know that, of the Government revenue, 90 per cent is received in the shape of taxes from the non-Brahmans. Need it be said how many non-Brahmans could be educated if fifty thousands should be expended? How many new factories can be started and how many non-Brahmans could make their livelihood by working in those factories? We wish that the Government will kindly consider this a little.

The Sourashta High School.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

25. The Andhraprakasika, of the 28th September, in an article under this heading, observes:—. . . In the time of Lord Lansowne, the age of children working in the factories was raised from 7 to 9. But children below this age may be seen working in most factories. It is well and good that Factory Inspectors should find out such children and send them to municipal schools. . . Further in some places, these labourers are made to work for eight hours, forenoon from 8-30 to 12-30 and afternoon from 1-30 to 5-30. . . Therefore if the Government should pass orders that boys below 12 years and girls below 9 should not be employed on any work and that they should be sent to school, the Government would earn the gratitude of the people.

Juvenile labourers and elementary education.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 28th, 1917.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

Private schools.

26. Referring to the decrease in the number of private schools in India since 1912, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 3rd October, dwells upon the necessity of such schools being given every help and encouragement by the Government, as the existing public schools cannot meet the present needs, even if some of them do not satisfy the requirements of the educational code, thinks that there would be a large increase in the number of elementary schools, if the rules regarding buildings, etc., be somewhat relaxed, and that the present rule which allows the levying of fees in all classes in the elementary schools, the moment the fourth standard is introduced, become an obstacle in the way of primary education, and observes that the people will derive the maximum good from elementary schools, maintained by the boards, only if a law is passed that no fees should be levied in any of these institutions.

(e) Local and Municipal.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

The Corporation of Madras.

27. The Dravidan, of the 25th September, writes:—Under section 192 of the Madras City Municipal Act, it is an important function of the Corporation to provide the city with a wholesome water-supply, and it is a great slur on the President of the Corporation if he is not paying proper attention to this matter. It is the first duty of the Commissioners to remedy this state of affairs. It is a great blunder to use pipe-water for big gardens and streets, when it is not available for drinking purposes.

There is another matter also which is worth the consideration of the Commissioners. As the Corporation office does not properly prepare the list of qualified voters and of persons qualified to stand for election as Commissioners, election affairs have frequently to go to a court of law. If, through lack of proper attention, the name of an unqualified person is once included in these lists, the President has no power to remove the name therefrom, and this view has been upheld by the High Court in a recent decision. We must, therefore, trust that Mr. Molony will, hereafter at least, realise that it is essential that these lists should be properly and correctly prepared, and take the necessary steps in this direction without any delay.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 23th, 1917.

Trichinopoly Municipality.

28. Adverting to a resolution proposed to be submitted to the Government by the Ratepayers' Association in Trichinopoly praying for the nomination of an Honorary Chairman in the place of the present chairman, who is to resign his office, a correspondent of the Hindu Nesan, of the 28th Sepetmber, observes that the Government will do well to consider the resolution favourably, as the nomination of an Honorary Chairman would not only cause satisfaction to the people but would also be advantageous to the municipality from a financial point of view.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

Taluk board election.

29. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 2nd October, writes that despite the strenuous efforts of the Brahmans and Brahman officials, the Brahman candidate for a membership in the Taluk Board, Madhavaram firka, lost the place.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 28th, 1917.

Location of a toddy shop.

31. The Dravidan, of the 28th September, publishes an appeal to the Government signed by the Panchamas residing in the Elephant Gate Paracheri in Park Town, Madras, praying for the removal of the toddy shop No. 104, which is located in the centre of the Paracheri, as great inconvenience is caused to their women and children by the indecent behaviour of the people, who resort to this shop for drinking. The memorialists state that an inspection of the locality by the Collector of Madras or any non-Brahman Government officials will convince them of the hardships caused to the residents by this toddy shop, and that the location of the shop in the midst of the Paracheri is one of the several acts of injustice done to them by the Brahman officials of Government.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

Excise Advisory Committees.

32. The Swadesamitran, of the 2nd October, writes:—Though the Government are aware that the increase in the volume of trade in liquor and other narcotics tells upon the morale and physique of the people, they are not inclined to do away with this trade altogether. This may be due either to the large income derived by the Government from this means or to their idea that every man has got a right to drink. Nevertheless, they are now prepared to reduce the volume of this trade, and the question is how to do it. It is the opinion of experienced people that the quantity of narcotics consumed will be reduced, if they are not easily available to the people and, applying this principle to the case of liquor, the best course to reduce its consumption seems to be to make the consumer go in search of a liquor shop instead of its being on his way and attracting him. This necessitates the determination of the places where liquor shops should be situated and where they should not be and the best parties to determine this will be the non-officials having an experience of each locality. But the Government have instituted a scheme for this purpose in which the District or Division Collector, the District Superintendent of Police or his Assistant and the Municipal Chairman will form an Advisory Board in towns, and the Tahsildar, the Inspector of Police and the Union Chairman will form a similar board in unions. There were no boards whatever for villages. As under this scheme, the Advisory Boards had two officials against one non-official, Sir Herbert Roberts presented a petition to the Secretary of State for India stating that these Boards should be constituted in such a manner as to voice the non-official opinion in each locality and that no liquor shops should be opened without these boards being consulted. This petition was in due course sent to the Government of India who forwarded it to Local Governments. According to the revised scheme drawn up by the Madras Government now, three more individuals are added to the boards in municipal towns, one of whom is the Inspector of Salt and the other two popular representatives. Thus the number of officials and non-officials on this board is equally divided, and when there is a difference of opinion, the Collector has a casting vote. So, the Government majority is maintained from the Legislative Council down to the Advisory Boards for determining the location of liquor shop! Are so many safeguards necessary for these boards, even at a stage when their opinion cannot bind the officials? Why should the Collector and the Superintendent of Police be on these boards? The Collector has always an eye upon taxes and he can never divest himself of this function of his. Every one will be afraid to oppose the Superintendent of Police and other Police officials. What local knowledge can these have? If the real object is to curtail the consumption of liquor, the constitution of the Advisory Boards should never be this. As the liquor shops are a source of danger to the people and one of profit to the Government, the Government officials should have no concern in determining the location of these shops.

Yatharthavachani, Kumbakonam, July 5th, 1917.

The present situation.

33. In the course of a leader dwelling on the Home Rule agitation and the internment of Mrs. Besant and her colleagues, the Yatharthavachani, of the 5th July, makes the following observations:—We have often stated that, before India seeks to obtain Home Rule, her industries and trade should improve ten-fold. Should we not, therefore, devise means for improving our industries and trade? The fact that we are not able to manage our own temples is proof positive that our leaders are not yet fit to conduct the affairs of the community properly. If we desire for political progress, the first thing we should do is to improve industrial institutions. How can India have Home Rule when she has neither an army nor a navy in proportion to her extent? Those who talk of Home Rule should be expert statesmen. But there are none in our Presidency.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The Dravidan, of the 29th September, says that the non-official Europeans in India and the Anglo-Indians unanimously complain that it is wrong on the part of Lord Chelmsford to have released Mrs. Besant from internment unconditionally, that this step lowers the prestige of the Local Government and that Mr. Montagu, who has agreed to it, is unfit to hold the office of the Secretary of State for India.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 28th, 1917.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 28th September, gives a gist of the proceedings of the meeting held at Bhatlapenumurru, Kistna district, on the occasion of the release of Mrs. Besant and others advocating the release of Mahomed 'Ali and Shaukat 'Ali and the rescinding of G.O. No. 559, repudiating the telegram of Rao Bahadur Tyagaraya Chetti, and approving of the Home Rule movement.

Mrs. Besant's release.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 1st October, contains some Telugu verses from the pen of a poet, one of which, rendered in English, reads as follows:—While the rulers of the Madras Presidency are sorry that their false statesmanship can no longer prevail, while the Anglo-Indians are pining in their hearts; because their songs have all failed, while cheats are very sorry that their words have failed, and while the Indian leaders are glad that their words have now been fulfilled, Mrs. Besant has by your grace, O goddess Kameswari, attained freedom.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Sep. 28th, 1917.

Referring to the demonstrations of joy at Coimbatore on the release of Mrs. Besant and on her arrival at Madras, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 28th September, in a leading article reiterates its admiration for Mrs. Besant which it expressed in previous issues and concludes the article as follows:—The release of these patriots has doubtless served to strengthen the foundation of British rule in India for all time. First in the order of merit for the success of these efforts stands Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar. The advocates of Home Rule among the Indians stand second. Next comes Mr. Montagu; next the British Cabinet; next the British public and next to them the Government of India. We tender them all our best wishes. We pray that Mrs. Besant may live to rejoice that the different classes have all combined to form one united nation and obtained the type of democratic (Home) Rule which obtains among the British public.

The release of Mrs. Besant.

MYSORE STAR, Mysore, Sep. 30th, 1917.

Writing on the same subject, the Mysore Star, of the 30th September, observes:—Mrs. Besant is said to have wired to her followers in Madras that her release was unconditional. But it was not easy to believe that the Government of India will have acted inconsistently with their own statement a fortnight ago that she would be released only on condition that she would refrain from all violent agitation. The replies to the interpellation at the subsequent session of the Council, however, removes all doubts on the subject. For, we learn from Sir William Vincent that Mrs. Besant had wired to His Excellency the Viceroy that she would help to produce calmness in the political atmosphere at the time of Mr. Montagu's visit and that some of the responsible popular leaders had also given a similar undertaking. It is thus evident that the Government of India have not acted inconsistently with their own statement. Mrs. Besant in her first editorial in New India after her release reveals her intention to adhere to that promise and again, addressing the students, she exhorts them to refrain from politics. This attitude of Mrs. Besant fully bears out the Government's announcement in the Council. It is thus clear that the Government have displayed their magnanimity in order to put an end to all agitation and in doing this they have relied on the loyalty, good faith and high mindedness of the popular leaders, as also on the assurances given by them. It is the duty of every Indian to justisfy the trust reposed in them and earn the benefits which such faithfulness merits. It is regrettable, however, that Mr. Arundale in his reply to an address at Coimbatore on his release said that the struggle had only just begun and that their propaganda under the leadership of Mrs. Besant should be carried on as vigorously as ever, and thereby seemed to incite the people to further extremism. Such a policy is hardly expedient at the present juncture. When the Honourable the Secretary of State is coming to India with the noble object of ascertaining the wants and wishes of the people from the representatives of Indians themselves, it would be nothing short of suicidal action to indulge in violent methods such as boisterous meetings, passive resistance and the like. Not only will it belie the expectations of the Government of India and lead to the loss of their sympathy but add fresh strength and volume to Anglo-Indian harpings and seal our fate. It therefore behoves every Indian to do everything in his power to help the political tranquility of the country.

Mrs. Besant.

The Kerala Sanchari, of the 26th September, points out that the 16th of July (? June) and the 17th of September 1917 will be memorable days in the annals of India—the one, as causing considerable indignation and pain to her, and the other, far greater pleasure and consolation—congratulates His Excellency the Viceroy on the release of Mrs. Besant and others from internment, which speaks much for British justice and mercy, and which is a matter for pride to all who endeavoured to bring it about, hopes that Mrs. Besant and her party will work more strenuously than ever for the attainment of self-government which is indispensable for the future welfare of India, and that the Government will be graciously pleased to do the needful in the matter, deplores the hostile attitude of the Anglo-Indians and their papers to the just and reasonable claims of Indians which, as enlightened, justice-loving and freedom-loving Englishmen, they ought to support, instead of opposing as they now do, and concludes by observing that whether Mrs. Besant was interned because of her advocacy of self-government for India or because of her methods being violent and unconstitutional, the internment in any case has been a blessing in disguise, as it has tended to augment more than ever the desire of Indians for self-government and their activities in this direction which have hitherto been lying dormant.

Mrs. Besant and others.

35. * While expressing joy at the release of Mrs. Besant and others from internment, the Kerala Patrika, of the 22nd September, points out that, if they had been interned with a view to suppress the "Home Rule" agitation, the step taken has defeated its own purpose, as it has only tended to increase it considerably, and deplores the attitude of the Madras Mail in the matter.

KERALA PATRIKA, Calicut, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

Messrs. Arundale and Wadia at Coimbatore.

36. The Dravidan, of the 26th September, reports Mr. Arundale to have stated at Coimbatore that he was bound to feel grateful to the Indian people for his release, for it was their agitation on his behalf and not the Government that was responsible for his release and that the struggle for liberty had just been begun.

It also roports Mr. Wadia to have observed that the three great occasions on which the prestige of the administrative heads in India was brought down were, the introduction of the Ilbert Bill, about the age of consent, the modification of the settled fact of the partition of Bengal, and the confusion that arose in Mesopotamia.

patriots in internment, which appear in the Hindu of the 26th idem, and observes:—The large attendance at the meeting is an indication of the readiness of the Muhammadans of Southern India to undertake political work with a new activity. We need not say that the delay of the Government in releasing Messrs. Muhammad Ali and others in internment is causing much pain to every one. We trust that these will be released very soon. The Government should release at least hereafter that the Muhammadan leaders in internment command the highest respect of all Indian Muhammadans, and move in the matter of remedying this state of affairs, so as to remove a cause of affliction to the Indians and secure the peace of the country and the affection of the people.

38. Referring to a statement said to have been made by the president of a meeting of shareholders of a company started in Great Britain to increase the cultivation of beet-root for the purpose of its being converted into sugar, that the reason why capitalists hesitated to invest their money in that company was the fact that the sugar manufactured by it might not successfully compete with the cheap sugar imported from foreign countries, the Swadesamitran, of the 26th September, says:—If the capitalists of Great Britain, who are well off, both in the matter of wealth and industrial progress, hesitate to invest money in an industry for fear of foreign competition, we need not say much about the Indians who are in a very poor condition in both the respects. This company has obtained a loan of £125,000 from the British Government. So it is for the Government to ponder over the support and protection that they should accord, if India is really to improve industrially.

39. The Vartakamitran, of the 16th August, observes:—As the levying of the super-tax is likely to affect the English banks and English industries, the Finance Member is advised to remove this tax and to impose a tax on the Indians in some other ways appropriately. While there is already a loud cry that taxes are heavy in India, they are being increased from time to time. The Indian pays 22 per cent of his income as tax, while in England the people pay only 8·5 per cent. It is but natural that one should be surprised at the recommendation made by gentlemen who, though in receipt of an income of Rs. 10,000 a year, find it hard to pay a tax at the rate of 1 anna per rupee of their income. These should indeed be called champions of self-interest.

40. The Vartakamitran, of the 30th August, reports that rumours are afloat about troops from Japan proceeding to the Russian front, and observes that, if this happens to be true, the trade between India and Japan will be affected as many of the Japanese steamers will then be utilised for military purposes, and it will be hard to find any for carrying goods from India.

41. Dwelling on the several advantages accruing to the merchants by such institutions as Chambers of Commerce, the Vartakamitran, of the 30th August, refers to the privilege enjoyed by the two European institutions in Madras, known as the Madras Chamber of Commerce and the Madras Trades Association, to elect their own representatives to the local Legislative Councils, and observes:—Besides these two institutions, there is one conducted by Indian merchants under the name of the South Indian Chamber of Commerce. This institution has not been given the privilege enjoyed by the other two institutions. . . . Has any merchant taken the trouble to note the difference in the facilities afforded to Indian merchants and to European merchants by the firms which conduct banking business with the money they get from the Government of Madras at a low rate of interest? Why have not the Indian merchants, who have realised the difference in the treatment accorded to them and to European merchants by the Railway Companies considered the reason for this difference?

Chambers of Commerce.

42. Referring to this exhibition proposed to be held in December this year, the Vartakamitran, of the 30th August, observes :—

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Aug. 30th, 1917.

The Madras Exhibition of Indian Arts and Industries.

The programme of the exhibition as published indicates that it will prove to be very instructive to the agriculturists, artizans and other classes of people in our country. But there will be no use of conducting it as it was done in 1915, when it was no more than a show of articles, as is seen in the Hindu homes during Dasarrah, and no facilities were afforded to the visitors to understand the processes of manufacturing these articles. So arrangements should be made at least in this exhibition to have, by the side of each exhibit, a written record of how it is produced and used, where it is available and the difference between its manufacture here and in foreign countries. There should also be an individual, who has a thorough knowledge of the exhibit, to clear the doubts of the people about it.

The same paper, of the 13th September, continues its comments on this subject as follows :—Of the numerous visitors to this exhibition in 1915, not even 5 per cent are known to have been benefited by what they saw therein. The show rooms were too narrow to allow people to stay and examine the articles leisurely and the articles themselves were not arranged in an order, so as to attract the attention of the people. There were many things which could be understood only by English-knowing people. It would have been very advantageous, if these had been translated into the vernaculars of this Presidency ; for an exhibition is intended more to improve the knowledge of the workman than to serve as a show for the English-educated people. The lectures delivered in the exhibition compound would have proved useful to the agriculturists, if they had been delivered in the open air and in the vernaculars. If all these defects are avoided by the exhibition committee this year, we believe the exhibition will help people in understanding things and improving their condition. Besides this, the main object of the exhibition of 1915 was the collection of money for the War Fund and industrial improvement was only a secondary motive. Though the Government want to improve the industries of this country, the people stand aloof. If the industries of the country are to improve, both the Government and the people should co-operate in the matter and the former should also help Indians with money and the advice of industrial experts. Otherwise, Indian industries will, doubtless, pass into the hands of the foreigners. Unlike other countries, India contains within herself all the natural products required for her. If all these products are utilised here alone and converted into manufactured articles, India can become the foremost country in the world in industries and trade.

43. Adverting to the constitution of the Imperial Resources Development Committee in England and its decision to commence its work of taking over some of the industries carried on in countries subject to Great Britain and managing them so as to help the Government in clearing the large amount of debt incurred by them, the Vartakamitran, of the 6th September, says :—It appears that this committee will begin its work in India and Ceylon, as the presence of black people here would make its work easy. When the westerns are making such arrangements, we do not think it is possible for us to think of improving the economic condition of our country. India has to pay four crores of rupees as interest on the loan raised for the war. When the payment of this interest will by itself be a hard task for us in the present condition, how can we improve our industries? There is no nation in the world poorer than ourselves, and yet the burden on our economic resources is being increased to an inordinate extent. It is stated that all the efforts made by the Englishman are for the purpose of improving the economic resources of India. In the olden days the East India Company obtained a charter from Parliament and, coming to India for purposes of trade, took over the Government. Similarly as the present Economic Resources Development Company has also taken its charter to do business in India, the Government of India should render all possible assistance to it. The first Chartered Company came here for purposes of trade and took over the Government in order to improve the trade. The present Chartered Company offers to introduce the necessary reforms for wresting even our trade from us and improve our economic condition. The sympathy of these people resembles the tears of the jackal at the site of a corpse. In ancient times, several races invaded our country and robbed us of our wealth. How is it, then, that we, who were in such an opulent condition, have become reduced now? The answer is that, instead of paying one-sixth of the produce to the King, we pay half the produce on all ryotwari lands. But in the Nilgiris district where the European planters live, it has been proposed to reduce the assessment slightly and keep it at the same level for twenty years to come. Even the interpretation of law becomes different in the case of the Indians. This is the case with agriculture. Coming to trade, we have to send our raw products to western countries and get manufactured articles therefrom. If we demand protection for our industries, we are told that the Indians are lacking experience in the sciences and the handling of machinery and that they would do well to continue as agriculturists and send their raw products to England and other allied countries. If we ask why industrial education is not given to us as is done in the western countries, we are told that the people have no interest in learning it. When there are several gentlemen in England, who are thus attending to our advancement by throwing obstacles in our way in every respect, what is the use of our complaining still? We should look to our wants only ourselves. Unless education is spread among our ryots and artizans so as to make them understand their present condition and move in the matter of improving it, it will be hard for us to raise ourselves.

Mr. George Joseph, who presided over the meeting, is reported to have exhorted the audience not to give up the agitation simply because the initial object has been gained, but to go on agitating vigorously for the accomplishment of their ideal.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 27th, 1917.

The Anglo-Indians in India.

49. The Swadesamitran, of the 27th September, writes:—The Indians demand that the system of administration in India should be reformed and the British Government also realise the necessity for such a reform. They decided to send Mr. Montagu to India to consult the Government of India and the people about the reforms to be introduced and it was declared by the Viceroy the other day that, in view to avoid all cause for misunderstanding during Mr. Montagu's visit, it had been decided to release all the interned. The very mention of this made the Indians calm down. The release of Mrs. Besant was hailed with a feeling of gratitude by the people all over the country. No one thought or said that the release indicated any weakness on the part of the Government. But papers like the Madras Mail grew wild and reviled the Government. They threatened to set up some one somewhere against us and abused the popular leaders. The Indians, who had calmed down in order to co-operate with the Government in preserving peace in the country, were provoked by these acts of the Anglo-Indians. Thus, though the Indians kept quiet in accordance with the wishes of the Viceroy, the Anglo-Indians, who did not care for the opinion of the Viceroy, set up an agitation. At a meeting of the European Association held at Calcutta, it was stated that, if any reforms were to be introduced in the Indian administration, the Anglo-Indians should be consulted about them, as they had a permanent interest in this country and special safeguards were demanded to secure their interests. But can this argument stand? These Anglo-Indians never stay in India permanently. They carry on several industries here only to enrich themselves and leave for their country with the money earned here. What permanent interest have these people in this country? These carry on business even in China and other countries. If the Government of those countries conducted in consultation with them? In a country having a population of crores, these, who form a microscopic minority, claim special privileges. Every one of us believes that our Government will not be guided by racial prejudice. Our people have no objection to take these Anglo-Indians with them. But the latter never move with the former. Thinking that Mr. Montagu is a little sympathetic towards the Indians, the Anglo-Indians sarcastically asked the Indians some time back to elect him as the President of the Congress and yet Sir Hugh Bray made the surprising statement in the Imperial Legislative Council that the Indians never sought their co-operation. The regard we have for Mrs. Besant indicates, by itself, how much we seek the co-operation of the Europeans. The co-operation of the Indians with the Anglo-Indians depends upon their mutual goodwill, and the recognition by the latter of the right of the former to share the responsibility of the administration of this country.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Sep. 27th, 1917.

Doctor Muthu on the Indian administration.

50. The Swadesamitran, of the 27th September, reports a western paper called the Christian Commonwealth, to have stated it, as the opinion of Doctor Muthu, the Tuberculosis Expert, that, if there were any extremists in India, they were only very few in number, that they came into being only on account of the repressive measures of the Government of India, and that the Indians in general were thoroughly loyal to England, and to have attributed the discontent and unrest in India to the following three causes:—

(i) The Indians have not complete confidence in the rule of the bureaucrats as it is irresponsible and is not in accordance with popular aspirations.

(ii) The main features of the bureaucratic rule are fear and suspicion, and the Defence of India Act is being used by them to curtail the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press.

(iii) Though England has promised the grant of Home Rule on liberal lines, many Indians are afraid whether she may fail to fulfil it.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Sep. 28th, 1917.

The Muhammadan leaders in internment.

51. Adverting to the announcement now made that the Government of India have, on inquiry, come to the conclusion that it is inadvisable to release Messrs. Mahomed 'Ali and Shaukat 'Ali, the Swadesamitran, of the 28th September, says:—This decision will doubtless cause great dissatisfaction and pain especially to our Muhammadan brethren. The Government say that the reason for their present decision is the fact that the two Muhammadans used not only violent language but also openly exhibited their sympathy for Turkey and thereby endangered public peace. As soon as this war began, the rupture between Great Britain and Turkey placed the crores of Muhammadans in India in an awkward predicament. They could not get rid of the love they had borne to the Sultan of Turkey, as their religious leader, for many centuries. All the same they took care to see that their loyalty for the British rule did not wane in the least. As an indication of this, not only were the Muhammadans in the Indian army ready to fight with the Turks but thousands of them have also been enlisting in the army. It is neither possible nor necessary that, at this juncture, the Indian Muhammadans should evince an inveterate hatred towards the Turks, who have joined the enemy. Nevertheless, we hope the Government of India will note that they are keeping their natural feeling for their religious leader under restraint and are also rendering the necessary assistance to conquer the enemy.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The Muhammadan leaders in internment.

Referring to this subject, the Hindu Nesan, of the 29th September, says:—The reply of Sir William Vincent to the question of the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah about the release of these two Muhammadans shows that, in the opinion of the Government, the offence committed by them is much more heinous than that of Mrs. Besant. But many things are not viewed in the same light by the people as they are by the Government, and the case of the two interned is an instance in point. Meetings are being held in different places and resolutions passed conveying to the Government the dissatisfaction caused to the people by the reply of the Home Member and the prayer of the Muhammadans for the release of the interned. Apart from the strength of public opinion among the Indians, the Indian Daily Telegraph of Lucknow says that the aforesaid reply will not help the maintenance of confidence and peace among the Muhammadans and demands the production of the proofs against them in the hands of the Government. Under these circumstances, it is necessary on the part of the Government of India to reconsider the case of these two Muhammadan brothers, in view to secure a calm atmosphere among that community. Though the Government of India may be angry with these brothers for their having evinced sympathy with the enemies of the Emperor, we expect them to show some compassion and release the interned in recognition of the Indian Muhammadans having fought against their co-religionists on behalf of King George and for the purpose of satisfying that community.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

Reverting to this subject, the Swadesamitran, of the 1st October, remarks:—Mrs. Besant and others were interned while we were agitating for the definite suggestions of the Congress and the Muslim League, regarding our future acquisition of self-government subject to the British Empire, being given effect to. As we were deprived of the help of the leader of our movement and her two colleagues, we carried on a special agitation for it. Because this has succeeded, we should not keep quiet under the impression that our object has been gained. This special agitation has succeeded only as regards three of those that have been interned. Messrs. Mahomad 'Ali and Shaukat 'Ali are not yet free. Of about 1,000 persons interned in Bengal, many are in internment for political agitation. Though it is now many days since the Government announced that all these would be released on giving some undertaking, nothing is yet known as to what has been done in the matter. The attitude of the Government about the two Muhammadan brothers is not quite clear. Under these circumstances, the lot of the aforesaid thousands of youths is causing some anxiety indeed. The recent statement of the Home Member that the open exhibition of sympathy with the enemy on the part of these brothers was the main reason for their internment may lead some to think that the two could have been concerned in a serious conspiracy. But the letter of their mother, addressed to the press, does not justify this impression. They were prepared to give an undertaking, as required by the Government, that they would not evince, by word or deed, sympathy with the enemies of the King-Emperor and indulge in violent political agitation until the end of the war, and they agreed not to do these two things even after the war. But they added that they would do everything in their power, without prejudice to their religious principles. The Government should note that there is nothing peculiar in this addendum. The Sultan of Turkey is in the position of a High Priest to all Mussalmans, as far as their religious principles are concerned. Therefore a Muhammadan may sympathise with the Sultan at heart, as far as his religion is concerned. But there is no necessity for the Government to be anxious about this. There has been nothing wanting either in the loyalty of the Indian Muslims or the enormous help rendered by them for the war. So the position of Mahomed' Ali and others is in no way different from that of any other Muhammadan. Why should the Government then refuse to release them? Have the Government received any information from any other quarter beyond what is mentioned in the letter of the mother of the two interned? It appears that the C.I.D. Deputy Superintendent stayed in Chindwara for a number of days. Has he supplied the Government with any secret information? Unless the Government come out with the facts in their possession, how can Mahomed' Ali know the charges against him? The Raja of Mahumedabad. in a telegram to the mother of the interned, stated that their release was being delayed by a message sent by Mahomed' Ali to a friend. The only friend to whom he seems to have sent a message is Mr. Horniman, the editor of the Bombay Chronicle, and reading this message over and over again, we do not find any objectionable word in it. So it cannot have created any obstacle. We hope, therefore, that the Government will pay due regard to the feeling aroused both among the Muhammadans and the public at large and take prompt steps to secure the release of these patriots.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 1st October, reports Mr. P. Varadarajulu Nayudu, one of the Secretaries of the Madras Presidency Association, to have stated, in a Tamil lecture delivered by him at Dindigul, at which a Muhammadan gentleman is said to have presided, that the refusal of the Government of India to release Messrs. Mahomed 'Ali and Shaukat' Ali would cause discontent throughout India and added:—If the charges levelled against these Muhammadan brothers are true, they could have been tried in a court of law and punished. Sir Vincent said that they evinced sympathy with the enemies of the King-Emperor. I cannot believe this. Perhaps the Government have taken action on the diary of the Criminal Investigation Department officers. That is quite possible. Mr. Chamberlain, the late Secretary of State for India, openly stated that Mrs. Besant was engaged in a dangerous political agitation. Has she not been released now? Why should not your Muhammadan brethren be released? The whole world knows how Mr. DeWet of South Africa was magnanimously released in spite of the fact that he fought against the British and helped Germany. Even if the Government of India should, perchance, substantiate the charges against the Muhammadan brothers, why should they not be released like DeWet and others? There is no use of our being patient till Montagu goes here, as long as eminent patriots continue in internment. I, therefore, request His Excellency the Viceroy to release them immediately.

ISLAM-UL-ISLAM, Madras, Sep. 27th, 1917.

50. The Isla-ul-Islam, of the 27th September, also publishes the proceedings of a Muslim meeting held at the Lawley Hall, Mount Road, Madras, on the 25th idem, praying for the release of Messrs. Mahomed 'Ali and Shaukat 'Ali from internment.

Messrs. Mahomed 'Ali and Shaukat 'Ali.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 29th, & Oct. 1st, 1917.

The Swadesamitran, in its issue of the 29th September and 1st October, publishes, as reported by correspondents, the proceedings of a Muslim meeting held at Dharapuram on the 27th September 1917 and of the meetings held at Kannamangalam, Tiruppattur and Nagore, respectively, at each of which resolutions are said to have been passed for the release of the persons referred to above.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 1st October, reproduces in Tamil the letter written to the press by the Hon'ble Mr. Yakub Hasan Sait about the internment of these two Muslim brothers, which appears in the Hindu of the same date.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 29th September, writes in its leader under this heading:—The reply of the Government that they could not release these two Muhammadan leaders from their internment has really disappointed all the Indians. The Government declare that these two gentlemen wrote, sympathising with the Turks who are waging war with our Emperor, that they have not given up their opinions and that therefore there does not appear any reason to release them. . . The Muhammadans in India may have any amount of sympathy with the Turks in the matter of religion; but, when they are enemies to the British empire as at present, it is unlawful to show any political sympathy with them. No Government will agree to their subjects manifesting any sympathy with their enemy. Such sympathy cannot but be deemed as an offence. . . Some time ago, some of the Muhammadans used to say that they were not Indians and that they could not work with the Hindus in political matters. Their eyes were always fixed on Mecca. They were under the influence of the "Pan-Islamic" movement. They were dreaming that all the Muhammadans in the world should be under one Muhammadan rule. They could not endure the existence of the Indian National movement. They did not like the Congress. For this reason they not only failed to sympathise with the national movement for a long time but they were almost hostile to that movement. The nationalists were at a loss to know how to settle this problem. If the Native Christians valued their political connection with the English, the Parsis, with the Persians, and the Muhammadans, with the Turks, and were indifferent towards their native-country, the grant of self-government to India would be impossible. In order to destroy union among the Indians, some Anglo-Indians used to support this separate Muhammadan movement. When such an evil had overtaken the country, some nationalists came forward from among the Muhammadans and had begun to teach that it is the duty of every Indian who considers India his mother-country to support the idea of an Indian nation above all differences of creed. They said that the Muhammadan cities of Lucknow, Delhi, Agra, Hyderabad, etc., in India, were more holy to the Mahomedans here than Mecca and Constantinople. They began to say that it is as much the duty of the Muhammadans here as it is the duty of the Indians to uplift the country. Of such Muhammadan nationalists, Mahomed Ali is the foremost. Mr. Mahomed Ali and his brother worked in several ways to show that the Pan Islamic movement is only an illusion. Though the Muhammadans now require separate representation, Mr. Mahomed Ali is the chief man to manifest great love and enthusiasm in nationalistic work. We cannot believe that such a man as Mahomed Ali has shown political sympathy with the Turks who have unsheathed their sword against the British Empire. It is true that Mr. Mahomed Ali has criticised the policy of the British in Egypt. It is not proper to say, for the reason, that he has embraced the cause of the enemy. We firmly believe that Mr. Mahomed Ali will now declare that he has no sympathy with the enemies of the British Empire. Then it will be plain that the view the Government of India have taken about Mahomed Ali is wrong. We therefore hope that the release of Mahomed Ali and his brother will soon take place.

Mahomed Ali and Shaukat Ali.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

Release of Messrs. Mahomed Ali and Shaukat Ali.

Referring to the reply of the Government of India regarding the release of Messrs. Mahomed Ali and Shaukat Ali, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 3rd October, observes that the releasing of these two well-known persons, in accordance with public opinion, before the arrival of the Secretary of State, even though it be after the obtainment of the necessary securities, will tend to allay the unrest and give satisfaction to the people.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, Sep. 30th, 1917.

Mr Mahomed Ali and the Moslem League.

The Hitakarini, of the 30th September, says: Mr. Mahomed Ali is elected as the President of the forthcoming Moslem League. He and his brother are now under internment. The Muhammadan leaders are giving their votes with enthusiasm in this matter.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, Sep. 30th, 1917.

Internments.

The Hitakarini, of the 30th September, says:—Mr. Mahomed Ali and Mr. Shaukat Ali are still suffering internment. It is narrow-mindedness to feel glad that the whole country has been freed, merely because Mrs. Besant, Mr. Arundale and Mr. Wadia have been freed.

Mr. P V. Sabhapati Mudaliyar, the chairman of the meeting, is reported to have condemned "the divide and rule" policy of Lord Curzon, and observed that the adoption of the same policy at present resulted in the present non-Brahman movement. The proceedings of this meeting appear in English in the Hindu of the 1st October 1917.

The North Madras Mahajan meeting.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

56. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Hindu Nesan, of the 28th September, observes :—The concluding words of the Viceroy at the last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council will remove even a ray of suspicion which the people might have had about his policy. We can confidently presume from his speech that a good time is sure to dawn upon India. These words of the Viceroy may provoke the Anglo-Indians. But, as long as there is the Viceroy here to sympathise with us and the Secretary of State for India in England to appreciate our aspirations, we need not be afraid. The Anglo-Indians, who are sitting on one of the branches of the tree of Indian administration, are aiming a blow at the very root of the tree without realising that, if the tree itself is rooted out, their lot is doomed. As already observed by us, they will do well to note the attitude of the Viceroy and the Secretary of State and keep quiet, without indulging in vain agitation. It will be foolish on the part of these to obstruct political privileges being granted to the Indians. Resolutions were passed at a meeting of the European association of Calcutta condemning the action of the Government in releasing Mrs. Besant and their proposal to reform the Indian administrative system We refer to these resolutions only to show the spirit of rancour, jealousy and obstinacy that underlies them. If the Anglo-Indians, who claim India to be their country as long as they remain here and go away to their native land after knocking off what they could get in trade, business or service, can have so much rancour, jealousy and obstinacy, how much rancour, jealousy and obstinacy should the Indians, who are born and bred up in this country and who are sacrificing their very life for its welfare, have? The best course for the Anglo-Indians will be to look to their matters and keep quiet. They will not be well advised in doing anything which tends to create a feeling of enmity between them and the Indians.

Opening a new chapter.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Sep. 28th, 1917.

57. The Swadesamitran, of the 29th September, writes :—Mr. Montagu will go here to ascertain the reforms that are necessary in the Indian administration. He will then try to consider about the different proposals made by different people in this matter and come to a conclusion. The Government of India have submitted certain proposals. Though these have not yet been published, they do not seem to have proposed to increase the powers of the Legislative Councils. It is rumoured that, apart from the recommendations of the Government of India, some members thereof like Sir Sankaran Nayar, have sent up dissenting minutes. Next there is the memorandum of the nineteen and then the scheme drafted by the Congress and the Muslim League. Lastly there are the so-called proposals of the late Mr. Gokhale. As Mr. Gokhale commanded the respect of the Indians, there is the danger of his proposals being regarded as a moderate standard for the reforms. They might have been sufficient at the time when they were written. But, as was observed by Mr. Lloyd George, there have been considerable changes within these two and a half years after his death and therefore they will not suit the present period. As for the recommendations of the Government of India, Mr. Chamberlain himself seems to have thought that they were not sufficient. It is a fact admitted by all that the representative element should preponderate in the Legislative Councils and that these councils should have greater responsibilities. The main point to be decided is the extent to which the executive Government should be controlled by the Legislative Councils. As it is, the Executive Council, i.e., the Government, is not bound by the views of the elected members of the Legislative Councils. Though the reforms of 1909 gave a greater latitude to the Members of Legislative Councils in the matter of discussion and increased their number also, the official majority was maintained in the Imperial Council

The proposed reforms.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

and the non-official majority introduced in the Provincial Councils was only a nominal one, as the nominated members and the European non-official representatives always sided the Government. So the people have no voice in the administration. Though there is an Indian in the Executive Council, he is nominated by the Government. Thus the Legislative Councils have only to play to the tune of the officials. That is why the Congress and the Muslim League demand larger powers for these councils. The people wish to share the responsibility of the administration and be in a position to criticise the Government through their representatives. It is in anticipation of an objection that the time has not yet come for it, that the Government is sought to be subjected to the control of the Legislative Council.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The moderates and the present political agitation.

58. In the course of a long communication under this heading, a correspondent of the Swadesamitran, of the 29th September, refers to a note which recently appeared in an Anglo-Indian paper in Bombay from the pen of an old congress man, regretting the release of Mrs. Besant on the ground that it would lead to the cornering of the "Moderates," whom the correspondent describes as being a class of timid persons content to have small concessions from the Government by begging for them, and observes:—The aim of the political agitation now conducted under the leadership of Mrs. Besant is that our country should be governed by Ministers, who would be subject to Legislative Councils with members elected by the Indians. At present, it is the bureaucracy that rule our country. These are not bound by the opinion of the people and therefore, they can do things as they please. The present agitation aims at putting a check upon them. The old congress man says that the release of Mrs. Besant has sounded the death knell of the moderates. We were till now under the impression that the victory of Mrs. Besant, who is the life and soul of the new movement, sounds the death knell of the bureaucracy. It is only now we learn that it sounds the death knell of the moderates also. But we are not sorry for it. Our country can improve only when the black sheep amongst us, calling themselves moderates, who hamper our complete acquisition of the privilege of self-government, leave us and our country. Very few would bemoan the loss of these statesmen. The public will not care much for their exit. They have done their work. "Young India" has come up to do service for India. The moderates do not know the attitude and opinion of this "Young India". So the people would prefer their exit to their remaining and blocking the progress of the country on account of their ignorance.

The release of Mr. Besant and her colleagues.

The Vaisyamitran, of the 24th September, hails with satisfaction the release of Mr. Besant and her colleagues, which it deems to be a victory for the lawful and constitutional agitation carried on by the people for the uplift of the country and expressing its thanks to all those, who have been responsible in bringing about this result and, dwelling upon the futility of the argument advanced by some, against the grant of Home Rule for India, that the Indians are not yet fit to manage their own affairs, feels certain that the King Emperor, who is waging a war for the purpose of doing away with the despotism of Germany and preserving righteousness and liberty, will very soon grant Home Rule to his Indian subjects. It entreats the Government to release also all the other patriots such as Mahomed Ali and Shaukat Ali, who are in internment for their having indulged in political agitation.

61. The Dravidan, of the 29th September, also publishes a letter on this subject from one Muhi-ud-din Bacha, which is similar to one published in the Swadesamitran of the 24th idem and referred to in paragraph 54 of Report No. 39 of 1917.

America has decided, and arrangements are being made, to confer autonomy on Poland, Finland and other States. Even in Germany there seems to be a desire to depose the Kaiser and establish a democracy. Holland has given her consent to the formation of a representative assembly in Java, a small island in the Indian Ocean. Under these circumstances, you should also strive to acquire Home Rule. Do not sleep till your efforts succeed.

PANDIYA NESAN, Madura, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

68. The Pandiya Nesan, of the 22nd September, dwells in detail upon the insanitary condition of Madura, which is next in importance to the Presidency town and which, being the head-quarters of two districts, is visited by a large concourse of people every day, apart from the thousands of pilgrims who gather there, and attributing it to the non-completion of the new drainage works in the town, the delay in allotting portions of the tract acquired on the other side of the river among the people, and the insufficiency of the water-supply in the town, where many wells have been closed, relying on the supply through the pipes, and, complaining of the injustice of the pipe water being allowed to be used in a few gardens of the rich, to the detriment of the rate-payers in the town, observes that all these evils can be avoided if the Municipal Councillors evince the same interest in looking after the needs of the town that they show in convasing for votes to get into the council.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

69. Adverting to the condemnation by the Madras Mail of the action of the Government in releasing Mrs. Besant from internment and the strong attacks made by some other Anglo-Indian papers on the British Cabinet itself, a correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 1st October, thinks that, as the articles of these papers tend to bring the Government into contempt, they should be punished under the Press Act, and adds: I do not see why these papers use such strong language. Is it their view that the release of Mrs. Besant will root out the British Empire, or are they afraid that the Secretary of State for India will be ready to grant Home Rule when he goes here? They do not seem to realise that Home Rule is a birth-right of India. I wonder to find these Anglo-Indians devoid of British instincts. If, at a juncture like this when there is a change in the angle of vision of the Government of India, the Anglo-Indians raise a hue and cry actuated by self interest, let them understand that their position in India after the war will become very bad. India was never before united as she is today. It is quite certain that a section which tries to create faction among the people in order to serve its own interest and to seek the favour of the Government, can no longer raise its head.

The mischief of the Anglo-Indians.

TAMILIAN, Madras, Sep. 26th, 1917.

70. The Tamilian, of the 26th September, refers to the Home Rule movement as being engineered by some retired officials and graduates, who cannot find any other employment, for the purpose of driving out the English Government and ruling over the country themselves and condemns the conduct of these people in dragging also the poorer classes into their avaricious movement. It adds that those who write and speak of Home Rule are traitors to their king and warns the other subjects from following this traitorous gang and ruining themselves.

The Home Rulers and their activities.

MAHAVIKATA DUTAN, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The Mahavikata Dutan, of the 29th September, writes as follows on the same subject:—O Loyalists, who preach loyalty from the platform but contrive secretly to subvert the Government! O valiant heroes, who, having been caught by the authorities on account of your excesses actuated by the pride of education, riches, youth and race, now blink! Listen to what I say, which, though unpalatable to you now, will be beneficial to you in the future. Everyone knows what confusion reigned in India about a hundred years back and how the English have restored order and conferred numerous benefits on us. In addition to these, the Congress has also been agitating for reforms and even these have often been granted by the Government. Meanwhile the Home Rule movement, which has sprung up from the Congress, has, under the guidance of Mrs. Besant and her paper New India, been making a great noise in every town and village while the Justice and its vernacular compeers, the Dravidan and the Andhraprakasika, have been falling foul of this movement for fear that it may provoke the westerns. What a shame it is that you should fight among yourselves owing to differences of caste and class? How can a desire for Home Rule be justified in a country like this? It is against the policy of the world. Though a number of ants may join, their strength will still be very weak and their voice still very feeble. Our Home Rulers are no better than these ants. We should not desire for more than what we deserve and, if we do we will lose even what we have. The Home Rulers make a show that they have the people behind them, but this is not a fact. The Government will surely be not afraid of the activities of these Home Rulers. Even taking it for granted that the object of the Home Rulers is accomplished the want of union among us will make it disappear very soon.

71. The Mahavikata Dutan, of the 29th September, dwells upon the severe criticism to which Lord Pentland has been subjected ever since he issued the orders interning Mrs. Besant and her colleagues and prohibiting students from attending political meetings and the way in which he is attacked on both the sides after he was asked by the Government of India to release the interned persons—the Home Rulers gloating over their victory and making light of the authorities and the students openly defying the provisions of G.O. No. 559, on the one side, and the Madras Mail and the other Anglo-Indian papers insisting upon the resignation of His Excellency as his post has lost its prestige on the other and describes him as crying out "I have got into this mire without noting its depth and those who importuned me to jump into it do not follow me now". The paper gives the sage counsel to His Excellency not to be upset by all this, as the assurance given by Mrs. Besant, that she would co-operate with the Government in avoiding all agitation until the Secretary of State for India returns home after his visit is practically a condition precedent to her release which was all that His Excellency wanted. It asks him not to be beguiled by the advice of the Brahmans hereafter, but to help to uplift the lower classes who will be ever grateful to him and sacrifice their all for him.

Mr. Montagu's opportunity.

75. The Andhrapatrika, of the 26th September, gives in Telugu the article of Saint Nihal Singh headed "Mr. Montagu's opportunity", in the Review of Reviews which contains:—Mr. Montagu said that it seemed to him that the Government were sending as little help to the war as possible from India. . . When medical help was urgently needed, the Military authorities sent back to India Bengalee medical officers from Mesopotamia. They refused to serve as coolies, leaving off their professional work. . . While there are 50,000,000 Indians fit to be enrolled as soldiers, only 150,000 men are enlisted in the army. Even these are not enabled to attain high offices. However much the authorities are requested, they do not comply with our request. From the commencement of the war till now, the authorities have not advanced even one step towards granting the wishes of the people. Thistis just the reason why the Mesopotamian expedition failed. . . The Financial Secretary is a non-Indian belonging to the bureaucracy. Had there been real national Government they would not have failed in the expedition. Mr. Montagu said that the Government of India was more brittle than wood, harder than iron, old fashioned and unsuited to the present conditions. . . The India Council also is not susceptible of change. Mr. Montagu has pointed out the irresponsible nature of the India Office. . . The India Council contains officers who worked very long in India. They take pleasure in opposing proposals calculated to advance the people. They have the power to over rule the authority of the Secretary of State in settling the affairs of India. . . Unless both the Houses of Parliament unitedly pass an order, they need not resign their seats. . . Mr. Montagu said:—Unless the Government of India is made responsible to the Indians, it will be difficult to reconstruct the Executive Council of the Government of India, change the Viceroyalty and delegate to the Council greater powers from the Parliament. . . The views contained in the editorial of the Review of Reviews and the ideas of Mr. Montagu are the same. . . The papers began to write that Mr. Montagu gave expression to such views before he assumed responsibility. But Mr. Montagu says that he still holds those views. The Secretary of State for India is willing to listen, with sympathy, to the representations of the Indians. But will the officers under him agree to act according to his wishes? He knows he has to overcome many difficulties. He is very bold and persevering. May he make India happy and prosperous with the help of his colleagues in the Cabinet.

The speeches of Mr. Montagu.

77. In its leader reviewing the speeches of Mr. Montagu, the Andhrapatrika, of the 26th September, says:—The stability of the British Empire is due to statesmen like Mr. Montagu. It is due to such gentlemen that the confidence of the people in British justice and generosity remains unshaken. . . Why should England which encouraged the unrest that made its appearance in Persia, Turkey, China, and Japan, be intolerant as regards unrest in Egypt and India. . . It is the opinion of Mr. Montagu that India should be governed according to the wishes of the people and not by the sword. . . The words that Mr. Montagu spoke in 1913 may be of use to those who attempt to promote race differences. He said, "It is a dangerous policy to divide and rule. There is no place for such a doctrine in our politics. He said that the Indian problem was a political problem and related to giving the Indians more opportunities in their own country for the unfoldment of their administrative capacity. Indians ask for opportunities to administer their country. Mr. Montagu has already realised that the Indians will not rest satisfied with small concessions. Mr. Montagu has noted the evil that was done to India by Lord Curzon. . . The words of Mr. Montagu regarding prestige are a fitting answer to those who attach much importance to its maintenance. Those words deserve to be written in gold and held as ideals for every statesman to follow.

Mr. Montagu's speeches.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 27th September, says in its leader:—Mr. Montagu said in 1912 that it was not possible to pass time without declaring the goal to which the Government are driving. . . On the 12th of July this year, when the report of the Mesopotamian Commission was being discussed, Mr. Montagu criticised the policy of the Government of India. Mr. Montagu said:—The Government of India is harder than iron. It is inflexible and old. It is not possible to justify this administrative policy under the present circumstances. . . It is the opinion of Mr. Montagu that to turn the attention of the English to India, the Parliament should be made to bear the salary of the Secretary of State. This is what the Congress also asks for. . . Mr. Montagu wanted the Government to declare that they would take steps to see that the goal to which they were driving, whatever that goal might be, was reached. One of the means by which it should be reached is the establishment of more representative institutions. The people should have control over the Executive Council. The Executive Council should be reconstituted. Mr. Montagu said that as the people took up increased responsibility in the Government of India, the responsibility of England should proportionately decrease, and that the Government should be in accordance with the wishes of the people. The principles suggested by Mr. Montagu agree with those of the congress scheme of reforms. It is the opinion of Justice and the Mail that the Government should be vested with greater independence and made more arbitrary without the people being given any administrative responsibility. This is opposed to Government by the people and to the aims of Mr. Montagu. . . Although the above views of Mr. Montagu were given expression to before he held the reins of Government, they are his views even now, as stated by him.

Ancient inscriptions.

78. Under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 26th September, says:—It is regrettable that while the work of publishing Tamil inscriptions is being done so quickly and wonderfully, the work of publishing Telugu inscriptions has not taken any shape. It is to be surmised from this that among the officers engaged in the work of publication there are many who know Tamil, and that excepting the Telugu Epigraphic student, there is none who knows Telugu. The Telugu language is in this sad condition, owing to the absence among officers of men who are versed in the language. Not only in this institution but in almost every Government office, such is the condition of the Telugu language. Some may console us saying that the work in connection with the Kanarese language is still worse. But we have to say in answer to them that if Telugu had the same patronage from the native chiefs as Kanarese, we would not have regretted the present state of Telugu. We trust that if the Government should note this difference in the treatment, unwittingly observed with reference to the various languages, the sad plight of the Telugu language will soon disappear.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 26th, 1917.

The Andhra Conference.

79. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 26th September, proposes to introduce in the forthcoming Andhra Conference a resolution requesting the unconditional release of Syamasundara Chakravarti and others, and the grant of freedom to Mr. Aravinda Ghose, Lajpat Rai and others who are living outside India for fear that they may be charged with offences if they return to India.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 28th, 1917.

The Andhra Conference.

80. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 28th September, says:—The miserable condition has overtaken us of patriots like Lala Lajpat Rai and Mr. Aravinda Ghose finding shelter in foreign lands without having a place in India, which is sheltering lakhs of foreigners. Mussalman lions were declared guilty because they voiced forth the grievances of their countrymen, and are suffering internment at some corner of the country. What happiness can we have when many great men are suffering untold miseries? What is the use of any number of boons if those great men are not in our midst? May the Andhras discuss in their conference the resolution proposed by Mr. Lakshminarayana Pantulu and try to get the leaders released.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

The Special Andhra Conference.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 1st October, publishes the proceedings of the special Andhra conference and the gist of the speeches delivered therein, from the pen of a correspondent. The presidential speech contains:—The Government have to direct the aspirations of the people into proper channels and lead them to the goal. If they do not do so, these aspirations may take another course and harm will surely result. The love for freedom which has recently manifested itself in Russia is an instance in point. . . The administration of India is arbitrarily carried on in accordance with the wishes of the Secretary of State and his Council, and is not subject to the opinion of the people.

A letter, addressed by Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar and read at the conference, contains:—If I am competent to pronounce an opinion as to whether administration should be carried on through the medium of the vernaculars, I say that it should be. The necessity to translate everything into a foreign language unnecessarily, is unendurable; because in many suits in law courts people do not obtain justice on this account. There can be no difference of opinion among wise men as to the fruitlessness of education not imparted through the vernaculars. Unless matters are discussed in the vernaculars no good work can be done by village panchayats, unions, local boards and municipal councils. There is no use of carrying on discussions in a foreign language. The change may appear to be too much to expect, but I am one of those who believe that the Indians will not be completely happy under the British rule unless such changes are effected.

The fifth resolution relates to passive resistance. It contains—This conference is of opinion that if the officers of Government obstruct constitutional agitation, it is proper and necessary that the people should resort to the adoption of passive resistance instead of yielding to such obstructions.

The sixth resolution relates to the release of the interned. In supporting it a speaker said:—Internment, it is said, is driving youngmen in Bengal to commit suicide. Mr. Aravinda Ghose has been in exile for six years. Unless all these are liberated, there can be no peace in the country.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

The Special Andhra Conference.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 1st October, reports the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Special Andhra Conference to have said:—The country will not approve of anything short of the reforms that we now ask for. If anybody throws obstacles in our way, we must strongly protest. Lord Islington spoke about the future reforms in India with the same narrowness of view with which he closed the conclusions of the Public Services Commission. . . The division of the country on a language basis will lead to the advancement of the people, to education being imparted through the vernaculars, and to administration being carried on in vernaculars. The people will then be enabled to understand the methods of administration, and the Government will be carried on by the people for the people. Mr. Tilak and Sir S. Subrahmaniya Ayyar have urged the necessity of such a division of the country.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

The Special Andhra Conference.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 2nd October, reports the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Special Andhra Conference to have said:—Mr. Montagu need not pay any heed to the adverse cries of the Anglo-Indian papers and the improper agitation of the Anglo-Indians. . . Our patriotic leaders such as Mr. Mahomed 'Ali are yet suffering under internment. Sir Rabindranath Tagore says that hundreds of young men have been interned without trial, that many of them were lodged in insanitary houses, prisons and dark rooms, that some turned out mad, that some others committed suicide, and that many houses have been reduced to utter misery and trouble. We read in papers that some were driven mad and that some others died of consumption. From the September papers we learn that two persons committed suicide out of despair. One of these two was a student of the senior B.A. Class, Ripon College, Calcutta, and son of a pleader. Before he died he reported to the District Magistrate about the troubles he was put to by the police. As there was no proof that any of the interned has been guilty of treason or any conspiracy with the enemy, the Government have avoided prosecuting them. Those that suffer like this suffer because they love our mother country greatly. How can there be real peace in a country which is placed under such heart-rending circumstances? With what calm mind and what conscience can our countrymen render help to Mr. Montagu? How can we keep quiet without agitating till the interned are released? . . . We respectfully request that the Government will be pleased to release all the interned in our country and excuse all those who are suffering punishment for political crimes, so that the people may not suspect any difference in the treatment accorded by the British to Ireland and India. . . We have to agitate for the release of the interned and for the grant of the reforms we ask for. We do not hate the British. We want brotherly feelings to prevail permanently between us both. We condemn sedition and revolution. Our agitation shall be carried on on peaceful and constitutional lines, but if the bureaucracy obstruct our right to make speeches and to work constitutionally, we have no choice but to resort to passive resistance. . . Passive resistance means the manifestation of soul force. It is a maintenance of man's self-respect. It is a determination to get our birthrights.

The same paper publishes certain verses read at the conference, one of which rendered in English runs as follows:—O Andhras, in order to maintain, your right, resort today to the policy of passive resistance, which Prahlada adopted against the cruelties of Kanakakasipa, which the truth-wedded Harischandra adopted against the anger of the sage, which the sage Gandhi resorted to with firmness in righteousness, which Vasishtha embraced in enduring the mischiefs of the son of Gathi, and which has thus become traditional.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 27th, 1917.

The Muhammadan interned.

80. The Andhrapatrika, of the 27th September, says:—Ever since the release of Mrs. Besant and her co-workers, the agitation regarding the interned Muhammadans has been on the increase. . . The reply of Sir William Vincent to a question bearing on this matter is unsatisfactory. If the interned were tried in a law court and duly punished after conviction, the people could raise no objections.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 28th, 1917.

The interned Muslims.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 28th September, gives in Telugu the telegram containing the comments of the Indian Daily Telegraph on the interned Muslims, which appears on page 5 of the Hindu of the 28th September.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The interned Muslims.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 29th September, expresses its dissatisfaction at the answer given by the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent to the question regarding the release of the Muhammadan leaders and says:—We regret that those patriots have been accused of groundless offences. . . There is no use of such answers. The Government cannot help to maintain peace among the people. We regret that there is no agreement between the speeches of His Excellency the Viceroy and the answers of the officials. . . May the Andhras express their disappointment in the Andhra conference at the answer of the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

The Mussalman interned.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 1st October, says:—From a letter of the mother of Mr. Mahomed 'Ali, it is plain that a Muhammadan Criminal Investigation Department officer got a written statement from Mr. Mahomed 'Ali, and Mr. Shaukat 'Ali, that the Hon'ble the Raja of Muhammadabad came and went back after speaking with them, and that the representative of the Government then gave the answer to a question relating to them. From a perusal of this letter, the brothers do not appear to be in the wrong at all. On account of the delay in their release, the minds not only of the Muhammadans but of all Indians have been agitated. We pray that the Government of India and His Excellency Lord Chelmsford will ascertain the truth, release the interned and earn the gratitude of the Indians.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct 1st, 1917.

The interned.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st October, says:—It may be said that the people are satisfied with what the Provincial Governments have done already. But there are many other interned persons, by whose internment many families have been reduced to helplessness and misery. Unless Mr. Mahomed 'Ali, Mr. Shaukat 'Ali, Mr. Syamasundara Chakravarti and others are released before Mr. Montagu's arrival, India cannot be perfectly peaceful. We hope the Government will kindly release them.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The Moslem interned.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 29th September, publishes in Telugu the letter of Abadi Bano, the mother of Mr. Muhammad 'Ali, who is now undergoing internment, which appears in the Hindu of the 29th September 1917.

SATYAVADI,* Mysore, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

The interned.

The Satyavadi, of the 2nd October, in an article under the heading "1,500 and others", observes:—Srijut Wadia in his first speech at Coimbatore on his release said: "When we, three innocent people, who have resorted to no kind of violence and shown no desire to disobey the law, have been interned, what guarantee is there that more than 1,000 of those Bengalis and more than 500 of the Punjabis, in all more than 1,500 men, have not been interned likewise though they are innocent like ourselves? These should be released." As the reasons for which these men have been needlessly placed in confinement are kept secret, Wadia was right to have raised the question. We are repeatedly demanding that the interned should rightly be released. We want them. We have a right to ask for them. The Government is therefore bound to release them.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 27th, 1917.

The kindness of Bombay Government.

81. The Andhrapatrika, of the 27th September, says that, in view of the difficulty of getting food under war conditions, the Government of Bombay have decided to grant local allowance to Government servants earning under Rs. 100 and house-rent to meniels, and trusts that the Madras Government also will grant such praiseworthy concessions in their Province.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 28th, 1917.

The enthusiasm of the Andhras.

82. The Andhrapatrika, of the 28th September, says under this heading:—It is a common language that merges all differences and unites all people. After this unity is realised, people of all creeds and races will worship the language together. . . If the principles of Andhra the movement are embodied in the national movement, it will be possible to establish efficient national self-government in India. . . Many a leader in India has approved of the principles of the Andhra movement. Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar has accepted the principle of the division of the country on a language basis. The Hon'ble Justice Abdur Rahim says that sciences and arts should be taught to students through vernaculars.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The Andhra movement.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 29th September, regrets that while in a short space of three years, Mrs. Besant has made the whole of India resound with the cry of Home Rule and instilled "consternation and confusion" in the minds of Europeans, the Andhra movement has not made any considerable progress.

The same paper says:—Mr. J. C. Bose has proved by his work that the slander that the Eastern Continent is deficient in scientific knowledge and that the Indians are not intelligent enough to find out new truths, is groundless. His life is in point to show that the Indians do not evince an interest in new sciences because of the lack of opportunities. . . When students are wasting their whole time to attain proficiency in English, where is the time to learn sciences? As stated by the Hon'ble Justice Abdur Rahim, unless sciences are taught through the vernaculars, the condition of India will remain the same as ever.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 28th, 1917.

Liberty.

83. Referring to the speech of Mr. Asquith at Leeds, the Andhrapatrika, of the 28th September, says:—While Mr. Asquith has been trying to create an atmosphere of liberty in the world, it is impossible that such atmosphere will not spread in India. The moment when the allies commenced to sacrifice their life and treasure in the war for justice and liberty, the grant of liberty to India was commenced.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 28th, 1917.

The District Judge of Guntur.

84. The Andhrapatrika, of the 28th September, publishes in Telugu an article from the Madras Law Times criticising the action of the District Judge of Guntur in calling for a list of those pleaders who take part in the Home Rule and Swadeshi movements in that district.

---

* Started in September 1917.

85. The Andhraprakasika, of the 25th September, observes as follows under this heading :—. . . Statesmen are unanimously agreed that the majority report of the Public Services Commission is very favourable to the non-Brahman community. But our representatives in the Supreme Legislative Council are strongly criticising that report now. What is the meaning of this criticism? Our Brahman representatives are afraid that, if those reforms are granted to the non-Brahmans, they will be deprived of the power in their possession. . . The Hon'ble Mr. M. Ramachandra Rao is only for territorial representation and not for separate communal representation. . . There is no use unless some seats are reserved exclusively for non-Brahman representatives, and the Brahmans prohibited from standing for those seats. . . If Mr. Ramachandra Rao Pantulu's views are given effect to, the position of the Panchamas will become miserable. It is very necessary that some seats are reserved for them.

Separate representation.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Sep. 25th, 1917.

86. The Desamata, of the 26th September, reproduces from the Kistnapatrika, of the 15th September, an article on this subject referred to, under this heading, on page 2399 of Report No. 38 of 1917.

Satyagraha or passive resistance.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Sep. 26th, 1917.

87. Referring to the proceedings of a non-Brahman meeting held to protest against the cable of Mr. P. Thiagaraya Chettiyar and to support the Congress Scheme of reforms, the Desamata, of the 26th September, gives a gist of the President's speech which contains:—The bureaucracy here will not consent to give up its power. The British are good but we are spoiling them. They are fairminded people and hence our faith in them. We therefore ask them to give us self-government.

A non-Brahman meeting.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Sep. 26th, 1917.

88. Referring to the release of Mrs. Besant and her co-workers, the Desamata, of the 26th September, observes as follows under this heading :—The release of Mrs. Besant, Mr. Arundale and Mr. Wadia is positive proof that agitation has triumphed. Before the flood of the united voice of the people, the repression of the bureaucracy, however tremendous it may be, cannot stand. . . The British Government has to carry on its administration in India in accordance with the wishes of the people. If the Government of India should administer their rule against the wishes of the people, then it may be certainly asserted that this country is not under British rule. Our rulers are administering our country without giving room to such an impression. . . The rulers have, till now, adopted a policy of repression in the matter of administration.

But now after the persistent agitation of the people, they have understood that the people have become dissatisfied on account of that policy and are mending their mistakes. The release of Mrs. Besant and her co-workers bears testimony to this. . . His Excellency the Viceroy has said in the last meeting of the Supreme Legislative Council that Mahomed Ali and Shaukat Ali would be released, but they have not been released as yet. We wish that the Government will release them soon.

Happy news.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Sep. 26th, 1917.

89. The Desamata, of the 26th September, has, from the pen of a correspondent, a report of the proceedings of a meeting held at Cherukumilli village, Kistna district, in which resolution were passed repudiating the claim of Rao Bahadur P. Thiagaraya Chettiyar and Doctor Nair, and the papers conducted by them to represent the non-Brahmans of South India, and stating that the Congress scheme of reforms has the approval of all.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Sep. 26th, 1917.

90. The Andhrapatrika, of the 29th September, gives in Telugu the speech of Mr. Fletcher on the labour movement in England, which is reported in the Hindu of the 29th September. It also reports Mr. Fletcher to have said: It is not advantageous for the Government to oppose any movement, for it is impossible to suppress truth. The more we try to suppress it, the greater is the force with which it asserts itself.

Mr. Fletcher's speech.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The paper makes the following remarks on the speech :—It is plain from the speech that the Indian ideal of Home Rule has attracted the attention of the people of England. Mr. Fletcher said that there was no Englishman in England who was opposed to Home Rule. Comparing India with England at the time when the Reform Bill was introduced, Mr. Fletcher proved that to say that the Indians were not fit for Home Rule was groundless. He said that fitness would come only by granting them Home Rule. When we consider to what eminence Trade Unions have raised workmen, the contention that the Indians are unfit for Home Rule loses its value. It augurs good that the English have recognised that the aims of the Indians are reasonable.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

A meeting at Penukonda.

91. In giving a gist of the proceedings of a Home Rule meeting at Penukonda a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 29th September, reports:—After dwelling on the gigantic efforts made by the Congress and the Muslim League to get Home Rule and the objections of the opposite party who have tasted the pleasure of authority and do not like to give it up, Mr. Harisarvottama Rao, the president, said that the powers which the authorities gave us are only nominal, that they broke to the heart what they promised to the ear, that until Home Rule was given the difficulties of the people would not disappear and that only Home Rule could grant us salvation.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The Madras Mail.

92. The Andhrapatrika, of the 29th September, addresses the editor of the Madras Mail and says:—It is true that your vow to see that Mr. Montagu is removed from his office has not been fulfilled as yet. You do not know the reason of this delay, but many have learnt it. The days are gone when the words of the Anglo-Indians who come to this country for their own ends, and return to England after their work is finished, are believed as gospel truth. The time has arrived when the aspirations of the Indians who reside permanently in India, are respected. The necessity of administering the country according to the wishes of the people is recognised. This is what the Indians want. The Congress scheme also wants the same thing. The object of Mr. Montagu's visit is to satisfy this wish. This wish is entertained not only by India but by the whole world. It has been announced that the angle of vision towards Indian ideals even in England has changed. A great war is taking place for the maintenance of the liberty of the individual and of the country. Under such circumstances, to express yourself against the spirit of the times will seem absurd not only to Indians but also to the people of England. In these times, the voice of the people will prevail and not your opinion whatever influence you may wield. You must remember this.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

Home Rule movement.

93. The Andhrapatrika, of the 1st October, reports that a meeting of the Tiruvalluvar (sic) Home Rule League, the President, Rao Bahadur V. K. Ramanuja Achariyar, said:—The Anglo-Indian merchants oppose the Congress scheme of reforms, fearing that if Home Rule be granted, duties may be levied on their articles of merchandise. The Anglo-Indian officers who draw greater salaries than the Indians oppose the scheme for fear that if Home Rule is granted they may lose their appointments. The Christian Missionaries oppose it, because they suppose that if Home Rule is granted, the grants now paid to schools under their management may be stopped. The orthodox Indians fear that if Home Rule is given, social reforms which they oppose will receive the sanction of legislature.

RAVI, Cocanada, Sep. 27th, 1917.

Home Rule.

The Ravi, of the 27th September, says:—We do not contend that India should not get Home Rule. We also believe with our British contemporaries that India should get Home Rule. That is the goal of the British Government. But we are not sure at all that the country is fit for it. The present is not a fit time for political agitation. When the Empire is fighting for its very existence, it is wrong, seditious, mean, contemptible and almost criminal to disturb the moral and material strength of India and the Empire. The British can never forget it. . . . India's real friends and her sons who are most loyal will not sympathise with the agitation now. They condemn the acts of the extremists.

94. The Andhrapatrika, of the 29th September, publishes a letter above the signature of seventeen persons, in which the signatories who are non-Brahmans of Kapileswarapuram, Gōdāvari district, disown the opinions of Rao

Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chetti and Doctor Nayar, approve of the Home Rule ideals of the Congress, demand class representation, express their gratefulness to the Government for the release of Mrs. Besant, etc., and pray for the release of Mr. Mahomed 'Ali and his brother.

95. The Andhraprakasika, of the 2nd October, publishes, under this heading, resolutions of a non-Brahman meeting held at Pulivendla, accepting the leadership of Dr. T. M. Nayar and Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chetti.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

96. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 2nd October, writes:— The common folk that came to see the procession of the Home Rulers on the 27th of last month were surprised and began to ask themselves in the following strain:—"How can they attack the Governor? They might even do so. The rulers are out of their wits. Perhaps the old anarchy is to repeat itself once again." On the next day when I happened to talk to some shepherds working in the fields, they referred to the Home Rule agitation and remarked that all this was due to war and the rulers have to face this difficulty on account of appointing the Brahmans in places of most English people who had been sent to the front.

Home Rule in Palamcottah.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

97. The September number of the Divyagnanadipika has the following in an article under this heading: —We shall see how much wealth is drained from here to other countries on account of the Vysyas not observing their duties. . . How can the country remain without being impoverished, if in a year Rs. 2,22,75,91,927 should go from our country to other countries. Besides this, the salaries and pensions paid to the English officers amount to crores and not lakhs. Our medicines are condemned. On account of the encouragement given to the foreign drugs, the best science of ayurveda has become extinct, and the country is losing its wealth and health. Their (foreign) medicines are 75 per cent mixtures of alcohol. The pure bodies which have been foreign to wine and flesh for generations become degenerated on account of these impure articles finding their way into them. . . How wealthy our country would have been if the merchants of our country had joined together and run the railways! How comfortable would our passengers find their journey! Though a large portion of the receipts of the railway companies derived from us, and though large profits accrue to them, our countrymen are looked down upon with contempt, while the Europeans and the Eurasians, who are the offspring of them and the women of this country, are treated with respect. They are furnished with all necessary comforts. They do not see to the comforts of our passengers. At some stations the waiting rooms of the third-class passengers are like cattle-sheds. They are abounding with bugs and ticks. The stationmasters house their cattle in them and third-class passengers should wait in the midst of the stink of dirty dung. As for the compartments, sometimes fourteen or sixteen passengers are stuffed into one intended for ten. The passengers of this class are treated very meanly. This is all the result of our poverty!

98. The Andhrapatrika, of the 29th September, writes in an article under this heading as follows:—As the Europeans, Muhammadans and other foreigners eat beef, it will be found impossible to put a stop to the slaughter of cows, which is going on every day in our country. Whenever we think of the cow-slaughter by the Government every year for the food of the army, it rends our heart. . . It is very cruel on the part of the Christians and the Muhammadans to kill them merely to appease their hunger, conscious as they are of the usefulness of these animals. . . Ponder, what hard-hearted people does it become, to witness the slaughter of these large bodied dumb animals while they are crying piteously.

Head-quarters of the New Kistna district.

101. The Kistnapatrika, of the 29th September, says:—At the time of the bifurcation of the Kistna district, it will be necessary to decide as to the location of the office of the new district, but we cannot understand what necessity there is to change the offices in the old district, in confusion. We hear that our district Collector has made up his mind to transfer the head-quarters of the district from Masulipatam to Bezwada. . . We do not see the necessity for this transfer. When the district is divided, the Collector's office, the District Court, and the offices of the other departments cannot but be constructed at a cost of some lakhs in Ellore or in Nidadavole. In addition to this, the authorities are perhaps going to construct storied buildings at Bezwada at a cost of some more lakhs. Want of funds is pleaded when we require roads for villages. There are no funds forthcoming when the question of elementary education is moved. There are no funds for repairing tanks, and for encouraging handicrafts. But funds will pour forth from some unknown quarter to construct new buildings, after pulling down strong buildings unnecessarily. While useful endeavours are being abandoned on account of lack of funds, the authorities venture to erect new cities. Let alone the expenditure. There is none to enquire into the grievances of subordinate officers. The authorities construct palacial buildings at a cost of lakhs for Collectors and Judges, but who cares what becomes of subordinate officers and clerks, who cannot find accommodation in Bezwada for which heavy rents have to be paid. May the Government not tread such mad ways.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, Sep. 30th, 1917.

Burma.

102. The Hitakarini, of the 30th September, contains the following:—Hitherto Bihar was deemed the Transvaal of Hindustan. But now Burma has deserved that honour. It is said that that country has proscribed New India and the Indian Review. Perhaps Sir H. Butler thinks now that the rulers of other provinces are less wise than he.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, Sep. 30th, 1917.

Passive resistance and Mr. Gandhi.

103. The Hitakarini, of the 30th September, says: "Passive resistance, and the use of weapons have been existing among us from time immemorial. These two courses are met with in the Dharma Sastras. They are forms of divine and Asuric power. Our countrymen admit that the divine form is important in the first instance. Even now that is my ideal. An example of the Asuric form is furnished in Europe at present."

HITAKARINI, Ellore, Sep. 30th, 1917.

The mischief of the Anglo-Indian papers.

104. The Hitakarini, of the 30th September, says under this heading:—Papers which have conducted constitutional agitation for swaraj have fallen a prey to the weapon of the Indian Press Act. Those that have taken part in such agitation have been interned. Do not the Government hear the Anglo-Indian papers insulting them? It is curious that they feign deafness. . . We cannot guess what offence the authorities found New India guilty of. Even the Madras High Court did not venture to accuse New India of any offence. Who does not know how many times that paper has suffered from the bombs of the Press Act? Why has it suffered? The answer to this question is the wrong vision of the authorities. It is a surprise that the Madras Government who award internments for the slightest reasons have not noticed the writing of the Mail. Why are not such papers that insult the authorities publicly made liable under the Press Act. It is plain that the laws of Government relating to punishment are enforced only against the Indians, the papers that work for their advancement and their leaders, and that the Anglo-Indians and their papers are above the laws of the land. . . In view of the fact that the authorities harass the papers that advocate the aspirations of the Indians, while they turn a deaf ear to and put up with papers that fearlessly insult the authorities, the public will certainly form the opinion that the Government treat the Anglo-Indian papers with great favour, and that, having tolerated them in the past, the authorities are obliged to put up with whatever they write at present. Such a view cannot be said to be wrong under the present circumstances. We therefore pray that the Government will soon wake up, put down the mischief of papers insulting them, manifest their impartial attitude, and change the opinion that now prevails among the people.

105. The Agriculture, for August, says :—In pursuance of the orders of the Government of India, the report of the Registrar of Co-operative Societies for 1915-16 has been made to cover only 20 pages. It is regrettable that the Registrar has not been allowed to write in detail about co-operation, but has been forced to see that his report does not exceed twenty pages. . . If the Government really wish that House Building Societies should work, they must provide those societies with funds. Without the pecuniary help of the Government the societies cannot thrive. . . His Excellency the Governor has stated that in a short time a Town Planning Bill will be introduced in the Legislative Council. We pray that, in that Bill, provision will be made to help these societies with funds.

AGRICULTURE, Ellore, Aug. 1917.

106. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 28th September, writes :—We have already referred to the objectionable, bitter and puerile speech of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab which was of the nature of the volcanic eruptions in the Himalayan valleys. The well-known popular leader, the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya was to have retorted the very moment. But the President stopped the quarrel by adjourning the meeting on the excuse that the time limit had been exceeded. Fortunately, however, His Excellency the Viceroy did not approve of it. At the next meeting His Excellency presided personally and gave Sir Michael O'Dwyer an opportunity of explaining himself. The latter gave a sort of apology for speaking as he did. As this apology was not explicit enough, His Excellency personally referred to the inexpediency of Sir Michael O'Dwyer's irritating speech and stated that the Honourable Members of the Council had every right to condemn Sir O'Dwyer's remarks. Pandit Malaviya thereupon replying on behalf of the popular representatives said that although Sir Michael in expressing his regret had not withdrawn his remarks against the popular representatives and political workers, he would not be misunderstood if he chose to be silent out of regard for His Excellency the Viceroy. The Pandit thereupon emphatically protested against every remark made by Sir O'Dwyer. We wish to make the following remarks in this connection. When the 19 members of the Council and the Congress Leagues have already placed before the Government their schemes for thorough reform in the judicial as well as executive branches of the administration for the whole of India including the Punjab, it was in the first place inexpedient on the part of the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi to have moved that resolution. It was still more inexpedient on the part of Sir Michael O'Dwyer to have indulged in such a "heroic" at this juncture. Nevertheless his subsequent acknowledgement of the puerility of his speech and his apologetic reply will afford considerable satisfaction to the Indians.

Sir Michael O'Dwyer's speech in the Imperial Council.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Sep. 28th, 1917.

Referring to the O'Dwyer incident, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 26th September, observes that it is to be regretted that the Anglo-Indian papers do not still understand that it is unjust on their part to assume a hostile attitude, instead of deploring the necessity for apology, brought on by the Lieutenant-Governor himself, not only in this matter but in all that concern Indians.

The O'Dwyer incident.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, Sep. 26th, 1917.

107. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 28th September, in a leading article, observes : —As soon as Mr. Chamberlain who, though not an advocate of a policy of repression, was yet its supporter, resigned his office of Secretary of State and the liberal Mr. Montagu took his place and secret orders came to be issued to the Provincial Governments to have regard for certain aspects of constitutional agitation, His Excellency the Viceroy, who had scathingly criticised the representations of the Press Deputation without a whit of sympathy, began to preach the gospel of peace with all possible tenderness ; Mrs. Besant, etc., were released ; the Bombay Government withdrew its order against Mrs. Besant ; and Sir O'Dwyer who, in the meantime, had exhibited his powers of elocution, made amends by apologising almost the very next day. In short, with the exception of one or two incidents, the sympathetic attitude of the Government is again assuming the same form and clearness which was discernible some 16 or 17 months back during the universally popular regimé of Lord Hardinge. . . It is very natural that the people should rejoice at this sudden and favourable change in the situation. It would be the height of folly, however, to allow these raptures to blind us to our duty or to slacken future efforts on this account. That is why we must be ready to consider what we should do next. When the goal of self-government within the empire has been already fixed, and there is general agreement as to the methods by which it should be attained, and these methods include the representation of popular aspirations to Mr. Montagu when he comes to India, it might seem strange that we should raise the question "what next." The pertinence of it will be evident, however, when we see the information published by the Government in regard to the mode of placing matters before Mr. Montagu. All petitions and representations should first be submitted to the Provincial Governments concerned. The latter will forward only such of them as they consider proper to the Imperial Government. The latter will again choose from among these and place only what they think fit before Mr. Montagu; and the latter will receive deputations, etc., with the Viceroy always by his side. These restrictions come to this: Nobody can approach Mr. Montagu direct. Even Provincial and Imperial Governments form two forts as it were which must be entered before Mr. Montagu can be spoken to. Even a child can understand that these forts cannot grant free access to all popular representatives and institutions. And even if these two fences are crossed, there is the Viceroy always by his side. We do not mean that the presence of the Viceroy is by itself anything adverse. But it is questionable how far the representatives will find themselves at liberty to expose the shortcomings of the administration when the Viceroy is on the right of Mr. Montagu. It is also pertinent to inquire how far Mr. Montagu will think himself free to open his mind before the representatives in the presence of the Viceroy. Under these circumstances, we are unable to say that the result of the visit will be as fruitful as the people might expect. It will be a great thing if they get what may be called a four-annas crop. If we look at the situation from Mr. Montagu's point of view, the information published by the Government of India in this connection reads somewhat strange. In the course of a speech on the Mesopotamian enquiry, Mr. Montagu has said that the demand of Home Rule in India is not very general and the agitation is not wide-spread, which means that the agitation should be more active; and now, the Government of India have constructed these two fences against the representations intended for him. When the Secretary of State is willing to hear the full say of the people, why should he be placed behind the two curtains of the Provincial and Imperial Governments? If only self-appointed representatives who are oblivious to everything outside the official view-point should have facilities to approach Mr. Montagu and the nationalists are kept at a distance, he will not be able to ascertain true public opinion, and his visit will have resulted in nothing. This question will very likely be discussed at the forthcoming session of the Congress. As Mr. Montagu will be in India for some time even after the Congress session is over, the political leaders who are to approach the Secretary of State have to be chosen beforehand. The "Home Rulers" ought to deliberate on this point from now alone. It is no use merely indulging in raptures over the release of Mrs. Besant. If the whole of India, including Mr. Bannerjee's party in Bengal, should elect Mrs. Besant as President of the Congress, it will make a good impression on Mr. Montagu that India wants Home Rule.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Sep. 28th, 1917.

Mysore Star, Mysore, Sep. 30th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit to India.

Referring to the opportunity afforded to the various classes and communities to represent their grievances, if any, at the time of Mr. Montagu's visit to India, the Mysore Star, of the 30th September, says that in these days when everybody would seek his own individual interests unless the backward classes work with twice or even three times the vigour shown by the rest in urging their wants, they are apt to lose the benefit of the golden opportunity of improving their condition and that it behoves the leaders of the backward Veerasaiva community, whose claims to separate representation in the councils of the State have been endorsed by so eminent a leader as the late Mr. Gokhale, should set themselves to the task of obtaining that privilege.

The Imperial Legislative Council.

108. Adverting to the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma that the Indian Civil and Police Services should prescribe no limitations regarding the Indian element therein and, to the Hon'ble Mr. Couchman's reference to non-Brahman agitation in the Justice, etc., regarding the inadequate representation of their community in the public services, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 28th September, says:—Hurrah! T. M. Nair! You are indeed most fortunate! You had some time back stood for election as a member of the Madras Council. Although you did not succeed then, your name and the name of your paper and of the agitation to which you have set your hand have reached even the Imperial Council at Simla. No one can be so fortunate as you. Let that pass. As the remarks of Mr. Couchman were condemned by the Hon'ble Mr. Sastri then and there, there is no need to repeat them. As Sir Vincent was very sympathetic in his concluding remarks on Mr. Sarma's resolution, Mr. Sarma withdrew his resolution.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Sep. 28th, 1917.

Sir Rabindranath Tagore and Mrs. Besant.

109. In an article giving a translation of a letter written by Sir Rabindranath Tagore to an English friend and published by him in the press explaining why he has turned an advocate of Mrs. Besant, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 1st October, observes:—Sir Tagore has herein reflected the opinion of the Indian public in general. Every fair-minded Britisher will also doubtless share this view. Those who are democrats in their own country and wish to be autocrats in India are, we think rightly, regarded as not deserving their title to be called Britishers. We must say that those who fearlessly expose the shortcomings arising from the autocratic powers under the British Government and who help to strengthen the traditions of British justice and add to the glory of the empire are its most loyal citizens. Everyone who is proud of the British rule ought to be grateful to Sir Tagore for having so frankly expressed his views and become the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Congress and helped the election of Mrs. Besant as President. When Home Rule comes to be granted to India, the Indian Parliament House will have many portraits in it. The portraits of Mrs. Besant, Messrs Mahomed Ali, Shaukat Ali and the 1,500 Home Rulers now in confinement will all be placed in that sanctuary. But the most conspicuous pictures just opposite the entrance will be those of Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar, Sir Tagore and Mrs. Besant. All unbiassed persons will be sure to regard this trio as their presiding deities in all temporal matters. May God grant them long life and health!

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Oct. 1st, 1917.

Christianity.

110. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 1st October, writes:—There was a discussion at Hebbal camp as to whether Christianity was a useless religion. There were arguments on either side. Let that pass. Christ was Justice Incarnate. The Germans and others who follow this religion have only the guise of Christians; they do not seem to follow Christ's precepts. Christ desired that we must do good to those that do us evil. Many Christians do harm even to those who did them good and prove false to their salt. Many of the Christians do not follow the precepts of their religion. This is not peculiar to Christianity. Such profligacy is to be found in every religion. But Christianity seems to outdo all other religions in this respect.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Oct. 1st, 1917.

Partiality in respect of release from internment.

111. The Manorama, of the 28th September, draws attention to the difference between the actions of the Madras and Bombay Governments, the former's cancellation of the order of internment showing that it was due to pressure from the Government of India, and the latter's withdrawal of their prohibition order against Mrs. Besant, containing a statement that they feel it their duty to do so, because the Secretary of State and the Government of India do not favour a policy of repression, rejoices that the Bombay Government have also withdrawn the prohibition order against Mr. S. M. Paranjpye, which shows that they have realised that their duty as a Provincial Government is to act in accordance with the policy of the Imperial Government, and dwells upon the necessity of releasing also Messrs. Mahomed Ali and Shaukat Ali from internment, the delay in doing which will, it thinks, produce considerable unrest amongst the Hindus and Muhammadans.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Sep. 28th, 1917.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Sept. 28h, 1917.

The Government of India and the release of Messrs. Mahomed Ali and Shaukat Ali.

112. Referring to the reply of the Government of India to an interpellation in the Imperial Legislative Council regarding the release of Messrs. Mahomed Ali and Shaukat Ali, the Manorama, of the 28th September, writes:—"If they had associated or sympathised with or helped the King-Emperor's enemies, they can never be set at liberty. But there must be sufficient proofs as to their having done so. Whether or not the records, referred to above (in their reply), are such as have been fabricated by their enemies, is a matter which deserves a thorough examination.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Sep. 28th, 1917.

The Bombay Government and the low-paid officials.

113. Referring to the appointment of a committee by the Bombay Government to consider the question of granting a batta to low-paid Government servants, in view of the rise in prices, the Manorama, of the 28th September, observes that the Madras Government also will do well to appoint a similar committee.

KERALA PATRIKA, Calicut, Sep. 22nd, 1917.

Indian administrative reforms.

114. *While taking exception to immediate grant of full self-government to India which, in its opinion, will do more harm than good to the less advanced classes, the Kerala Patrika, of the 22nd September, points out that, when increased administrative privileges are conceded to Indians, steps should also be taken to improve the condition and status of such classes, and to safeguard the interests of the various castes and creeds in the country, and that the "Home Rule Party" will do well to remember that to create dissensions among the Indians at the present moment will be playing into the hands of the Anglo-Indians, who are opposed to all reforms, and hopes that by the time Mr. Montagu arrives in India, all these quarrels will cease.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

The Viceroy's concluding speech.

115. Referring to the closing speech of His Excellency the Viceroy at the Simla session of the Imperial Legislative Council, which was quite consistent with His Excellency's opening speech, the Manorama, of the 2nd October, points out that it is clear from it that, though His Excellency is ready to safeguard the interests of the European community in India, and no reforms, calculated to do injustice to them or to any other classes, will be carried out during his regime, His Excellency does not care a jot for their threats, and hopes that these threats will not lead to a change in the conciliatory policy now adopted by the Government of India.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

The Indian Defence Force.

116. The Manorama, of the 2nd October, applauds the announcement of the Hon'ble Mr. Kumara Sahib Shaikar Shar Roy to give a present of Rs. 100 to each and every one of those who join the Indian Defence Force, and of the Raja of Venkatagiri to give them lands and money as presents, and hopes that the wealthy people in Malabar will follow the example of these two great men.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, Sep. 19th, 1917.

Home Rule and Mussalmans.

117. We have shown in the Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 19th September, that Home Rule, as demanded by our Hindu compatriots, is opposed to the interests of Mussalmans, and facts go to show that their religious freedom would be interfered with. Existing British rule has proved itself to be very beneficial to Mussalmans in that the Government have recognised the separate claims of Muhammadans.

Probably it is remembered that, during the Viceroyatly of Lord Minto when Lord Morley was Secretary of State for India, the Government declared its willingness to admit the claims of Mussalmans to a separate electorate. To this the Hindus took serious exception. Had the Government not been firm in its attitude, hardly a single Mussalman would today have been found on the Legislative Councils? There are several such favours shown by the Government to the Mussalmans, and it is believed the British Government, which in accordance with the Mussalman faith, is the Government of the people of the Book and the followers of Hazrath (Jesus Christ) on whom be peace, will treat the Mussalmans more friendly and fraternally.

* Received this week.

Here the editor reproduces in extenso a Fatwa (religious decree) against participation in the Home Rule propaganda over the signatures of the following divines:—

(1) Zahid Husain Hanafi, (2) Ghulām Muhī-ud-dīn, (3) Qazi Fasi-ud-din, (4) Saiyid Muhī-ud-dīn, trustee of the endowment of Amir-un-ni-sa mosque, (5) Mir Ghulām Jilani Muhammad Abu-Bakar Qazi-ul-Quzzat, Madras and districts, (6) Ghulām Mahmūd, Deputy to Madras and districts, (7) Tajammul Husain Khan Bahadur (Iman), (8) Saiyid Muhammad Fakhr-ud-din Naqvi, Fakhri, (9) Khajat Shah Hidayat-ul-la, (10) Muhammad Fazl-ul-la (written by).

The Fatwa has a quotation from the Kōrān declaring Christians in the matter of friendship to be better than Jews and idolators because they have elders and divines and are not proud.

117. The Qaumi Report, of the 27th September, referring to the reply given by the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent on behalf of the Government of India regarding the release of Messrs. Mahomed 'Ali and Shaukat 'Ali, writes:— The Government of India have stated that Mahomed 'Ali and Shaukat 'Ali have openly expressed sympathy with the enemies of the King. But no one knows what proof and evidence exist for this statement. The Government say that they have endangered public peace. But nobody knows where a revolution has occurred, where the flags of the King's enemies are flying or where murders are being committed.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Sep. 27th, 1917.

The Government of India's refusal: the defeat of the Mussalmans.

The Parliament excuses the Irish revolutionists and the Government releases the supporters of Home Rule, but does not consider it advisable to liberate those whose offence is still kept secret.

If it is not considered advisable to cancel the order of internment regarding Mahomed 'Ali and Shaukat 'Ali, why are (1) Moulana Saiyid Fazlul Hasan Hazrat Mohani, (2) Moulana Mahmūd Husain Devobandi, (3) Moulana Abul Kalam Azad, (4) Moulana Muhi-ud-din Ahmad Khusūri, (5) Moulavi Imam-ud-din Hushiarpuri, (6) Moulavi Abdul Vali Khan Peshawari, (7) Moulavi Hamdulla Panipati and (8) Mr. Saiyid Muhammad, not released? Are they also in fault? Are they, too, considered suspects?

The Government of India's reply has hurt the feelings, disappointed and upset the aspirations of seven crores of Muhammadans. Lord Chelmsford had given a conciliatory reply and Mr. Montagu had approved it. But all these promises were intended for non-Muhammadans. The promise made by the Government of India on the 5th instant to grant a general amnesty and the intimation of its readiness to release Mahomed 'Ali and Shaukat 'Ali have been honoured in the breach.

The editor, with the above remarks, advises Muhammadans not to be displeased with or sorry for or take exception to the action of the Government. Patience is our ancient and precious motto. God is testing us with the calamities of peace and tranquility. The clouds will soon roll away.

118. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 27th September, in a sub-leader, comments on the marginally-noted subject as follows:—A pamphlet entitled Fakhri's appeal has been received for review in this office. God willing we will frankly and fully review it and point out that those self-styled sympathisers and leaders of the community who represent their individual opinion to be that of the community, are in fact self-interested persons who are false to their community.

Jaridah-i-Rozgar, Madras, Sep. 27th, 1917.

Fakhri's appeal.

The writer of the pamphlet Moulana Fakhri, an old friend of ours, appears to have felt it incumbent upon himself to publish this brochure at the present moment. He has proved by Islamic and secular history that if there is a community in the world that can call itself loyal to the King, it is the Muhammadan community. The Islamic world ought to be thankful to Moulana Fakhri, for he has exposed to the community the selfishness of the Muslim League and the Congress, and placed before them the actual record of those ambitious and ostentatious leaders. He has given publicity to the fact that all Mussalmans are on principle opposed to the Congress, the Muslim League and the Home Rule propaganda.

In one place Moulana writes that the Government and the Muslim public are fully aware of the Islamic rules and principles that are laid down for the guidance of a leader. At the present moment there does not exist a single person, either among the enlightened or the members of the Muslim League, who possesses the qualifications of a real leader of the Muhammadan community or even a genuine political leader. Those self-interested persons, who claim to represent the community are in reality no leaders at all. As a matter of fact, leaders are becoming so numerous that the community is heartily sick of them.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Sep. 23rd, 1917.

A hostile Fetwa (religious decree) provoking discord between Muhammadans and Hindus: an attack upon holy Islam.

119. The Qaumi Report, of the 23rd September, has a leader on the marginally-noted subject of which the following is the gist:—The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 19th September, has published the Fetwa of a few muftis through which some strange and curious commands are issued having for the object the representing of holy Islam as a disagreable, hostile, bigoted, and treacherous religion. It seems that it required the seal and sign manual of ten muftis to spread discord between Hindus and Muhammadans and to prove that Islam is man's enemy "That is is a perfect ten" (Kōrān).

Andhraprakasika, Madras, Sep. 27th, 1917.

Administration in Hyderabad.

121. The Andhraprakasika, of the 27th September, in an article under this heading, observes as follows:—. . . Hyderabad is not on the line with the Native States at the present time in the matter of education, irrigation, agriculture, industries, railways, roads, police and every other thing. The administration report of the State ending with October 1916 indicates an improvement over last year's.

All the same what in the opinion of the Nizam's Dominions is an improvement cannot be recognised as such. . . We regret to state that, while in British India the student population is 41 per cent, it is only 7 or 8 per cent in the Nizam's Dominions. Is it not plain therefore that much attention is not paid to education in that State? Coming to sanitation, when in the Hyderabad city, no preparation has yet been made for good water-supply and drainage system, does it not speak of the indifference of the rulers?

Vokkaligara Patrike, Bangalore, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

The Postal administration in Mysore.

122. The Vokkaligara Patrike, of the 3rd October, observes:—A special committee of the Mysore Representative Assembly, which met at Arsikere to concert measures for the improvement of the Malnad tracts, have made the following observations: It is thirty years since the British postal administration was introduced into Mysore. The administration has proved very useful to the public. But the postal facilities in the rural tracts cannot be regarded as satisfactory. The majority of the subjects of Mysore reside in villages. These do not benefit much by the present system. This is evident from the complaints which are frequently made in the Representative Assembly. The postal revenue has increased considerably during recent years. It is therefore imperative that postal facilities in the rural parts should be improved.

The postal revenue during the last five years has been steadily increasing. Our province too has contributed to this increase in proportion to its population; and yet, the candidates of Mysore for the higher posts in this department have not been appointed in the same proportion. It behoves the Government of India to consider these grievances. A large number of branch offices deserve to be raised to the status of sub-offices. In some places the postmasters of branch offices have also to carry the mails, besides doing their office work. The delivery of letters too has to be done by them. It is regrettable that even in those villages which lie on the mail-road there are no branch offices. The number of postmen in India which was 7,944 in 1902 rose to 8,219 in 1912. In Mysore, on the other hand, their number has decreased. It is regrettable that the number of post offices remains the same as it was thirty years ago, while in the sister provinces of Madras and Bombay the number has increased. Two new offices were no doubt established in 1915-16 but three other offices were closed. It is therefore necessary that the number of post offices in this province should be increased. In consideration of the above circumstances, the committee have made the following suggestions:—(1) The number of rural post offices should be increased. It will not be difficult to do so in areas where there are elementary schools. (2) The number of rural postmen should be increased so as to limit the area of their work and to provide that they shall not have to travel more than eight miles a day. (3) The village postman ought to deliver the letters direct to the addressee. When the latter happens to be absent from his village, he must deliver them to a responsible headman of the village and obtain his signature therefor. The headman ought to enter them in a register and obtain signature on delivering them to the addressee.

It seems to us that the Government of India ought to carry out these suggestions. It would be well to publish a separate report on the postal administration for the Mysore province. Further it would be well to entrust the control of all offices in the province to one Central office and keep the latter under the directions of the Mysore Government. It is desirable to re-introduce the postal system which was once in vogue in the province. The Government of India will not fail to accord their approval to this.

A Military Honour to Mysore.

124. The Vokkaligara Patrike, of the 3rd October, welcoming the news that His Majesty the King Emperor has been pleased to confer the title of Lieutenant-Colonel of a British Regiment on J. Desaraj Urs, M.V.O., C.I.E., says that the Colonel has not only displayed his prowess in the Burmese war, but has also been at the front in Egypt in the present war and that this recognition of his courage and ability by His Majesty is an honour done to Mysore.

Agricultural improvements.

126. Dwelling on the importance of agricultural improvements and the conservative tendency of the Indian agriculturist to adopt new methods of cultivation, the Yathartha-vachani, of the 24th August, writes:—If the land should be properly cultivated to yield a good outturn and the country prosper thereby, the people in all towns and villages ought to be told the details of using the modern implements of agriculture. Further, the importance of the modern methods of cultivation should be explained to them in different places.

Yathartavachani, Kumbakonam, Sep. 24th, 1917.

The administration of the Agricultural department should be in the hands of the Indians, who, besides, being educated, should possess both the theoretical and practical knowledge of agriculture. The supervising officers of the department should continue to be Europeans. At present there are 62 higher posts in this department of which only two are held by Indians. At least a majority of these posts should be held by Indians, as in course of time the department itself will have to be managed by them. The Government should consider these facts and appoint a larger number of Indians to higher offices in this department as it will create enthusiasm in them for work which will contribute to the success of the department.

1. The Hindu, of the 9th October, remarks:—"We should like to put one question to the authorities responsible for the maintenance of law and order in this city: were there any Criminal Investigation Department reporters present at the meeting of Panchamas on Sunday? We have received from various correspondents who were present at the meeting letters asserting that a very deliberate attempt was made to inflame the worst passions of the mob by at least one speaker. . . If it is true that any such outrageous appeal was made, the disturbance that occurred at the meeting assumes a much more sinister aspect than otherwise we would have been inclined to attach to it, for it indicates that organised rowdyism was afoot, the full consequences of which may yet be far more serious than an assault on a few youths playing at hockey. . . Is it too much to ask some of our contemporaries, stern champions of law and order against marauding Viceroys and Secretaries of State, to take up such a concrete case of incitement to breach of the peace as was made, according to our reports, directly by one speaker and indirectly by several other leading lights of the 'loyal' fraternity? Or are Brahmans outside the pale of the law and is it a case of the practical application of the principle of 'no quarter to Home Rulers' which is the main plank of the European platform? We wait for an answer from the authorities as well as those journals who are so meticulously careful about the slightest infringement of the prestige of those authorities."

Hindu, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

2. The Wednesday Review, of the 3rd October, states:—"There is no denying that the strikes and other undesirable features of students' life just now are due to the activity of the agitators who have to indent upon the services of the students to get up a show of a following. We do not think they are obtuse enough not to perceive the harm they do to the young men by taking them away from their studies and distracting their attention. No one contends that the student from the primary class to the highest university class should be asked to keep his attention glued to his book and that he must not take an intelligent interest in what goes on about him. . . But there is considerable difference between a student reading newspapers and discussing current politics with his school-fellows and his elders at home or his teachers, and his heading Home Rule processions and his being planted in the gallery to shout down sensible politicians. Those who encourage him in these ways are criminally oblivious of his best interests and for the matter of that are guilty of deliberate disservice to their country. The spectacle of a number of outsiders forming themselves into a committee to mediate between the Principal of an institution and the students whom he had to punish for indiscipline is unedifying in the extreme and will not be tolerated for a moment in any of the seats of learning in England where everybody is said to breathe democracy. Such interference is bound to lower the power and the prestige of the head of an educational institution, and set a premium on indiscipline."

Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

3. In a leader on this subject, the Cochin Argus, for the week ending 6th October, says:—"We cannot but find ourselves fully in agreement with those who condemn, as a most deplorable exhibition of unstatesmanship, the astounding action of the Government of India and the Secretary of State, or, at any rate, one of these two,

Cochin Argus, British Cochin, Oct. 6th, 1917.

The Indian political crisis.

in over-riding the Government of Madras by directing the unconditional release from internment of Mrs. Besant and her two colleagues. What makes this action on the part of the higher authorities all the more extraordinary and indefensible is the puerile reason which has been seriously assigned in support of it. The Government of India and the Secretary of State knew quite well all the circumstances under which Mrs. Besant and her two friends had been deprived of that part of their civic liberty, which they had been scandalously abusing. They knew quite well, it is safe to presume, that the Madras Government had only resolved upon the internments, after it had become only too evident that the mischievous political agitation, engineered by Mrs. Besant, was having its inevitable and injurious effect in bringing the Government and the whole body of its officials into utter contempt, chiefly among the untutored masses and the undiscerning sections among the educated classes. . . The pitifulness of it all lies in the fact that the two higher Governments had apparently been previously satisfied with regard to the course which had been taken by Lord Pentland's Government and, as far as the public are aware, for very nearly three months, these two higher Governments had acquiesced in the internment order. Mr. Montagu probably needs a very tranquil atmosphere in which to study Indian problems, but it is quite plain that, in seeking to bring about such an atmosphere, he has scarcely attempted to uphold the prestige and self-respect of Provincial Governments in this country or to consider the consequences which are liable to arise, when duly constituted and responsible authority, pursuing a policy of cheap opportunism, descends to make an unconditional surrender to political agitation of a type acknowledged to be pernicious and unpermissive. . . Supposing that Mr. Montagu should find it impossible to eventually concede the demands of the Home Rulers, what will be the sort of atmosphere he will leave as the legacy of his Indian visit to the Government on the spot? We doubt if the Secretary of State has given any consideration to this aspect of the question, but we are very strong in our belief that, in throwing the Madras Government unceremoniously overboard, the Government of India and the Home Government have struck a heavy blow at constitutional administration, while, at the same time, we very respectfully take off our hat to His Excellency Lord Pentland for the splendid spirit of abnegation he has so far shown in retaining an office, in which he has been shamelessly and undeservedly stultified, in order that a handful of unscrupulous agitators might be won over to keep quiet, until it suits their purpose to create fresh clamour and sow more seeds of unrest and of mistrust and contempt of the Government by law constituted."

Travancore Times, Nagercoil, Oct. 9th, 1917.

The Congress Presidentship.

4. The following appears in the Travancore Times for the week ending 9th October:—"Mrs. Besant has almost unanimously been elected to preside over the deliberations of the next session of the Indian National Congress. This was not unanticipated. When the Indian air is charged with Home Rule tension, who can ignite it effectively but the organiser of the Home Rule League? . . . If the whole of India rises as one body and crave for Home Rule or at least the great majority of the people of India demand it certainly the British Government would feel that their task in India is more or less completed and grant the demand with grace. But that is not now the case. Hence if the Government, because of clamour, give up the undertaking they have made towards the poverty-stricken millions of India, they will not only be disappointing a people who looked to them for good but also be failing in their clear duty. . . If we are fit for Home Rule which some gentlemen say they more than are in the face of an array of facts against it why should we look to an Irish lady to put up the agitation for it? Is India bereft of leading men who can lay their claims before the Government? Viewing the present situation we have to say that in the absence of Mrs. Besant there will not be so much agitation for the grant of political power to the Indians because the diversity of customs and manners of different communities is against combination. . . The selection of a foreigner to preside over a National Assembly is against our ambition and it is against principle. If the popular element have a voice in deciding those matters certainly things would have been different. But as it is, the millions of India who have been kept under for ages or with gaping mouths wondering what calamities will happen to them by the resolutions of the Congress when Mrs. Besant is its leading spirit pandering to the power seeking few."

The Moslem interned.

5. Justice, of the 11th October, observes:—"From reports published in newspapers from time to time we see that the manufacture of a special political atmosphere of sweetness and light for Mr. Montagu's benefit is proceeding most satisfactorily. . . The agitation that has been roused by the continued retention under internment of Mr. Mahomed Ali and his brother threatens the calm of the political atmosphere. We cannot see any logic in the action of the Government. If the release of those who are interned is the result of a revision of their respective cases on the merits of those cases we can understand the difference made between one interned and another, but when the release is the outcome of political considerations and of a desire to promote a calm political atmosphere there is no room for any distinction being made between interned and interned. . . In India as long as the Muhammadan interned are locked up while the Europeans and the Parsee are let out, one would naturally suppose that greater irritation would be caused than otherwise. Either the policy of releasing the interned to create a calm political atmosphere is right or it is wrong. If it is right to release Mrs. Besant it is right to release Mr. Mahomed Ali. If it is inexpedient to release Mr. Mahomed Ali it was equally inexpedient to release Mrs. Besant."

JUSTICE, Madras, Oct. 11th, 1917.

Writing on this subject, the Indian Patriot, of the 12th October, says:—"The unfortunate answer to the interpellation regarding the release of Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali, now interned at Chindiwara has been responsible for a serious agitation, in which Muhammadans who do not ordinarily interest themselves in politics have joined, if anything, with even greater fervour. We cannot forget the almost demoniac glee with which the news that the Alis were not to be released was received by the European Association meeting at Calcutta. . . We appeal to the Government to publish the evidence against the Alis that they were in sympathy with Turkey. The spiritual allegiance which the Koran insists every follower of the Prophet to own to the Sultan of Turkey is absolutely consistent with active loyalty to the British Raj: the Pathan soldier is displaying his active loyalty everywhere. If the internment of the Alis is due to this vague, undefined, we might add, superstitious regard for the Sultan, every Muhammadan in India ought to be interned. Is there any definite charge against the Alis? If there is, the Government must publish it and thus prevent an agitation which threatens to assume proportions. . . Nothing will unite the Moslems more rapidly than the cry of 'religion in danger'. That is exactly the cry raised, and the reply of the Government gives occasion for the cry. There is no doubt about the Muhammadan feeling on the subject. Those who ordinarily take no interest in politics have come forward to protest. If the Government would not show a higher statesmanship at the present moment, it would be driving them to an agitation which will be quite the antipodes to the atmosphere of peace."

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Oct. 6th, 1917.

The war.

6. Referring to the decision of the British Government to pay the Germans in their own coin in the matter of their frequent air-raids on England, the Hindu Nesan, of the 6th October, does not understand how this decision can prevent the enemy air-raids and remarking that this line of action has perhaps been taken by them in order to satisfy public opinion, adds that, once the Government have decided on committing retaliatory air-raids, they should carry out the decision without any delay.

Dravidan, Madras, Oct. 5th, 1917.

The Pope's note.

7. Referring to the details of the Pope's note to the belligerents suggesting that, in order to preserve permanent peace in the world, every kingdom should disband its army, keeping only such forces as are barely necessary for self-defence and should abide by the decision of a central arbitration board, which will have the power of punishing such countries as do not accept its awards, the Dravidan, of the 5th October, observes:—Germany, which has had a sound thrashing in Flanders, has no reason to stand by her post yet. She will give up Belgium perhaps only after she is taught a good lesson even in this region and this too has begun. The fact that, when the Pope's note clearly stated that the terms of peace could be settled only after Belgium and France were vacated, Germany gave an evasive reply indicates, by itself, the advent of the date of her ruin.

Kistnapatrika, Masulipatam, Oct. 6th, 1917.

German æroplanes.

8. The Kistnapatrika, of the 6th October, says:—The German æroplanes raid England every day and are causing loss of life and damage to property. When we know that the raid in June caused the death of 500 people, we can guess what havoc is caused by these raids. Some English people ask why British æroplanes should not cause havoc in German towns. But the Bishop of Canterbury expresses himself against any such reprisals. Such reprisals will stimulate the natural cruelty of the Germans all the more.

Police Administration Report for 1916.

9. In commenting favourably upon the Police Administration Report for the year 1916, the Kerala Patrika, of the 6th October, points out that, in order to attract educated and respectable people to the department, not only should the pay of the police officers be increased but the attitude of the higher officials towards their subordinates should also improve, and observes that, all things considered, some more reforms seem to be still necessary in this department, but that it means more money.

10. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 29th September, referring to the City Police Report for last year, writes:—We consider that the important work performed by the Police under the guidance and direction of Mr. Armitage, the popular Commissioner of Police, deserves the thanks of the public.

(d) Education.

Dravidan, Madras, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

Students and politics.

11. A correspondent to the Dravidan, of the 3rd October, reports that a few students were present at a meeting held at Tiruvarur by the local Home Rule League on the 28th September 1917.

Students and politics.

Adverting to the recent order issued by the Punjab Government prohibiting students from attending political meetings or otherwise taking part in politics, the Swadesamitran, of the 9th October, observes:—The frightened man is afraid of the smallest straw and it is indeed the few officers, who in their fear do not sympathise with our aspirations, that say that students will be totally ruined if they have anything to do with politics. Can it be said that in at least a single political meeting words are used which transgress the law in any way? No. We can definitely assert that there is no ground whatever for the fear entertained by the authorities. Unless the strange orders issued by the several provincial Governments in this connection are cancelled, the authorities, the people and the students cannot be free from unnecessary anxiety in the matter.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

The Palghat College.

12. The Swadesamitran, of the 9th October, reproduces in Tamil a telegram received from a correspondent about the strike situation in this College, which is also published in the Hindu of the same date.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

The Palghat College.

Referring to the present situation in this College, Dravidapatrika, of the 10th October, deprecates the existing relationship between the Principal and his students and the uncompromising attitude of the former in allowing the strike to go on in spite of the suggestions made to him by the Chairman of the Palghat Municipality, and observes that, as some consider that good days will dawn upon the College only after Mr. Shankunni is removed from his office, he will now at least give up his obduracy and discharge the duties of Principal peacefully.

DRAVIDAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 10th, 1917.

The message of Sir Rabindranath.

13. The Andhrapatrika, of the 5th October, says under this heading:—Sir Rabindranath has made it plain that that which obstructs the spread of education most is the practice of making a foreign language the medium of instruction. . . The ordinary objection to the imparting of education by means of the vernaculars is that there are no text-books in the vernaculars. But how can such books come into existence when no endeavours are made to give instruction in the vernaculars? If higher education should wait for books, trees should wait, without growing, for leaves and rivers should wait for banks. The only means for standard vernacular works coming out is to impart education through the vernaculars. . . The present-day education does not help to inspire the daily life of man. The University degrees only determine the market value of students, and help them to obtain posts. They do not help very much to produce great men characterised by ardent patriotism. To obviate this evil, national schools should be established and national education, imparted.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 5th, 1917.

The educational system.

14. The Andhraprakasika, of the 6th October, writes in a leader under this heading:—The present educational system has done grave injustice to the masses of the population of this country. It has denied equal opportunities to the different communities of people in this country. It tends to choke up and strangle talent and capacity. It weans men from the plough and the loom and entices them into petty clerkships. It is perpetuating class tyranny, but is not putting an end to it. It does not help on the political reconstruction. By it the best interests of the people are being sacrificed at the altar of class selfishness.

There is no immediate way out of these difficulties. . . The educated among us deliver long lectures on primary education, but give prominence to higher education when there is an occasion for it. Even the Government in this matter side the educated without any consideration. The Government are aware that under this system primary education does not reach the masses. . . We cannot but say that the Government do not take proper interest to obviate this. It is in the hands of the Government to promote either primary education or higher education. The Government alone can do this, but not the people. Need we say what immense good the country will derive if the crores of money spent on the Hindu and the Muslim Universities are devoted to the propagation of free primary education?

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 6th, 1917.

(e) Local and Municipal.

Dinamani, Cuddalore, Sep. 29th, 1917.

The administration of the South Arcot District Board for 1916-17.

15. The Desabhimani, of the 29th September, comments, as follows, in English upon the administration report of the South Arcot District Board for 1916-17:—. . . After adjustments of contributions due to other district boards on account of plague charges the year's accounts closed with a deficit of Rs. 82,360 under general funds against a deficit of Rs. 1,10,181 in the previous year. Though the existence of a minus balance in the district board is a sorry feature of its administration, yet it is a matter for consolation that during the period under review the district board was able to reduce it to some appreciable extent. We trust our resourceful non-official president will soon try to devise ways and means to restore, as early as possible, the financial condition of the board to a satisfactory level.

. . . The receipts under avenues amounted to Rs. 54,362 against Rs. 34,819 in the previous year. Though there was actually a fall in the receipts under avenues owing to the cyclone damages, the increase of Rs. 19,543 on the whole under this head during the year is due to the sale-proceeds of the trees uprooted by the cyclone. We hope that applications for remission of the lease amounts relating to avenue produce will receive the prompt and due consideration of the district board. . .

The resources of the district board having been fully dealt with above, it may not be without interest to examine how the money was utilized by the board and how the board's affairs were administered. In matters educational, the district board did not seem to be lacking in interest during the year under review. There were four sessional schools maintained during the year, which appear to have produced satisfactory results. The new scheme sanctioned by Government in April 1917 and brought into force in July 1917 will, we hope, contribute to the better working of these schools. The taluk boards continued to maintain four incomplete secondary schools, and the total number of pupils on the rolls at the end of the year was 872 against 793 in the previous year. It is gratifying to note that the school at Villupuram, which has had the advantage of fourth form newly opened during the year and to which fifth form also was added since June 1917, has been reported to be working at a profit. This evidently shows how readily the people appreciate and embrace the opportunity when facilities are offered for the spread and growth of education. The other three incomplete secondary schools at Vriddhachalam, Porto Novo and Tirukkōyilūr are reported to be doing fairly good work, and it must be conceded that they are really meeting a genuine need of the locality. The present unsuitable accommodation for the Vriddhachalam and Tirukkōyilūr schools deserves the prompt and earnest consideration of the board. In the present crippled state of the finances of the district and taluk boards, we earnestly wish the Government will be pleased to come to their rescue by helping them with a liberal building grant. . .

So far as medical matters are concerned, the general attendance of patients declined and the reason assigned for it that some of the institutions had to be closed temporarily for want of adequate medical staff, is an unfortunate circumstance indeed. It is noteworthy that steps are being taken to give practical training in mufassal hospitals to hereditary midwives in private practice. The work of the vaccination staff was not satisfactory and the percentage of successful operations low. We hope that the adoption of the scheme of the district board for the reorganisation of the vaccination staff will produce better results. . . We are sorry that adequate attention was not bestowed on rural sanitation and communication by the local boards. Nor was any work of village sanitation carried out by rural co-operative societies during the year. The sanitary staff was inadequate in some of the unions. The amount spent on village communications during the year was Rs. 16,454 against Rs. 33,287 in the previous year. The fall in this item of expenditure is again attributed to paucity of fund and the crying needs of the main roads. The extension of village-sites and relief of congestion in their areas is still at its initial stage and no substantial progress was shown by any of the taluk boards. It is our earnest hope that matters affecting the welfare of villages will, in future, receive greater importance and attention from the boards than they were receiving hitherto.

* * * * * *

Regarding the administration of the non-official presidents of the taluk boards in the district, we are glad that Diwan Bahadur Mr. A. Subbarayalu Reddiyar has continued to earn the appreciation of Government for the customary energy displayed by him in his honorary duties.

The same paper reproduces the above in its Tamil columns.

16. A correspondent to the Dravidan, of the 8th October, complains that, of the eight members of this union, which, he says, is a big one with a population of 12,000 only, only four are non-officials and, referring to the fact that the Chairman of the union is to be elected from among the members themselves, requests that in the interests of the union the number of non-official members may be raised so that every community in the village may be represented in the union.

Uttiramerur union.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Oct. 8th, 1917.

17. The Dravidan, of the 9th October, has the following running comments on a variety of subjects:—It looks as if municipalities have adopted partiality as a salutary principle. The Madura Municipality seems to have prosecuted a number of private individuals, for not removing prickly-pear in their lands promptly. But at the same time it seems to plead want of funds to remove this very prickly-pear, which abounds extensively in its lands. When a Municipality collecting taxes throughout its area has no money, how can the poor tax-payers be expected to have it, and what is the justice of this differentiation in treatment?

Tit-bits.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

The same kind of justice obtains even in Madras. Private individuals are worried to any extent, if they do not keep their drains and houses in good repair and fill up the ponds in their lands promptly. But how about the deplorable condition of the public drains and roads and tanks and pits in municipal lands? Money, time and every other facility are required only by the municipality and not by private individuals!

It appears a District Board school at Russelkonda in the Ganjam district is located in a thatched shed. Having only side screens for purposes of ventilation and no windows, these have to be lifted up in summer for letting in breeze, thereby exposing the boys to the rays of the sun, and to be let down in winter to keep out rain water, thereby depriving the boys of all light. Thus it is awful heat in summer and utter darkness in winter! We hope steps will be taken to improve the location of mufassal schools hereafter at least.

18. A correspondent to the Desamata, of the 3rd October, says:—It is many years since the suburb of Aryapuram of the town of Rajahmundry was constructed. The roads that were then laid have not since been repaired. . . . The bridge over the drainage channel being in disrepair has been the abode of venemous serpents for a long time. There is not even one lamp post near it. When the inconvenience of this state of things was represented to the municipality, they have not taken steps to repair the bridge, though they have transplanted a lamp post here from another place. Drainage water stagnates on the sides of roads, and our representations to the municipality against this state of things have turned out to be so many cries in the wilderness. Our petitions were consigned to the waste paper basket. We pray that the Government at least will interfere in the matter and do the needful, etc.

20. The Swadesamitran, of the 3rd October, notes with regret that, in spite of the existence of many extensive forests in India with a plenitude of raw products which can be utilised in several other ways for industrial purposes than what is being done, thereby not only increasing the income of the Government but also providing fresh means of livelihood for the people, and referring to the fact that five lakhs of rupees are said to have been sanctioned by the Mysore Darbar for providing facilities for communication in forests, remarks that, considering the condition of industries in this country, it is necessary that the Indian forests should be improved to a very large extent.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

Tenali-Guntūr Railway.

23. The Andhrapatrika, of the 9th October, says under this heading :—The announcement of the Madras and Southern Maharatta Railway Company that neither passengers nor goods will be carried on the Tenali-Guntūr Railway does not state the period for which the notice will be in force. The Desabhimani, of the 29th July, published certain rumours in this connection and, in answer to a question put in the meeting of the District Board held on the 31st July, the Collector said that the rumours were all groundless. The agitation of the people thereupon showed signs of abatement. But the announcement in question may cause some surprise to the people. The authorities have not given out any reasons for the announcement. This railway is undoubtedly useful to all the people in the Guntūr district. It is not, therefore, satisfactory under such circumstances to have published such an announcement without consulting the people. The Government might have taken this step on account of the war, and the people could then have no objection to it. Victory in the war is surely many times more necessary in the interests of the subjects than in those of the Government. But it is disappointing to the people that the authorities should take such a step in a matter affecting the interests of all the people, without consulting them. This cannot be indicative of the new angle of vision. There is nothing in this announcement about the Tenali-Repalli line. If the authorities contemplate to announce any restrictions on this line, they will do well to consult the people. This line is maintained with the money of the people.

25. The Swadesamitran, of the 29th September, reproduces in Tamil a lecture said to have been delivered by Babu Bhagavan Das at Benares in Hindi, in the course of which he makes the following observations:—Has any Viceroy or any other Provincial Governor tried to ascertain from the leaders whether the cry raised by the Congress for the last 32 years is a legitimate cry or not? Is it the opinion of the bureaucrats that the leaders of the Congress have not qualifications enough to talk with them on equal terms? The position of these leaders is in no way inferior to that of the bureaucrats. The opinion of the Congress is no more than that the destruction of our ancient industries has rendered us helpless and that, as all trade is in the hands of the foreigners, India has to look to other countries to satisfy her needs. How and when can these defects be remedied? If the Government are approached about it, they suggest no remedy, but ask us to keep quiet. They do not patiently listen to our complaints. They listen to tales and misunderstand us. They ascertain everything through the Secret Police. That is why we demand Home Rule. Lord Pentland was pleased to say that the British Government would not take up the responsibility of satisfying our aspirations. When all powers and all higher appointments are in the hands of the British, who else than the Government can take up the responsibility? If the Indians are granted Home Rule, they will take up the responsibility. When agriculture and trade suffer, the responsibility for it can rest only with the rulers. All that the Congress want is that the people of the country should have enough for their sustenance and that they should preserve their self-respect. It is because we have not enough to eat and have no self-respect, that the world laughs at us. Even our Rajas and Nawabs are treated like coolies in South Africa, Australia and other British Colonies, and yet our complaints are not heard. Even though the Indians are now allowed to have their say in the Legislative Councils, no practical benefit accrues therefrom. So there should be reforms in every department. We, therefore, entreat the Provincial Governors to listen to the cry of the people in a sympathetic sprit and redress their grievances. In view of the numerous benefits conferred on the Indians by the British Government, they have sacrificed their all in this war. Our demand is, therefore, that we should be granted Home Rule as it exists in the colonies.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

28. Adverting to the active agitation of the Anglo-Indians against the new policy of the Government, the Swadesamitran, of the 3rd October, observes:— It is a fact to be noted that the plea advanced by the Anglo-Indians against the new policy in the protest meetings held in the different provinces is not the same. For example, they make much of the interests of the landed aristocracy in this Presidency and say that the majority of them are against Home Rule. In the Calcutta meeting it was argued that it was the landed aristocracy that wanted Home Rule and that it was the duty of the Anglo-Indians to save the poor ryots from the tyranny of these landholders. So the only common feature in this new movement of the Anglo-Indians seems to be the fact of agitation. Evidently they are afraid that their influence may go, if the existing differences between the ruling race and the ruled race should disappear. No one should be beguiled by their so-called magnanimity in the matter of the Indian reforms. They declare such reforms as have already been

The Anglo-Indian agitation.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

contemplated by the Government to be their own recommendations, so that they can appreciate their own moderation, after these are carried into effect! But it is stated that the Secretary of State has returned the despatch of the Government of India on the ground that the reforms proposed therein are not conceived on liberal lines. As an indication of a liberal turn in the attitude of the Government, the policy of repression has been given up. Mr. Montagu is going here, only with a view to discharge his duty on his own responsibility, without the help of the Anglo-Indians. It is quite natural that the Anglo-Indian papers view these things with alarm and are raising a big hue and cry before the reforms take a definite shape. It is now two weeks since the one cable of the Madras Mail was sent and nothing strange has occurred yet. The war is still carried on with full vigour and Mr. Montagu has not yet vacated his seat as Secretary of State for India nor has Mr. Lloyd George, who supports him, ceased to be the Prime Minister. Not even Lord Curzon has resigned his seat in the Cabinet! The important papers in London, too, do not seem to have cared for the cable of the Madras Mail. But it is a fact to be noted that, though the cable of the Madras Mail has become a cry in the wilderness in England, whose whole attention is now engrossed in the war, we cannot completely ignore the united agitation carried on by the Anglo-Indians in India. We should lay bare the real condition and objects of these Anglo-Indians, who pretend to be very anxious about the progress of the masses. We should demonstrate to Mr. Montagu that every soul in India, irrespective of educational qualifications, wealth or sex, is intent upon the introduction of reforms in the country in view to the grant of Home Rule. An excellent suggestion has been made by Mr. Gandhi that the best way of doing this is by presenting a monster petition to Mr. Montagu signed by all people, indicating thereby that they approve of the reforms proposed by the Congress and the Muslim League. Arrangements are being made for this purpose in every province. We hope all the Indians will realise their duty in this matter and co-operate in making this movement a success.

The Muslim leaders in internment.

Referring to the large number of telegrams sent to the Government of India both by Muhammadans and others praying for the release of these leaders, the Liva-ul-Islam, of the 4th October, urges that the Government of India should reconsider their decision in the matter, on the score that these internments create unrest among the Muhammadan community, and hopes that, at least to satisfy the Indian Muslims, who in loyalty to their Emperor are now fighting against their co-religionists, the Government would show mercy and release Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali, even if it be found that they had acted in any way wrong.

The release of the Muslim interned.

The Swadesamitran, of the 8th October, publishes in Tamil the proceedings of a meeting held by the members of the Attar Jamath community at Coimbatore on the 3rd idem, under the presidency of the Peish Imam of the Attar Jamath Masjid for the purpose of praying for the release of the interned Muslim leaders, as they appear in the Hindu of the 8th idem. The same paper reproduces in Tamil the speech delivered by Mr. C. R Das as the president of a public meeting held in Calcutta on the 7th October 1917 to demand the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali. The speech appears in New India of the 8th and 9th idem.

The same paper publishes in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting held near the Victoria Public Hall, Madras, on the 8th idem, under the presidency of Khan Bahadur Safdar Husain Sahib Bahadur, to pray for the release of Mr. Muhammad Ali and others, and, observing that the popular feeling in this connection can be gauged by the thousands of Hindus and Muhammadans, who attended the meeting, and the numerous resolutions passed at public meetings held even in the rural parts for the same purpose, trusts that the Government will ponder over the public feeling and adopt the proper course.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 9th October, also publishes in Tamil an abstract of the proceedings of the above meeting. HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

The release of the Muslim interned.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 9th October, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a Muslim meeting held at Rajagiri (Tanjore district) on the 2nd idem to pray for the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali and other Muslims interned, when one of the speakers, Mr. Abdul Masjid Sahib, in attributing the non-release of these interned Muslims to the lack of agitation to such an extent as was done within a short space of three months in the case of Mrs. Besant and her colleagues, is said to have made the following observations:—It appears that the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali is objected to on the score that they have professed friendly feelings with the enemies of His Majesty the King Emperor. We cannot believe this until the Government enlighten the people by specifying the particular enemy with whom they professed such friendship and the particular nature of it. When amnesty has been extended to the Irish people who actually raised a rebellion against the King Emperor, with the aid of his enemies, it is indeed regrettable if in the present case the religion of the interned Muslim leaders should stand in the way of their release, despite the fact that they are God-fearing and law-abiding patriots. If Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali are really guilty of the crime brought against them by the Government, why should they not have been punished for it by this time? We should, therefore, continue the agitation carried on by us for the past few months, and pray to God that the Government may have more compassion. HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

for consideration whether it is necessary or desirable that Mr. Montagu should be followed by an advisory committee during his visit here. In our opinion, there is no necessity for it, for he is not new to India and he can well conduct the enquiry here with the Viceroy and Babu Bhupendranath Basu and draft the reforms leisurely after reaching in England. We think such a committee as is contemplated now is also undesirable; for, instead of helping him in his enquiry, it may operate as a clog upon him also. But we cannot pronounce any decided opinion upon this point, in the absence of definite information about the constitution of the proposed committee.

The same paper reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Hindu on this subject in its leader of the 2nd idem.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Oct. 5th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

A correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 5th October, regrets that, while the non-Brahmans pay the major portion of the taxes to the Government, the Brahmans, who are only a few in number and who pay the least tax, should occupy high positions, everywhere and, observing that it is the duty of the Government to give free primary and secondary education to those classes in Southern India, which have not yet had the benefit of education, suggests that Mr. Montagu should be approached, during his forthcoming visit, for conferring a larger number of appointments upon the non-Brahman classes and for restricting the number of appointments available for the Brahmans to 3 per cent according to their population. He considers the European rule to be the best rule, as men of his community have been benefited only under this rule, and appeals to all non-Brahmans to join the South Indian Peoples' Federation and get up a counter-petition to the one signed by the Home Rulers at the instance of Mr. Gandhi, stating that Home Rule is not required for this country and that class representation should be allowed.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 4th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th October, says:—In the Corporation meeting held on the 22nd October, Mr. Morrison said that Mr. Montagu might not come to India. His reason for saying so might be the agitation of the Madras Mail. If such a thing happens, the rulers will have retarded the advancement of the thirty-three crores of Indians, yielding to the agitation of a few Anglo-Indians. . . The writings of the Mail need hardly be reviewed. There is vituperation in it and not argument. But one thing is certain, namely, that the agitation of the Mail is directed against the Congress scheme of reforms. The veil has been removed from the ideas of the Mail. The Anglo-Indians have set about agitating the country at a time when India is regaining her peace. They made greater agitation in 1883 when Lord Ripon wanted to pass the Ilbert Bill. They demanded the rejection of the Bill and the removal of Lord Ripon from his office. But they failed to accomplish their object. Lord Ripon deserved the love of the Indians. The Anglo-Indians were not able to gain their end even under such favourable conditions. In these days when the people have a knowledge of self and entertain new ideas, it cannot be believed that the endeavours made to see that Mr. Montagu is removed from office, will succeed.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Oct. 5th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

In a lengthy leading article under the heading "Strike while the iron is hot", referring to Mr. Gandhi's scheme of presenting a monster petition to Mr. Montagu, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 5th October, observes that while Mr. Montagu is eager to know the exact nature of the political demands of the entire mass of people in India and comes to this country for that very purpose, it would be the height of folly to lose the golden opportunity of proving to him that the demand of Home Rule is universal in India and that it behoves every one to help the success of Mr. Gandhi's organisation so that Mr. Montagu may find cart loads of petitions awaiting his arrival.

The paper welcomes the rumour that there is a similar organisation in South Kanara too and adds that in case the rumour is not true, it behoves either the leaders of the District Association or the Home Rulers to lose no time in starting it.

The approaching visit of the Secretary of State for India.

The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 3rd October, referring to the approaching visit of the Secretary of State for India, writes:—The Muhammadans should not lose this opportunity. They should not cease demanding what is most urgently needed for them. They may mention to him that they are not anxious to get Home Rule at present. We simply desire that some Muhammadans may be given higher appointments in every department and more educational facilities afforded to us. We may be given the right of separate electorate in every district. Higher appointments should be given in consideration of services, but not on higher qualification. They must also inform him of the fact that they are in full enjoyment of peace, comfort and ease of every kind under the present Government.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

The Government and co-operative movement.

32. The Hindu Nesan, of the 4th October, writes:—We do not deny that the Local Government are making all possible endeavours to spread the co-operative movement. But their progress in this matter is no faster than that of the snail. They are doing everything only by way of experiment and proceed very cautiously. They hesitate to spend money in developing the co-operative movement. The movement is much stronger in every other province than ours. Even in Native States like Mysore and Baroda, it has made a great advance. The reason why it has not progressed in this Presidency is the policy of this Government in trying to get everything done with the least expenditure of money. Their recent proposal of appointing some honorary Assistant Registrars with a view to help the progress of this movement, can be quoted as an instance in point. The conditions imposed do not seem to be very attractive. We do not know which non-official Indian will come forward to learn the worth of the co-operative societies without any salary or travelling allowance and to discharge the duties of an Assistant Registrar, after the probationary period, without any staff. It may be this proposal has been made with a view to make out that the non-official Indians take no interest in the co-operative movement, as they did not avail themselves of an opportunity given to them to be of use in spreading the movement. We trust the Government will not find fault with the Indians like this. There is no use whatever in Government making proposals which can never be acceptable to the Indians and then trying to ease themselves of their responsibility by pleading that the Indians did not take advantage of such proposals. Such a procedure cannot indicate that the Government are co-operating with the Indians for securing the progress of the country.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 4th, 1917.

Postal runners.

33. The Hindu Nesan, of the 5th October, observes:—Though facilities exist for the delivery of postal mails without any cause for complaint in the neighbourhood of towns commanding all conveniences for the purpose, complaints do arise about the delivery of mails so far as rural parts are concerned. The reasons for this are the difficulty in the mails reaching the respective places easily and the fact that the staff required for carrying mails to these parts are not easily available on account of the many dangers which they have to face on the way in carrying mails to places to reach which there are neither railways nor good roads. These postal runners have to pass through mountainous and forest regions, with the ever present possibility of being attacked by wild animals on one side and the dacoits lying in ambush on the other. In spite of the numerous facilities afforded in these civilised days to the servants of the Postal Department, it cannot be said that postal runners are immune from danger.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 5th, 1917.

The Indians and the army.

34. The Swadesamitran, of the 5th October, reports Mr. A. Hutton, the Professor of Indian History in the Oxford University, to have written to the London Times expressing his regret at the Indian students in the University not being given the military training which all other students have had since the commencement of the war and, observing that this is the time to foster and increase the devotion and loyalty of the Indians for the empire and not to hamper the growth of such feeling, adds:—Need we say that, if the opportunity and the facilities are offered, the Indians will demonstrate their valour and devoted loyalty before the whole world? The present war has amply proved the consequences of the Indians having been kept in the lower scales of the ladder, without being given the opportunity or the facilities for doing military service or serving their country.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 5th, 1917.

Competitive examination.

35. Adverting to the objection raised by a correspondent to the London Times to the military training for befitting the Indians for the higher offices in the army being given to them in England on the grounds that the Indian youths of 17 or 18 would find the environments in England quite new to them, that they would get into bad association and that they would become dissatisfied with their condition on seeing the pompous life led by people in England, the Swadesamitran, of the 5th October, observes:—We admit that the above objections are sound ones If there are such objections to the Indians going to England for military training, do not the same inconveniences exist in the case of the Indians proceeding to England to study for Civil Service examination? Innumerable are the difficulties and losses to which they are put in going to a foreign land, of which they have no previous knowledge, and that is why we have been urging for a long time that the Civil Service examination should also be conducted in India. Further, according to the recommendations of the Public Services Commission, the Indians have to go to England at an earlier age than is the case now. If the abovementioned difficulties are to be avoided and the Indians are to be satisfied, it is necessary that the competitive examination should be conducted in India itself.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 5th, 1917.

The reform proposals.

36. The Swadesamitran, of the 5th October, writes:—If the Government really intends to give effect to the open announcement of the Secretary of State for India in Parliament that the ideal of the British Government is to grant us Home Rule ultimately, we cannot understand how any one can have any objection to accept the recommendations of the Congress, the Muslim League and the nineteen representatives in the Imperial Legislative Council. One of their recommendations is that a half of the members of the Executive Council should be elected by the representative members of the Legislative Council. Lord Islington objected to this and said that the election of the executive officials by popular representatives was a system unknown to the British. But we are not demanding any novelty unknown to the world. The constitution of the Government in each country depends upon its peculiar conditions. In Switzerland, the system demanded by us is in vogue. It is not compatible with modern methods to condemn a system merely because it has not been tried. Lord Islington says that the representative members of the Legislative Council only condemn the Government, but will not take up the responsibility of conducting it. If the system suggested by us is adopted, the popular representatives will, on account of their electing some of the members of the executive Council, share the responsibility of conducting the Government and so the people themselves share it. Lord Islington observes that, if the members of the Executive Council are selected properly, the policy of the Government cannot but be in accordance with the opinion of the popular representatives. This is true. But is it not a better course to entrust the popular representatives with the duty of deciding who can voice forth their opinion correctly than to expect them to believe that those chosen by the Government will do so? The Governor or the Governor-General may be a new man, with no experience. Who is to advise him about the person to be nominated to the Executive Council? If the popular representatives do not discharge this duty, it is the bureaucrats that will have to do it and the nominee of the latter will naturally only support their actions. So Indians should not be nominated on the suggestion of the bureaucrats but only by the popular representatives. The latter course has two advantages. One is that the nominees will be capable of voicing forth the opinion of the Indians and the other is that the Indians will thereby share the responsibility of the Government. The conduct of the administration in accordance with popular opinion and the taking up by the people of the responsibility of the Government through their representatives are the two bases of Home Rule. So, if the idea of the British Government is to grant Home Rule ultimately, the best course will be to reform the constitution of the Executive Council as suggested by us.

The Muhammadan leaders in internment.

LIVA-UL-ISLAM, Madras, Oct. 4th, 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 6th October, refers to a telegram announcing that Mr. Muhammad Ali has been elected as the President of the forthcoming Moslem League, and suggests that the Government will now do well to release the interned Moslems and conciliate the Muhammadan public opinion.

The Muhammadan interned.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 6th, 1917.

The Desamata, of the 3rd October, expresses its disappointment at the reply of the Government to the interpellation of the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah regarding the internment of Mr. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali. It says: . . . We do not see any reason why the Government have not yet released them. The interned persons have stated that they will not act unconstitutionally and tread wrong paths. Then where is there any sedition? They have said that they will not act in violation of their religious belief and duties. Perhaps the Government inferred from this that under the influence of their religion, they may show some sympathy for the Sultan of Turkey, and based their answer on such inference. Though these two brothers have had sympathy for the Sultan, they have not been disloyal to the King Emperor, nor have they attempted to act disloyally to him We fear that the failure of the Government to release them may defeat the object of the Viceroy to maintain peace in the country. There is great commotion among the Muhammadans in the country. Meetings are held in many places. Hindus also sympathise with their Muhammadan brethren in this matter, and say that their release is essential to the maintenance of peace in the country. As His Excellency the Viceroy desires to establish peace in the country, it is necessary that these brothers and others who are undergoing internment should be released. It is our belief that if the Government publish the reasons why they are not released, three-fourths of the agitation will disappear. May those reasons be disclosed and may perfect peace be established in the country by the time Mr. Montagu arrives here.

The interned Muhammadans.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

The Swadeshabhimani, of the 15th October, writes:—Lord Chelmsford in his recent speech in the Council the other day invited popular co-operation from the whole of India and in a very short time succeeded in lifting the curtain of repression, so to speak, from the stage of Indian politics. We had thought that here the policy of repression had seen its end, and that the interned Muslims, Mahomed Ali and Shaukat Ali, would also be released, though not along with Mrs. Besant, at least a few days later. We have in another column referred to the interpellations in the Council on the subject. These leaders in assuring the Government, at their request, that they will abstain from all violent or unconstitutional agitation likely to endanger public safety added that they would agree to the condition without prejudice to their Islamic faith. This expression can hardly be meant to vitiate their loyalty. It is natural that everyone should follow his own faith. We fail to see why at this critical moment the Government have objected to this one bit of their statement. There can be no doubt that the release of these Muslim leaders will be welcomed with great joy by Hindus and Muhammadans alike. The reports of the recent meetings in this connection will show how essential it is to the universal tranquillity of India that these Muslim compatriots of ours should also be released. We pray that His Excellency the Viceroy may be pleased to display a fuller measure of his liberality.

The interned Muslims.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 10th, 1917.

The interned Muslims.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 10th October, says:—At a meeting held at Berhampur on the 7th September, one of the speakers has said in Telugu that if the Muhammadan brothers now under orders of internment are not released, the people will once again resort to passive resistance.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

The interned Muhammadans.

The Qaumi Report, of the 3rd October, referring to the Government of India's reply regarding the release of the Muhammadan detenus, writes:—The Government of India's reply has undoubtedly disappointed and depressed Muhammadans in general, who are feeling their degradation most acutely. The unjust and unexpected refusal of the Government has caused a commotion among seven millions of Muhammadans, and they have now begun to realise that their object cannot be attained by keeping a silent tongue. The proof of this is being furnished by the big meetings that are being held in Muhammadan localities.

By the grace of God the Madras Presidency is not backward in this respect. Several meetings have been, and are being, held in the surrounding districts, and Muhammadans are prepared to, very faithfully and very freely, reveal the secret that the suspicion, which the Government entertain regarding them and their leaders, is baseless.

The editor invites the attention of all the Khatibs (preachers) Paish Imams (leaders at prayers) and trustees of mosques in the districts and villages in the Madras Presidency, and urges them to pray to God, after the usual services for the release of the interned Muhammadans. He further hopes that all friends and sympathisers of Islam will convene meetings at an early date, and invite the attention of the Government of India to the fact that, unless the Muhammadan detenus are released, they will not cease complaining and appealing.

Panchamas' condition and their representation.

43. Dwelling upon the various hardships to which Panchamas are subjected by the social restrictions imposed on them by Brahmans, the Dravidan, of the 3rd October, writes:—All those who are desirous of doing good to these Panchamas should represent to the benign Government their sufferings by means of resolutions passed at the meetings convened for the purpose. If colour distinction is to be made in the Legislative Councils, immediately there is the loud cry of the Brahmans. But if caste distinction is sought to be shown, they remain as though unaware of it. Much is now said of the birth-rights of the Indians, but the Panchama is denied even the birth-right of a dog. If only a Panchama had been a Member of the Legislative Council, would he not have represented effectively the hardships experienced by his castemen and told the British rulers that the Panchamas also had an equal right to share the benefits of the British rule as the Brahmans. This, indeed, is our strong reason for urging that every community should be duly represented in every council of the Government and in all Government institutions. Now that the British element is predominant in the Legislative Council all is well; but what will happen when the representatives of the people secure the majority in that council and take the administration in their own hands? One party alone will secure all the rights to the ruin of others.

Government aid to industries.

44. Adverting to the reply given by the Government of India to the interpellation on this subject by the Hon'ble Sir Wacha, the Swadesamitran, of the 4th October, observes:— From the statistics published in this connection, we find that, among the several companies which have received financial support from the Government, a European sugar manufacturing company, which has been granted a loan of 7 lakhs of rupees at 5 per cent per annum, and an Indian owning a glass factory, who has been given a loan of Rs. 20,000, may be mentioned here as instances of persons who have secured substantial aid from the Government. From this the disparity in the figures can be clearly noted. The fact that the Indians are not well aware of the support they can have from the Government for the development of industries, accounts, we believe, for the low number among them receiving such support.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 4th, 1917.

Referring to the same subject, the Lokopakari and the Prapanchamitran, of the 8th and 9th October, respectively, say that from the figures published it will be clear that the Indians are not receiving the full support of the Government in this direction.

Home Rule.

45. The Swadesamitran, of the 4th October, publishes in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting held at the Gokhale Hall, Madras, on the 3rd idem, when, in the course of his lecture on "who are unfit for Home Rule?", Mr. Suryanarayana Ayyar of Tanjore is reported to have made the following observations:—Some might say that you have not the manliness for the acquisition of Home Rule. Is it without manliness that our brethren have shown their valour in the battlefields and won rewards? Even if it be found that they are wanting in manliness, who is responsible for it? Had we been only given military training, would not the Kaiser have disappeared in a couple of hours? Will not our men enlist in the army in thousands, if only the Indian and the English soldiers are treated alike?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 4th, 1917.

An abstract of these proceedings appears in English in the Hindu of the same date.

Home Rule.

In a lengthy leading article on Home Rule, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 12th October, writes:—The term Home Rule is identical with swaraj which means the administration of the country by the people themselves without being subordinate to foreigners. It also means that the administrators ought to rule according to certain principles; that those who rule against these rules, like autocrats, are restrained by public opinion; that from the rulers down to the scavengar and the humblest servant all ought to obey the laws of equity; that the strong and those in authority should not override the weak; and that if they do, they should be dealt with just as the British public dealt with their King Charles I. The most advanced nations of the world such as the British are democratic. We do not say that there are no autocrats among them. Autocracy they have. The Anglo-Indians who abandon their inbred democratic principles and become seized with the evil desire of ruling us in an autocratic manner are themselves an instance in point. Though these are of this type, when we see among the British persons of the type of Mr. Montagu, we know how democratic principles are bred in their bones as it were. As a result of Anglo-Indian ways, constitutionalists like Mrs. Besant were kept in confinement. The democratic British Cabinet ordered their release. In order to establish the sacred principles of democracy in the world the Almighty God becomes incarnate in every nation from time to time. In India Mrs. Besant and Sir Subramanya Ayyar may be regarded as incarnate beings. In the United Kingdom Mr. Montagu and others may likewise be regarded as incarnate beings. Home Rule means democracy of this kind. Those who maintain that India should not be granted this kind of rule, whether they be whites or blacks, can by no means be regarded as fair-minded. Those who hear their advice and fall a victim to their intrigue to create disunion and fight among themselves and thus subvert all democratic principles can have no patriotism in them. Indians

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Oct. 12th, 1917.

if they would promote their advancement should sink all their caste and religious differences and look upon all Indians, of whatever class, sect, creed or community, as their brethren and compatriots. The righteous should be regarded as belonging to the higher caste and the unrighteous as belonging to the lower. God will make the world a hell to those who are opposed to Home Rule. Some persons think that those who happen to cast a glance at these opponents, should take a holy bath and say their prayers to free themselves from that defilement. All patriotic citizens will grant the justness of this feeling.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 6th, 1917.

Mr. Muhammad Ali.

46. Adverting to the resolution passed at the meeting of the Committee of the All-India Muslim League at Allahabad, that Mr. Muhammad Ali should be the President of the League at its session to be held in December next at Calcutta, the Swadesamitran, of the 6th October, writes:—Almost all Muslim members of the several Legislative Councils in this country were present at the meeting at Allahabad, and from this it is clear that the leaders of the Muslim community have great regard for Muhammad Ali and his brother. Further, it will be doubtless evident from the numerous meetings held all over the country for their release, by Muslims and others, that the people of this country esteem them highly and pray for their release. Under these circumstances, it is but proper that the Government should respond to the popular wish and release them without any further delay.

A Brahman meeting at Erode.

47. The Swadesamitran, of the 6th October, publishes, as reported by a correspondent, the proceedings of a meeting held by the Brahmans of Erode on the 5th idem to condemn the action of the Tahsildar, Mr. Sambasiva Mudaliyar, in occupying a choultry used as a rest-house for Brahmans, ignoring thereby their rights to use it and treating the community itself with contempt. A resolution is also said to have been passed at this meeting for memorialising the Government to prevent the non-Brahman officers from acting against the feelings of the Brahmans.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, Oct. 8th, 1917.

Virtue is its own reward.

48. In the course of an article under this heading contributed by one K. V. Subrahmanyam to the Lokopakari of the 8th October in appreciation of Mrs. Besant, the following observations occur:—Mrs. Annie Besant stands by virtue and is always anxious to find out the truth. Wherever she finds a mistake, she will do her best to set it right. She is an Englishwoman and is intensely loyal to the British Empire. The Madras Government took a crooked view of her actions. Her speeches and writings appeared to be dangerous to the bureaucrats, with a bewildered imagination. Every action of hers nonplussed them. Certain traitorous editors, who are causing immeasurable injury to the British Empire, put a dangerous construction upon every action and every lecture of Mrs. Besant and increased the fears of the bureaucrats, who were already losing confidence and getting unnerved. They forgot what was meant by justice and, bereft of their discriminating capacity, had recourse to the Defence of India Act. The usual nature of the Englishman is that the greater the danger, the more valiant and bold will he be. It is, therefore, strange that they should have been afraid that Mrs. Besant's acts would injure the Empire.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

The Madras Panchama meeting.

Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 9th October, after giving in Telugu what purport to be reports of the meeting as contained in the Indian Patriot and the Hindu, proceeds to publish a Telugu gist of the speech of Doctor Nayar, the president, which contains:—You must deem yourself equal to the members of the highest class and assert that right. In case anybody obstructs you, you will gain the upper hand if you show the strength of hand which you have now shown. . . Until the members of your community become educated, wise and fit to vote, the authority should remain in the hands of the British so that one race may not lord over another.

The paper reports Mr. Somasundaram Pillai to have said:—Home Rule means rule by Brahmans, who are your enemies, and in whose words you should not place any confidence.

The paper reports another speaker to have said that until the Panchamas should become fit for Home Rule they would not agree to its grant, even though the Brahmans and the Non-Brahmans alike should ask for it.

K. Sivarama Ayyar, the Chairman of the meeting, after clearly describing the present constitution of the Government of this country and the function of each of its officers and the freedom now enjoyed by the Indians, is said to have observed that in demanding Home Rule they only asked for a larger representation of the people on the Legislative and Executive Councils, as, on account of the present non-official minority, several bills fail to be passed in these councils and facilities are not afforded to the public to a larger extent.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Oct. 4th, 1917.

The critics of the Government.

53. In the course of a long article contributed by a correspondent to the Dravidan, of the 4th October, the following observations occur:—Everyone should point out to the English Government how they are being deceived. The powers of the Government are, mostly in the hands of the Brahmans, and the European officials do many things according to the opinion of these Brahmans. But the latter, without considering who are the cause of the defects in the English Government, ungratefully blame the Government for them. It is these Brahmans that, getting into the good graces of the Englishmen, exercise their official power to the detriment of the people and make the people believe that it is all due to defects in the administration. Not stopping with this, they have been coercing the people, who have to go to them frequently in their official capacity, to recognise their deceptive claim to be the representatives of all castes in India and made an immense profit thereby. Having thus had a taste of power, they are now clamouring for Home Rule. If this is granted, all other castes will be ruined. Even statesmen of the type of Lord Morley have been deceived by institutions like the Congress started by these Brahmans and, in introducing reforms in this country, failed to recognise the pitiable condition of the non-Brahmans and provide for their separate representation in the councils, as has been done in the case of the Muhammadans. In the present juncture, when the Indian nation is submerged in ignorance and caste dissensions, the most reasonable course will be to distribute appointments and honorary posts among the Brahmans and the people of other castes according to their population. As an instance of the way in which the Brahmans are treating the other classes in India may be quoted their utilisation of Rs. 5,000 annually from the funds of a choultry at Tirukkurungudi, endowed by a Vellala gentleman, for running a Sanskrit College at Kallidaikurichi, which is useful only for the Brahmans. How stupid it is and what an injustice again to utilise public charitable funds in a taluk for the benefit of one caste, while there are thousands of poor boys there having no education whatever. It is these Brahmans that make the Government consent to such unjust acts and it is they themselves that find fault with the Government. It is these Brahmans again that, taking advantage of their legal knowledge and official position, have obtained a control over the funds of all big Devastanams and utilised them for starting Sanskrit Schools, beneficial only to their own class. We hope the Government and Courts of Justice will realise hereafter at least that the major portion of the income of these Devastanams is contributed by non-Brahmans and frame proper laws and regulations to prevent their being utilised by the Brahmans for their own benefit. Besides this, they get special grants also from the Government for their Sanskrit schools and yet abuse the Government. Their motive is only to enslave the other castes which are just now coming up under the upright rule of the British. The reason why the people of our country have, from the very beginning, been suffering inconceivable hardships is that only one caste among us acquired education and knowledge, leaving the others immersed in ignorance. The conferment of all high appointments upon the people of this caste operates as a clog upon the improvement of the other castes on all lines. In Sermadevi and other places, the president of the taluk board is always a Brahman and he does not discharge his duties as justly as his European predecessors were doing. So, if the justice of the British Government should be clearly demonstrated, all responsible positions should be given only to Europeans or members of any other race which does not harbour a racial prejudice, all other appointments should be given in accordance with the population of the different castes in India and all public charitable funds should be utilised for the benefit of all castes.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakottai, Oct. 1st, 1917.

The last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council.

54. In commenting on the proceedings of the last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, the Vaisyamitran, of the 1st October, observes:—We heartily endorse the view expressed by the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah and Pandit Madan Mohun Malavya that the arguments adduced by Sir William Meyer against the resolution of the former, that two non-official Indians should be included in the central recruiting Board organised by the Government to regulate the formation of the Indian Defence Force, will not satisfy the Indians. The main reason why a larger number of Indians have enlisted in this force from the Punjab than from other provinces is not the paucity of persons in these provinces fit to become sepoys but the fact that the major portion of the Indian army is now stationed in the Punjab and not in other provinces. There is no doubt whatever that, if convenient opportunities are offered, provinces like Madras and Bombay would also supply a proportionately good number of men for this force. There will then be no room for others finding fault with the Indians that they have not the zeal and the strength to enlist in the army. It is really regrettable that the Hon'ble Mr. Srinivasa Sastriyar's resolution that the salaries of the members of the Indian Civil Service should not be increased as recommended by the Public Services Commission, should have fallen through, considering that the amount spent on the salaries and pensions paid to European officials has already increased and that, out of 20 crores of rupees spent for salaries of officials, only 3 crores are received by the Indians.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Oct. 5th, 1917.

The Imperial Legislative Council.

Commenting on the proceedings of the recent session of the Legislative Council, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 5th October, observes :—The Hon'ble Mr. Srinivasa Sastri's resolution that the recommendation of the Public Services Commission regarding the increase of pay of civil servants, etc., should not be given effect to at present, owing to the additional expenditure it entails, was lost. So long as the officials form the majority in the Council, is it conceivable that the popular side can win? The reply on behalf of the Government regarding the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali is very disappointing. It is gratifying to note that His Excellency the Viceroy expressed his confidence in the "remarkable energies" of Mrs. Besant. Another significant utterance of His Excellency is that in the coming reforms due consideration will be shown to the question of promoting the trade and other interests of the European community in India. We must observe that His Excellency's concluding address was very statesmanlike. While His Excellency is thus endeavouring to calm the atmosphere, it is deplorable that a few narrow and self-seeking Anglo-Indian gentlemen and journalists should be opposing the Government's policy of reform and conciliation. At the instigation of the Madras Mail, which is a veritable fire-brand, the Anglo-Indian community held a meeting at Calcutta and passed three mighty resolutions. Although they profess now and again that they are not opposed to Indian reform, in their speeches and writings, they as frequently forget their avowals. From the protest meeting at Calcutta and the venomous writings which stream forth every day from papers of the type of the Madras Mail, we are led to suppose that the task of administration in India gives more anxiety to these non-official Anglo-Indians than to the actual administrators themselves. It remains to be seen how far their tricks will succeed.

Pandya Nesan, Madura, Oct. 6th, 1917.

Redistribution of provinces on a linguistic basis.

55. Referring to the opinion expressed by the President of the Andhra Special Conference recently held at Bezwada that, instead of the existing fifteen provinces, India should be divided into twenty provinces on linguistic basis, which will conduce better to the individual advancement of each province, the Pandya Nesan, of the 6th October, gives facts and figures to prove how in each of the existing provinces more than one language is spoken by the people and, quoting Lord Hardinge, who is said to have expressed himself in 1911 in favour of a redistribution of the provinces in India on a linguistic basis, approves of the same on the grounds that the linguistic unity of the people of a province will help them materially in developing a spirit of brotherhood among them and in making united efforts for the advancement of education, industries, etc., and that it would make it possible for the vernaculars being recognised as the first language in schools and by universities and for Colleges coming into existence in which instruction will be imparted through the vernaculars. This paper exhorts the Tamilians also to follow the example of the Andhras and approach Government for the grouping of the Tamil districts into one province.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

A Home Rule meeting at Tiruvarur.

56. The Hindu Nesan, of the 3rd October, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held on the 28th September 1917 at Tiruvarur, under the auspices of the local Home Rule League, when the Hon'ble Rao Bahadur V. K. Ramanuja Achariyar is said to have delivered a long speech on the present political situation, in the course of which the following observations occur :—Mr. Gandhi and others are of opinion that the release of Mrs. Besant and her colleagues is due to the adoption of the resolution regarding the policy of passive resistance by the majority in the special session of the Madras Provincial Conference. The recent events indicate clearly that we can gain our object if we have union amongst ourselves. People might think that the Government have vast powers and the only means left for them is to memorialise the Government, but this has now been disproved. It is the people of India, and not the Secretary of State or the Viceroy or the Governor of Madras, that are responsible for the release of the interned. We were reminded of our strength by Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar and, under his lead, have gained our object. We have more important matters to attend to, and we can always count upon the policy of passive resistance in case the other means do not help us in these. To adopt this policy of resistance, one need not transgress the law but should only be prepared to suffer keeping within its limits.

Why is Home Rule necessary? The popular representatives in the Legislative Council have at present no powers. In spite of our efforts in the Council, the land assessment has been enhanced by the 25 per cent in the recent resettlement in Madura, North Arcot and Chittoor. The resolution moved by me that there is no need for the appointment of temporary Judges in the High Court has fallen through because of the official majority in the Legislative Council. The official members of the Council always support whatever is said by the Government and in consequence our efforts become fruitless. Without Home Rule, the grievances of the people in respect of the land assessment cannot be redressed, nor will it be possible to establish village panchayats or curtail the excessive cost of litigation or promote education. Home Rule is indispensable even in the case of municipal administration. By the grant of Home Rule, the English merchants apprehend that duties will be imposed on their goods, the English officials fear that the Indians will preponderate in service and the Missionaries think that colleges, wherein the Bible is taught, will be deprived of the grants they now receive.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

The mischief of the Anglo-Indians.

57. In refuting the observations made in an article on this subject contributed by a correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 1st October, and abstracted in paragraph 69 of Report No. 40 of 1917, a correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 3rd October, writes:—Why should not this gentleman, who came forward to counsel the Anglo-Indian papers, tell the Home Rule leaders, who raise in these war times such a loud cry of Home Rule as to cause annoyance to the British Government and the Brahmans and their papers who aspire for Home Rule, that it is improper for them to give trouble to the Government at this juncture? Is it on account of self-interest or anything else that he fails to do so?

SWADESAMITRAN Madras, Oct. 8th, 1917.

The Anglo-Indian agitation.

Quoting the description of the Anglo-Indians by the late Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji in his presidential speech of the Congress in 1906, the Swadesamitran, of the 8th October, writes:—It was the agitation of the Anglo-Indians against the prayer of the Bengalees for the annulment of the partition of Bengal that Mr. Naoroji had in his mind when he referred to them in his presidential speech. It was contended then that the partition was effected by Lord Curzon in view of administrative convenience. But the Bengalees took it to be an attempt to injure a new spirit of union which had come among them. Rightly or wrongly, those who opined like this regretted the partition and entreated and implored for its annulment. But the Government paid no heed. Even the people of other provinces stood aghast at the fundamental principle of English rule, that the Government should be conducted only in accordance with public opinion, being ignored in this country and criticised it severely. But the Secretary of State for India declared in the Parliament that it was a settled fact and could not be altered. All the same, the Bengalees and, following them all the Indians, determined to agitate until the settled fact was altered. What happened subsequently need not be detailed here. We refer to these events only to point to the agitation that was got up by the Anglo-Indians then. In the subject of contention then, there was nothing to affect their glory or influence prejudicially. The Indians did not then demand any reform in the administration, nor did any one claim a share of the enormous profits enjoyed by the Anglo-Indians. It was merely an administrative affair which was objected to by those who were affected by it. But the Anglo-Indians, who completely forgot the British instincts and greatness the moment they crossed the shores of the west, were not prepared to look at the justice of the matter. They were actuated only by the crooked notion that others should not criticise what had been done by the members of their class. They condemned the Indians as much as they liked in their papers. They did not hesitate to depict the Indian character in the worst light. What is the wonder in the Anglo-Indians, who forgot themselves so much for a petty affair then, carrying on a big agitation now? The latest phase of the agitation engineered by the Madras Mail, seeing that the bomb prepared by it for unseating Mr. Montagu failed to explode like a wet cracker, is its sermon to the members of the Anglo-Indian community, that it was because they did not pay proper regard to their rights and responsibilities in Legislative Councils and elsewhere, they had not bold and efficient leaders to guide them at this critical juncture and that this state of affairs should be reformed without fear or favour. One suggestion strikes us on reading this: If the present representative of the European Association in the Legislative Council resigns his seat, in order to utilise fully the services of such a capable editor, the latter can occupy that seat and benefit not only Anglo-Indians but the Indians in general by expressing his rare views in the Council. Our readers are aware that, ever since the split in the congress a decade back, our leaders are divided into two classes, moderates and extremists. The great souls, who made it a point to create a party spirit among us, whenever they could not prevent the reforms demanded by us, adopted it as their policy to pat the moderates on their back. The way in which papers like the Madras Mail often used to applaud the moderation and upright views of some Indians in the Legislative Councils can be quoted as instances in point. But this can no longer continue, for, in the opinion of the Mail, the moderates and the extremists have no difference at heart, and it is only such of the extremists as have not the boldness to speak out their views that are styled moderates. During the time of the Grecian Empire, the Greeks divided the world into two classes. One comprised themselves who were all civilized, and the other comprised all savages. The editor of the Mail has adopted the same easy plan and divided the politicians in India into two parties—one comprising those that agree with him and the other those that differ from him, i.e., the agitators. This paper would not admit the existence of any party between these two. The healing of the recent split in the congress camp has evidently demonstrated to the Madras Mail the contrivance of the moderates. However this may be, will those who style themselves moderates understand the ruse of the Mail hereafter at least?

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, Oct. 8th, 1917.

The Lokopakari, of the 8th October, writes on the same subject in the following strain:—The Anglo-Indians are carrying on a useless agitation, being jealous of the efforts made by the Indians to better their condition. The time is past when such an agitation will have any effect. Its only result will be to create mutual hatred between themselves and the Indians. It is really surprising that the Anglo-Indians, who hold the principle that a foreign Government, however good, cannot be equal to self-government, should try to hamper the attempt made by the Indians to acquire liberty. If India obtains Home Rule, all the people in India will enjoy equal privileges and no one will have cause for complaint. The Anglo-Indians evidently do not relish such a state of affairs, and the reason for it is only the strange notion that they are a superior race to the Indians. All those who make much of racial superiority will one day be humbled to dust. If every one should realise that generally position changes with the times and behave with modesty and patience, he can, in course of time, rise to eminence. The time has come for India, too, to attain a lofty position like other countries. No one can prevent this. If India obtains Home Rule and prospers in every respect, it will prove to be the right hand of the British Empire. Then no one will even dream of attacking the British.

PRAPANCHAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

The Prapanchamitran, of the 9th October, reproduces the above comments.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd October, says:—Equal privileges to Anglo-Indians and the Indians will help to establish self-government and peace and bring honour to the British Empire. But the influence of the Anglo-Indians will, to some extent, be affected. Some Anglo-Indians who care more for their own interest than for the advancement of the empire try to obstruct the ideal of self-government. The Mail which has taken the lead in the matter and is endeavouring to do evil to the country, has no other object. It has made the release of the interned a pretext for conducting hostile agitation. The chief object of the Anglo-Indians is to prevent political reforms being introduced into India. They are annoyed by the fear that their authority will be affected. They fear that the visit of Mr. Montagu to India will result in the Indians getting their object, and so they have taken a vow to see that Mr. Montagu is removed from his office. . . At this juncture there cannot but be a political conflict between the people and the Anglo-Indians. . . The hostile attitude of the Anglo-Indians is born of despair. If the firmness of purpose of the people takes a practical shape, the Anglo-Indians will surely give up their vain attempts. . . In yesterday's issue of the Mail, it stated that it was fighting for greater issues than the release of Mrs. Besant and others. The Indians know very well what they are. The goal of the Anglo-Indians is to prevent freedom being granted to the Indians.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 8th, 1917.

58. The Hindu Nesan, of the 8th October, reproduces from the Swadesaparipalini an article on the proposed increase in the freight of steamers coming to India from Australia, New Zealand and other countries, in the course of which the following observations occur:—This increase in the freight will lead to an increase in the price of the British articles imported into India and the merchants will not hesitate to take advantage of this to raise the price of these articles by a half or even more. This would result in great hardship to the people purchasing such articles, though the merchants may not be put to any loss thereby. This, on the other hand, gives an opportunity for the development of certain industries in India. For instance, the Indian cotton mills will derive large profits as they will not have to compete with imported British articles. Besides this the rise in the freight will lead to a further increase in the price of imported British piece-goods, which will drive the people to go in for cheaper Indian goods. This may give an impetus to the weaving industry in this country. It has, however, to be said that this increase of freight might contribute to the advancement of the Japanese trade, but steps should be taken to prevent the Japanese goods from flooding the Indian market at this juncture. Adequate facilities exist in this country for the manufacture of many of the imported British goods here alone. We trust, therefore, that both the Government of India and the leaders of the people will avail themselves of the present opportunity and adopt the necessary measures to promote the manufacture in this country itself of the articles now obtained from Britain.

Increase in the freight of steamers.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 6th, 1917.

An appeal by a landholder to his brethren in the rural parts.

62. In the course of an appeal justifying the demand for Home Rule for India addressed by Mr. Chinnaswami Ayyar, a landholder in the North Arcot district, to the villagers in the rural parts of this Presidency and published in the Swadesamitran of the 6th October, the following observations occur:—It is indeed we, the residents of the rural parts, that suffer a great deal under the present system of administration, and it is we that will reap the greatest benefit by the grant of Home Rule to India. I will now relate the hardships we experience under the present system. The major portion of the people in this presidency are agriculturists. The system of fixing the assessment is based on the opinion of individual executive officers and not on the recommendations of our representatives in the Legislative Council; nor is it of such a nature as to admit of a remedy being sought in a court of law. The existing method of administration is responsible for the present condition of our country which is behind the other countries in the world in matters of education, trade, industry, etc. The reason why India has not progressed is the fact that our leaders are not consulted about the ways in which the revenues collected in India are expended and that they have no lawful authority to check unnecessary expenditure. What I venture to say is that we have neither the power nor the facilities to bring home to the authorities our real grievances and our real aims and aspirations, as these authorities are foreigners to our land differing from us in manners and customs and modes of life. To say that the time has not come for the conferment of Home Rule on Indians or that we have neither the union among ourselves nor the capacity for such a rule, really indicates a disinclination to confer the same. In his presidential speech of the Congress of 1906, Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji has said that India has several able statesmen though possessing a knowledge of their vernaculars only. If India gets Home Rule, she can show to the world that her administration is ably conducted by these statesmen and at considerably less cost than at present.

63. The Dravida Patrika, of the 10th October, dwells upon the waste of the funds of the Devastanams in this Presidency on account of the ineffective control of the temple committees over the trustees of Devastanams, which again, the paper attributes to the disinclination of the Government to amend the Religious Endowments Act, and referring to the majority of the members of the temple committees being illiterate and inexperienced persons who have no idea of their responsibility, implores Lord Chelmsford to remedy the state of affairs by amending the Religious Endowments Act suitably, which will make the people remember his name for ever.

DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 10th, 1917.

64. The Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd October, writes under this heading:—The Government have in their review of the report relating to ancient inscriptions, require the publication of the inscriptions that have been obtained, to be expedited. We submit that this will not be possible until officers representing different languages are employed in larger numbers. If arrangements are not made for obtaining inscriptions, which is more necessary than the publication of them, we fear that the inscriptions already deteriorating will be lost. May the Government chiefly attend to this!

The Madras Mail.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

In condemning the attitude of the Anglo-Indians towards the promised administrative reforms in India, particularly that of the Madras Mail which now brings forward a charge against the Government of India that they have instructed Reuter's Agency not to transmit to England telegrams regarding Anglo-Indian protests, and to India, the views of the English Press on the subject, the Manorama, of the 5th October, says:—It is to be regretted that a wicked thought like this, namely, that the Government of India would suppress telegrams in this way, should also have entered the mind of the Mail. How long can a paper which criticises the Government in so unjustifiable a manner be tolerated? Though it may be possible to suppress telegrams to and from India, will the despatch of newspapers to and from India be stopped thereby? Will not, then, the whole thing be brought to light? It is very rash indeed to write all sorts of things against the Government through impatience, and bring them into contempt? Will not the Government take the necessary steps in this matter?

The Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd October, represents the Madras Times to have said with reference to the proscription of the Hindu and New India in Burma:—It is audacious on the part of the postal authorities to fail to deliver these important dailies to the people in Burma, without making any announcement. Such secret acts used to prevail in ancient Russia. But they ought not to be done in the British Empire. This is a matter in which the Government of India should interfere.

68. The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th October, reports the Hon'ble Mr. K. V. Rangaswami Ayyangar to have written in an article on the speech of Sir Michael O'Dwyer:—Many of the laws in India are just and are administered impartially. Some laws are unjust and hard, and in their case, passive resistance will be resorted to.

Passive resistance.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 4th, 1917.

A correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 6th October, says:—Every one must admit that Mr. Gandhi is the real leader in India. . . If there be one such leader, no bureaucrat can trouble us. . . . The passive resistance movement has spread all over the country in a short time. As many unselfish men have already seen the advantages of the use of the weapon of passive resistance, they have begun to resort to it.

Passive resistance.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Oct. 6th, 1917.

They believe that passive resistance is an unfailing weapon to use against the present arbitrary acts. . . The letter of Mr. Gandhi having been published, a new force has come into existence in the minds of the people, who are thanking him for stimulating their enthusiasm. . . Mr. Gandhi who has said that he will lead us on our onward march is a holy man and is the chief of the sons of India. . . It is by means of passive resistance that the followers of Mrs. Besant were released from internment. . . Do not rest satisfied that our work is over. Endeavours should be made to see that those bold lions Mr. Muhammad Ali and Mr. Shaukat Ali, who have been suffering internment for three years, are released. Finding no place of shelter in this vast Indian continent, the Punjab lion had to seek refuge in America, and the Bengal lion in a foreign territory. We have to see what reply the anti-passive resisters are going to give in this matter.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 4th, 1917.

69. The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th October, says:—The special Andhra Conference prayed that the rulers would be pleased to pardon all the Indians who had been deprived of their freedom with or without trial. If the Government carry out this resolution, they will help to bring peace to the country.

Pardon.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 10th, 1917.

The Audhrapatrika, of the 10th October, refers to the resolution passed in the special Andhra Conference, requesting the Government to pardon all political offenders and remarks:—If the Government do pardon them, the country can be peaceful when Mr. Montagu arrives here. In Ireland, before the national problem was solved political offenders including members of the Sinfein party, who never hesitated to do violent acts, were released. Indians never resort to violence. . . When we come to enjoy self-government, and our brethren who have been subjected to the rigour of law when working for the country, do not, our happiness will not be unmixed. We, therefore, pray that the rulers will act generously in this respect.

Pardon.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th October, reports a speaker at Guntūr to have said on the occasion of the celebration of the birthday of Mrs. Besant, etc.:—The Government who prevented Mr. Gandhi from going to Champeron at last yielded to him and appointed him as a member of the enquiry committee. Mr. Gandhi said that if Mrs. Besant were not released, the people should resort to passive resistance and that he would take up the lead in the matter.

It says that Bellary being a cantonment, there will always be the traffic of sepoys, and that people fear the recurrence of such an outrage. It prays that the sepoys who committed the offence may be exemplarily punished so that the people may be freed from fear.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 6th October, reports the United India and Native States to have said:—The South Indian People's Association began their work well, but as its President and his co-workers have trodden wrong paths and have joined with men hostile to the welfare of the country, the majority of non-Brahmans have turned against the association. Diwan Bahadur Kesava Pillai, the President of the new association, will never tread the wrong paths trodden by Mr. Tyagaraya Chetti and his followers, who even went the length of justifying the repressive measures of the Government. The clamour on the part of Indian-conducted papers for repressive measures is a matter for even gods to weep. How can the Indians bear such a thing? The few educated Indians entirely devoid of patriotism will be found in Madras and not anywhere else. . . We congratulate Diwan Bahadur Kesava Pillai and others on the courage they have manifested in differing from Mr. Tyagaraya Chetti and Mr. Nayar.

The Madras Presidency Association.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th October, says:—In the memorial of the Madras Presidency Association, the scheme of reforms laid down by the Congress has been approved of. Class representation was asked for on behalf of the non-Brahmans, who comprise non-Brahman Hindus including Panchamas, and Indian Christians. . . May the endeavours of the Association be crowned with success.

74. A correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 6th October, says under this heading:—Some of the officers who possess extensive independent powers and who have been administering the country just as they pleased, and many Anglo-Indians connected with them say that the Indians are unfit for swaraj and that if they are given authority their interests will be affected. Needless it is to say that self-preservation is ordinarily the chief goal of man. Think how difficult it is for those who have been wielding arbitrary authority to give self-government. However much the Secretary of State may wish the welfare of the people, and however fair he may be, he will find it easy to agree with the majority of the English. . . There is no use giving advice. They are indignant and they will not heed it. Unless the people clamour ten times more than they our contention will not be brought home to the minds of the higher authorities. . . Whatever may be the attitude of the English people in India, the leaders in England are fair-minded to a large extent and have love for us. The English people in India also express just opinions here and there. At any rate, our reward at present will depend upon our conduct. It is no exaggeration to say that the people in general cherish a desire for self-government. But we must adequately publish our opinions.

75. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 4th October, says:—In the taluks of the Ganjām district where two languages prevail, both the languages should be made use of in administration. It is not proper that the rulers should carry on the administration by means of one language. We pray that the Government will attend to this matter chiefly and maintain both the Telugu and the Uriya languages in offices. . . If the Government prefer Uriyas to posts in offices, to the exclusion of the Andhras, the lower classes of Andhras will convert themselves into Uriyas, causing loss to the Andhra country and the Andhra race. Instead of showing such preference and unnecessarily paining the minds of the Andhras, the Government will do well to make a proper territorial division of the district and do good to both the races.

Wickedness.

77. In its leader under this heading, the Desamata, of the 3rd October, says:—75 per cent of those who were not for a separate Andhra Province are now for it, and they now argue that that is the goal of the Andhra movement, and say that we should reach the goal at an early date. The times are also on our side. The truth about the territorial division of India contained in the despatch sent by Lord Hardinge in 1911 has now been brought home to the minds of the people. Mr. Montagu has stated in the Parliament last June, that self-government in India should be based on a division of the country on a language basis. In his letter to the Secretary of the Special Andhra Conference, Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar also recognised the necessity of a Separate Andhra Province and said that it would help to establish self-government. The Madras Times also recognised the necessity of a separate Andhra Province. The President of the Conference has urged the necessity of constituting such a province in his opening speech. The Chairman of the Reception Committee also dwelt on that subject in a masterly way. The 800 persons that attended the meeting composed of men of different races and creeds have unanimously resolved to arrange for a deputation to wait on Mr. Montagu to urge on him the necessity for the constitution of a separate Andhra Province. May this desire of the Andhras be realised in a short time through the visit of Mr. Montagu.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 8th, 1917.

The Madras Mail and its hostile spirit.

78. The Andhrapatrika, of the 8th October, says:—The hostile spirit of the Mail should help to merge all differences among the Indians. The Mail would not be satisfied even if the Indians should show loyalty and help on the progress of the war. As long as the Indians demand political reforms they are all seditionists. Only those Indians who, in addition to being loyal to the British rule, worship all the Anglo-Indians, deserve the favour of the Mail. If there is any self-respect in the Indian race, the Indians should state in one voice that they will not yield to the threats of the Mail and that they will not relax their perseverance till they attain self-government. They should show that the ultimatum sent by the paper is useless. If at this juncture, the Indians hesitate to any the least extent, and give room for internal dissensions, springing up among them, the Anglo-Indians will take advantage of the opportunity to frustrate the aims of the Indians. The Indians should not afford such an opportunity. They should make it plain that they would act loyally to the British Empire and to the Government, but that they would never be subservient to the Anglo-Indians.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 8th, 1917.

The rage of Lord Sydenham.

79. The Andhrapatrika, of the 8th October, says:—Lord Sydenham has begun to play the second fiddle to the agitation started by the Mail. . . It is difficult to understand why Anglo-Indians like Lord Sydenham, who, having held offices in India, are even now enjoying Indian money, fly into a rage when the Government show any kindness to the Indians.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

A Moslem meeting.

80. The Andhrapatrika, of the 9th October, gives a Telugu version of the proceedings of the Moslem meeting held on the 8th October at the Victoria Public Hall, and of the resolutions passed at that meeting, which apper in the Hindu of the 9th October.

The paper reports the president to have said:—We must not give up our agitation till our leaders are released. By patience, loyalty and justice, we must try to secure the release of our interned leaders. . . His Excellency the Viceroy relied on the report of a Criminal Investigation Department officer and the interned Muhammadans were not released. The people could not look upon such things with unconcern.

The paper reports the mover of the first resolution to have said:—When Mr. Muhammad Ali and his brother said that they would submit to the conditions laid down by the Government, keeping their allegiance for Islam, the Government appear to have misunderstood them. Islam means the Muhammadan religion and not the Turks.

The same paper observes:—It was resolved at yesterday's meeting that it was unfair on the part of the rulers to keep Mr. Muhammad Ali and Mr. Shaukat Ali under orders of internment, even after they made the promise required by the Government, that the Defence of India Act should not be enforced against political agitators, and that the hostile attitude of the Anglo-Indians was improper. No exception could be taken to the promise given to the Raja of Muhammadabad by Mr. Muhammad Ali. Mr. Muhammad Ali said that he was a nationalist, that his ideal was the ideal of the Congress, and that if Turkey should invade India, he would fight against the Turkish army. It, therefore, appears that, for the establishment of peace in the country, it is necessary that the interned should be released.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

A meeting at Calcutta.

81. The Andhrapatrika, of the 9th October, contains the following in English:—

THE BRITISH IN INDIA.

SPEECH AT CALCUTTA MEETING.

CALCUTTA, October 8.

At a mass meeting of Hindus and Muhammadans yesterday demanding the release of Muhammad Ali and others Mr. C. R. Das, who presided, strongly denounced the European Association's agitation and said that if self-government was granted and authority of the Magistrates and Collectors lessened, European traders would lose all the undue advantages they had at present. Referring to the speeches made at the meeting of the European Association, the speaker said that, according to Mr. Arden Wood, if this racial bitterness increases the time will come when we, British, will either leave India or reconquer India. They might leave India if they find it is unprofitable to stay in India, but they will stay in India if they find it profitable to do so. But tall talk of reconquering India is a statement which can hardly be taken seriously. They ought to know that India was never conquered, India was won by love and by promise of good Government. India was never conquered and God willing India will never be conquered in time to come. Continuing Mr. Das said: One gentlemen is reported to have said that if it is a Government by people and for people then there will be no security for life and property. Whose property is it? The property of India or is it the property of Sir Archy Birkmyre? India has lived for herself for thousands of years and she will live in herself and for herself for all time to come. There is another statement made by this angry speaker which took my breath away. He says that the agitation by the European Association is to assert the rights of the British in India. This trader, who at a time when Government enjoins a calm atmosphere, holds a meeting and denounces the whole country, abuses the people of this country and all ideals in which they move and live and have their being—this is the man who claims to represent the British in India. We can frankly tell the Anglo-Indian community that there are no extremists among us, that there are no moderates. Hindus and Mussalmans of Bengal are nationalists who are neither extremists nor moderates. I will tell you who are these extremists. It is these Anglo-Indian agitators who are extremists. Talk of a calm atmosphere. Who broke the calm atmosphere? Sir Hugh Bray, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, and the speakers who spoke at that meeting in Calcutta. They are the people who broke the calm atmosphere. I ask them to consider their position and beware. The days of the Ilbert Bill agitation have gone by. These are days of rising democracy.

We ask for Home Rule or self-government not for another bureaucracy or oligarchy in the place of the bureaucracy that there is at the present moment. In my opinion bureaucracy is bureaucracy, be that bureaucracy of England or Anglo-Indian or of India pure. We want no bureaucracy. We want Home Rule, self-government by the people for the people (Applause). We want self-government for every individual in the country. The poorest ryot or the richest zamindars must have a share, must have a voice. If these Anglo-Indians wish to make India their home, let them do so and we will fight with them on the same platform for self-government in this country. If they come here to make money and all their interest lies in how best to make money, I say to them, "you are not the friends of India."

The paper publishes the above matter in Telugu also.

82. The Andhrachandrika, of the 27th September, says that this year Navaratri and Mohurrum come off at the same time and that there are rumours that riots will take place between the Hindus and the Muhammadans. It remains to be seen, it remarks, what the Government are going to do to avert the riots.

Navaratri and Mohurrum.

ANDHRACHANDRIKA, Proddatur, Sep. 27th, 1917.

83. The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th October, says in its leader under this heading:—Mr. Joseph Baptista warns us against letting go the present opportunity and urges on us the necessity of coming to a decision as to what constitutes our goal, what reforms have at present to be introduced, by what stages the goal has to be reached, and what time it must take to reach it. Up to now, the Indians have determined the scheme of reforms to be introduced. But their object cannot thereby be accomplished. They should ask that responsible Government should be constituted in India in a definite number of years. They should moreover consider at what intervals they should reach the several steps to such a Government. We are of course happy that Mr. Montagu is coming to India to know our aspirations personally. But Mr. Baptista says that there is danger in such a procedure and that the country should be saved from it. He fears that our opponents may confuse Mr. Montagu by inducing some Rao Bahadurs to place before him views antagonistic to national welfare, and that the object of the Indian bureaucracy in inviting Mr. Montagu may not after all be to encourage Indian aspirations. . . Indians should go to England and work there. . . If, for any reason Mr. Montagu heeds the opinions of the bureaucracy and those of the Anglo-Indians and the Indians who retard the advancement of the country, we can attain our object by the sympathy of the English people in England.

Mr. Baptista's warning.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 10th, 1917.

84. The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th October, refers to the discussion that took place in a meeting of the Rangoon European trades Association held on the 29th September, and shows that among Europeans too there are some who consider the pros and cons of matters with a calm mind.

Europeans.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 10th, 1917.

85. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 10th October, says:—Lord Willingdon is showing his statesmanship at this juncture. He does not enforce repressive laws in the Bombay Presidency. He removed all restrictions against the students of the Law College attending Home Rule speeches and Home Rule meetings. It is necessary for the well-being of the country that his farsighted policy should be copied by tne rulers of other provinces.

The political policy of Lord Willingdon.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 10th, 1917.

86. Referring to the incident in which a near relative of the Raja of Venkatagiri was first refused admission by a European into a second-class Railway compartment occupied by him, and to the hostile attitude of the European when, on the intervention of a Eurasian Guard and the Assistant Station Master of Gudur, he was at last admitted, the Andhrapatrika, of the 10th October, remarks:—It is regrettable that these Europeans still harbour differences. The Europeans will do well to know that it is such differences that disturb the friendly relations of the Indians towards Europeans.

Racial differences.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Oct. 9th, 1917.

87. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 9th October, writes:—The amount subscribed to the Indian War Loan through the post office and other bonds is Rs. 52,42,13,566. This is no little help to the British Government in a crisis like the present. If we ascertain what portion of this loan has been subscribed by the Anglo-Indian community, we shall know the relative help rendered to the government by the Anglo-Indians and the Indians. Despite this, the Anglo-Indians look upon the Indians as their enemies. It is therefore natural that the latter too would look upon the former in the same spirit. When the Government, seeing all this, tried to bring about a reconciliation between the two communities, the Anglo-Indians began to indulge in most abusive language against the Government. Many persons ask whether there can be any parallel to such ingratitude in the whole world. There is no need to ask this question. Heaven and hell, Gods and demons, justice and injustice co-exist everywhere. There can be no doubt that truth and justice will triumph in the end.

Europeans and the war loan.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Oct. 5th, 1917.

88. The Manorama, of the 5th October, exhorts the zamindars and other wealthy classes in India, especially those of Malabar, to follow the example of the Bengal Zamindar and of the Raja of Venkatagiri, in encouraging the people to join the Indian Defence Force by granting lands and money to them, and to render every possible assistance to the Collectors and the Recruiting officers in the matter, suggests that Government should grant poramboke lands to such people, and that factories should be established for the benefit of those that are discharged from the Army, and expresses its readiness to publish all advertisements on the subject, free of charge.

Army recruitment.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Oct. 5th, 1917.

89. Referring to the order relating to the appointment of Honorary Assistant Registrars of Co-operative Credit Societies, the Manorama, of the 5th October, thinks that it was not proper of the Government not to have decided to give some allowance to them at least during their probation period, and doubts whether the honour is sufficient in itself to induce persons to accept these posts and incur personal expenditure.

Honorary Assistant Registrars of Co-operative Credit Societies.

Manorama, Calicut, Oct. 9th, 1917.

The Congress split.

90. In expressing satisfaction at the settlement of the differences between the "Moderates and the Extremists" in Calcutta regarding the election of Mrs. Besant as President of the next Congress, the Manorama, of the 9th October, observes that it is to be hoped that the Secretary of State and the Viceroy will learn from this that the whole of India is firmly united in respect of the proposed administrative reforms.

Malayala Manorama, Kottayam, Oct. 10th, 1917.

The crisis in India.

91. In its third article under the heading "the Crisis in India" the Malayala Manorama, of the 10th October, refers to the fear in some quarters that, unless the proportion of representatives from the various communities be fixed, the demand of the Congress-Muslim League that four-fifths of the members of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils should be elected ones, will, if granted, practically put the administrative machinery into the hands of the Brahmans, points out that the demand for half of the members of the Executive Councils being elected by members of the respective Legislative Councils, and that for the granting of complete freedom to the Legislative Councils in financial matters, are extremely dangerous ones, the latter power being sufficient to destroy in a moment the British religious institutions in this country, and observes that, to speak briefly, the granting of these demands will make the Governor, sent out from England, such only in name. It adds that, unless and until the racial and religious jealousies in India have been reduced to a minimum, the presence in this country of the British who are strong, impartial and justice-loving is absolutely essential, and that it is to be hoped that British Government will introduce only such changes in the administration, as are calculated to conduce to the real welfare of India.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Oct. 1st, 1917.

Disappointment with reference to liberty.

92. The Qaumi Report, of the 1st October, referring to the reply of the Government regarding the release of the interned Muhammadans, writes:—After a considerable delay the Government have given a curt reply and the fact is that it has thrown cold water on the joys and hopes of the Muhammadans. It has been said that they had expressed sympathy with the enemies of the King and have not yet changed their attitude. We are asking ourselves whether this charge is true or untrue. If it is true, can the Muhammadans pride themselves on their loyalty? We do not know what answer we can give, but we are sure that the Government are put in possession of wrong information, which they in all good faith, believes. Would that, this charge had been placed before a court of justice, their arguments were heard, and witnesses, who have been the cause of creating the Government's apprehension, had been examined!

The question is what does sympathy connote? Did they suggest to the Muhammadans that they should join the King's enemies, or did they order them to fight against the King's friends and Allies? Did they collect subscription to help the King's enemies, or did they prepare any medical mission or despatch any weapons, powder, shells, or reveal any political secrets to the King's enemies? Apparently they have not done anything of the sort. It is possible they might have simply committed an offence which the Government spies have detected. But the question is why have they not been properly punished? We do not wish to wreck our faith by supporting any revolutionist or traitor. But unless we are convinced that our friends have really committed an offence, we cannot cease to be their friends.

We do not believe in the reports of envious and self-interested persons who have proved false to the community, and we will surely give expression to the feelings of our aching hearts in the words of Mirza Ghalib thus—

"They have been unjustly arrested in accordance with what was recorded by the angels.

"Was there any one of us present at the time the entry was made?"

If it is a purely religious sympathy we do not understand why the Government consider it a crime. The Government are neutral in matters of religion and faith, and since 1914 the Muhammadans have been giving manifest proof of the fact that their loyalty has not, in any way, been affected, either by national aspirations or by spiritual calamities. When the Muhammadan sepoys are wholeheartedly supporting the cause of the British flag, Muhammadan subjects are equally loyal to the British Crown, and when their tongues and pens are pursuing the right course, how can we admit that Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali's sympathy with the King's enemies is such as can neither be described nor defined? The Government, however, consider it an unpardonable crime.

We remember that at first Mrs. Besant was also accused of having conspired with the King's enemies, and even German printed post cards were produced on which Mrs. Besant's photograph was impressed, and the late Secretary of State for India had declared her actions dangerous, but she has now been released unconditionally by the Government. Is it not possible for the Government to adopt the same course with regard to the interned Muhammadans? Should the Government be pleased to be more considerate and make enquiries into the matter, this charge will also prove baseless just as it has turned out in the case of Mrs. Besant, provided Lord Chelmsford is pleased to appreciate the feelings of seven crores of Muhammadans and give proof of their wise, just, and independent policy. The Muhammadans do not like to embarrass the Government, but they necessarily want that justice to be done to them and that their leaders may not unreasonably be suspected. No accused person or a culprit, who is really guilty of the crime can ever be so firm and resolute-minded as the interned Muhammadans. It is a powerful proof of their simple-mindedness and innocence. No community can give a more regrettable proof of its helplessness than the Muhammadans have hitherto given. There are no persons among the Muhammadans who can agitate from Simla to London, but their forbearance, patience and innocence must necessarily prove effective, and soon by their silence they will convince the Government.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Oct. 4th, 1917.

The ninth day.

93. The Qaumi Report, of the 4th October, writes:—The Government of India is adhering to its order of refusal for the last nine days and has not, up to the present, released any of the Muhammadan internees. During the last eight days the Muhammadans have proved that they are now awake! They have been quiet for the last three years, out of consideration for the Government, and subjected themselves to the test of patience and gratitude, and now they have spent a month in expectation. But only Mrs. Besant and her lieutenants have been released and then the door of mercy and justice closed with a "no change, in principle, has taken place in their attitude."

We ask what was the attitude of Muhammadans, which the Government want them to change? They are not Irish Sinn-Feiners. Their religion and faith have been evident and as clear as the noondays are for the last 1,300 years. Since the establishment of British Rule in India, for the last two-hundred and fifty years the attitude of the Muhammadans, towards the ruling nation, has been friendly, fraternal and sympathetic. Their affection for, and obedience to, the Throne and Crown are still the same as they were during the reign of the late Queen Victoria. During this long interval of two-hundred and fifty years, however the different Ministers, such as Lord Beaconsfield, Mr. Gladstone, Lord Salisbury and Mr. Asquith, changed their views, but the ideal of the British Crown, and the Muhammadan religious principle, have remained constant and the history will bear out the fact that no change could occur.

The assurance and the official promise, that this is not a religious war, which the Government gave us at the beginning of this war, are fresh in our minds. We complied with the Royal Proclamation and considered it unlawful to show any sympathy with the King's enemies. But as this is not a religious war our sympathy, on religious principle, is lawful. The Government do not interfere with our religious matters according to their Royal Proclamation, and we do not interfere with their politics, in accordance with our religious principle. But we do not understand the objectionable thing in our attitude that calls for change.

The example of Egypt is still before us where the Government did not interfere with the religious aspirations of the Egyptians, and it is an open secret that they and we are the followers of the same faith, and we are entitled to the same concessions and fair play as were shown to them. On the other hand, we are far more true and real sympathisers of our worldly King. We are opposing the enemies on every front, shoulder to shoulder with the ruling race, and are shedding our blood. The Government of India have blamed us for showing sympathy with them. Have we not shed our blood in the campaigns of Mesopotamia, Bagdad, Egypt and Palestine? Although the Criminal Investigation Department Police cannot answer to this, yet Lord Chelmsford and Mr. Lloyd George know it; Mr. Balfour has knowledge of it, Mr. Montagu is aware of it, even the King himself bears testimony to it, and the whole British nation admits it, and the enemy, too, cannot deny it.

We are sure that instead of the Criminal Investigation Department Police, Lord Chelmsford himself will enquire into our attitude and that of the interned persons. They want peace and tranquility in the country, which cannot be gained when the hearts of seven millions of Muhammadans are afflicted and distressed. It is time now that His Excellency paid personal attention to this and not open our wounds afresh by the memory of ninth day.

At present consultations are held in every corner of the country, and Hindus and Muhammadans are unanimous in this respect that the Government refusal is fatal to its recent policy. Mrs. Besant's affair is a branch of the same tree and a fruit of the same branch, and it is not at all justifiable and expedient to draw any invidious distinction between them.

We remind the Government of the fact that the refusal is even opposed to its old policy. We do not forget the treatment the Government extended to mete out to some mischievous persons who had been sent out of India, for having conspired with the King's enemies. The Government itself is aware that they have been excused and brought back. Are the respectable and guarded discussions of the interned Muhammadans and their religious aspirations more dangerous than those mischievous persons?

The public is convinced that the interned Muhammadans have fallen victims to suspicion, imagination and doubt. The Criminal Investigation Department of Police has made them appear as suspects in the eyes of the Government. But when this polluted curtain is torn away by the strong hands of justice and right, the Government will find out the real knowledge of their innocence.

We request Lord Chelmsford to move his powerful hands and not to admit mere suspicions in the case of Muhammadans. Recently in England Mrs. Asquith was also suspected of interviewing the King's enemies, and presenting them with a basketful of fruits but justice has proved that she is innocent of any such charge. Lord Haldane is considered to be the friend of an influential party of Germans and some papers have gone so far as to say that this war has been the result of his intrigue, but Lord Haldane was neither interned, nor was he deprived of his liberty by the Defence of England Act. Then what is the reason of suspecting the interned Muhammadans in India, and why should they be imprisoned and chained by the Defence of India Act?

The Muhammadans have received such a deep wound that they cannot exercise patience or forbearance any longer. This affair cannot be terminated by the ordinary words of Sir William Vincent. We are making our voices heard by Lord Chelmsford, we invite the attention of the Secretary of State, the Prime Minister, the Throne and the Crown, and we often draw attention of the Viceroy, who is their representative to this state of affairs and request that justice may be done in accordance with the political and Islamic condition of Muhammadans.

94. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 3rd October, has a leader against the Home Rule propaganda in which it describes the several advantages that we are enjoying under the British Rule and the several disadvantages that are likely to occur under the Home Rule. MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, Oct. 3rd, 1917.

Home Rule and the Muhammadans.

95. The Qaumi Report, of the 6th October, has a leader on the marginally noted subject:—The reply of the Government has dealt a severe blow to the aspirations of the Muhammadans. They deplore the degradation and ignoring of their position, and it is impossible for them to pass over such taunts and reproaches in silence. The Government released Mrs. Besant and her associates, but did not say on that QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Oct. 6th, 1917.

A necessity for a revision.

occasion that the interned Muhammadans would not be released. The dawn, for which the seven crores of Muhammadans, were waiting day and night, has not come, and the worst of it is, that it has been told to our faces that it will not come.

Sir William Vincent has announced regarding Mr. Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali that they openly expressed increasing sympathy with the king's enemies and as though they are inimical to the king, we have been acting at their instance. This is such a degradation that no community, possessing historical greatness and a sense of self-respect, can coolly admit it. How can we, who have learnt the lesson of freedom from the British nation and have been trained under them, tolerate, it being against us in the history of the future, that we and our leaders have shown sympathy with the king's enemies?

The writings of Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali still exist. We request the Government to reveal the secrets to us, as to which sentence, word or letter of theirs is objectionable, so that we may cease to show any sympathy with them, and if they are convicted of treachery we will be the first to denounce them.

We regret to find that the Government places so much confidence in the Criminal Investigation Department Police as to cast suspicion on our loyalty which has been in existence for the last two hundred and fifty years.

We further desire to enquire what crime Moulana Abul Kalam Azad has committed, what sin Moulana Hasrat Mohani is guilty, and what offence Moulana Muhammad Hussin and Moulana Muhammad Muhiuddin Ahmad, etc., have committed and when and how did they openly express sympathy with the king's enemies and why did not the Government assign reasons for interning them.

The Government is fully acquainted with our religious affairs and we take pride in the fact that there is no more tolerant and honest community than ours. We do not deny religious sympathy which is legally and naturally allowable, but we did not express any political sympathy which might be harmful to the king.

We request the Government to look upon our hearts and appreciate our loyalty, agreements, and treaty-engagements. It cannot be happy by displeasing and disheartening us. We rely on the free and independent temperament of the English people who have recently pardoned those Irishmen who had openly obtained help from the enemy, and for three days lowered the British flag. Can the offence of the interned Muhammadans be more dangerous, more rebellious and more abhorrent than that? We do not even know what our offence is, but the present peace of India bears eloquent testimony to the fact that our community is the most patient and grateful of all.

The reply of the Government has not only caused anxiety and disappointment, but also displeasure and perplexity. We, Muhammadans, as Muhammadans, find our position very degrading and humiliating. We are obliged to conclude that we do not possess the status even of the Irish Revolutionists. We were told and Lord Chelmsford also suggested that we should devote our time, prior to the arrival of Mr. Montagu to considering desired reforms, but such precious time is being spent in perplexity, disappointment and mourning and should not the Government be disposed to quickly revise its decision, this time will also be spent in sorrow and lamentation, and when Mr. Montagu does come, we will plainly request to be excused. Our religion is dearer to us than our country.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

The Diwanship of Mysore.

96. Adverting to the impending retirement of Sir M. Visvesvarayya from the Diwanship of Mysore and the difference of opinion in Mysore itself regarding the necessity and desirability of his continuance as Diwan, the Swadesamitran, of the 9th October, observes:—The best way to judge of the efficiency of the Diwanship of Sir M. Visvesvarayya is to see whether it has on the whole been beneficial or not, and the answer will surely be in the affirmative. It is in his time that many changes and reforms have been introduced in the administration. Opinion is unanimous that the ideal of his administration was that the people of Mysore, though only the subjects of a State, should maintain their own self-respect and lead a civilised and progressive life. This has led to the growth of a new spirit among the Mysoreans and that is that Mysore should be administered by Mysoreans for the benefit of the Mysoreans. Some may deem this view to be a narrow one. But we think it will gradually be liberalised. Though the question of some as to what immediate benefits have accrued to the State from the administration of Sir M. Visvesvarayya cannot be replied to definitely, the changes and reforms made by him are bound to bear fruit in course of time. If this is to be a fact and the new spirit that has appeared among the Mysoreans is to become rooted, the future Diwan should be one who will help such a process and not one who will work against it. Though his regimé for the last five years may have its own defects and shortcomings, considering the trend and nature of his administration and his farsightedness and earnestness of purpose, we will prefer his continuing as Diwan.

97. A correspondent of the Vrittanta Patrike, of the 11th October, writes:— Vrittanta Patrike, Mysore, Oct. 11th, 1917.

Rumour regarding compulsory recruitment at Tumkur (Mysore Province).

Sir,—The residents of Tumkur are in great consternation owing to a rumour that the Government are compulsorily seizing and carrying away men for the front. The villagers who are wont to see and recognize the officers of Government run into the forests or hills and hide themselves under rocks the moment they hear of the visit of a Shekdar, Shanbogue or the police and return home only during the nights. If at this time any visitor happens to call at their house, they conclude that the recruiting agents have come to take them and stricken with panic they try to run away or hide themselves in closets, cattle-sheds or attics. Women and children weep and wail. Whenever they think of the war they are unable to eat their food. To add to this, somebody has started a rumour that the Government take the measurements of persons and take them compulsorily. I request you will be so good as to restore peace among the ignorant people by explaining in your paper the truth concerning the order issued by Government on the subject.

P. Yesudasappa.

[This is altogether groundless panic. No one will be enlisted by force. It is a positive fact that the Government have not ordered compulsory recruitment. Only those who are willing and fit (for military duty) are being enlisted.—Ed.]

Students and politics.

1. Writing under the heading "Vagaries of a Professor," the Hindu, of the 17th October, says:—"We learn that Mr. Mark Hunter, Professor of English, set as a subject for composition to the B.A. Honours class, the responsibility of the European races towards the dark races. One of the students, Krishna Rao, who is a Government scholarship holder and is a son of Mr. Amrita Rao, an Assistant Professor in the College, set forth his views in the composition paper in a manner which was not flattering to the European races as regards their alleged responsibility towards the so-called 'backward races,' and as to how the European races were fulfilling their 'trust' or 'mission of civilisation' in regard to them. . The opinions of the student gave great offence to Mr. Mark Hunter, who, in the first instance, called upon the Assistant Professor, the father of the boy, to account for the student's conduct. . . It is stated that a simple apology was at first tendered which was curtly rejected as not meeting the needs of the situation. A more elaborate apology was then prepared and submitted in which the student expressed contrition for his offence and stated that the views which he expressed in his paper were derived from reading New India, 'India, a nation' by Mrs. Besant and some of the works of R. C. Dutt. . . When a Professor invites his pupils to write a composition upon the subject, they cannot do otherwise than express what they feel and believe to be right. If the opinions expressed by the pupil are unpalatable to the Professor, he has only himself to thank for it. It is a mischievous and tyrannical attempt to stifle freedom of opinion on the part of young men. to punish them for opinions innocently formed and frankly expressed. The student in question has, since the occurrence of the above incident, become entitled, we learn, to a University scholarship; and it is a thousand pities that so promising a young man should be subjected to the soul-crushing despotism of foreign teachers."

Hindu, Madras, Oct. 17th, 1917.

Writing on this subject, New India, of the 18th October, remarks:—"When His Excellency the Governor of Bombay was discoursing last week at the Deccan College on the need for students to encourage the habit of independent thinking and acting according to their conscience, he could have little suspected that a tragedy was being enacted in the metropolis of a sister presidency, the moral of which is to emphasise very pointedly the danger of following His Excellency's advice. . . The most significant moral of this tragedy is the frame of mind exhibited by the Madras Presidency College authorities. From the facts now available to the public, it is evident that they have not lost faith in the mailed fist theory. They evidentlybelieve that the best way to set right the ways of our young men is to inflict on them dire penalties if they give expression to what they really feel. The inevitable effect of the Presidency College incident will be to compel the students to conceal their views in all statements which have a chance of reaching the ears of their expert professors, in other words, to practice the fine art of hypocrisy in such matters . . These experts are endeavouring to suppress with a high-hand all such expressions of honest opinion, and extracting apologies and other statements from the terrified youths which no fair-minded person will ever dream of demanding. . . The need of the hour is not to develop in our young the tendency to stiffle or hide their nobler instincts. It may be that some are misled into entertaining extravagant ideas, if they are, the antidote is persuasion and not the use of the mailed fist.

"We cannot speak with restraint of the conceit and the heartlessness of the 'experts' who have scored this triumph over the honest, helpless young man.

New India, Madras, Oct. 18th, 1917.

Neither can we contemplate without the utmost sympathy the position of the bright young man, who has been made to suffer unjustly in his self-respect and his patriotism."

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, Oct. 9th, 1917.

Home Rule for India.

2. The West Coast Spectator, of the 9th October, remarks:—"We do not believe that India is ready for Home Rule. In fact, we do not think that we would be, even fifty years hence. Those who have eyes to see and ears to hear, who are not hypnotised by travelling orators and emotional mystics or self-seeking political adventurers and those who are not charmed by or hear the music of the spheres, can come to no other conclusion. . . If India gets Home Rule to-morrow and the 'bi-colour' courts the breeze from the 'battlements' of Adyar, we believe our friend Kunholan of Ernad would be the first to salute the flag. He would probably regard the flag as a signal for a spree on his own account, a raid into some adjoining Brahman village to be ended with a maulood in the local temple. We only hope that our deluded people would open their eyes before it is too late and break loose from the pernicious leadership of political quacks who proclaim the virtues of the nostrums from every house-top as panacea for all ills the body politic is suffering from."

Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, Oct. 10th, 1917.

The Congress Presidentship.

3. The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 10th October, writes:—"'Divided we stood, united we fell' would be the most likely exclamation of those who are responsible for the compromise which has resulted in the election of Mrs. Besant as the President of the next Congress when they come to realise the magnitude of their blunder. . . The President should be one in whom the Government have confidence, and whose representations will carry weight with them. There is no use in pretending that Mrs. Besant answers in any particular to this description of a Congress president, and by electing her as the President the Calcutta Reception Committee have woefully minimised the chances of the representations made at the next Congress receiving due consideration at the hands of the Government. It is hard to imagine a more deplorable piece of political folly. A Congress held under such auspices will stand condemned in the eyes of the Government and of the more thoughtful section of the people."

Non-Brahman, Madras, Oct. 14th, 1917.

The Panchama revolt.

4. The Non-Brahman, for the week ending 14th October, states:—"Indian journalism reached its lowest ebb when the Hindu abused the Panchamas who had assembled at the Spur Tank under the leadership of Rao Bahadur Tyagaraya Chettiyar and Dr. T. M. Nayar as rag-tags, bob-tails, apaches and the rest. . . Because Doctor Nayar and Mr. Tyagaraya Chettiyar led the movement, and the presence of Brahman imps resulted in a 'chucker out', the Panchamas are abused, Doctor Nayar is said to have 'found his level', and language which the scavengers may use is used against respected politicians. . . Thanks to Mrs. Besant, we have had new journalism. To abuse and revel in dirt, and when the object is gained, circulation increases and the Government is forced to accept her 'word', to suddenly appeal to the Benares audience for moderation! Mrs. Besant appealing for moderation! Can she escape reaping the whirlwind, she who sowed the wind? We live in strange times, indeed, when topsy turvydom prevails and Mrs. Besant sits on the throne and Lord Chelmsford plays the Mani Ayyar to praise her for her 'remarkable activities'. The Hindu abuses the labourers as apaches. And leaders are held up to scorn. And these are said to be the preludes for self-government!"

Non-Brahman, Madras, Oct. 14th, 1917.

Rival Non-Brahman Associations.

5. The Non-Brahman, for the week ending 14th October, observes:—"It is a pity that a responsible association, as we have no doubt the Madras Presidency Association is, should have stooped to vulgar abuse of a sister association, whose objects and ideals are at least as high as its own. We are told that the South Indian Peoples' Association does not represent the masses. Does the Madras Presidency Association represent forty millions? Will any responsible leader of the association come forward to deny that it is not a Brahman-engineered Home Rule organisation—of course Mrs. Besant has become respectable, and there is nothing in Home Rule when Lord Chelmsford is seen on his knees before the avatar of Bharata Mata cherishing her 'word' and certifying to her 'remarkable activities.'"

Justice, Madras, Oct. 17th, 1917.

Political delirium tremens.

6. Justice, of the 17th October, has the following:—"The Hindu has of late been studying the manifestations of what it is pleased to call the 'inebriate press.' The study of inebriety must have been very close, for last night under the title of 'His master's voice' it comes out with a leading article which exhibits unmistakable symptoms of political delirium tremens. It classes the Morning Post of London with the gutter-press. Men may differ from the views of such great newspapers as the Times, the Morning Post and the Daily Telegraph, but that is no justification for calling them the gutter-press. If the Morning Post is of the gutter, where could any one locate the Hindu in the drainage system of Madras? . . . We are very glad to see however a statement made by the Hindu that 'we are not aware that immediate Home Rule in its complete sense is advocated by any sane politician in India.' Neither are we. But we were only sorry to see a sudden increase in insanity in India among politicians, some of whom are our personal friends. We hope that the sober influence of the visit of the Secretary of State will decrease the percentage of lunacy among politicians."

Justice, Madras, Oct. 19th, 1917.

In an article under the heading "The Psychology of the Brahman mind," Justice, of the 19th October, says:—"A couple of days ago we questioned the accuracy of the classification by our contemporary, the Hindu, of the Morning Post among the gutter press. Yesterday our contemporary replied with the statement 'If our contemporary considers that the methods of the Daily Mail and the Morning Post are such as entitle them to be called great newspapers we wish our contemporary joy of its journalistic ideals'. We did not call the Daily Mail a great newspaper. We did call the Morning Post a great newspaper and mentioned, along with the Morning Post, the Times and the Daily Telegraph. We do not know why our contemporary bracketted the Daily Mail and the Morning Post together. They are entirely two different classes of journals. . . . The Hindu persists in including the Morning Post among the gutter press and says that tastes differ. The gentleman who kissed the pig is reported to have made the same observation. It is not a question of taste so much as the insight we get into the psychology of the Brahman mind. The Morning Post, an English newspaper of longstanding, the organ of the British aristocracy and the old governing classes, which has maintained the high traditions of British journalism, is called a gutter paper by a Brahman, because it is opposed to the Brahman view of Indian politics and shatters the Brahman ideal of a British politician. . . . Side by side with this condemnation of the Morning Post to the gutter, you have to consider the elevation of the apologist of Leadbeater to divinity. Mrs. Besant, a few years ago, came in for attack at the hands of the Hindu scarcely less severe than what the Morning Post has suffered. But the voluntary offer of Mrs. Besant to pull the Brahman chestnut out of the fire has made a goddess of her with the big umbrella and the Vedic hymns and all the other paraphernalia of the Hindu idea of divinity. The only standard by which it is to be decided as to whether one is to be elevated to heaven or relegated to the gutter is whether the individual agrees or disagrees with the Hindu. . . . At all events with these side lights thrown on the psychology of the Brahman mind, it would be dangerous for others, who do not belong to this sacred sect, to permit them to wield any political power over the vast mass of the people of this country."

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, Oct. 16th, 1917.

Mr. G. K. Gandhi.

7. The following appears in the West Coast Spectator, of the 16th October:—"A contemporary asks the question why Mr. Gandhi is not under the lime-light, and why he does not receive so much public attention as Mrs. Besant. The answer is simple. Mr. Gandhi is not an emotional politician and has the inconvenient knack of calling a spade a spade; and his methods of agitation are different from those of Mrs. Besant. And, further, he does not travel in reserved upper class compartments on railways and in luxurious motor-cars. He does not, moreover, pander to the vanity of the people whose luxury and indifference to the condition of the untouchables and the fallen he has unequivocably condemned."

Justice, Madras, Oct. 19th, 1917.

The release of Mrs. Besant.

8. Justice, of the 19th October, writes:—"In his statement made before the House of Commons, the Secretary of State for India says, in regard to the release of Mrs. Besant and her associates, that the course followed in no way constituted a criticism of the action of the Madras Government. We have no right to question the intention of the Secretary of State. But what is the effect of the action taken by Mr. Montagu and the Government of India? Does any intelligent and impartial observer in India think that by what they have done in this matter the authority and prestige of the Madras Government have not been lowered? . . Even the man in the village in this country does not fail to realise the effect of the action taken. If he had any doubt what Mr. Besant's followers have been doing after her release to make her a heroine, a martyr and a goddess has completely removed it. The story is told that when an innocent villager was shown the stamp with Mrs. Besant's effigy on it, possibly with a view to get his signature for the Home Rule manifesto, he enquired whether she was the same Europern lady who defeated the Madras Government. No speeches in Parliament, no assurances to the contrary, can remove this impression. . . Mrs. Besant is not the people of India. She is doubtless the leader of a noisy sect. But the bulk of the people of this country have nothing to do with her. If in the benefits of the new policy all the interned Indians were included we could have seen the wisdom of the step taken. By releasing Mrs. Besant and her friends alone and that in the way it has been done, not only has the position of the Madras Government been visibly weakened, but mischievous agitators of every class have received an encouragement. . . Why was Mr. Montagu so anxious about Mrs. Besant? What induced him to think that if her co-operation was secured there would be a tranquil atmosphere in India? What about the Indians? Are they of no consequence? Is it because their friends did not make so much noise that he ignored them?"

11. Adverting to the repeal of the order issued by the Government of Bombay prohibiting students of Law College from attending political meetings, especially those convened by Home Rulers, the Swadesamitran, of the 10th October, observes:—We will say that this is a step in the right direction. The order relating to other students, however, still continues to be in force. Apart from the consideration whether the real object is gained by prohibiting students from attending political meetings and requiring heads of institutions to see that students do not attend such meetings, it is quite certain that much affliction is caused to the students by such an order. Every one is aware that strong exception has been taken in all the provinces to this order. We will, therefore, reiterate once again that it will betoken wise statesmanship on the part of the authorities to cancel this strange order in response to public feeling in this matter.

Referring to the repeal, by the Government of Bombay, of the order issued by them prohibiting Law College students from attending Home Rule meetings, the Lokopakari, of the 15th October, suggests that a similar action may be adopted by the other provincial Governments as well, seeing that the repeal of orders affecting college students would give satisfaction to all.

17. Referring to the administration of the Tirupati Municipal Council, the Tirupati Municipality. [redacted] publishes an article under the above caption. The Government do not give more funds, especially now on account of the war. So there is no use blaming the municipal council.

The Tirupati Municipality states that without help from the Government, it could not maintain its hospital. The Government have not shown any sympathy with this suggestion. They refer to the consideration of the proposal to impose taxes on the pilgrims to be taken up with the revision of the Municipal Act. They suggest that the only source lies in raising the taxes. This suggestion does not appear proper. From these facts, it will be easy to see what powers the municipal councils have in local self-government. The critics of municipal administration will not hesitate to make much of small defects in it, and say that the Indians are unfit for self-government.

19. Adverting to the communiqué issued by the Government that no specials will be run for the coming festivals at Tiruvannamalai, Chidambaram and Trichinopoly, the Lokopakari, of the 15th October, thinks that this will cause great hardship to the people and, remarking that the Railways exist for the convenience of the people and not for being utilised by the Railway authorities as they like, even to the detriment of the people, suggests that, in consideration of the fact that many important festivals take place only once a year, even a higher rate can be collected, if necessary, from pilgrims and the required facilities offered for their attending the festivals.

administration, and the proclamation of Queen Victoria will be in vain. Are the several statutes and regulations, which declare that India will be governed without any reference to distinctions of caste or creed, false? But Sir William Vincent says that the British character should be maintained, even though the Indians may be allowed to share the administration. So, this could not have been his meaning. The second meaning of the phrase "British character" may be the political characteristics of the British, the glory of representative councils and the influence of public opinion. Our prayer is that the Indian administration should really have this British character and we demand only that the Government should be conducted with the consent of the people. Our grievance is that the popular representatives have not sufficient influence. No one can say for a moment that the administrative qualities of the British are not possessed by others. It will be wrong again to say that there are no mistakes in the administration of the British. Justice, uprightness and morality are the inherent qualities of the Indians, and we must take it that these qualities have been well developed as a result of their association with the British for the last 150 years. Why should then the big phrase "the British character" be brought into create a confusion about a simple matter? It is news to us that the British capital has come into swell the wealth of this country on some definite assurance by the Government. For aught we know, there is no law or statute to this effect, who has the power to give an assurance on behalf of the Indians, without the Indians knowing anything about it? Is British capital utilised in India only with humanitarian motives? Does it not fetch its interest? Perhaps some Anglo-Indians think that the moment the Indians are granted a measure of self-government, they will drive out the companies working with British capital. Is it fair on their part to think so and is it fair again for the Indians, with whom they have been moving till now? The Indians know full well the benefits they have derived from British capital. Nothing will happen to wound the feelings of the British. The real fear of the Anglo-Indians is that their inordinate influence will be reduced. It is to hide this that they are indulging in vain dreams.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Oct. 15th, 1917.

The Anglo-Indian agitation.

Referring to the meeting of the Bombay European Association held on the 12th October 1917, the Swadesamitran, of the 15th idem, writes:—One feature of this meeting was that there was not that spirit of jealousy and extreme arrogance which was characteristic of the meeting of the European Association at Calcutta. Though there was nothing new in the speech of the president of this meeting, Mr. Wardlaw Milne, we appreciate the tenor of the speech. His first plea was that it was most inexpedient to consider about the introduction of political reforms in this country during this period of war. When future reforms are being considered even now in England and other countries, which are the direct sufferers by the war, it is somewhat strange that this objection should be raised in India. No one will venture to assert that the consideration of political reforms now will change the course of the war. The only idea of the Anglo-Indians is that, by offering such an excuse, the unpalatable solution of a complicated problem may be postponed for some time. The statement of Mr. Milne that he has no objection whatever to the introduction of moderate and reasonable reforms deserves careful consideration. But what are these reforms? It can immediately be stated that they are not what have been proposed by our politicians. The Anglo-Indians themselves are not now in a position to say what these reforms are; for Indians of such moderate views as will be acceptable to these Anglo-Indians have not yet begun to take part in politics. Considering the cleverness with which the Anglo-Indians have till now been safeguarding their prestige, influence and rights, there is nothing surprising in their proclaiming themselves now to be the champions of the masses. Until a spirit of mutual confidence was created between the Hindus and the Muhammadans, these were patting the latter on their back. As long as our politicians stood divided as moderates and extremists, these were praising the moderates. Now that both these devices have failed, they have to get a party favourable to them and they have suddenly begun to evince a sympathy and love for the poorer classes. We would quote here the words of the Manchester Guardian that it is a futile argument adduced by the bureaucrats here that the uneducated masses are quite contented with their condition, and that therefore no weight need be attached to the clamour of a few educated persons, who are the disappointed lot. We need not add anything more. We doubt whether these plausible arguments adduced by the Anglo-Indians show that they are making dupes of themselves or that they want to dupe others. However this may be, those in England will surely not be deceived by this and that is all that we want. It is in that portion of the speech of Mr. Milne, where he says that the Anglo-Indians would not permit their stake in the trade, the commerce, the industry and the Government of this country to go unrecognised or disregarded, that the secret motive of the Anglo-Indians has been incautiously laid bare to us. Mr. Milne bases the rights of the Anglo-Indians on the conquest of India by the East India Company. But our readers should note that when the Crown took over the Government of the country from this company, they set a money value upon all the privileges of the company and paid them off. Therefore a claim based on privileges enjoyed before the advent of British rule cannot hold water. Others can never claim better privileges in India than the Indians. The Indians have a prior right in the administration and wealth of India. May the Anglo-Indians know this soon!

The Joint Session of the All-India Congress Committee and the Muslim League at Allahabad.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 11th, 1917.

26. In commenting upon the proceedings of this session, the Swadesamitran, of the 11th October, observes:—We hope the Viceroy will note the spirit of the resolution passed by this session recommending the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali. It has been pointed out that the conclusion arrived at by the Government about the attitude of Mr. Muhammad Ali is not a correct one, that no danger will accrue from his release and that it will increase the loyalty of all classes of people. Therefore the Government should not think that this affair has been settled in a way, and that it will be derogatory to their dignity if their decision is changed. Their release is demanded by the people throughout the country. Judging from facts published till now, the conclusion of the Government seems to have been arrived at on wrong information. The peace wished for by the Government can prevail in the country only if, instead of persisting in their present conclusion, they take courage from the fact that to err is human and release these as well as others who have been interned for political reasons. Next coming to the committees appointed to prepare an address to be presented to Mr. Montagu and a draft memorandum in support of the reform scheme to be submitted to him, a special importance was given to old workers in selecting the members of these committees and an apprehension was entertained in the case of some. There is room for us to doubt whether a committee nominated, under such circumstances, will discharge its duty of drafting the memorandum satisfactorily. The members of this committee are not all in the same place and Mr. Montagu will be here in December. As the time before us is very short, we would suggest that, in order to draft the memorandum in the best manner each member of the committee should note down his opinion on every subject and that all members should approve of the memorandum at one sitting.

Pilgrim tax.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 11th, 1917.

27. The Hindu Nesan, of the 11th October, dwells upon the desirability of levying a tax on pilgrims, which will be paid without the least demur, by the municipalities of the several places where pilgrims gather on festive occasions, and, justifying it on the ground that the local tax-payer, who is already sufficiently ground down by taxation, cannot fairly be asked to contribute to the maintenance of sanitation and other measures necessitated by a large concourse of outsiders on a particular occasion or occasions, instances the case of Tirupati, where the prayer of the municipality for levying a tax on pilgrims has not been granted by the Government, who want the municipality to wait until the District Municipalities Act is amended. The paper adds that it is merciless on the part of the Government to make the burden of taxation on the people of Tirupati a most unbearable one, and, describing the statement of the Government that the people of Tirupati are also benefited by the gathering of pilgrims there as a meaningless excuse offered for the nonce, observes that the only benefit accruing to the people from these pilgrims is the contagious diseases they leave behind them.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 10th, 1917.

Release of the Muslims interned.

In commenting the observations made by Khan Bahadur Safdar Husain Sahib as the president of the public meeting held at Madras on the 8th October under the auspices of the Madras Muslim League, to pray for the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali, the Hindu Nesan, of the 10th October, says that these observations are worthy of the notice of His Excellency the Viceroy, and insists on the necessity of a deputation, as proposed at the above meeting, consisting of representatives selected from the several provinces, to wait upon His Excellency the Viceroy in this connection.

Release of the Muslim interned.

The Liva-ul-Islam, of the 11th October, publishes the proceedings of a public meeting held at Tanjore on the 3rd October 1917, under the auspices of the local Home Rule League, for this purpose, referred to in the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 29 of the above report.

Das as the president of a public meeting held at Calcutta on the 7th idem to demand the release of these interned persons, referred to in sub-paragraph 6 of paragraph 29 of Report No. 41 of 1917.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 15th, 1917.

The release of the Muslims interned.

A Muhammadan correspondent writing from Shimoga to the Swadesamitran, of the 15th October, characterises as improper the reply of the Government of India to the interpellation of the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah on this subject, and, advocating continuous agitation in respect of the release, observes:—From what the mother of these Muslim brothers says, it is clear that they have been interned for no proper reasons. Let us grant for a while that the reply of the Government is proper. If these interned persons really wanted to help Turkey in the great war now raging in Europe, they could have advised and prevented the Indian Muhammadans from proceeding to the front. But, on the other hand, these Indian Muhammadans have, in loyalty to their Government, sacrificed their lives in large numbers in victoriously fighting against the Turks in Mesopotamia irrespective of their religious sentiments. Our benign Government, though aware of this, have, by their action in respect of the internment of these Muhammadan brothers, plunged all the Mussalmans in this country in a sea of misery and roused the feelings of even the patient among them. How, under these circumstances, can it be said that the reply given in the Imperial Legislative Council on this subject is a proper one?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 15th, 1917.

Release of the Muslim interned.

The Swadesamitran, of the 15th October, publishes in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting held at Mayavaram on the 13th idem, under the auspices of the local Home Rule League, when resolutions are said to have been passed demanding the immediate release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali, and taking exception to the action of the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces in refusing permission to the Hon'ble Mr. Razi Ali, to visit the interned persons as their legal adviser.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, Oct. 7th, 1917.

The release of the interned.

The Hitakarini, of the 7th October, says:—The Indians are disappointed in their expectation that Mr. Muhammad Ali and his brother would be released along with Mrs. Besant.

To secure their release and to maintain the independence of the Indians, we have no other go than to have recourse to the same great power that has been the cause of the release of Mrs. Besant and others.

The interned Moslems.

The Desamata, of the 10th October, says:—Mr. Muhammad Ali and his brother promised that they would never descend to anything but constitutional agitation. But in the promise they said they would keep allegiance to their Muhammadan religion. The Government put some strange construction upon it, and, out of fear, have not released them. The Indian Muhammadan army is fighting against the Turks on behalf of our Emperor, and so the Government, we think, need not suspect these Moslem leaders. If they suspect them at all, they will do well to ascertain their views plainly, and avoid giving pain of mind to the Muhammadans just at a time when the whole of India is happily expecting the visit of Mr. Montagu. We hope the Government will set the brothers at liberty and satisfy both the Indians and the Muhammadans.

Place of Indian history in the present system of education.

30. In reproducing the remark of the Superintendent of Archæological department in his report on the working of that department, that the educated Indian knows much more of the history and architecture of Greece or Rome than of those of his own country and that, if Indians are to actively participate in the administration of their country, this condition should be removed and greater importance attached in these days of light and wisdom to archæological research, the Swadesamitran, of the 12th October, reiterates once again its observation, that the system of education now in force in this country is not adapted to the requirements of the people and that there are not proper facilities for gaining a knowledge of the history of the country, and adds—This is the remark made by a Government officer himself. See how strange it is that the Indians should be made to learn the Histories of Greece and Rome, while facilities are not afforded to them for the study of the history and architecture of their own country, just as a man, without learning the constitution of his own body and home, should be required to learn that of others.

Postmen's strike.

31. In the course of a leaderette on the postmen's strike in Bombay, the Hindu Nesan, of the 10th October, characterises as wise the action of the Postmaster-General, Madras, in having given a personal hearing to the grievances of the Madras postmen and submitting certain recommendations to the Director-General of Posts and Telegraphs with a view to redress their grievances, and observes that he has, by his thoughtful action, averted a similar strike of the postmen in Madras and saved thereby considerable inconvenience to the public.

The two parties among the Indians.

32. The Swadesamitram, of the 12th October, writes:—Anglo-Indians of the type of the editor of the Madras Mail gloat on the impression that they have created two parties among us. The national party, which has been in existence for a long time, is spread throughout India and comprises many races and classes. The other party consists of a company with about 300 members and a few of its followers as well as some Anglo-Indians. Though the Home Rule party is sympathised with by a large section of the public, the persistent opposition of the bureaucrats and the Anglo-Indians, who do not belong to it, to the grant of Home Rule to Indians necessitated the Home Rule propaganda being pushed throughout the country by establishing Home Rule Leagues. Seeing that this strengthened the cause of the Home Rule agitation, many Anglo-Indians began to take steps to obstruct it. As their opposition would make others naturally conclude that they are averse to giving up their authority, they found it necessary to make it appear that there was opposition to Home Rule among the Indians themselves. Though the Madras Mail itself admits that those Indians, who are alleged to be against

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 12th, 1917.

Home Rule, have not interfered much in politics till now, it decided to find out such Indians and make the Anglo-Indians join with them. As a result of this, our readers are aware that a party is being brought into existence against Home Rule. The main ground on which many of the bureaucrats and other Anglo-Indians clamoured for the suppression of the Home Rule movement was that it would endanger the public peace. But this movement has not till now led to the creation of a feeling of hatred or the commission of riots, nor will it ever do so. Now what is the policy adopted by the opposite party, which declared our peaceful agitation for the release of Mrs. Besant to be dangerous? The Madras Mail suggested that an attempt should be made to drive away the Secretary of State for India from his office, and that the Anglo-Indians should resign their seats in the Legislative Councils and other appointments, thereby making the administration impossible. Besides this, the agitation carried on by a few Indians in this Presidency in the name of the non-Brahmans, who are against Home Rule, is tending to create a spirit of hatred and mischief. Let us now see how far this anti-Home Rule agitation is capable of promoting public peace. The statement of the Collector of Coimbatore on the information of the police, that the flying of the Home Rule flag would lead to riots on the part of those who were against Home Rule, shows which party is calculated to disturb public peace. How about the smashing of the windows of the Home Rule shop in Madras, the assault on Mr. Deobhanker by some soldiers during his travel from Madras to Bombay, the rough handling of some Brahmans by the Panchamas recently at Egmore, and such other incidents? These are all doubtless acts contrary to law. Nevertheless, those who commit such acts seem to be emboldened by an impression that the law would not be enforced against them. Doctor Nayar and his following have the support of the Anglo-Indians like the editor of the Madras Mail. As the Mail makes a show of supporting the local Government, ordinary people may believe that the latter reciprocate the feeling. Though, in spite of the want of sympathy on the part of the Government for the Home Rule agitation and the party connected with it, the officials would not support the commission of unlawful acts to the detriment of that party, it should be noted that there is room for the creation of a wrong impression. Several statements are attributed to the speakers at the Panchama meeting held in the Spur Tank, which are capable of inciting the audience to act of violence against the Brahmans. If this is true, we will ask whether the officers, who take down shorthand notes at every Home Rule meeting, have reported these speeches to the Commissioner of Police, and we would like to know what action the Commissioner has taken on it. The mischievous tendency created in the minds of the Panchamas by the speeches delivered on that day and the conduct of that party cannot be ignored. Some Panchamas seem to be giving trouble to the Brahmans in Egmore and other places, and petition signed by 40 residents in Egmore have been sent to the Commissioner of Police. What action are the authorities going to take? Though the speech of Mr. Anchas shows that the intelligent among the Panchamas did not allow themselves to be deceived on that day, there is the doubtless fact that there are many in this city, who, for a small income or even in fun, will commit fanatical acts and that inciting these against Home Rule, without telling them what is meant by it, will lead to a disturbance of public peace. It may be that some officials do not like the demand of the Indians for reforms in view to Home Rule. But there is no connection whatever between their individual opinion and the performance of their duties. The granting of reforms or denying them depends upon the will of the British Parliament. It is the duty of the authorities in India to protect all the subjects of the King-Emperor.

38. A correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 10th October, refers to the statement of His Excellency the Viceroy, in the course of his recent speech in the Imperial Legislative Council, that the skin merchants in India are now carrying on a vigorous business and that it is due to the work of the Munition Board and its branches and observes:—The above statement may create an impression that the skin merchants and tanners are now having a very favourable time of it and are making such huge profits as to make good the loss incurred by them two years back owing to a fall in price in the London market. Though we ardently wish that the words of the representative of our Emperor may prove true, the real state of affairs now is anything but agreeable to us. Our hands are tied up almost completely by Acts, rules and regulations and very soon we may have, of necessity, to close our godowns, depriving thousands of our workmen and their families of their means of livelihood. First, let us consider about the trade in hides. The export of tanned hides to England has now been prohibited by the Government and they insist on their being sold to themselves, at prices fixed by the officers appointed for the purpose. It is found very difficult to make these officers accept the quality of the hides presented to them. As, however, there is no enactment fixing the price of raw hides, we have to purchase these hides at great cost and incur heavy loss thereby. The lot of those trading in sheep skins is even more pitiable. An order of the Government of India, dated the 28th April 1917, insists on all skins under tannage on the date being removed from the tanning operation within 20 days. According to the old methods followed by us, it takes 45 days to tan skins and so skins had to be removed from tannage, while they were not yet completely tanned. Skins so removed and raw ones purchased by us for tannage are now rotting in a corner of our godowns. When even well-tanned skins get depreciated in value after a few days, it need not be pointed out that these half-tanned ones are only a dead weight on us. This order is sure to ruin us completely, and we rely upon the benign Government to spare us the misery by cancelling it. Under existing conditions, untanned skins may be exported, and this helps countries like France and America to purchase these skins from here and get them tanned there, thereby increasing the profits they are already making in this trade. Thus the restrictions against tanning and the export of tanned hides have resulted in depriving Indian merchants of their profits, transferring them to foreign countries, which still carry on the business with raw hides obtained from here, and thousands of workmen of their means of livelihood. Let us hope that the Viceroy will soon remedy this state of affairs, for we take it from his speech that he appreciates our services.

The condition of skin merchants in South India.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Oct. 10th, 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 13th October, also dwells at length upon the hardships resulting to skin merchants in this country from the orders of the Government prohibiting the export of hides and the tanning of skins and pointing out that, besides the merchants dealing in hides and skins, those that have entered into contract with them for supplying tanning barks also suffer much by the aforesaid orders of the Government, observes that, though it may not be possible for the Government of India to redress the grievances referred to above completely, they are bound to remedy the state of affairs as much as possible.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

39. Adverting to the communiqué of the Government of India issued to the effect that Mr. Montagu and the Viceroy will visit Bombay between the 24th December 1917 and the 2nd January 1918, the Hindu Nesan, of the 13th October, reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Indian Social Reformer, which invites the attention of the Viceroy to the fact that, as the session of the Indian National Congress and several other important conferences will be held at Calcutta during this period, great political leaders will find it hardly possible to go to Bombay to meet the Secretary of State, and suggests the desirability of the Secretary halting at Calcutta during the Christmas, as he can then have an opportunity of meeting many of the leaders, who would be present at Calcutta at the time, and the object of his visit to India will thereby be fulfilled.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 12th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 12th October, says in its leader:—In pursuance of the notification of the Government of Madras, the representations of the people to Mr. Montagu have to reach the Provincial Governments in a month more. In this Presidency, a memorial has to be sent regarding the Congress scheme of reforms. The Madras Presidency Association are to send a representation regarding separate representation. The constitution of a separate Andhra province will form the subject of the address of the Andhras. The Congress scheme of reforms relates to the whole of India. The scheme would have been perfect if it had included the division of the country on a language basis. . . As the Andhras, the Congress and the Madras Presidency Association are pursuing the same goal, they will do well to put the money they are going to spend into a common fund and concentrate all their energy. The united strength of the people will then manifest itself with great force. . . The people will understand that the different movements of the country will open themselves into one great national current.

A lecture at Sivaganga.

40. A correspondent, writing to the Dravidan, of the 13th October, reports Mr. P. Varadarajulu Nayudu of Tiruppur to have spoken at Sivaganga on the 9th idem on the condition of India, past and present, and to have made the following observations in the course of his speech:—The Government have not allowed the Indian people, inclusive of the zamindars, the use of revolvers and guns without a license. It is, indeed, they that are responsible for the differences in caste and creed in India. The ancient civilization of this country completely disappeared on account of the Government and has ceased to be of any use to it. It is, therefore, essential that India should have Home Rule at once, and we should make united efforts to acquire it.

A public meeting at Tippirajapuram.

41. The Hindu Nesan, of the 15th October, publishes the proceedings of a public meeting held at Tippirajapuram in connection with the celebration of the anniversary of a reading-room on the 10th idem under the presidency of Rao Bahadur N. Krishnaswami Ayyangar, when Mr. G. Mahalinga Ayyar, the Secretary of the Local Home Rule League, is said to have spoken on the condition of villages, past and present, the position of village officers and the necessity for the establishment of village panchayats. Then Mr. E. Suryanarayana Ayyar of Tanjore is reported to have addressed the audience on the aims of the two great assemblies, viz., the Congress and the Muslim League, in the course of which he is stated to have observed that, under the existing constitution of the Legislative Council, the representative members command no influence in the Council and that unless these members are given powers as recommended by the Congress and the Muslim League, the requirements of the country cannot be satisfied, and that the people suffer much for want of control over the finance. The President, while speaking on the present political situation, is said to have observed that Home Rule can be had only with the co-operation of the villagers and that the number of the Indians holding higher offices under Government is considerably low and condemning the attitude of the Anglo-Indian papers like the Madras Mail in hampering the progress of the Indians by throwing obstacles in the way of their aspirations being realised, exhorted on the necessity for union among the people in connection with the representations to be made to the Secretary of State during his visit to this country.

Co-operation of Indians necessary.

42. The Lokopakari, in its leader of the 15th October, strongly deprecating any attempt at creating a split among the different sections of the Indians especially at the present juncture, observes:—As a result of the war, Japan is growing in strength in every respect. The Government should come forward to place India in a higher position still. But to gain this end, the Indians should co-operate with the Government with a desire to acquire all kinds of rights. If, on the other hand, they should go on creating party factions among themselves, their progress will hardly be possible.

The Panchama meeting, Madras.

43. Referring to the incidents which took place at the Panchama meeting recently held in the Spur Tank, Madras, on the 7th October 1917, when it is said that certain Panchamas assaulted some Brahmans and Non-Brahmans, the Lokopakari, of the 15th October, writes:—Perhaps the police who were near the scene of occurrence were merely witnessing these events. Had they come to the spot immediately, the Panchamas would not have committed this act of injustice. The police made no attempt to arrest the offenders and the Commissioner of Police came to the place after the affray was over and issued instructions to his men. The people can infer for themselves as to who is responsible for this incident, the conveners of the meeting or some one else.

Quoting, from the report on the working of the Police department, in this Presidency during the year 1916, certain figures to show that a good number of head constables and constables are either illiterate or can only sign their names, the Lokopakari and the Prapanchamitran, of the 15th and 16th October, respectively, question the possibility of such illiterate men behaving properly towards the people, in the discharge of the responsible duties they have taken upon themselves.

Improvement of industries.

45. Adverting to the proceedings of a conference recently held at Bangalore for the improvement of forests, the Lokopakari and the Prapanchamitran, of the 15th and 16th October, respectively, observe:—Several varieties of articles can be manufactured from the raw products available in the Indian forests. Our country can advance in industries by the manufacture of matches, pencils, paper-pulp, colours and dyes and the Indian workmen, who go to and suffer in foreign countries, can thereby find means of livelihood here alone. If the Government and the capitalists in our country would bestow their attention on this subject, our country will prosper. Foreigners are now carrying away all our raw products and are making large profits thereby.

Lord Pentland.

47. The Swadesamitran, of the 15th October, in reproducing a statement appearing in the India of London that according to the information furnished to the Weekly Dispatch of England by its special correspondent that Lord Pentland is likely to return home but that his return has no connection whatever with the release of Mrs. Besant, observes:—The facts are these. But the readers of the Madras Mail will think that Lord Pentland resigns only on account of the release of Mrs. Besant.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 15th, 1917.

However this may be, from what the special correspondent says, there is room for many to consider whether Lord Pentland will continue in his office till the close of the war or will be expecting another to be nominated to it very soon.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Oct. 8th, 1917.

His Excellency Lord Pentland.

The Qaumi Report, of the 8th October, writes:—"Some foolish persons have monopolized the friendship and far-sighted policy of His Excellency Lord Pentland and are now considering whether His Excellency having suffered defeat in Mrs. Besant's affair, should resign.

The editor criticises the views and suggestions of the local contemporaries, the Madras Mail, the Hindu and Justice submitted to His Excellency and observes—

We advise our contemporaries to give rest to their thinking minds. Sophistic aspiration has no place in the arena of practical politics and the public entertain no idea of defeat in their minds. In God's name they should stop their preaching and cease disturbing people's beliefs and sentiments by proving to them that enmity, misunderstanding or friction exist between the Viceroy and the Governor of Madras. They are concealing the fact in their logical minds.

With profound respect and due deference we, on behalf of the vast majority of the public, suggest to His Excellency Lord Pentland that he should not be misled by their words. If God forbid! His Excellency were to act so, thousands of Muhammadans in the Madras Presidency would be extremely sorry and it would make it very difficult for his successor.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Oct. 13th, 1917.

Home Rule.

48. The Swadesamitran, of the 13th October, reproduces in Tamil a speech delivered by Mr. B. G. Tilak on Home Rule at a meeting held on the 7th idem in the office of the Home Rule League, Allahabad, under the presidency of Mrs. Annie Besant, in the course of which the following observations occur:—We aspire for Home Rule, because it is our birth-right and we now demand that we should ourselves be allowed to manage our affairs which is now conducted by others. We do not wish for a change of rulers but for a change in the administrators. Those who conduct the administration of this country state that they have been appointed under the Government of India Acts; but my view is quite different. They are only the representatives of the King and not the King himself. The Indians are as much the subjects of the King as these administrators. Hence they are also the representatives of the King on an equal basis. These officers have indeed certain powers given to them by a statute of Parliament and have not usurped them from any body else. If the Parliament should pass another Act and confer similar powers on the Indians, the Indians would then occupy the position which those officers have at present. If our aspiration is fulfilled, some persons will have to give up the positions they have been holding till now. Besides this, there would be no other cause for complaint. It is now admitted by all that our demand for Home Rule is but a reasonable one, while the bureaucrats, out of self-interest, say that it will take some centuries before we can have it. We know in what manner the bureaucrats have ruled India for the past 100 years. They say that the Indians cannot govern themselves, organise an army, administer justice or legislate measures, although they were actually doing these things before. On whom rests the responsibility for this ignorance? Not on the Indians. When the bureaucrats came to this country, they took the trouble to restore order from the chaos which then prevailed here; and how did they effect this? First they wrested from us our arms and appropriated for themselves all the important administrative powers. Then the progress in science began to decline, and industries totally disappeared from this country in consequence. They say that they have established peace here, but on the other hand they have rendered all progress impossible. We must, therefore, clearly represent to Mr. Montagu, when he goes over here, our aspirations and grievances and demand, with courage and firmness, the privileges we require and in doing this, we must take into account the existence of opponents and work in such a way that our object will be fulfilled.

The above paper reproduces in Tamil the speech delivered by the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah on the same occasion, in the course of which the following observations occur:—Not only should we be prepared to receive Mr. Montagu during his visit, but we should also overcome the three opponents to the Home Rule movement in India so that they may not have the upperhand. The first opponent is the bureaucracy, who belong to a party with narrow views and, having monopolised all the high offices for themselves, would not like to part with them. The second is the Anglo-Indian commercial community, who for the past two centuries have plundered the economic resources of our country. They say that they have invested large capitals in trade in this country and that, as long as this investment continues, the Indians, the sons of the soil, should continue to be their servants. This is indeed preposterous. The third opponent is the military, where all the high offices are now in the hands of the British. We have to contend with these three opponents. It is, therefore, our duty to demolish the monopolies enjoyed by these at present and we should do all that lies in our power to gain this end.

Home Rule.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th October, has the following in English :— ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 13th, 1917.

"The question of Home Rule.

"A CURIOUS STORY.

"CALCUTTA, October 12.

"A correspondent writes to the Amrita Bazar Patrika that certain firms and parties in the district of Hooghly as well as in Calcutta have begun inviting clerks, menial servants and others in their service to state assent or dissent to the statement that they do not want Home Rule, and that they prefer a European to an Indian member of Civil Service to be in charge of their district."

It also gives a Telugu version of the above on another page.

The same paper makes the following remarks: —A correspondent to New India writes to say that while the patriots are trying to get signatures to the Congress scheme of reforms, the opponents are trying to get the signatures of some to a memorial opposed to the scheme. It is said that the Anglo-Indians and the Indians that are opposed to freedom are secretly deliberating over the matter. A correspondent to the Amrita Bazar Patrika says that certain European firms are taking statements from their clerks, etc., as to their views regarding Home Rule. The provincial rulers have not left off their hostile attitude towards Home Rule when political reforms are about to be considered. Lord Willingdon has suggested that those who join the Home Rule League do not act according to the dictates of their conscience It is said that the Anglo-Indians in Allahabad will meet on the 24th of this month and, after enquiring into the present condition of the country brought about by the agitation for Home Rule, inform Mr. Montagu of the same. But one thing has to be noted. It may be surmised that the vow of the Mail to see that Mr. Montagu is removed from his office has failed. This is why the Anglo-Indians have undertaken to represent their grievances to Mr. Montagu.

A correspondent to the same paper says:—We have learnt during the past three years that we do not make proper endeavours to remove the ignorance of the people and inspire new ideals into them. It may now be said that a new era has begun. . . It is now the opinion of the people that the rule of the bureaucracy is, on the whole, unsatisfactory and not very efficient. The reason for this is that they have not granted all our aspirations. Mr. Montagu said in the Parliament as follows, addressing the British rulers:—I can emphatically assert that your administration of India is very inefficient. It is to be regretted that though you are lovers of freedom, you do not grant the wish of the Indians for self-government. When the Indians wish to become a great military nation like ourselves, why do you not make them such ?

Home Rule.

The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 10th October, has an article against the Home Rule propaganda in which it mentions the several disadvantages that are likely to accrue from the grant of Home Rule or self-government. MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, Oct. 10th, 1917.

The editor throws light on merely the principles of the subject, but reserves the expression of his views with reference to the preservation of the rights of the community and the maintenance of public peace and order for a future occasion to be submitted to his readers when necessity arises. The article concludes with the assertion that, under present conditions Home Rule is not suitable for the people of India.

The Home Rule howl.

49. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Dravidan, of the 16th October, takes exception to a newspaper supporting the Home Rule movement having alleged that Doctor Nayar and Mr. A. C. Parthasarathi Nayudu made certain statements at the recent Panchama meeting held in Egmore, and says that it is really funny that, knowing that the innocent Panchamas were unnecessarily teased by the Brahman boys, this paper should find fault with persons who have long been working for the public good and who command the respect of all.

The Madras Bank and the ryots.

51. The Hindu Nesan, of the 15th October, complains that the Madras Bank, the large amount of Government money invested in which is nothing but what has been collected as taxes from the agriculturists and others in this country, is helpful only to the Anglo-Indians in the main and that poor Indians are not able to have loans from it at moderate rates of interest, and contrasts the statement said to have been made by the president of the bank at its last annual meeting, that the agents of the bank at different centres were helping the ryots materially by advancing loans to them and thus releasing them from the hands of the village Sowcars, with a communication addressed to the local dailies by a Nellore correspondent who says that local bankers in different places borrow from the branches of the Madras Bank at an easy rate of interest and lend to the ryots at exorbitant rates.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 16th, 1917.

Scarcity of milk, ghee, etc.

52. Anent the hardships suffered by the people here on account of the scarcity of good milk, ghee, etc., the Swadesamitran, of the 16th October, says:—The main cause of this scarcity is the reduction of the number of cattle in the country now, which is continuing. Not only are cattle of good breed sent away to foreign countries, but buffaloes and cows are neglected by the people after they cease to give milk and sold to butchers for a low price. So both these things should be put a stop to. Steps should also be taken to foster the breed of cattle. Unless and until such measures are adopted and the number of cattle in the country increased, there is no possibility of securing a good supply of milk, ghee, etc. Before the Provincial Governments take up this question, the municipalities are bound to do their best to remedy the existing state of affairs. As we have often pointed out before this, the two remedial measures that can be adopted are the starting of co-perative societies for the benefit of cattle owners and the opening of demonstration milk farms. For aught we know, the insanitary condition of many towns is due to the impure ghee and milk consumed by the people there. So it is necessary on the part of every municipality to bestow proper attention on this subject.

Reforming the animals.

53. The Swadesamitran, of the 16th October, contains an article contributed by C. Subrahmanya Bharati on the merciless slaughter of animals by man, in the course of which the following observations occur:—It is very necessary to open a school for the animals and improve them. But some may object to this on the ground that schools have not yet been opened for all Hindus. But this argument cannot hold good; for we should do our duty. Let us, if possible, start schools for Hindus as well. If they will not take advantage of it, we shall open a school for the animals and the Hindus and other races may learn a lesson therefrom. He who does not reform himself is not competent to go about reforming other creatures.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 12th, 1917.

Mr. Muhammad Ali and Mr. Shaukat Ali.

54. The Andhrapatrika, of the 12th October, publishes in Telugu the letter of Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar which appears on page 5 of the Hindu, dated the 11th October, under the heading "the Moslem interned."

55. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th October, says under this heading :—The mischief of the Anglo-Indians is daily on the increase. The readers are aware that only the other day Mr. K. Hanumantha Rao was, while travelling in a train, assaulted by an Anglo-Indian. Even when that event is green in the minds of the people, Mr. Deobhanker, the patriot, was, while going from Madras to Bombay, dishonoured by Anglo-Indian soldiers. Which Indian's indignation will not be roused when he hears that he was beaten? Which Indian will not think of retaliation? It is difficult to understand whether the Indians appear to them as men or some other animals. We hear that in railway journeys, Indian men and women are often dishonoured by such Anglo-Indians. Why should it be said that they are dishonoured in South Africa or the Fiji Islands? In this holy India itself, such things take place at a time when people are fighting for freedom. May the rulers redress this grievance! The Anglo-Indians treat us in an arbitrary manner thinking, perhaps, that they belong to the ruling race. It is through such arbitrary behaviour that the swaraj movement is gaining strength.

Anglo-Indian mischief.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 11th, 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 15th October, also reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Morning Post of England, in its leader under this heading, on the appointment of Mr Montagu as the Secretary of State for India, as they appear in the Hindu of the 13th idem.

"Mischief in India."

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 15th, 1917.

The Kistnapatrika, of 13th October, says:—When the Anglo-Indians hear the expression Home Rule, they behave forgetting that they belong to the British nation. Their cheif business is to drain the wealth of India. The words spoken by the President of the Calcutta Anglo-Indian Association betray the selfishness of the Anglo-Indians. It is ridiculous that these people to whom their own advantage is all important, should now and then pose themselves as friendly advisers to the Indians. They say that their outlay of Rs. 750 crores in India is to be regarded as more important than the welfare of 300 crores of Indians.

The Anglo-Indians.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Oct. 13th, 1917.

56. A Mussalman correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th October, writes:—The Hindus as well as the Muhammadans are sorry that the Muhammadan brothers under orders of internment have not yet been released in pursuance of the hopes held out by His Excellency the Viceroy in his speech in the Legislative Council. It is the duty of every Indian to carry on constitutional agitation and see that the rulers release the brothers soon. . . We exhort the people to resort to passive resistance if necessary and request the Government to release the two Muhammadan brothers, who have been doing much good to India politically.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 11th, 1917.

The Sam;ad Abhyudaya, of the 13th October, in its news columns, writes:—Turkey is now hostile to the British Government. It is difficult to own allegiance to two masters who are hostile to each other. It is easy on the other hand to incur the hatred of both. The mother of these great men greatly grieved by the confinement of her children has publicly advised them to give the necessary assurance. This advice is unavailing. The condition of these Muslim patriots is indeed most deplorable. Unless Turkey and the British end their hostilities, neither party will believe what they say. However that may be, the people from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin are praying for their release. The Government would do well to grant the prayer.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 11th, 1917.

58. Under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th October, says:—The Mail writes as follows about the successes that it has attained till now:—"We have roused the European Association. We constituted a committee in England and have begun work. Whether what we have been doing is an exhibition of a drama or not will be known in a few weeks more. We are waiting for the result with confidence." The threats that have been held out by the Mail till now have all proved vain, as also its challenge that it could by means of a cablegram remove Mr. Montagu from his office. . . It is to be seen how far its threat of upsetting the Parliament will prove true. It is, at any rate, plain that the Mail is doing its level best to see that the national aims of the Indians are not fulfilled. There is no doubt that the editor of the Mail is receiving help from many of his countrymen. But what efforts are the Indians putting forth to counteract this? . . . The burden of their work lies in the future. . . Had some leaders gone to England and carried on an agitation there, the agitation of the Mail might have been counteracted. The Indians should understand that it is their duty to see that England shows a favourable attitude to the aspirations of the Indians.

A meeting at Vizianagram.

59. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th October, refers to a meeting of the Hindus and the Muhammadans held at Vizianagram to request the rulers to release Mr. Muhammad Ali and Mr Shaukat Ali and says:—The president of the meeting expatiated on the loyalty, patriotism, religious faith of, and the great deeds done by, the two brothers, on the troubles that overtook them and their paper, on other interned persons in Bengal and other provinces, and on the fact that a Bengalee youth among them committed suicide. He touched upon the commotion caused in the country by the Criminal Investigation Department, the Anglo-Indian papers and by the Defence of India Act. He said that it was the belief of many that the brothers had no love for Turkey. He prays that the Government would release them as their release would tend to the welfare and peace of the country.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

Non-Brahmans.

61. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 9th October, addresses the British rulers and says:—The non-Brahman Association wants a small favour of you. It is their representation in the higher offices. Unless you help us in this respect, we will not be freed from difficulties. If you neglect this, you will be the cause of our discontent.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 10th, 1917.

Passive resistance.

62. The Andhraprakasika, of the 10th October, says:—If the advocates of Home Rule think that it is improper to serve under a Government, who do not carry out their wishes, and give up their Government posts, it is difficult to understand how the Government can get their work done. It may be said that such a thing can never take place. But it may take place under the influence of the Home Rule movement. . . Those who are grateful to Government cannot but deem it the duty of the authorities to confer on non-Brahmans more than half the appointments in all departments including the military. May the Government see the need of such a step before it is too late.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 12th, 1917.

Indian reforms.

63. Under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 12th October, reports the Leader to have written:—The Anglo-Indians will surely misguide the people in England who are ignorant of Indian affairs, by representing to them that if India is given self-government, and the British authority diminished, the people will become anarchic and there may be many dangers. They will not try to consider the question of Indian reforms with a fair and calm mind. But their tactics will not succeed. Though they speak such falsehood, the reform propaganda of the Indians will succeed through their constitutional agitation, for the Governments in India and England are in sympathy with the Indian political reforms. The Liberal British papers and the chief of the conservative papers, the Times, are of opinion that the Indians should be granted some important reforms.

64. The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th October, says in its leader:—The manifestation of any hostile attitude by the British to the national aspirations of the Indians involves a contradiction of their own words. But it is regrettable that many English people in India hold such a hostile attitude. It is absurd that they apply one principle to England and another to India. The Lord Bishop of Bombay has surpassed the Anglo-Indian critics and has struck out a new path. His intellect deserves the praise of everybody. He said that the Prussian Government was more commendable than democracy. The Kaiser may feel glad that in the British Empire there is at least one person who loves the Prussian Government. . . We are anxious to know by what divine eye the Lord Bishop has got at the secret that the Indian masses always wish to be governed. He believes that the system obtaining in the Native States is very useful. But would he try to introduce the system in England also? . . . Simply because the Indians have asked for self-government, the Lord Bishop has ventured to say that the democratic ideal is not a very useful ideal for the world. But India shall have the boon of democracy. The Government obtaining in Prussia can never flourish in the world. May the Lord Bishop not waste his time in such vain utterances! May he try to establish the Kingdom of Heaven on the earth as taught by Jesus Christ!

Lord Bishop of Bombay and the Prussian Government.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 13th, 1917.

65. The Kistnapatrika, of the 13th October, says:—In the scheme of reforms suggested by Dr. Nayar, the responsibility of the Government to the people has not been defined, and opportunity for the people to be trained in self-government has not been secured. It is better that there is no change at all than there should be any fruitless change. The scheme proposed by the Coimbatore non-Brahman Conference is much better than this scheme. We regret to say that Dr. Nayar's scheme reflects discredit upon his education and his name.

Dr. Nayar's scheme.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Oct. 13th, 1917.

66. A correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 13th October, says:—The promotion from a first-grade Stationary Magistrate to the post of last grade Tahsildar is no promotion, but a degradation; for the last grade Tahsildar has to meet some of his touring charges from his pay. To remove the discontent thus caused, the post of the last grade Tahsildar carrying the salary of Rs. 150 should be abolished, or his batta should be doubled. . . The Tahsildars have to provide the Huzur clerks coming for jamabandi with supplies. This is private and cannot be expressed publicly. If the Tahsildars are remiss in the matter of these supplies, they may even lose their appointments. Inspections by the Huzur officers are very curious. Some Huzur clerks come like bombs, and are highhanded. Inspection reports are drafted by the Huzur clerks in secret and receive the approval of their head in some boat or rest house. Then they assume the name of the proceedings of the Collector and come like cobras hissing and ready to bite. There will be mistakes in the reports. The Tahsildars should not point out the mistakes, but should admit that the faults are theirs and submit explanations. Otherwise, they will come to be regarded with disfavour by the Huzur officers and will be looked upon as enemies by the Collector. . . Here and there there may be Tahsildars who are in the good graces of the Collector. The notes of the Huzur office are first shown to them, harmful remarks are removed, and the Collector is informed that the offices of such Tahsildars are good. Whether there is any means of ending the troubles of the Huzur clerks is a question to be considered. . . Unless these fruitless inspections by the clerks are done away with, the Collector and the Divisional officers will not see the truth. If these higher officers do the inspection personally, the troubles of the taluk officers, mentioned above, will see their end.

The discontent of Revenue officers.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Oct. 13th, 1917.

67. Kistnapatrika, of the 13th October, publishes the comments of Mr. Bhogaraju Pattabhi Seetaramayya on the Congress scheme of reforms which contain the following:—The majority of members in the Legislative Councils voting on the side of the Government, not even two per cent of the resolutions relating to the welfare of the villages and the ryots, are approved of by the Government. . . Under the existing conditions His Excellency the Governor being the President, he may prevent the representatives of the people speaking fully. In the last budget meeting, the Hon'ble Mr. Ramachandra Rao had to stop speaking, being obstructed two or three times. . . Resolutions such as those relating to the inadvisability of the Government going to the hills and to the appointment of one Indian member to the Board of Revenue, were rejected or attempts were made to reject them, without discussion, though they were proper resolutions. There should be no such arbitrary authority. . . It happens under the present conditions that the proposed resolutions are thrown out except one or two, and that the carrying-out of those accepted by the Government is not obligatory on them. Unless such arbitrary authority is reduced, the happiness of the people cannot be promoted. . . Those who have risen from the lower grades of service should not be appointed to the Executive Councils. The Collectors are shortsighted from the very beginning and cannot hold high thoughts. They have a sort of contempt for the Indians and support the acts of persons of their own class. . . Neither the Parliament nor the people in England exercise any powers over the Secretary of State, who has therefore become an arbitrary authority. The members of the India Council have all the faults of the Indian bureaucracy and are indifferent to the advancement of the Indians.

ANDHRAPATRIKA Madras, Oct. 16th, 1917.

Mr. Tilak on Home Rule.

68. The Andhrapatrika, of the 16th Octobor, publishes in Telugu the speech made by Mr. Tilak at Allahabad, which contains the following:—Self-interested persons use for their self-preservation the argument that the Indians are unfit for Home Rule. Government do not confer higher appointments on the Indians. And so they have no opportunity to show their ability. They are given smaller appointments in all the Departments; because administration cannot go on otherwise. . . It is unfair to say that the Indians are unfit to govern without giving them an opportunity. This trick will not avail in future. The British people cannot endure it. . . The people should resort to passive resistance if that is very advantageous. It will be well to leave the question to be decided by our leaders. To resort to passive resistance means to try to achieve our object with a firm mind, making any sacrifice. This is constitutional.. The law that is opposed to the moral code and to public opinion is not lawful. We must rid the people of their ignorance.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 16th, 1917.

Self-government.

69. The Andhrapatrika, of the 16th October, says in its leaderette:—All generous-minded people sympathise with the desire for self-government. Excepting the papers conducted by Lord Northcliff, all papers in England have expressed favourable opinions. The Review of Reviews is telling Mr. Montagu that India should be given nothing short of the reforms laid down by the Congress. It is encouraging to the Indians that the English people in England have realised that the reforms proposed by Lord Islington cannot satisfy the Indians at all. . . Mr. Wedgewood suggested in the Manchester Guardian that India should be given the freedom enjoyed by the Colonies, and said that India, with her rights and responsibilities as a chief portion of the empire, would be a source of strength to the Empire. . . The Madras Times states that during the days of the Ilbert Bill, the Europeans were bent upon frustrating the aspirations of the Indians, and abused them without grounds. It observes that the agitation connected with the Ilbert Bill was the reason why there had not been good understanding between the Europeans and the Indians. It is the opinion of that paper that if at a time when both the Indians and the Europeans are fighting side by side in the present war and their relations are growing more and more friendly, the Europeans show a hostile attitude to the aspirations of the Indians, it will be impossible for the two races to agree with one another in the future. That paper says opportunely that such a situation will tend to evil, and hopes that no such hostility will be manifested when Mr. Montagu visits India. A perusal of the opinions of the Rev. Doctor Lazarus in the Commonweal about Home Rule will show the attitude of the Indian Christians. . . The Britons under the Roman rule and the Anglo-Saxons under the Norman rule worked for Home Rule. So there is nothing strange in that a desire for Home Rule has taken hold of the Indians. Home Rule implies not only rights, but also duties. English Rulers, says Doctor

Lazarus, have not introduced administrative reforms so easily as the Indians. The Native States bear testimony to this fact. In the whole world, the progress of education is most deplorable in India. There is no reason why the bureaucracy has been indifferent to the spread of education for the past one century. . . A correspondent to the Fortnightly Review says that when the Empire is reconstituted after the war, the presence of not only reformers, and advocates of new methods, but also that of persons who would lay the axe at the root of the present systems will be necessarily required. It is unfair that while new methods are to be introduced in England which is a free country, after the war, India alone should be refused any change in her administration.

70. The Desamata, of the 10th October, says:—The conduct of Sir James Meston in the recent meeting of the United Provinces is an instance in point to show how strange the proceedings of Legislative Councils in our country and the behaviour of provincial rulers are. In requesting a member to withdraw his resolution relating to the wholesale abuse of the Indians by the Principal of the Roorki Engineering College, James Meston, it is to be regretted, has, instead of getting an apology from one who having come to serve in India, had the audacity to pain the minds of the Indians, taken pains to maintain his prestige.

The United Provinces Legislative Council.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Oct. 10th, 1917.

Referring to the incident that the Hon'ble Mr. Motilal Nehru left the hall of the United Provinces Council as a protest against the Hon'ble Mr. Wood's speech, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 13th October, says:—That is one mode of expressing indignation at Mr. Wood's remarks. The Indians are organising protest meetings everywhere in the country. Mr. Wood said that crookedness and dishonesty were the characteristics of the Indians. We must observe that he does not know a whit of the truth about Indian nature. If men of this kind should be sent to our country to hold responsible positions, it will never tend to augment the loyalty of our people.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Oct. 13th, 1917.

71. The Dharmasadhani, of the 27th September, says under this heading:—When Raja Ram Mohan Roy was not able to get the Press Act that was in force in his time repealed, he discontinued the paper he was conducting, in order to show his disapproval of the Act, which was improper, unfair and opposed to British justice. He liked freedom and felt glad when others got freedom. He was excessively glad to learn about the French revolution. Their republican banner caused him great delight. He wept to hear that the people of Naples lost their freedom. . . He stated that if the Indians had a quarter of the knowledge and ability of the Irish, India would, from her distant situation, population and prosperity, be either a beneficent friend or a sworn foe to the British Empire. Miss Collet writes that in this is to be found the seed of the present desire of the people for Home Rule, etc.

72. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 16th October, refers to the damage caused by the Kollair floods and says:—I regret that this year also there has been the same loss as in the past three years. When the people have thus been suffering for the past so many years, what did the Government do to prevent floods? They have been letting drainage water into the Kollair all the time, but have not provided outlets for the Kollair water flowing into the sea. All representations about this have proved so many cries in the wilderness.

73. In an article dwelling on the importance of Hindustani as a universal language for India, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 12th October, says that although, just as the civilian officers who are Indians are required to study a vernacular in addition to their own, it is only reasonable that the European officers too should pass a compulsory test in another language which should be Hindustani, the Government had till now overlooked this fact and that it is gratifying to know that the Government have now recommended the study of Hindustani which is of practical use not only in the whole of India but also in Burma, the Straits Settlements, East Africa, the Persian Gulf, etc.

The representation of the backward classes.

74. In a lengthy leading article dwelling on the magnitude of the interests of the vast mass of population forming the backward and depressed classes in India and urging the necessity of providing for the special and proportional representation of these classes in the Indian Councils, the Mysore Star, of the 14th October, observes that it is deplorable that there should be any attempt, as is now seen, among a section of the more advanced communities, who pose as the leaders of political thought and clamour for Home Rule, to minimise or gainsay the importance of such representation. The paper adds that some of the leaders are unable to bear the sight of a fast awakening of these backward classes to improve their own condition and are seeking to hamper their progress by opposing movements such as compulsory education and by seeking to create discord either among the different communities forming the backward classes or between the veteran leaders and the younger generations, and unjustly accuse them of Brahman hatred.

Sampad Abhyudaya, Mysore, Oct. 16th, 1917.

The Russian situation.

75. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 16th October, in its news columns, writes:—The province of Achraine (?) in Russia formed a separate parliament and constituted itself into a republic. It seems likely that the various provinces of Russia will form separate republics. Very probably, like the United States of America, every little province will form a small republic and eventually unite to form a Federal Republic. It would be well to have this arrangement in every empire.

The motto of the Satyavadi.

76. The Satyavadi, a newly started weekly, has for its motto the following lines in Sanskrit:—"All dependence is sorrow, All liberty is joy." The same paper in a leading article under the heading "Swaraj" quotes extracts from Mr. Arundale's speech at Coimbatore soon after his release stating that the true struggle has not ended with the release but has only just begun. The paper next expresses its adoration for Mrs. Besant in recounting the celebration of her seventy-first birth-day.

Sampad Abhyudaya, Mysore, Oct. 19th, 1917.

Communal representation.

77. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 19th instant, in its English columns, observes:—"There are some who advocate communal representation. Does such representation obtain in any enlightened Government on earth? There are in England as many communities as there are in India. The Indian communities are known as castes and subcastes and the English communities are known as higher and lower classes. These obtain throughout the Western countries. Is it possible to give class and sub-class representation in Europe and America? If class representation is to be given, all classes, even the scavengers must have representation. Is it possible to do so? Supposing that it is possible, can the representatives of all classes and sub-classes do justice to their duties? If a member of the scavenger community is elected to the Executive or Legislative Councils of India, is it not necessary that he should be competent to do justice to the duties that devolve upon him by virtue of his election. Even such a great man as Lord Islington has observed that in India the fact that the population is divided into communities cannot be forgotten. Nobody wants him to forget it. Let the representatives of all the depressed classes be appointed to the Executive Councils, to the Legislative Councils, to the municipal councils, to the local boards, etc. It remains to be seen whether the majority of them will be able to do anything there. They will be ornamental figure-heads. The interests of those who elect them can never be efficiently safeguarded by these communal representatives. If every community has men of education, character, patriotism and ability to carry out the duties entrusted to them, no harm will come by commuual representation. Even mediocre lawyers are not engaged by the members of their community in important cases. All castes and classes employ people qualified to do the duty entrusted to them. They do not show any solicitude to employ men belonging to their caste to do duties in which they are not experts. Communal representation is simply meaningless. It is a dodge adopted by people to divide communities, so that they may assert their supremacy over them and damn them. Discerning people should know this. People who know how to do justice to their duty should be employed to do such duties, if they could do them well. If not, efficiency will be sacrificed at the altar of communal interests."

78. In expressing satisfaction at the appointment of Mr. John Mathai as Private Secretary to Mr. Montagu during his visit to India, the Manorama, of the 12th October, observes that this is an honour done to India as a whole.

MANORAMA, Calicut, Oct. 12th, 1917.

The appointment of Dr. John Mathai as Private Secretary to Mr. Montagu.

79. Referring to the proposed establishment of an "Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau", the Manorama, of the 12th October, points out that the selection, as the representative of India on the bureau, of any one from amongst the Europeans, who now practically monopolise the mineral industries in this country, the Indians being mere wage earners, will only tend to increase the outflow of wealth from India, and that, if Indians be not given a voice in this matter, India will be in a worse condition than that which has already been brought about by the planters, and calls upon Mr. Tata and others to see that India is properly represented on the bureau.

80. After dealing with the Anglo-Indian agitation consequent upon the release of Mrs. Besant and others, with the unrest among the Muhammadans due to the non-release of the two Muhammadan brothers, with the split in the Congress camp in Calcutta and the patching up thereof, and with the incident at the recent meeting of the Panchamas in Madras, the Malayala Manorama, of the 17th October, points out the impossibility of self-government being demanded with one voice, as desired by the Home Rulers, by all classes of people in India during Mr. Montagu's visit to this country, and observes that, unless all classes of people in India, the Europeans, the higher classes among the Indians and the anti-Home Rulers be prepared to modify their views to some extent, there can be no doubt that India can have no real progress of a lasting nature.

MALAYALA MANORAMA, Kottayam, Oct. 17th, 1917.

The crisis in India.

81. Referring to the leaving of the hall by the Hon'ble Mr. Pandit Motilal Nehru at a meeting of the United Provinces Legislative Council, and to the Lieutenant-Governor's letter to him, which closed the incident, the Manorama, of the 16th October, observes that such occurances in Legislative Councils, which exist for the consideration and discussion of political questions, are very regrettable indeed.

82. The Qaumi Report, of the 9th October, gives an account of the proceedings of the meeting held in the Town Hall on Monday the 8th instant in connection with the release of the Muhammadan detenus with the names of the speakers, and says that the meeting was a success inasmuch as there was a very large audience present who, in their zeal, closed their shops and suspended their business to attend. The speeches were very able, enthusiastic and to the point.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, Oct. 9th, 1917.

A Muhammadan meeting at Madras.

84. The Qaumi Report, of the 7th October, writes:—We have already proved that Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali and any other interned Muhammadan, have not shown any open sympathy with the King's enemies and that they did not seduce people either by their speeches or their writings. The silence of the Muhammadans, the peaceful state of the country and the condition of the detenus bear witness to this fact, and we desire the Government to point out the clause or sentence in their writings or speeches, if any, suggesting or supporting revolution or mutiny. If local Governments have acted on mere suspicion, it is the duty of the Government of India to release the internees and see what they will say or do.

The Government of India have accused Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali of "not having, in principle, changed their attitude", but have advanced no proof in support of the assertion. The Government of India have neither inquired from them, nor sent any of their reliable representatives to them nor demanded any security from their community, but have permitted the Criminal Investigation Department Police, who have already arrested them by mistake, to make enquiries.

The editor draws a distinction between the two undertakings, one probably drafted by Sir Charles Auckland of the Criminal Investigation Department and the other by Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali and makes the following observations:—

With profound respect and due deference we request the Government to enlighten us as to whether the Muhammadans have not got the right of "observing their Islamic covenants". Have not the British Government granted us religious freedom and have they not promised not to interfere in religious questions? The fact that Mr. Muhammad Ali and Mr. Shoukat Ali did not encourage obedience to the Turks, Arabs, Kurds or Hindus, but simply would not undertake to be faithless to Islam is worth considering. It is regrettable to find that the Criminal Investigation Department Police have taken Islam for Turkey and have misled the Government of India. The Turkish business is different from the question of opposition. Here only the question of obedience to Islam is under discussion. We cannot understand it, but take it seriously to heart to learn that Sir Charles Auckland has regarded the covenant of obedience to Islam with suspicion and has rejected Mr. Muhammad Ali's draft.

We have frequently said that we still entertain hopes in the Government of India that, as His Excellency Lord Chelmsford, in addition to being a statesman, is also a Barrister, he can well judge the actual and real value of the words for the sake of seven crores of Mussalmans. We request him to reconsider the two drafts and suggest any necessary amendments in order that our aching hearts may be soothed, and we may be saved from the consequences of suspicion. The covenant of obedience to Islam has not been entered into by Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali alone, but by all the Muhammadan subjects of the King ever since they were born.

Jaridah-i-Rozgar, Madras, Oct. 13th, 1917.

Internments.

85. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 13th October, has the following letter:—

As long as the Government are engaged in the great European war and so long as worldwide peace and liberty in the moral sphere are not re-established, the Government cannot find time to deal with unreasonable and oppressive persons.

India could not escape the injurious effects of the war. The Government are endeavouring to minimise these effects. Had the Government been indifferent, India would have been involved in economical ruin. At a critical time like this, when the Government are engaged in internal organisation and preoccupied with external anxieties, how can the revolutionary methods, adopted by the well-wishers of India, be considered commendable?

As regards religion the Government are non-existent. They are neither Mussalman, nor Zoroastrian nor Christian. Their rule over India is political, but not theological. Time was when the idea prevailed that the Government were very partial to Parsis, later the opinion was that Hindus were the favourites, and that they were disgusted with the Mussalmans. As a matter of fact, there was no definite evidence to support either of these conjectures.

Their law relating to internment is the same for all, and the Government are obliged to put the Defence of India Act into operation, or their political fabric would be shaken to its foundations.

Most of the newspapers, when they saw that Mrs. Annie Besant had been released, requested the Government to liberate Shoukat Ali and Muhammad Ali. One of the papers in commenting on the subject threatens the Government in these terms, "This intentional trifling with the services of Mussalmans will compel them to set on foot a fierce agitation, a procedure which they have hitherto, during the war, avoided."

The Government are not so cowardly as to care for so idle a threat. The paper should first have cleared these gentlemen of the charge on which they have been interned. Some Mussalmans have asked the Government to examine them again. Moulavi Zafer Ali Khan, editor of the Sitarah-i-Subuh, is a living example of this procedure.

It is true that the desire of Mussalmans is that these two gentlemen should furnish satisfactory security and consent to follow a course of moderation in future. But the assertion, that the way Mussalman aspirations are being trifled with will compel them to set on foot a fierce agitation, is a baseless one.

The case of internees.

86. The Qaumi Report, of the 11th October, in traversing the remarks of the Times of India, Bombay, regarding Indian Muhammadans, makes the following observations: - Our contemporary suggests, in its issue of the 6th instant, that Muhammadans should rely on the Government of India in the case of Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali. We very gladly accept its suggestions but sadly deplore its ignorance that in spite of its being a paper of longstanding in India and having seen and understood Muhammadans, it could not realise that they have placed confidence in the Government of India from the very beginning. We have not even mentioned the name of Muhammad Ali or that of any other detenu for the last two or two and a half years. We were confident that the Government would now realise their innocence and come to know the inventions of the Criminal Investigation Department Police.

We relied on the Government even when the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah had made a requisition to them for the release of Mrs. Besant, and Sir William Vincent, a member of the Imperial Council, announced its acceptance and promised that the other detenus would be released on their giving satisfactory assurances to Government. Our friend knows that the Government were pleased to release only Mrs. Besant and her two associates, but that they made no mention whatever as to what kind of reassurance is required from Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali and what their reply was. Muhammadans relied even then on its policy of silence. But when the Government refused to release them, we began to consider what the secret of it could be. It was a time of perturbation and unrest, and we subsequently learnt that the Government had no confidence in the Hon'ble Raja Sahib of Muhammadabad and Mr. Jinnah's words but relied on the statements of Criminal Investigation Department officer, who through his spectacles had studied the aims that were in the minds of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali. Even then the Muhammadans continued to rely on the Government. The Muhammadans still trusted the Government even when they refused to grant to the Hon'ble Mr. Raza Ali permission to interview and give legal advice to the internees who had been sent for this express purpose of doing so. What stronger proof of our confidence in the Government can there be than the fact that hitherto we have simply been convening meetings and requesting the Viceroy to release them? If this is not reliance, we do not know what the word connotes in our contemporary's dictionary and why it should taunt us.

Really such advice would have been more suitable to the European Association of Calcutta and to our Madras Mail who are criticising the action of the Government of India in releasing Mrs. Besant. They have the least confidence in the Government and they do not even trust the Secretary of State or the Prime Minister.

The Madras Mail, the Statesman and the Pioneer have also concurred in the views of our contemporary, and have in the form of advice, proved that we do not rely on the Government.

The Times of India further asks why Mr. Muhammad Ali did not sign the agreement drawn up by the Government but submitted a separate draft of his own instead. But it does not enquire why an undertaking was not taken from Mrs. Besant but demanded from Mr. Muhammad Ali. Further, it does not want to know why the agreement was sent through a Police officer and not through a Justice of the Peace, a Magistrate, a Judge or any Hindu, English or Muhammadan leader? We do not wish to force it to ask or answer such questions. We will certainly reply to its astounding question that apparently the reason for Muhammad Ali's not accepting the terms of the agreement was due to the fact that it did not contain any condition relating to religious freedom (obedience to Islam) and in the absence of such a condition it leads us to inquire whether the Government do not wish to revive the condition of granting religious freedom. It is evident that it is preferable to a Muhammadan to die than to live without religious freedom. But can our friend answer this question at least as to why the Government did not approve of Muhammad Ali's draft, or why it did not settle the matter by drawing up a third draft instead of Muhammad Ali's or the Criminal Investigation Department's?

III.—Legislation.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Oct. 12th, 1917.

A Bill to prevent adulteration of food-stuffs.

87. In expressing its satisfaction at the action of the Punjab Government in drafting a Bill to prevent the adulteration of food-stuffs, the Hindu Nesan, of the 12th October, observes that the penal provision in the Bill rendering the offenders liable to fine or rigorous imprisonment, will doubtless lead to beneficial results, and suggests that a similar legislation may, with advantage, be enacted in other provinces as well.

Lokaprakasam, Trichur, Oct. 15th, 1917.

The proposed extension of the Cochin Forest Tramway.

88. In discussing the question of the proposed extension of the Cochin Forest Tramway, the Lokaprakasam, of the 15th October, doubts if the scheme would be a success, and observes that though, in view of its being beneficial to the interests of the planters, the Madras Government may give their assent to it, the work entailing so heavy an expenditure should not be undertaken before the views of the people and the Mahajana Sabha on the subject have been fully ascertained.

II.—Home Administration.

(k) General.

1. Justice, of the 20th October, writes:—"Mr. Montagu in his statement on Mrs. Besant's release said nothing about the position or responsibility of the Madras Government Indeed it is clear that he did not consult the Madras Government . . . Madras is not ruled by a Lieutenant-Governor but by a Governor in Council with whom the Secretary of State could directly correspond. Mr. Montagu's defence that Mrs. Besant's internment was of more than provincial interest and that therefore inferentially the local Government could be ignored, if accepted as sound, means in effect that Local Governments are mere agents and instruments, and nothing more. If this is so a most dangerous precedent has been set against which no protest could be too strong. . . . May we know again why in the matter of these assurances both the Secretary of State and the Government of India did not consider sufficiently the prestige and authority of the Madras Government who were the party concerned? The assurances should have been given to them directly as the Government which interned Mrs. Besant and her associates. It is no use talking about Imperial policy in a matter like this. It is a question of peace and order; and if this question is elevated to the Imperial sphere there is hardly an Indian subject which cannot be so dealt with.

"Not less important is the question as to who gave the assurances. Let us know something more specific and less mysterious about the 'influential sources.' The release of Mrs. Besant involves the consideration of a principle, and it is natural that the public should know whether the assurances were given by the Home Rulers, who are her own followers, or by some other influential people. The question of secrecy does not arise here. In the public interests the names of those who gave the assurances and their exact nature and form should be made known".

Justice, Madras, Oct. 20th, 1917.

The release of Mrs. Besant.

2. The Cochin Argus, for the week ending 20th October, has the following:—"We extend a hearty and respectful welcome to His Excellency Lord Pentland, Governor of Madras, on this his third visit to Malabar. We, in Cochin, are not privileged to entertain His Excellency on our own special account on this occasion, but we feel that every portion of Malabar should gratefully appreciate the deep and sympathetic interest, which His Excellency evinces in our moral and material welfare. From accounts which have reached us, His Excellency met with a very warm reception from all classes in Calicut, and we do not feel any surprise, for, apart from a handful of malcontents, Lord Pentland is respected and esteemed all over the Presidency for his great administrative qualities, no less than his genial and sympathetic disposition. We trust His Excellency has been having a pleasant time during his present sojourn on this coast."

Cochin Argus, British Cochin, Oct. 20th, 1917.

His Excellency Lord Pentland.

3. The West Coast Spectator, of the 20th October, observes:—"We have respect for the Home Ruler, however erratic his methods of agitation and crooked his work, who is honest and stands by his principle. The most contemptible specimen of humanity, however, is that Home Ruler who would sell his principles for a mess of pottage or a handful of silver, and foul his own nest to serve his own ends. . . No wonder, Indian politics stink in the nostrils at times, and we are perfectly justified in the attitude we have taken up towards the Home Rule movement which harbours, among honest men, a nondescript medley of time-serving humbugs, frenzied wind-bags and swollen-headed political mount-banks as well. Honest Home Rulers would do well to give wide berth to this type of men."

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, Oct. 20th, 1917.

Time-serving Home Rulers.

4. The West Coast Spectator, of the 20th October, remarks:—"The authorities are considering ways and means of stimulating the recruiting movement. . . We are not prepared to support the suggestion to present the family of the new recruit with a fifty-rupee currency note. . . The masses live on their land by the sufference of the janmi, at the tender mercy of the rack-renting landlord and his agents, and the best way would be to put the recruit's family in perpetual possession of their homestead without fear of eviction. The Government might arrange with the janmi to sell to the recruit the land on which his homestead stands, and if the janmi refuses, the Land Acquisition Act should be put into operation after a slight amendment to meet the new requirement.

This procedure will attract thousands of recruits, whose children's children would bless the Sircar, the grateful Sircar, who rewarded their ancestor for shedding his life-blood in its honour and service, with a home where he and his descendants could live in peace safe from the ravages of the rack-renting landlord and without fear of eviction."

NON-BRAHMAN, Madras, Oct. 21st, 1917.

The Government and the Brahmans.

5. The following appears in the Non-Brahman for the week ending 21st October:—"The ways of the Government are inscrutable. 'The Government,' New India, the organ of 'Bharat Mata' as Mr. Wadia would say, once said, 'are afraid of the Brahmans.' That they are, for did they not release Mrs. Besant? And did they not refuse to release the Alis? More than that, a serious insult was flung on the entire Moslem population of India when one day the hope was lit?: 'we are considering the advisability of liberating the Alis.' And then came the sensational reply that shook the Moslems' mind: 'We do not liberate them because they have sympathy with the King's enemies.' That came upon the Moslems as a shock. Mrs. Besant, having passed her word on to Lord Chelmsford, was counselling patience. But the agitation has spread. No effect. Having Mrs. Besant by their side the bureaucrats hope to defy India. We seriously put it to educated non-Brahmans whether more cannot be gained by attacking the Government, calling Sir Alexander Cardew and Mr. Gillman impertinent and following the paths trod by New India. We must make the Government fear us. That is the only way to make our case heard."

JUSTICE, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

Mrs. Besant's triumphal progress.

6. Writing under the heading "Blowing her own Trumpet", Justice, of the 22nd October, says:—"In the issue of New India of October 20th there appears a three and a half column article from Mrs. Annie Besant giving a graphic description of her triumphal progress through India. From her description of the great crowds that gathered everywhere to receive her, the decorations in the streets, the garlands and bouquets and the burning of camphor and incense, the splendid caskets enclosed in which addresses were presented and above all the State carriages drawn by eight pairs of highly caparisoned horses with postillion outriders, her triumphal progress must have been such as to have satisfied the vanity of even Mrs. Besant. Mrs. Besant has worked hard for this, and no one grudges her the gratification of an insane desire for pomp and publicity. But when it comes to her attacking respectable newspapers for not publishing descriptions of her triumphal progress her vanity takes an objectionable turn."

NEW INDIA, Madras, Oct. 25th, 1917.

The European Association, Madras Branch.

7. In a leader under the heading "The Talking Images of Madras", New India, of the 25th October, states:—"We have perused with care the lengthy report of an apparently tedious meeting of the local European Association in yesterday's issue of the Madras Mail. . . It is said that it was 'an influentially attended meeting,' though the names of those present are withheld, presumably not on account of lack of space on the part of the Madras Mail. We do not know who were these 'influential' people, and if we were to judge from the standard of influence possessed by the speakers well—the less we say the better. All were shopkeepers and tradespeople, with the exception of the redoubtable Mr. Welby, editor of the Madras Mail. Where were the representatives of the professions? Are there no European lawyers and barristers and doctors and engineers and architects and bankers and brokers? And why were the poor Missionaries left out? Rightly speaking it was a gathering of European traders. The only name of any importance is that of Mr. Gordon Fraser, and that is only because he happens to be a member of the local Legislative Council. . . Naturally, when such ignorant people were the oracles of the evening, and when others had gathered to hear them, what can we expect of the throwing of such pearls before such—let us say an audience. Let us examine some of these gems. . . Mr. Thonger referred to the effect upon 'our fighting men at the front, when they hear that instead of concentrating upon the war, India is concentrating upon internal politics'. We can tell Mr. Thonger that the perusal of the entire Indian papers by any thoughtful fighting man will produce a double effect: (1) that there are Europeans like Mr. Thonger who while making money out of war prices are sitting in safety in India, while they are risking life and the happiness of people dearer than life for the sake of Britain and her Empire; (2) that Indians are aiding them to win the war against Prussianism and autocracy by endeavouring to do away with the dangerous powers in the hands of a bureaucracy known for its arrogance and inefficiency—vide the Mesopotamia report, and which bureaucracy is now being supported by European traders, whose monopolistic tendencies have been guarded and encouraged by them. . . Then, this philanthropist, this champion of the poor, this defender of the liberty of the down-trodden and the oppressed, talked of his clique as 'trustees of posterity' and said that they must do for 'the submerged interest what the people cannot do for themselves'. A more ludicrous story has never been told. Imagine this 'gang of agitators,' who have been for years exploiting India and Indians, parading themselves as the poor man's friends! These people have been here to make money and for no other purpose, and this tall talk is not going to fool the Indian public. . . Let us turn to the seconder Mr. Rae. He also had a pose to affect. 'Our community has done in the past and is doing at present too much for India.' May we ask what, save doing a profitable trade beneficial to yourselves in the first instance. And what have Indians done or are doing for you? Mr. Rae and his like may answer the query by recalling their position, that hat in hand, each of them begs for business in every bazaar of our important towns, and is dependent on the good will of the Indian merchant. Business relations and trade benefits are mutual, and the unfair treatment meted out to the Indian compared to the European trader has driven the former into the fold of the Home Rulers, and for that the European trader has to thank his own selfishness and greed.

"Mr. Worke said that Mr. Montagu's 'intention in releasing Mrs. Besant was to bring about tranquility throughout India. May I suggest that exactly the opposite is the result?' Is it ignorance or falsehood, on the part of Mr. Worke when he talks thus? He refers to 'the elderly dame and her Brahmana supporters'—is it, once again, ignorance of, or lying propensity in, Mr. Worke, for what about the innumerable non-Brahmana and Muslim 'supporters' in all parts of India. Space forbids our making a list, otherwise we might hurl it in the face of Mr. Worke. . . Of the demands of the Indian public, through their national organisations, Mr. Welby has spoken, and has called them 'inopportune and insolent', and he has not had the fairness to produce his own scheme. Perhaps out of his journalistic experience, and through his friendship with the Curtis clan, he would have produced a scheme, but he could not make his gang of business men either understand or accept it. . . Mr. Welby is a journalist, and it would be good if he would kindly publish in his Madras Mail a full list of the selfless doings of his own class and the class of trade exploiters with whom he now joins hands. . . The Hon'ble Mr. Gordon Fraser was very condescending: 'Talking as business men we have all kept very friendly relations with numerous Indians'; but what else could you do? You had to, because you wanted to earn your livelihood out of those Indians. 'We have in many cases given them a helping hand,' as the Indians in a far greater number of cases have given you a helping hand, without which you would not have been able to establish a firm in India And it is amusing to hear Mr. Fraser talk of the European traders 'as straightforward business men.' We know by experience something about the ways and methods of European traders, and the less talk made about straightforwardness the better. . . Thus in these half dozen speeches no serious argument is advanced, no considered thought is to be found; reasonableness is absent, sympathy with Indian aspirations is non-existent. Tall talk and petty abuse is all that we encounter, and falsehoods abound. Selfishness and greed are the motive forces of this agitation, and we have written at length to prove the hollowness of the pretensions of the European traders who use the name of the entire European community in an un-British agitation against a cause which is founded on truth and righteousness—the cause of justice and liberty."

The war in the region of the Gulf of Riga.

10. Referring to the retreat of the Russian fleet into the Gulf of Riga, the Swadesamitran, of the 22nd October, writes:—As both the northern and southern channels are now in the hands of the enemy, the possibility of escape for about 20 Russian warships which have got into the Gulf of Riga is causing some anxiety indeed. This will make it easy for the enemy to capture the other islands on the gulf. He may easily get the whole gulf under his control. If the Russian fleet gets out before the enemy strengthens his hold and defeats his fleet, they may recover all that they have lost. But it is still keeping quiet. There are many advantages to the Germans by capturing the Gulf of Riga. Their authority will be strengthened in the Baltic Sea and the position of Petrograd on the Gulf of Finland and the port of Rieval which guards it will be weakened. As the Russian line in the eastern front extends almost to the seashore, the Germans getting a hold of the shore will be a source of danger to the line.

Kistnapatrika, Masulipatam, Oct. 20th, 1917.

The war.

11. The Kistnapatrika, of the 20th October, says:—The Germans have occupied the islands of Oesel and Dago near the coast of Riga with great skill, landing their forces in these islands without the knowledge of the Russians. . . There is no doubt that this is a source of some consternation to Russia. The whole of the territory about the Gulf of Riga has fallen into the hands of the Germans. The ports on the coast of the Gulf of Finland are unprotected. The Russians entertai n fear about the safety of their navy in the Gulf of Finland. The Germans may besiege Petrograd, keeping their zeppelins in the Island of Dago, and taking the port of Revel. The situation of Russia is not good. The traitors in the country have conspired with the enemy. There is great confusion in Petrograd. It has been proclaimed that anarchism is on the increase in South Russia. Robbers are raiding village after village. Unless the Russian Government take active steps, there can be no peace in the country.

Sampad Abhyudaya, Mysore, Oct. 23rd, 1917.

The war.

In an article in English, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 23rd October, says:—"The war is not likely to cease till all the nations are exhausted; and when it ceases, it ceases for a time to enable them to rush again into the whirlpool of war with redoubled man, woman and mechanical force. The Maharishis of India knew this. It is this that made them give a godly and spiritual turn to the education that is imparted not only to the students but also the parents of students. Let an impartial judge go from one end of India to another; he will see a kind of godliness pervading every nook and corner of society and the godliness is either gross, delicate or rational according to the intellectual equipment of the persons concerned. The material education of the west has been unhinging and dislocating society even in India. God forbid that the infernal revolutionary spirit of the west should invade the east and convert even India into a part of the world's great cemetery."

(d) Education.

II.—Home Administration.

12. In the course of a long article tracing the origin of the several industries in India, the Thozhil, for September, refers to the instruction in drawing imparted at present in the School of Arts, and observes:—It will be an excellent thing if the students of this institution are trained to manufacture for themselves, without depending upon others, the particular implements they require for their respective profession. On account of the present war, the import of many rare implements from foreign countries has been prohibited, and it is highly desirable that mechanics should possess a good knowledge of manufacturing the implements required by them. We, therefore, request the authorities of the School of Arts to bestow their attention on this subject.

The School of Arts.

Thozhil, Madras, September 1917.

13. Adverting to the conduct of Mr. Mark Hunter of the Presidency College, Madras, in compelling Krishna Rao, a student of the B.A. Honors class, to tender an apology for the sentiments expressed by him in a composition paper and depriving him of the Government scholarship for a short period, the Hindu Nesan, of the 18th October, writes:—Mr. Mark Hunter seems to have asked Mr. Amrita Rao, the father of the student and an Assistant Professor in the College, to account for the conduct of his son. What explanation could Mr. Amrita Rao offer? We fail to understand how he can be held responsible for the opinion expressed by his son, a student of the B.A. Honors class, on a particular subject on which he was asked to write. There was indeed no necessity for the latter to apologise. If the students are asked to write on a general subject, especially a political one, they cannot but express different views. It is but proper on the part of the professor concerned to see if there is a logical development of the subject dealt with in the composition and not to grow wild for the sentiments expressed therein clashing with his own views on the subject. Yet, Krishna Rao had to apologise as Mr. Hunter threatened to dismiss him from the College. But this simple apology is said to have been rejected by Mr. Hunter as being very brief. The student then seems to have tendered a long apology stating that the views expressed by him were taken from New India and the works of Mr. R. C. Dutt and Mrs. Besant, and this, it is stated, was accepted by Mr. Hunter. But it appears that he has, on representation to the Principal, had the Government scholarship drawn by the candidate suspended for six months. If a scholarship once conferred has to be withdrawn, it must be in accordance with the rules relating to it and not otherwise. Granting that Krishna Rao was actually in the wrong, would not the simple apology tendered by him meet the case? Why should he be forced to tender an apology stating that his views have been derived from other sources? Mr. Hunter should have been aware of the order issued by the Government prohibiting students from taking part in politics or in meetings discussing political matters. Why, then, should he have asked the students to write a composition on a political subject giving rise to conflicting opinions? While Mr. Hunter is really guilty of having asked the students to write on such a subject, his act in holding Krishna Rao guilty of expressing opinions unpalatable to him and obtaining an undesirable apology from the student, depriving him, at the same time, of his scholarship, is one in which he has transgressed his limits.

An incident in the Presidency College.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Oct. 18th, 1917.

Referring to this subject, the Swadesamitran, of the 18th October, observes:—It is strange that the College authorities should have the power to deprive a student of the scholarship awarded to him by the Government. Had the students been told, when they were asked to write the essay, that they should only write in praise of the Europeans, they would have written accordingly. But when they have been simply asked to write an essay, how are the students to know that, in writing it, they should not touch upon a particular aspect of the question? It is not known if the answers of the students appearing for the University examinations also are similarly valued. We are now led to think that this may be one of the reasons for the large number of failures in these examinations. Since the occurrence of this incident, the student in question is said to have become entitled to a University scholarship also. Subjecting such youths of high capabilities to undue restrictions without allowing them to read and write with freedom only mars their progress. The suggestion made by the Hindu for an interpellation in the Legislative Council on this subject is an excellent one.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

An incident in the Presidency College.

Referring to the conduct of Mr. Mark Hunter in compelling a student of the college to apologise for expressing certain sentiments unpalatable to him in a composition paper and depriving the student of his scholarship for a period of six months, the Lokopakari, of the 22nd October, observes:—The college authorities are not justified in suspending scholarships awarded to students by the University; nor is it proper for the professor to ask the students to write essays on subjects giving rise to conflicting opinions. The Director of Public Instruction and the Government should bestow their attention on this subject.

The reorganisation of the Educational service.

15. Adverting to the communication addressed to the Provincial Governments by the Government of India on the recommendations of the Public Services Commission regarding the reorganisation of the Educational Service, the Hindu Nesan, of the 23rd October, says:—Evidently not agreeing with the recommendations of the Commission in this matter, the Government of India have made some alternative proposals. Though these proposals are admittedly more satisfactory than the recommendations of the Commission, we cannot but say that they cannot give entire satisfaction to our people. In former days as a large number of educated Indians was not available, there was a necessity for indenting upon the services of Englishmen to impart education to Indian youths. But times have since changed. Even the Public Services Commission of 1886–87 was of opinion that it was enough if Englishmen were appointed to principalships of colleges and certain specific professorships. Thirty years have now passed by. At present even Indians who have obtained degrees in England are available in large numbers. So, it is naturally asked why English Professors and English Inspectors should still be appointed instead of Indian Professors and Indian Inspectors to teach Indian boys and supervise Indian schools. The statement made by the Government of India, that the time has come for education in India being transferred from European to Indian hands, shows that they are fully aware of this point. Though it cannot be gainsaid that the suggestion of the Government of India to make the posts in the Indian Educational Service, now vacant owing to the war and other causes, available for the Indians is a better one than that of the Commission, the Indians will not care to accept these posts as a matter of grace. They will demand that the higher posts in the service should be conferred on them and the Europeans alike irrespective of any racial distinction. The motive of the Government of India seems to be to make a show of suggesting agreeable reforms than to devise means to get rid of the racial distinction which exists in the service now. They suggest that some posts should be graded on a pay rising from Rs. 350 to Rs. 1,050 and again to Rs. 1,750 and some others on a pay rising from Rs. 250 to Rs. 500 and then to Rs. 700 and they say at the same time that all the appointments will belong to the same group. This verbal alteration will not give any satisfaction to the Indians. Indians and Englishmen should without any difference be in a position to rise from Rs. 350 to Rs. 1,050, if they have sufficient educational qualifications.

ANDHRACHANDRIKA, Proddatur, Oct. 11th 1917.

Female education.

16. In an article under this heading, the Andhrachandrika, of the 11th October, makes the following remark:—As it is not laid down in the west that the wife should be a devoted follower of the husband, women in the west may have freedom of movement but not our women.

17. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th October, says under this heading:—Though students pass high examinations at the expense of their health, under foreign systems of education, they are unable to earn their livelihood. They have neither the liberty nor the facilities necessary for acquiring knowledge. Students, especially those who study history, should necessarily learn politics. Nobody says that they should take any part in politics. But to carry out the duties of citizens, they have to acquire a knowledge of politics To add to the arbitrary authority already exercised on students by the teachers, G.O. No. 559 has been passed. It may be said that by this, the internment of students has become complete . . Alas, the students have been overtaken by a greater misfortune than that which has overtaken the traitors to the country. The students are always in fear of the teacher shadowing them. It is unfair that books like Arcopagitika should be fixed as text-books and students punished for desiring liberty. A certain student of the Presidency College wrote his opinion in an essay on the advantages of British rule in India and the condition of the Indians in South Africa. Mr. Mark Hunter got angry and suspended his scholarship. He seems to have asked the student to state in his apology that New India, the Bombay Chronicle, etc., were the authority for his views. We are at a loss to know what the professor meant in punishing the student for giving adverse views on a subject on which difference of opinion exists. . . The student gave such an apology for fear he may lose a source of his sustenance. Others would look upon such an apology as a violation of their self-respect. . . Our countrymen yield to such arbitrary authority in receiving English education but do not, it is to be regretted, receive national education and promote national life.

The strange conduct of Mr. Mark Hunter.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 19th, 1917.

18. Referring to an infringement of G.O. No. 559 at Nagpur by students, the Andhraprakasika, of the 22nd October, observes as follows:—Most of the teachers in this presidency as well as in other presidencies are Brahmans, who are all Home Rulers with the exception of some one or two. They are causing disturbance in the country, rightly or wrongly following one another like a flock of sheep. It is no mistake if we say that the students are attempting to take part in politics at the instigation of the Brahman teachers.

19. The Kistnapatrika, of the 20th October, publishes in Telugu an article from the pen of Sir Rabindranath Tagore criticising the present system of education. Sir Rabindranath says:—The foreign system of education does not concern itself with our actions and thoughts and that it is not assimilated by us. . . Education has been made very costly to us who are merged in poverty. It is cheap in Europe and America. . . It cannot be believed that the English people will have the same concern for our country as for theirs. Now-a-days people think of bettering themselves at the expense of others. Others think so poorly of the need for our education because we have lost our self-respect and we do not know what is good for us.

20. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 25th October, writes:—It is reported that a large number of students in the Madras Presidency are defying the disciplinary rules of their school and go on strike if they are punished for such disobedience. We must observe that the teachers themselves are to blame for this kind of behaviour on the part of the students. The students will get unruly only when the teachers allow themselves to be swayed by anger and prejudice and act in a highhanded manner. We have no hesitation in saying that where the teachers are considerate, the students are never refractory.

point out again that the officials should act very promptly in this matter. We have noted some days back that the Government have in this year deputed a larger number of medical officers than is usually done to deliver lectures in the vernaculars in the mufassal on sanitary subjects. Though this may prove beneficial, the sanitation of the Presidency cannot improve satisfactorily, unless an adequate amount of money is spent on sanitation and facilities of drainage and water-supply are improved.

The utility of sewage.

22. A correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 22nd October, observes that it would be advantageous from a financial point of view for the municipalities to store sewage in big reservoirs constructed for the purpose at the outskirts of municipalities as it would find a ready sale among the neighbouring cultivators who would utilize it for manuring their fields, and suggests that this system may be tried by the different municipalities as an experimental measure.

The Malabar District Board.

23. In reviewing the report on the working of the Malabar District Board during 1916-17, the Yogakshemam, of the 19th October, regrets that the District Board should have failed to employ the large surplus at its disposal in useful directions, draws attention to the inadequacy of medical aid given to the people, and to the deplorable condition of the roads, despite the heavy outlay on the maintenance thereof, and the existence of a costly establishment, and observes that Mr. Madhava Raja, President of the Palghat Taluk Board, and Rao Bahadur Krishna Varma Raja, President of the Malappuram Taluk Board, richly deserve the praises showered upon them by the District Board, and that in saying that in Malabar the people contribute only 2 annas 7 pies per head towards the administration of the District Board, while in other districts of the Presidency the rate comes to 4 annas 1 pie per head, the District Board should have also considered how much the people in Malabar have to pay by way of land-tax.

25. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 20th October, writes under this heading that the stationmaster of Dosapadu, who has been there ever since the opening of the station, is giving considerable trouble to the public. He scolds the ignorant villagers when they ask him to issue tickets and bids them to come the next day. Sometimes he would say that he could not issue tickets for want of change. The passengers are thus obliged to forego the balance due from the stationmaster. No platform tickets are issued at this station and the stationmaster refuses admission to the platform even when people have urgent business there.

"China".

26. In dwelling at length on the present condition of China and the probability there is for its advancement in the near future, the Dravidapatrika, of the 17th October, observes:—

It is understood that some among the Europeans are already entertaining fears that the three countries China, Japan and India would join together and might thereby excel all other countries in the world in commerce and education and even overpower them in war, should such a necessity arise. Their opinion is, in a way, based on truth. These three countries have a total population of over 90 crores, i.e., over half the population of the world, and the fact that these countries with such a large population are treated by the people of other countries with indifference is likely to create strong hatred in the minds of the people of these countries. Should these countries join together and work in harmony, the day may not be far off for the aforesaid event to come to pass. But as these are countries having different characteristics, it will take time before they come to an agreement. We trust that the English language and the western civilization, which are spreading in these countries, would alone bring about this union in course of time.

PURNACHANDRODAYAM, Madura, September 1917.

27. Dwelling on the internment of Mrs. Besant, the Purnachandrodayam, for September, observes:—In ancient days, there was a feeling that, if great men were imprisoned or otherwise insulted, it would injure the Government itself. But in these days of arrogance and atheism, this feeling does not seem to exist. Our leader Mrs. Besant is a saint and a direct agent of the Almighty. Any injury done to her or insult offered to her will be deemed to have been done or offered to the Almighty and will, therefore, have an adverse effect on the whole world. Do we not all believe that the war is favourable to us now, because our cause is just and that we will surely win a victory? Is it not, therefore, the duty of the wise to devise means which will accelerate this end? If the lady, who has been working for the benefit of this sanctified land, is released, it will not only please all Indians, but will also secure the blessings of the guardian angels of the world, which will, therefore, doubtless lead to the satisfactory conclusion of the war.

The internment of Mrs. Besant.

VIDYABHANU, Konapet, September 1917.

28. In the course of an article contrasting the eastern with the western civilization, the Vidyabhanu, for September, makes the following observations:—The Asiatics say that it is best to forsake one's own pleasure and seek spiritual bliss. But the Europeans hold that one's own pleasure is the goal of human life. The easterns sympathise with others in their happiness and misery; but the westerns show their skill in achieving their own objects. The former clear the obstacles in their way by means of self-denial and patience, while the latter do so by means of their own power. The former desire to improve the public life of the world and have accordingly a sincere and impartial attachment for all other beings; but the latter care for self-interest and their attachment for others is subordinated to this interest. The former are anxious to befriend all, while the latter are as anxious to secure their own ends and to vaunt their history. The easterns strive to attain greatness, mercy and good character; but the westerns strive to acquire only ferociousness, exclusiveness and bodily purity. The main natural characteristics of the former are plainness and purity of heart, while those of the latter are a desire for excessive pleasure, purity of body and health.

UNITED CHURCH HERALD, Nagercoil, Oct., 1917.

29. In the course of an article exhorting the Indians in general and the Indian Christians in particular to join the Indian Defence Force in larger numbers than they do at present, the United Church Herald, for October, has the following observations in its English columns:—"We cannot help feeling that Indians have yet hardly realised the war and all that it means. They do not understand how closely it touches the vital interests of India. We have noticed that this is true of Christains as well as of non-Christians. There is an attitude of aloofness to the war as if we were simply spectators of a great conflict in which we had no part. It is true that India has helped in a thousand ways, but it is really only the few who have thrown themselves enthusiastically into the work and who feel the conflict to be at their very door.

"It was only the other day that we were asked in a large village whether the Kaiser was not a great Sanskrit scholar and whether he did not read the Bhadvat-gita every day. This was the thing of most interest to those people in regard to the whole terrible war.

If only the Indian leaders had realised the terrible nearness and urgency of the war, it would have been impossible for them to have adopted the methods of agitation which have been seen in many places."

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 17th, 1917.

30. The Swadesamitran, of the 17th October, reproduces in Tamil a speech said to have been delivered at Allahabad by Mr. Tilak on this subject, in the course of which he is reported to have refuted the two arguments adduced against the grant of Home Rule to India that it would immediately lead to the Englishmen being driven away from India, and that it would endanger the interests of Englishmen in India and observes as follows:—None but self-interested parties will say that the Indians are unfit to have Home Rule. The people have not been given sufficient opportunities to show their efficiency. They are given only the subordinate appointments in the main. The conduct of the British administration will become impossible if the assistance of the Indians is not had in the subordinate appointments That is why the Indians are retained in the lower ranks of the service.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 17th, 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 17th October, refers to the attempt on the part of one Kumar Sahib to get up a loyalty meeting at Monghyr for the purpose of getting a petition signed that Home Rule is not wanted for India now and to the efforts of some Indians to induce the Namasudras in Khulna district to prepare a petition to the same effect and says:—For all outward appearances, efforts like these are made only by the Indians. But we regret to note that there are strong reasons to believe that, in every such case, the movement is being backed by some Englishmen, either official or non-official. The Home Rule movement is a spontaneous one and is the outcome of the education imparted to us by the British. Such a result was anticipated by eminent men like Macaulay 85 years back. But they did not expect that any one belonging to the British race will set up an agitation counter to the Home Rule movement. Perhaps they thought that the characteristics of the British race will not stoop to undertake such a mean work. Nevertheless, we actually see some Britishers in South India and elsewhere doing it.

The Desamata, of the 17th October, represents a speaker at a meeting at Parel to have said that certain opponents had created disputes between Brahmans and non-Brahmans out of a selfish motive, and that those that wished to uplift the country should condemn it.

The paper reports Mr. Tilak to have explained at the meeting how Home Rule was the birthright of every man, to have criticised the contention that every one ought to be educated before Home Rule could be granted, to have told that Home Rule is the universal remedy for all evils and to have advised the people not to fear the authorities but to express their opinions boldly.

The monster petition to Mr. Montagu.

31. In appealing to the Indian leaders to complete the work of getting signatures to the monster petition to be presented to Mr. Montagu without delay, the Swadesamitran, of the 17th October, observes:—The leaders who have undertaken this work have to meet with two impediments. One is from the party which, not recognising that the Indians are a nation by themselves and actuated by a spirit of arrogance that its members belong to the ruling race and have come here from the west with a settled status and authority, has been declaring both covertly and openly that the Indians should not, for several generations to come, be permitted to manage the affairs and conduct the administration of their country and trying to create divisions among the Indians and inconvenience them in many ways by utilising the influence of the bureaucracy. The other is, as our readers are aware, from a section among us which, either acting on the inducement of these westerns or owing to interested motives or on account of an irresponsible and mischievous nature, makes much of the caste distinctions among us and, creating a feeling of hatred against the Brahmans, objects to the immediate grant of powers of administration to our people. That both these parties comprise very few people can be easily proved to Mr. Montagu, and therefore their existence need not in any way hamper the work of getting signatures to the petition. Of course, the noise made by these have created some doubts in the minds of some people regarding this petition; and it behoves our leaders to give a satisfactory explanation to such doubts and complete their work.

A correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 19th October, complains that, while Mr. Gandhi has clearly pointed out that the signatures of persons who are against Home Rule or who do not understand what is meant by Home Rule should not be taken in the petition to be presented to Mr. Montagu, the signatures of such persons are being taken in Mylapore, and they are told that their taxes will be reduced if they affix their signature, and instances it by saying that he was himself approached by one for signature with the promise that, if he signed, arrangements would be made to reduce his municipal and other taxes. He apprehends from this whether some of the Brahman officials in the municipality would increase the taxes for those who are not enamoured of Home Rule and reduce them for those who are enamoured of it, and hopes that this matter will receive the attention of the authorities concerned.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 19th, 1917.

The same paper also publishes, as reported by a correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held at Conjeeveram, under the presidency of Mr. M. Ramachandra Ayyar of the Swadeshi Industrials, who is stated to have explained to the audience the sufferings of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali and urged his Hindu brethren to pray for their release. The correspondent also observes that the liberty day would be celebrated on the 17th of every month in Conjeeveram until the Muhammadan brothers in internment are released.

The Swadesamitran, of the 23rd October, publishes, as reported by correspondents, the proceedings of the public meetings held at Pannaipuram and Abhiramam praying for the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali from internment. At the former the resolution passed demanding the release of these Muslim brothers states that, so long as they are not released by the Government, the country can have no rest. At the latter, a resolution was also passed condemning the attitude of the Madras Mail towards the aspirations of the Indian people.

It would suffice if it had been only held that the Hindus should not conduct processions with music in the Muhammadan streets, as this might give rise to disputes between the Hindus and the Muhammadans. But it is not just to contend on the strength of the long established custom that the Hindus should not use music at the time even in their temples and houses. We do not see any reason why the music played in the Hindu temples and houses should jar on the ears of the Muhammadans.

But the number of the representatives in each Council will, perhaps, have to be decided with reference to its population also. However this may be, no one can have any objection to accept in general what is stated in the above letter.

The proceedings of this meeting appear in English in extenso in the Hindu of the 18th and 19th idem.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 17th, 1917.

Indian reforms.

In a leader under this heading, the Hindu Nesan, of the 17th October, dwells upon the views expressed by Mr. Ramsay Macdonald on the reforms to be introduced in the administration of India after the war and quoting his words that, as far as efficiency is concerned, the Indians are not behind the Britishers, observes:—It is a baseless statement that the Indians are unfit to exercise rights of administration We will confidently assert that, once the Indians are started on the road to Home Rule, they will prove their capacity beyond doubt and that, if they are trusted and a confidence is placed in their capacity and loyalty, there will be no difficulty whatever in securing the progress of the Indian public. Before an attempt is made to introduce reforms in the Indian administration, the fitness of the Indians to conduct it should be accepted. There was a time when they were put down as incompetent people. But this war has demonstrated beyond doubt the capacity and the loyalty of the Indians and their attachment to the British Empire.

Indian reforms.

In a leading article purporting to explain the difference between the Minto-Morley reforms and the scheme drawn up by the Congress League and proposed to be presented to Mr. Montagu, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 19th October, proceeds to add that the changes now urged seek to make the executive authorities more and more responsible to the popular representatives in the Provincial Councils, that these changes are not intended to promote the interests of any particular class or community but of India as a whole, that the ignorant rural population from whom it is proposed to obtain signatures to the monster petition to be presented to Mr. Montagu would do well to understand that signing the petition does not entail any fresh liabilities like the subscription lists which they are so frequently wont to see but would only bring larger powers to the Indian nation, and that consequently it behoves the people of all classes, creeds and communities to heartily give their signatures (or even thumb impressions) to the proposed monster petition.

Mrs. Besant's release and Mr. Montagu.

Anent the statement of Mr. Montagu in Parliament regarding the release of Mrs. Besant, the Dravidan, of the 23rd October, observes:—The statement of Mr. Montagu clearly shows that he did not take the Government of Madras into his confidence in this matter. As this Government is in the main responsible for preserving peace and order in the territories subject to its jurisdiction, it would have been fair on the part of Mr. Montagu, though it was not incumbent on him, to have consulted this Government in the matter of the release. He stated that there was no necessity for consulting the Local Government as the release of Mrs. Besant was not a provincial concern. If this view is accepted, we will not be wrong in presuming that the Madras as well as other provincial Governments are no more than instruments to carry out the directions of a higher Government. We are against this, as it will be dangerous to make the Provincial Governments mere puppets. Mr. Montagu said that strong recommendations had reached the Government of India from many quarters suggesting the release of — DRAVIDAN, Madras, Oct. 23rd, 1917.

Mrs. Besant, and assurances were given regarding her conduct. We would like to ask why no information was conveyed to the Local Government about such assurances, and who it was that gave them. Is it the few desciples of Mrs. Besant herself? Now the impression that she would keep quiet after her release is wrong; for from the day she was released she has been very active. Even villagers now understand from this release that agitation will get them everything.

Dravidapatrika, Madras, Oct. 24th, 1917.

The Dravidapatrika, of the 24th October, comments as follows on the statement of Mr. Montagu:—The statement should make Mr. Welby and his party, who threatened to oust Mr. Montagu from his office, feel ashamed of themselves. So the Anglo-Indian papers will surely condemn Mr. Montagu in many ways for some days to come The Civil and Military Gazette has begun the campaign already. It says that, however much Mr. Montagu may try to screen his responsibility for the relèase of Mrs. Resant, the educated Indians opine that he alone was responsible for it. We do not know who appointed the Civil and Military Gazette to be the representative of the educated Indians. It is a fact to be noted that the Indian newspapers applaud the statesmanship of Mr. Montagu.

Pilgrim tax.

40. A correspondent to the Hindu Nesan, of the 17th October, takes exception to the suggestion made by the same paper of the 11th instant, that a special tax may be collected from pilgrims gathering in sacred places so as to meet the extra cost of preserving the sanitation of the said places, on the grounds that the majority of the pilgrims being poor people, they will find it difficult to pay the new tax and that, when these pilgrims are paying the regular taxes in their respective places of residence, it will be unjust to make them pay an additional tax at a new place visited by them. He thinks that the levying of a new tax upon pilgrims may deter a large number of people from resorting to sacred shrines, which will eventually lead to the destruction of these shrines and a consequent reduction of the income derived by the Government therefrom.

Is there any hope for the interned?

41. The Swadesamitran, of the 18th October, refers to the unsatisfactory condition of the hundreds of men who have been interned, as seen from the letter addressed to the press by two vakils in the Central Provinces and the incident narrated in the Bengalee that an uncle of a young man interned in February 1915 had not received any reply to a prepaid urgent telegram sent by him to that Government seeking permission to attend upon the young man, who was reported to have taken ill and, remarking that this state of affairs gives room for the questions whether there is any hope for the interned and if so when, asks: "What is the reply of the officials to these questions?"

Mr. Montagu and the release of Mrs. Besant.

42. Adverting to the statement made by Mr. Montagu in the House of Commons on the 16th October 1917 on the subject of the release of Mrs. Besant in response to a question from Sir John Rees, whom the paper describes as being one of the representatives of those who are bent upon retarding the progress of India, the Swadesamitran, of the 19th idem, writes:—We do not know how far the Anglo-Indian newspapers and their following, who have begun to rake up an agitation regarding a matter which has been settled, deem their work to be compatible with patriotism or a calmness in the political atmosphere. But if they have not yet got rid of the idea that they can secure an exclusive authority, status or gain by means of this mischievous agitation, will they not give up their unjust aims and methods, eveh after the statements made by Mr. Montagu and Mr. Bonar Law last Tuesday? The statement of Mr. Montagu that the internment order passed against Mrs. Besant was essentially precautionary rather than punitive shows that the British Cabinet had unanimously decided that, in the present condition of the Empire, the policy adopted by the Provincial Governments here of suppressing at all costs the Home Rule agitation conducted by her and her criticism of the mistakes and defects of the bureaucracy should be changed. Our readers are aware that it is in pursuance of this policy and on the request of the Government of India that Mr. Montagu announced in Parliament that the aim of the British Government was to gradually establish self-government in India which would be responsible to the people, and that reforms would be introduced immediately to gain this end. While thus the Government themselves were trying to enlarge the scope of self-government and the Secretary of State had severely criticised the defects and mistakes of the bureaucracy in the course of the debate on the Mesopotamia incident, there is nothing surprising in the British Ministers having recognised the necessity of changing a policy according to which Mrs. Besant was interned for doing the same things actively here. So it was in the fittest of things that the Government of India should have taken the initiative in cancelling the internment orders. The fact that, though in response to a number of questions in Parliament Mr. Montagu promised to call for the details about the internment of Mrs. Besant, from the Government of India and place them before the House, he did not publish these details but suggested to the Government of India whether they could not, in the altered circumstances, cancel the orders themselves, may lead to the presumption that these details could not stand in a public discussion. We can any way safely presume that they were not agreeable to the new policy of the Cabinet. Seeing that this has been the course of events, need we dwell again upon the unwisdom of the Anglo-Indian newspapers and some Indian newspapers, which most unpatriotically lend a helping hand to them, in suggesting that the Governor of Madras and other officials should resign their appointments and that a serious agitation should be started in this country to prevent the accomplishment of the policy adopted by the British Cabinet at this critical juncture?

The release of Mrs. Besant.

The Dravidabhimani, of the 19th October, reproduces from the Swadesamitran of the 9th idem the Tamil version of the comments made by Lord Sydenham on this subject in a letter written by him to the London Times and referred to in paragraph 27 of Report No. 41 of 1917.

DRAVIDABHIMANI, Salem, Oct. 19th, 1917.

The release of Mrs. Besant.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th October, says:—Sir John Rees is playing the second fiddle to the Madras Mail. . . From the answer of Mr. Montagu regarding the release of Mrs. Besant, it may be inferred that the threats of the Mail have all proved futile. If the Anglo-Indian papers follow hereafter at least the opinion of the people and work for the advancement of the country, they will be helping the British Empire and India. . . How did the order of the release of Mrs. Besant, etc., affect the prestige of the Government of Madras, and the honour of the Mail? What absurdity is there in releasing the interned when the necessity for internment was over? Mr. Montagu did not bring pressure to bear on the Government of India. They released the interned out of their own free will. It will be well if the Mail which held Mr. Montagu responsible for the release, corrects its opinion now at least. Mr. Montagu's reply regarding the interned Muhammadans cannot be satisfactory. The promise that they made to the Raja of Muhammadabad will show that they have no sympathy with the enemy. The meetings held all over India are positive proof that there can be no peace in the country till they are released. Reuter adheres to his old traditions in telegraphing only things that are opposed to the Indian aspirations fully. . . Mr. Redmond is going to move in the House of Commons that the present repressive policy will not help to establish peace. The Government have to tread peaceful ways. There should be co-operation between the rulers and the ruled. Unrest should not be promoted at the instance of Lord Sydenham and Sir John Rees. While the leaders are doing their best to see to the release of persons already interned, a representative of the Amrita Bazaar Patrika has been interned on the ground that he was contributing objectionable articles to that paper and to the Bengalee. If this is a great offence, how can the freedom of any Indian be safe? As stated by the Amrita Bazaar Patrika, it will not be strange if a person committing nuisance in a public thoroughfare is interned under the Defence of India Act. All Indians will agree with the Patrika in its statements that the above Act, which is a war measure, is enforced against civil offences also and that as long as this state of things continues no man, however innocent he may be, can be safe.

It is mostly on account of the valorous deeds of the Indian troops that we were able to capture Baghdad. She has, in recognition of her services, been given a new status and position in the empire. Is England then justified in treating her and Lancashire differently? Is it fair on the part of England to deny to India the right of defining her own financial policy which will be suitable to her condition? We believe that in this matter the representatives of the Colonies will not fail to sympathise with her.

One of the speakers in the course of his observations is reported to have referred to the hardships caused to the ryots by the enhanced assessment in the recent re-settlement of the district and the lack of progress in industries, commerce and education in this country, and remarked that Home Rule was the only remedy in the circumstances. The president in eulogizing a speaker is stated to have attributed the wide experience gained by him in politics to the absence of G.O. No. 559, while he was a student.

to internal dissension and that open competition irrespective of considerations of caste is the best method of selection for choosing candidates for the Public Service by the remark that it is the preponderance of the Brahmans in every office and their active efforts to prevent the non-Brahmans from rising that necessitates the demand for communal representation, and observes:—Though it may be thought that numerous evil consequences may result from communal representation, it is very necessary for securing the progress of the non-Brahmans in their present condition. Until the Brahmans give up their jealousy of the non-Brahmans and learn to look to the interests of others in the same way in which they look to theirs and until the evil effects of the distinctions of caste disappear and the people become united in all respects, communal representation is very necessary.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Oct. 20th, 1917.

Discussion in Parliament about the release of Mrs. Besant.

53. The Swadesamitran, of the 20th October, says:—The details received today about the discussion in Parliament regarding the release of Mrs. Besant show that the aim of those who, under the guise of upholding the authority of the bureaucracy, agitate against the release, is not only to get the release order cancelled but also to alter the ideal of the British rule in India, which was recently announced by the Secretary of State with the full approval of His Majesty's Government. However moderate the Madras Mail may be in the matter of political reforms, the Anglo-Indian papers and associations do not seem to concede that the ideal of the British Government can be the grant of Home Rule to Indians and that the required reforms should be introduced. The Statesman and the Morning Post would not tolerate even the gradual establishment of a system of Government in India which will be responsible to the people. But the criticism of the Anglo-Indian papers serves in a way to bring out the true ideal of the British.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 20th, 1917.

When Mr. Montagu spoke about the release of Mrs. Besant, he would have done better if he had stated that it was a mistake on the part of the Madras Government to have thought of interning Mrs. Besant; for he did not hesitate to talk of the Home Rule agitation carried on by her. His speech clearly shows that both he and the Government of India are of opinion that the aspiration of the Indians for Home Rule and the prayer of the Congress and the Muslim League in this matter should not be opposed but disposed of sympathetically and that the status of India in the Empire should be definitely settled. So there is no necessity for interning some persons either on account of their opinion or as a precaution against their giving out their opinion, unless such opinion is prejudicial to the stability of the British Empire or the efficient conduct of the war. If this view is correct, are we wrong in expecting the Government to act without delay upon the unanimous appeal of the country for the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali, Shaukat Ali and others in internment?

The Lokopakari, of the 22nd October, and the Prapanchamitran, of the 23rd idem, also refer to the statement of Mr. Montagu in Parliament in support of the policy of the British Government to grant Home Rule to India and observing that, if the Anglo-Indians who agitate against it will read the remarks of Mr. Ramsay Macdonald in the Contemporary Review justifying a reconstitution of the structure of the Indian Government, they cannot fail to see the unreasonable nature of their agitation, adds that, though the Government have now avowed their policy, it is their duty to befit the Indians for the responsibility they are to take up by training them in administration and improving education, industries and trade in India.

Government as a first step towards the ultimate grant of Home Rule, which they have now avowed as their ideal, they would not be productive of proper results, if reforms were not introduced immediately which would give the people the power of controlling the finances and of levying taxes and observes:—In addition to these powers, trade protection is also very necessary for us. When even the Englishmen, who used to boast of having made immense profits by means of their policy of free trade, now clamour for protection for their trade, need we lay stress upon the necessity for such protection in India, which is relying upon the foreigners in the matter of trade? Babu Vikramajit says that next in importance to protection, direct pecuniary assistance for the several industries and liberal support in other matters are also required. Some may argue from an examination of the figures connected with exports and imports in India that there is a tolerable industrial advancement in India. But what is the extent of the gain derived by the Indians from this? We will reiterate here the observation of Babu Vikramajit that in Bombay every other industry than the weaving one is mostly in the hands of Europeans and that all the profits derived from such industries are taken away to England, the only benefit accruing to the Indians being petty wages earned by them.

He is stated to have referred in particular to the fact that while India was exporting sugar to other countries in ancient days, she has now to depend upon other countries for the very same commodity.

No importance need be attached to the activities of the third class noted above. It is clear that they have been pushed to the front nominally by the Brahmans in order to gain their own end. It is the Brahmans that now go round in every street taking signatures for the petition to be presented to Mr. Montagu. We learn that signatures are taken from illiterate people by offering some bait or other. What is the use of such signatures? Mr. Montagu himself knows what value to attach to them.

They were then in a very flourishing condition. But now all our villages have been ruined. The karnam and the monegar exercise despotic sway there and there are none to attend to these villages. Executive Government should be subordinate to the Legislative. The present system of Government had failed and the manhood of the country was being dwarfed under that system. The Congress Committee also has adopted a similar resolution. We pray that the Government will accept the resolution and recommend their pardon to His Majesty.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 19th, 1917.

The problem of an Indian nation.

69. In the course of an article under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th October, attempts to prove that racial and religious differences in India cannot stand in the way of the people forming an Indian nation and has the following remark:—As the Muhammadans settled themselves in India and spent Indian money in India itself, Indian money did not go to foreign countries and India did not suffer from poverty.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 19th, 1917.

The Panchamas.

70. A Panchama correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th October, in the course of an article about the social and other disabilities of the Panchamas, remarks that in spite of the several advantages gained by becoming Christians, the Panchamas are still attached to the Hindu religion and says:—As high appointments, high education, industries and commerce have been shut out against the Indians, the congress has been holding its sessions for the past thirty years. We could not do anything more than to wait for the visit of Mr. Montagu. The foreign countries have no respect for us. The hardships suffered by the Indians in the colonies are written in letters of blood.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 19th, 1917.

Mr. Muhammad Ali and his brother.

71. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th October, says:—At a meeting held at Narasapur, one of the speakers suggested that for the establishment of peace in the country before the arrival of Mr. Montagu, Mr. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali should be released, and that until then both the Hindus and the Muhammadans should carry on constitutional agitation.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Oct. 17th, 1917.

Mr. Muhammad Ali and his brother.

The Desamata, of the 17th October, publishes the correspondence between the Hon'ble Mr. S. Riza Ali and the Government of the Central Provinces regarding the refusal to allow the former to see Mr. Muhammad Ali and his brother, and says that the Hon'ble Mr. Riza Ali is suggesting to papers that Sir Benjamin Robertson, the ruler of the Central Provinces, should be made to know that he is the servant and not the master of the people.

The Madras Mail.

72. The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th October, says in its leader:—It is plain that the object of the Mail in awakening the Europeans is to oppose the grant of political reforms. It is anxious to make friends with those Indians who are hostile to national aspirations. It dwells upon reforms that are agreeable to it and to the Indians which it favours. . . It says that the British will not agree to the establishment of any system of Government that is opposed to what they think just. . . It is difficult to understand why the Mail, which accuses the Indians of a lack of plainness, should itself be so very inexplicit. . . The words of the Mail, as far as we understand them, appear to mean that to follow the wishes of the people is out of question. The ideal of the Indians has been declared to be the establishment of self-government under the British suzerainty. The Indians only wish for such government as will promote their national life. But from the writings of the Mail, it will be seen that the desire of the English for arbitrary authority will decide the future of India. It is then useless for Mr. Montagu to ascertain the views of the Indians. . . The Indians are requesting the British rulers to grant them the same liberty as that which they are fighting to secure for Belgium. Is there anything that is either absurd or inexplicit in this? It is the hostile attitude of the Mail to the aspirations of the Indians that suggests to it absurd interpretations. . . Indians cannot agree with the Mail in the reasons it adduces to show that Lord Morley's reforms have proved a failure. In those reforms no opportunity was given to the Indians to manifest their talents. They were not vested with any responsibility of administration. The enlargement of the Legislative Councils only converted them into debating societies. . . It is in keeping with the reasoning of the Mail to say under such circumstances that the Indians have not manifested capacity and talent. The Mail says that in the opinion of the British, the Indians are unfit to have self-government. What absurdity does the Mail see in the ideals of the Indians? . . . As the people have not been given a share in the administration, there are no political parties among them. All of them wish to have the right to govern. . . The Indians have a definite ideal and it is the hostile attitude of the Mail towards this that makes it pass irrelevant remarks.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 19th, 1917.

The Mail.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 20th October, says:—It is natural that the angle of vision of those that consider imperial questions from England should differ from that of the sun-dried Anglo-Indians. . . At a time when the rulers should get every help from all parts of the Empire and put down Prussian militarism, it is not expedient to foster unrest in any part of the Empire. It is self-contradictory and discreditable to deny liberty to India while waging a big war in Europe for the establishment of liberty. It is difficult that an opportunity like this will afford itself again to pacify India and strengthen the bonds of love between India and England. If the Indians are given military training, they will be able to encounter twenty Germanies. All obstacles to their admission into the army should be removed. Indians should be given liberty so that they may manifest loyalty to the Empire. The abolition of the system of internment will pave the way for all this. . . If the Mail considers the Indian problem with a broad mind, it will know that its agitation is disastrous. It is overwhelmed with the fear that the influence of the Anglo-Indians will be affected. . . It has not been able to understand that it is statesmanship to consider that the happiness of the people is of greater importance than the splendour of Government. The Mail asks if Mr. Montagu communicated with the Madras Government about the release of Mrs. Besant. This is a sapless question. He consulted His Excellency the Viceroy who is responsible for the peace of the country. The Government of India in their turn consulted the Government of Madras. Where is the necessity for the Secretary of State to consult the Government of Madras? . . . The answer to the question of the Mail, what brought about such change in the mind of Lord Chelmsford, is not far to seek. When Lord Chelmsford took up the reins of the Government, he reposed confidence in the opinion of the bureaucracy. But he gradually saw the truth and has understood that the chief means of uplifting the country is to tread the way of peace. Indians are satisfied that the authorities in England are now seeing the present condition of things in its true light. If the true state of things be represented to Mr. Montagu, our desires will surely be fulfilled. We request the Indians to work for this with perseverence.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 20th, 1917.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

Dasara and Moharum festivals.

73. Referring to the celebration of Dasara and Moharum festivals in Guntūr, the Andhraprakasika, of the 22nd October, writes:—. . . The Deputy Magistrate of Guntūr issued orders to the Muhammadans to celebrate their festival as they pleased. But he subjected the Hindus to many restrictions. They feel strongly that his order was not at all impartial.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 20th, 1917.

Dasara and Moharum festivals.

Referring to the affray at Cannanore between the Thiyas and the Mapillas in connection with the Dasara and Moharum festivals, the Andhraprakasika, of the 20th October, observes as follows:—We do not know how many such affrays may take place before the close of these festivals. Therefore we cannot but say emphatically that the least amount of negligence at this time on the part of Government will result in loss of life.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

Home Rule difficulties at Kolluru.

74. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 22nd October, writes:—On the 14th idem two pleaders from Tenali went to Kollur (Guntūr district) and obtained signatures from the villagers in some books, saying that, if they should sign therein they would get self-government. The next day I was sent for by the karnam of the place, but I did not go. I heard later on that signatures were taken from ten of our community. I was threatened that I would be made to pay additional tax this year for failing to sign in the said books.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

South Indian Liberal Federation.

75. The Andhraprakasika, of the 22nd October, has the following under this heading:—At a meeting of the South Indian Liberal Federation held yesterday under the presidentship of Mr. Govindarajulu Nayudu, Barrister, it was resolved unanimously that the majority of the Indians was not prepared to have immediate swaraj.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 20th, 1917.

Bifurcation of the Kistna district.

76. Referring to a memorial of the people of the Kistna district submitted to Government, and to the presidential speech of the Kumararaja of Challapalli made at a meeting held at Masulipatam in 1916, in respect of the transfer of the head-quarters of the district from Masulipatam to Bezwada, the Andhraprakasika, of the 20th October, observes as follows:—If the Government should consider the points mentioned therein, we can say that they would not deprive Masulipatam of its importance. Instead of spending large sums of money upon the bifurcation of the district during the time of war, the Government would do well to add some taluks of the district to the Guntūr district and one or two taluks to the Gōdāvari district, and thus reduce the heavy work of the Collector of the Kistna district. We believe that the Collectors of the Guntūr and Gōdāvari districts have not much work to do at present.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 20th, 1917.

The Andhras.

77. The Andhrapatrika, of the 20th October, reproduces from the Andhraprakasika of the 19th idem an article under the heading "the Andhra battalion" abstracted supra under the marginally-noted heading.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 19th, 1917.

The Andhras.

In disagreeing with the opinion of the recruiting officers that the Andhras have lost their valour, the Andhraprakasika, of the 19th October, says:—The Andhras are very valiant. They maintained the honour of the British flag in the Mysore and other wars. One of the reasons why they now do not join the army is that they prefer civil employment; because it is difficult to maintain their families, with a pay of Rs. 12 in the Military service. . . Well-to-do men will do well to get their sons admitted into the army and maintain the valour of the Andhras. As for the other boys, the Government, we suggest, should arrange to take them into the military service, affording them some facilities.

78. The Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd October, gives a Telugu version of the criticism of Mr. Montagu's speech by the Civil and Military Gazette, which contains:— . . . From the present state of affairs in India and from the agitation of Mrs. Besant and her Home Rule friends for the release of those in sympathy with the King's enemies, it is plain that while the peace, to establish which they were released, was not secured, the people believe that the Government have yielded to their agitation and that the Government of India have received a strong blow thereby.

The Civil and Military Gazette.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

79. The Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd October, writes:—At a meeting of the Home Rule League, Tekkali, it was resolved that the British Government be requested to release Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali immediately. The meeting terminated with an axhortation to the audience that persistent agitation for Home Rule must be made till the goal is reached.

A Home Rule meeting at Tekkali, Ganjam district.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

80. The Kistnapatrika, of the 20th October, says under this heading:—The conditions under which the Indian Christians are placed do not tend to promote devotion to the motherland and the idea of nationalism. As the people are converted by the western Missionaries, they acquire, along with the religion, a feeling of contempt for the coloured races which the westerners have. Indian Christians have not examined how far they can be Indians in social, educational, political and other matters. They have learnt from the western Missionaries that religions other than Christianity are false, that the customs, etc., of the coloured races are uncivilised, dishonest and reproachable, and that therefore they deserve to be abandoned. This is evident from the fact that a Missionary once objected to an Indian Christian growing a tuft of hair on his head. The Indian Christians thus give up not only their religion but also their national traits and imitate the westerners. . . Hindus should tolerate Christianity and enlist the sympathy of their Christian brethren in political matters. . . So long as Indian Christians yield to the influence of the westerners and forego self-respect and self-government, they will be not only retarding their own progress, but also marring the well-being of their country. So long as they consider England their home they cannot advance their own interests and it is no wonder therefere that they do not advocate Home Rule. . . Indian Christians have not exercised any independent thought over the doctrines of Christianity and they are intellectual slaves to western commentators. . . Christ is an Asiatic and it is only Asiatics and not Europeans that can throw light upon His tenets. . . Indian Christians cannot do so long as they pay reverence to the ecclesiastic authority of the westerners. How can the westerners who are actuated by national egotism, who are desirous of an earthly empire, realise the secret teachings of Christ? O, Indian Christians, pining under the ecclesiastic authority of the westerners, you do not see your superiority. . . Know that in order to make your church nationalistic, the political conditions of the country should change. So long as you are dependent politically, you cannot have freedom in the administration of the church. Being ignorant of the mutual relationship between the church and the State, you decided to be hostile to Home Rule. You will know by and by that this attitude is an obstacle more to your future progress than to that of the rest of the Indians. . . It is the Indian Christians that should be foremost in political activity. The fear that they will be ruined if India is granted self-government is groundless . . Moreover what the Congress wants is not complete self-government. There is no need for the English to leave India when the Congress scheme is carried out. . . Under the present rule, the people have no adequate powers. If the Congress scheme is carried out, the Government will become responsible and popular. It is strange that the Indian Christians fear such a change. They may like the Muhammadans demand separate representation for some time. It is ridiculous that they condemn the reforms which the people in general desire. Home Rule does not mean complete self-government. . . When the British Cabinet has approved of reforms being introduced in India and is sending Mr. Montagu, it is strange that the Indian Christians are stating that this is not the proper time for reforms.

Indian Christians.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Oct. 20th, 1917.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Oct. 20th, 1917.

Swaraj.

81. A correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 20th October, in an article under this heading urges the necessity of the leaders of the people making the swaraj movement a success by enlisting the sympathy of villagers also. He says that some of our social evils also, with which the Government refuse to have anything to do, because of their pledge of religious neutrality, will disappear in a moment under self-government.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Oct. 20th, 1917.

Pearl and coral fishery.

82. The Kistnapatrika, of the 20th October, publishes in its columns what it calls the tour of a cloud which, while passing above Ceylon, says with reference to the pearl and coral fishery in which Europeans are engaged:—Ah! these Europeans have been misappropriating our treasures. Trading in corals and pearls, they have been misappropriating the money of foreign countries.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Oct. 17th, 1917.

Home Rule in Sind and clerks in service.

83. A correspondent to the Desamata, of the 17th October, refers to the fact that certain clerks in Karachi have been dismissed for joining the Home Rule movement and hoisting the Home Rule flag and remarks:—Many young men in Sind have a religious devotion to the Home Rule movement. If the authorites in Sind should dismiss from office every young man who has joined the Home Rule movement, it is difficult to see how many young men there will be in small appointments.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Oct. 17th, 1917.

Home Rule and the non-Brahman movement.

84. The Desamata, of the 17th October, says in its leader:—The few gentlemen in England who are hostile to the grant of self-government to the Indians are so because of their love for the bureaucracy in India. . . Some selfish men have created disputes between Brahmans and non-Brahmans and are obstructing our endeavours. . . The Government have not yet begun to show due regard to the opinion of the Legislative Councils. If changes are made on the lines indicated by the Congress and other national institutions, the Government cannot but show regard to the opinion of the majority in the councils, in regard to the imposition and repeal of taxes and in the matter of passing good laws and repealing hard ones. . . The writings of Mr. Nayar not only promote the hatred between Brahmans and non-Brahmans but they also obstruct the endeavours of the leaders working disinterestedly for the good of the country. On Rao Bahadur Thiagaraya Chetti sending a cablegram to Mr. Montagu, the non-Brahmans disowned his leadership. Many of the educated among the Brahmans have agreed to the separate representation of the different classes of non-Brahmans. The special Andhra Conference also gave its approval. Still Doctor Nayar has not reconciled himself with the new non-Brahmans and the national institutions, but is working against them. While the people are signing the memorial that is to be presented to Mr. Montagu in pursuance of the advice of Mr. Gandhi, Doctor Nayar has joined the Anglo-Indians who are working against the aspirations of the people, and is, it is said, arranging to get ready a new memorial opposed to the above-mentioned one. This is opposed to the interest of all except the Anglo-Indians and is unjust. Mr. Montagu is coming to India and an opportunity like this cannot afford itself again. For this reason, many of the Brahman leaders have given their approval to separate representation of the several classes in the country.

So we request that the leaders will explain the Congress scheme of reforms and get the memorial suggested by Mr. Gandhi signed by all those who wish to sign it.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Oct. 17th, 1917.

The dispute between Brahmans and non-Brahmans.

85. A correspondent to the Desamata, of the 17th October, says under this heading:—When well defended rulers like Charles in England and Louis in Paris were murdered as soon as they became somewhat cruel, can there be a greater lie than that the coward of a Brahman has been annoying the non-Brahmans with impunity till to-day. . . The writings of the Madras Mail appears to be the cause of the dispute between the Brahmans and the non-Brahmans. Keep out the Mail which sets you up against one another, and laughs in its sleeves, cunningly accomplishing its object. . . We should know that it is this internal quarrel that brought the Muhammadans into India first, and gave this Empire to the English afterwards, and that such internal dissension exists in no other country than in India.

86. The Andhrapatrika, of the 20th October, criticises under this heading the leader in the Bombay Chronicle, against the division of the country on a language basis. It says:—Though many changes have to be made in dividing the country on a language basis, yet the authorities should not hesitate to carry out changes that are necessary to make administration efficient. . . Till now, the people have not been vested with the responsibility of administration. Before the people are given that responsibility, it is necessary to create circumstances that will enable the people to carry out that responsibility successfully. The division of the country into Provinces on a language basis is the chief of those circumstances. . . The Andhra leaders should in this matter enlist the sympathy of the other provinces. If they do that, the Indians as a whole will make a representation to Mr. Montagu in this matter.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 20th, 1917.

Division of the country into provinces on a language basis.

87. An Andhra correspondent of the Adhrapatrika, of the 20th October, refers to the forthcoming visit of Mr. Montagu and says: —As discontent, injustice and sin are prevailing in the country, Mr. Montagu will visit India like a god. He will punish the wicked and the sinful, will rescue us from the mouths of the Anglo-Indian burcaucrats, will disperse the unrest in the country, will restore peace and justice, will grant us the reforms we desire so that the poor among us may have full meals, will sow the seed of the tree of swaraj and ask us to tend it carefully, and will free a whole country from slavery and give it liberty. The reader will surmise in what state the Madras Mail will then be.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 20th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

88. The Andhraprakasika, of the 22nd October, gives an account of a farce exhibited at a meeting of the Madras Andra Sabha on the 20th October, in which officers taking bribes were given sound advice, and remarks that it is well-known that not only subordinate officers, but also those drawing Rs. 1,000 are receiving bribes, that bribe-taking has become a profession with officers and that many who are unemployed become prosperous through the corruption of officials.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

Corruption.

89. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 23rd October, says under this heading that certain Brahman young men at Cocanada are taking the signatures of innocent and illiterate ryots to the mahazur suggested by Mr. Gandhi, representing to them that, on receipt of the mahazur, they will have swaraj, that thereafter they will not have to pay any taxes and that the present Government is depriving us of all our wealth and putting us to many troubles. . . The correspondent says that these Brahman young men are thus imposing upon the innocent and getting their signatures in order to send the mahazur to Mr. Montagu.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 23rd, 1917.

The mahazur suggested by Mr. Gandhi.

90. In commenting on the Gōdāvari District Non-Brahman Conference, the Andhraprakasika, of the 23rd October, says that the non-Brahmans should not keep quiet till the Government gives them separate representation suited to their number, requirements, circumstances, honour, courage, loyalty and patriotism, that they must not place faith in the words and promises of Brahmans, who will not easily give up their authority, that they should request the Government to allow one of their leaders to tour with Mr. Montagu in India, representing to him the requirements of non-Brahmans, and that they should send their representatives also to England to work for separate representation being given to them.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 23rd, 1917.

Non-Brahmans.

91. The Adhrapatrika, of the 22nd October, says that the Gudur Home Rule League have resolved to send some more men to help those who are engaged on behalf of this League in getting signatures to the mahazur suggested by Mr. Gandhi.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

Gudur Home Rule League.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 19th, 1917.

The Indian Athletic Association.

92. The Andhraprakasika, of the 19th October, reports the President of a meeting of the Indian Athletic Association, Gajapatinagaram (Vizagapatam district), to have said in the course of his speech:—To add to the evils already existing among us, foreign rule has caused another great loss to India. It is in my opinion not wrong to say that that rule has estranged the Indians from their religious rites.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 18th, 1917.

A separate Kanarese province.

93. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 18th October, says:—It augurs good that the Andhra movement is attracting the attention of the people of the other Provinces. . . The Kanarese-speaking public intend to request Mr Montagu to constitute a separate Province for them. If the other races such as the Uriyas, Mahrattas, etc., also do the same thing, the question of the division of the country on a language basis will soon be solved. If the Andhra leaders induce others to do so at this juncture, the said question can be converted into a question concerning all India, and Mr. Montagu will take interest in solving it. . . The position of the Kanarese people is worse than that of the Andhras. Unlike the Andhras who are all in the Madras Presidency, the Kanarese people are scattered in Mysore and in the Bombay and Madras Presidencies. This is an obstruction to their advancement and to the progress of their language. A correspondent to the Bombay Chronicle wishes that the Kanarese public may all be brought under one province. When the impracticability of a united Indian nation is realised, we can see the desirability of individual races speaking different languages, advancing according to their own lights. The division of the country on language basis therefore becomes necessary. The present position of the Kanarese people is discouraging. Their literature is neglected, and their importance is not felt in matters relating to the progress of the country. They exist only in name, and their ancient history has disappeared. . . The above-said correspondent stated that the Kanarese country is more extensive than Belgium and is as populous as that country. The objection that it is not big enough to form a separate province cannot therefore stand. . . As far expenditure, the Government should not hesitate to spend the required money in matters affecting the interests of the people. The correspondent suggests that if a separate Kanarese province is impossible, the South Kanara district in the Madras Presidency and the portions occupied by the Kanarese-speaking public in Bellary and Anantapur should be added to the four Kanarese districts in the Bombay Presidency. . . He exhorts the Kanarese public to hold a separate conference and arrange to make a representation to Mr. Montagu in this matter. . . We wish the conference every success. A move in this direction in the different provinces will help the Andhras in gaining their object. The Andhra leaders should bestir themselves and among other things see that the representation to be made by the Congress includes the division of the country on a language basis.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 18th, 1917.

The Europeans in India and political reforms.

94. The Andhrapatrika, of the 18th October, says:—. . . The European Association and the Mail fear that Mr. Montagu may grant political reforms to the Indians. They will be delighted if officers who are opposed to the aspirations of the Indians visit India. Indians will indeed agree with the Times of India in suggesting that the Europeans should let the authorities know what reforms they want. But such reforms should not be allowed to retard the progress of the country. . . The Times says that it cannot be said that the attention of the Europeans is wholly taken up by the war, which they plead as an excuse only when political reforms are brought forward for consideration. The Times says that Europeans will do well to utilise the time they waste in preparing a representation to Mr Montagu. Mrs. Besant wishes that the Indians should gain a knowledge of political problems. The Times says that such advice applies not only to Indians but to Europeans also. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 18th, 1917.

The Tenali Home Rule League.

95. The Andhrapatrika, of the 18th October, publishes a letter from the pen of the Honorary Secretary of the Tenali Home Rule League which contains:—Our countrymen wish to have some privileges. If the privileges are granted, the bureaucracy has certainly to give up some of its powers. Mr. Montagu is coming to India to ascertain if the Indians want any such privileges. The people have to present him with a memorial. The people in the villages have to be acquainted with its contents and their signatures have to be taken. Members of Home Rule Leagues and others should work in this behalf. There should be a Home Rule League in every village. I hope that such Leagues may be established in every village.

Division of the country.

96. In the course of an article on the division of the country on a language basis, a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 18th October, suggests that the country may be so divided and the divisions placed under Governors or Lieutenant-Governors according to circumstances, and that the Legislative and Executive Councils may be constituted on the lines laid down in the memorandum of the nineteen. This and the carrying on of the administration in the vernaculars will conduce to greater union among the people, and happier relations between the rulers and the ruled. The correspondent urges that the leaders will lay down a scheme relating to these matters and submit it to Mr. Montagu when he visits India.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 18th, 1917.

The religion of Jesus and the war.

97. The Ravi, of the 18th October, says, under this heading that, if the doctrines of Jesus are strictly adhered to and international relations are adjusted accordingly there can be no war at all, and that the religion of Jesus should not be blamed on the ground that it was not able to avert the present war. The paper then justifies the present war against German militarism.

RAVI, Cocanada, Oct. 18th, 1917.

A suggestion for the constitution of a Provincial Council.

98. In reviewing a paper under this heading contributed by the Hon'ble Mr. B. Venkatapati Raju, the Ravi, of the 18th October, says that it also anxiously looks forward to the day when India shall have Home Rule, but that that day is rather distant because India is at present unfit for Home Rule. . . We are doubtful if the scheme suggested by the Hon'ble Mr. Venkatapati Raju will satisfy the non-Brahmans. We believe that the present system of Government will be enough till all racial differences which are an obstacle to universal brotherhood are done away with. May every effort be made to merge these differences till the goal is reached.

RAVI, Cocanada, Oct. 18th, 1917.

A Home Rule meeting.

99. In giving the proceedings of a Home Rule meeting at Kolluru (Guntur district), a correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 18th October, says:—The Home Rulers have stated that the Government do not carry on the administration according to our wishes, that they have imposed heavier taxes here than in the other countries in the world, that nothing is left to the ryot after he pays the taxes to the Government, that trade has been completely ruined, that the Government do not spend the revenue derived from the people with the approval of the people, that the wishes of the people are not fulfilled on account of the number of the representatives of the people being greater than that of the representatives of the Government, that India should have Home Rule if the people should be happy and prosperous, that the British who are now the rulers should be made to know that they are servants of the people, that in demanding swaraj, the Brahmans wish the welfare of the non-Brahmans, that the Government cannot remove racial prejudice, that they for sometime fostered the quarrels between the Hindus and the Muhammadans, joined the latter and afforded them some facilities, that the Muhammadans have seen their mistake and are working with the Hindus for swaraj, that failing in this attempt, the Government . . . are setting up non-Brahmans against the Brahmans and are making swaraj distant to us, that the Brahmans have unfeigned sympathy for the non-Brahmans, that. . . to future Legislative Council meetings the non-Brahmans may or may not return Brahman members, that they (the speakers) have no objection to such a thing, and so on. . . Certain non-Brahman speakers have said that the present system of Government need not be changed, that the Anglo-Indians are naturally great statesmen, that they are perhaps spoiled by the Brahman officers giving them advice, that they may be asked to rectify any defects in them. . . that the Government should not be made to feel they are servants, that there will always be differences among the several classes of Indians. . . that the absence of proper representation of backward classes will only tend to their complete degradation. . . that the Muhammadans who were once in a backward condition now share in the administration on account of the encouragement given to them by the Government. . . that the Brahmans having occupied all Government appointments do not allow the non-Brahmans to rise. . . that when with the help of the Government the non-Brahmans acquire administrative capacity, Home Rule may be demanded, that till then representation of non-Brahmans by the English is to be preferred. . . and that. . . if the people now ask for Home Rule, they will forego the good the Government intend doing them. They also said that the people in general do not now want Home Rule. . . It is said that the non-Brahmans that signed the Home Rule mahazur did so because they were clients of Brahman pleaders. Panchamas have not been invited to the meeting. They are three thousand in number. Those that signed the mahazur have afterwards regretted.

Home Rule.

A correspondent of the Andhrapatrika, of the 20th October, exhorts the public to work in the cause of Home Rule and observes that the ideal of swaraj has taken hold of the minds of the people of every village.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Oct. 19th, 1917.

His Excellency the Governor's visit to South Kanara.

100. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 19th October, writes:—His Excellency the Governor's visit to our district a second time is evidently due to some important items of business in connection with the Railway Conference, etc. It is gratifying to note that in accordance with the traditional practice among Indians of welcoming the ruler with some apt present, the popular leaders of South Kanara were able to present His Excellency with a sum of Rs. 7,266 towards the Hospital Ship Fund. Both the discussion in connection with the Mangalore-Arsikere line of Railway and the final result thereof were of great importance. Although we know what the outcome of it will be, we are unable to give publicity to it just at present. All that we can safely say at present is that the Government are regarding the question with the fullest sympathy. The item next in importance related to the Recruiting Conference. We have in a previous issue published the conditions of recruitment applicable to our district The discussion in the presence of His Excellency the other day did not lead to any definite results. Some of those present at the Conference urged that the wages of coolies should be raised by As. 4. We do not think that the raising of wages by As. 4 will be sufficiently attractive or encouraging. While the normal wages at present stand at As. 8 to 9 a day, it is doubtful how far an additional wage of As. 4 will render coolie work in distant lands in connection with military work attractive. Further, the number of people who are idle or out of employ being very small in South Kanara, it is not likely that the efforts to obtain a larger number of recruits will be successful unless the rate of wages shows a substantial increase. It is highly gratifying to see that the District Association took the opportunity of laying the grievances of the district before His Excellency. These related to education, forests, Kumki rights, sandalwood produce, etc. It is significant that nothing was said about our (Mangalore) Municipality. Either the municipality has no grievances, or it is too torpid to move. It was clever enough, however, to keep the one or two broad streets through which His Excellency passed in a very neat condition for the time being, so that His Excellency could get no idea of insanitary conditions in the other parts of the city. The account of the grievances published in another column will show what amount of help is needed by our district in connection with primary education. His Excellency, however, was pleased to observe that the needs of primary education were more pressing than provision for a first-grade college. We know that it is so; nor could the advocates of a scheme for a first-grade college be unmindful of these needs. Our needs are equally pressing in both directions. We only hope that this answer is not intended merely to evade every demand in its turn by pointing to something else.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Oct. 23rd, 1917.

The Madras Presidency Association.

101. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 23rd October, observes:—"It is a matter for great congratulation that the non-Brahmans of the Madras Presidency have begun to see that Mr. Theagaraya Chetti and Dr. T. M. Nayar do not deserve to be the leaders of any patriotic movement in India. They started an association lately under the name the Madras Presidency Association. The most influential merchants, mirasidars, landholders, etc., are members of this association. They have defined the objects and reasons of the association. They proceed on the principle that the distinctions of caste, colour and creed should not enter into our political aims and aspirations. In respect to religious observances, there are differences. In India though there are four castes, there are 4,000 sub-divisions of castes. A time will come when the followers of all these castes and sub-castes will come to think that there are only three castes, good, bad and hybrid. They will come to think that all who are pure in thought, word and deed belong to the first class, that those who are not so belong to the last caste and that the second caste consists of those who are a mixture of both. Before such a day dawns, there should be some principles of action to guide the well-wishers of India. Those principles are the political principles divorced from principles of caste, colour and creed. Our political ideals do not admit of much difference of opinion. Let the whole of India agree upon some fundamental rules of administrative action and stick to them without mending the stupid, silly, barbarous, savage and antidiluvian rules."

The Governor of Madras and the Yogakshema Sabha.

102. The Yogakshemam, of the 19th October, expresses satisfaction at the sympathetic way in which His Excellency the Governor received the representations of the Yogakshema Sabha during His Excellency's visit to Calicut.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, Oct. 19th, 1917.

Moulavi Hasrat Mohani. The refusal of the Government of the United Provinces.

103. The Qaumi Report, of the 15th October, writes:—We extremely regret and it is indeed a matter of regret to all Muhammadans as well to learn that the Government of the United Provinces have refused to release Moulana Saiyid Fazlul Hasan, Hasrat, Mohani, B.A. From the Council Report it appears that the Hon'ble Saiyid Raza Ali Sahib invited the attention of the Government to this matter, and the Government of Sir James Meston replied that the reasons for the internment of Moulana Hasrat, Mohani, were different from those mentioned by His Excellency the Viceroy. Hasrat, Mohani, is undergoing imprisonment on account of the infringement of the law, and it is not the intention of the Lieutenant-Governor to release him.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Oct. 15th, 1917.

Sir James Meston has imitated the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent in this respect, and adopted the tone in the case of Mr. Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali. Probably Sir James Meston cannot well realise to what extent the reply of his Government will hurt the feelings of Muhammadans and grieve and break their hearts.

It has been pointed out that Moulana Hasrat, Mohani, has committed an offence against the law. Unless it is shown that under what section of the Defence of India Act he is convicted, Sir James Meston can never be justified in asserting that he is guilty. Granting that he is undergoing imprisonment for the above reason, his offence cannot become more serious or unpardonable on that account, for the original offence, regarding which orders were passed and of which he pleaded not guilty, was not proved against him in court nor was he given an opportunity to cross-examine. In order to find him guilty of the original offence, the charge of the infringement of the law is laid against him. We invite His honour's attention to the fact with a view to his reconsidering the offence to which the offender pleaded not guilty.

We do not know if the disobedience of orders can be a more serious offence than the infringement of the Defence of India Act, even if such a charge is proved against him. Mrs. Besant and her associates acted against the Defence of India Act and Moulana Hasrat, Mohani, disobeyed orders which are two different cases. The latter's offence falls within the limits of ordinary law. It is amazing, however, to find that the Government of the United Provinces do not wish to act in an enlightened, just and sympathetic manner and want to read the promise of a general amnesty made by His Excellency the Viceroy in their own way. Mrs. Besant and her associates were accused of spreading disaffection and disorder in the country. Mr. Chamberlain, the ex-Secretary of State for India, had declared in Parliament that their action in India was so very mischievous as to prove very dangerous to the country. But Sir James Meston has seen that His Excellency the Viceroy strongly recommended their release. Is it not cruel that the reasons, which the Viceroy had assigned, should have proved beneficial with regard to their mischievous and dangerous acts, but could not be made applicable to, and secure forgiveness for, the Moulana's offence defined as disobedience.

We cannot understand how long the punishment for disobedience of orders can continue and why a definite period has not been fixed. We consider Sir James Meston's reply is more bitter and heart-rending than that of Sir William Vincent. The latter desires to take undertakings from Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali, but His Honour, without making enquiries of poor Hasrat and without considering over the matter, declared that he could not be released. Probably the other Governments too will give similar replies as regards Moulana Muhammad Hasan, Mohaddis, Daobandi and Moulana Abul Katam, Azad. If this be the case local attempts will not avail. We should now invite the attention of His Excellency the Viceroy, and request him to do justice to Muhammadans and show at least the same concession as he has already shown to Mrs. Besant and her lieutenants.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Oct. 15th, 1917.

Mr. Muhammad Ali and Turkey.

104. The Qaumi Report, of the 15th October, has an extract from the Cawnpore Gazette of the 8th October, dealing with the subject of "Muhammad Ali and Turkey" with the remark that it will shortly express its opinion on the subject.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Oct. 20th, 1917.

What do you say to this? "Sympathy with the enemy".

105. The Qaumi Report, of the 20th October, writes:—With reference to Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali's offence, it has been supposed and expressed in official language that they openly declared sympathy with the King's enemies. No one knows the literal or the figurative meaning of these words or to what extent they have expressed unlawful sympathy.

The editor, referring to the articles "B.S.A.'s peace proposals and the handing over of Mesopotamia to the Turks" published in the well-known Daily Telegraph, London, in its issue of the 28th August 1917, makes the following observations:—We have nothing to do with the reason why the British Socialist Party gave expression to such an opinion or arrived at such a decision, viz., that Mesopotamia should be handed over to the Turks and the colonies to Germany.

The question is whether this is not expressing sympathy with the Turks and the Germans and whether the British Socialist Party has not thus declared sympathy with the King's enemies. If the answer to this question is in the negative, we do not know how the offence of the internees is more serious and what opinion worse than this they could have expressed. If the answer is in the affirmative the question will arise, as to why the British Socialist Party was not interned in England on a charge of having declared sympathy with the Turks and the Germans, and whether the Defence of the Realm of England Act is not in force? We know that such an Act does exist in England, but the difference is that here more reliance is placed on the reports of the C.I.D. Police, while in England investigations are open and have none of this secret character.

Can it be said that the British Socialist Party did not show sympathy with the Turks and the Germans, but simply gave expression to their idea? We are unable to understand the reasoning which distinguishes between sympathy and opinion. The hint of the Daily Telegraph correspondent discloses the fact that this party has made such a statement which might have been made by the Turks or the Germans themselves, yet those persons are free and have not been punished by the authorities. It is difficult to realise how Muhammad Ali and Shoukat Ali would have been dealt with, if such an opinion had been spoken or written by them.

We regret to find that the Government of India have transformed the simple and innocuous word "sympathy" in something dreadful and horrible. There is marked difference between sympathy and assistance, and we admit that rendering aid or giving comfort to the King's enemies is undoubtedly a crime and to be sympathetic to the point of rendering assistance is a sin. But simple sympathy, which is the outcome of religious, patriotic and fraternal favour, cannot legally be defined as an offence. Have the British no sympathy with the Germans as fellow-creatures? Recently Mr. Lloyd George declared and previous to this Mr. Asquith assured us that they have no quarrel with the German people but that they are inimically disposed towards their militarism. Cannot the Muhammadans in a similar way express that they do not entertain any sympathy with the Turkish Empire but feel for them as co-religionists?

106. The Qaumi Report, of the 20th October, referring to Mr. Montagu's reply in Parliament regarding the Muhammadan internees, observes:—From the discussion it appears that the Secretary of State for India has no knowledge of the aspirations of seven crores of Muhammadans, and he cannot express anything more than what the official reports contain. It is incumbent now on Muhammadans to convene meetings everywhere and to draw Mr. Montagu's special attention to the fact with a view to his forthwith calling for all the papers connected with the Muhammadan internees as he has already done in the case of Mrs. Besant.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Oct. 20th, 1917.

A discussion in Parliament regarding the Muhammadan internees.

107. The Qaumi Report, of the 21st October, in a leader on the marginally-noted subject, writes:—Mr. Montagu announced in Parliament that Mrs. Besant was released for two reasons, first, some influential persons assured the Viceroy that after her release she would not adopt violent methods; second, India at present needs a calm and tranquil atmosphere to enable Mr. Montagu to discuss reforms satisfactorily.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Oct. 21st, 1917.

The Secretary of State for India and the Mussalmans.

The editor asks, "Is not a calm atmosphere required for the Mussalmans? Does it mean that the Mussalmans have not been the cause of any agitation or the authors of criticisms against the authorities in order to obtain the release of Mussalman detenus? If this is the secret of our despair and defeat, viz, that we have not agitated after the manner of the supporters of Mrs. Besant there is no reason why we should not agitate. Although the method may be a disagreeable one still when this is the only source of influencing Mr. Montagu willy nilly we must act on the philosophy of the poet:—

"Urfi! if weeping but secure us union
"We can weep in hope for a century".

The editor proceeds to observe that Mr. Montagu's reply has changed the complexion of the affair.

We should now sternly demand of him why such improper treatment has been meted out to Mussalman detenus.

The editor contrasts the treatment extended to Mrs. Besant and that shown to the Mussalman internees and says, "Lord Pentland came down from the Nilgiris to Madras and asked Mrs. Besant to desist from having recourse to violent methods, but nothing of the kind has been done in the case of the Mussalman detenus in whose affair the report of an ordinary Police officer has been relied upon."

The editor asks whether there is one law for Mrs. Besant and another for Muhammad Ali, or whether it is a question of colour or agitation?

108. The Qaumi Report, of the 22nd October, has a leader on the marginally-noted subject which is briefly to this effect:—In reply to the Hon'ble Saiyed Ali Raza, the Government of the United Provinces said: "Moulana Mahmud-ul-Hasan Sahib is now a prisoner of war at Malta as it has been proved against him that he had assisted the enemies of His Majesty in their military plans. Mussalmans will probably find much difficulty in understanding what military skill Moulavi Mahmud Hasan, a teacher of ancient logic and also the lawful and the unlawful, could possess, or what examination he could have passed at Farangi Mahal or Dooband. Possibly the German Missionaries, who came to India to dispel the darkness of ignorance from this country, were in reality German warriors. There is no doubt that most of the European Missionaries are capable of taking an active part in devising military plans. But this is the first time in India when a school Mulla has been arrested on such a charge. What connection has a pedagogue with military plans? But unfortunately war with the Turks has placed a convenient snare in the hands of the Criminal Investigation Department. By this means they entrap any one they like. What does the Government

Qaumi Report, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

"Moulana Mahmud Hasan Muhaddis."

know of the doings of the Criminal Investigation Department? The Mussalmans should, however, zealously, deliberately and calmly take the matter up, and investigate this atmosphere of suspicion that has enveloped us. A couple of questions at meetings are not sufficient. The attention of His Excellency the Viceroy should be invited to the case of all the Mussalman detenus in order to remove all such suspicions and doubts.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

A review of the Fukhri's appeal.

109. The Qaumi Report, of the 22nd October, in reviewing "Fukhri's Appeal", an anti-Home Rule pamphlet, makes the following observation. It is a mistake to say that only the Hindus are the originators of Congress. A European, the late Mr. Hume, was its founder (see the history of the Congress, page 206) and some Mussalmans as well had something to do with its foundation.

Moulavi Fukhri has erred in saying that Mussalmans have been against the Congress and even ninety-nine per cent of them are so. The Congress was initiated by some Mussalmans and their number has been increasing gradually.

If Moulavi Fukhri means that common Mussalmans have been its antagonists, in fairness it must be said that such Mussalmans have been against Sir Saiyed's Educational Conference and even opposed to English education. It is true Sir Saiyed was opposed to the Congress, but his opposition was not due to the fact that Hindus were its originators or that their ideas were absurd. Sir Saiyed was under the impression that Mussalmans were backward in English education, and consequently if the Government wished to give high appointments to Mussalmans, there was not a single Muhammadan fit to perform the duties of a High Court Judge or of a District officer. Before referring to the antagonism of Sir Saiyed to the Congress the condition of that period should be taken into consideration. (To be continued to-morrow.)

The Diwanship of Mysore.

110. Referring to the rumours that were afloat of late that Sir M. Visvesvarayya would retire from the Diwanship of Mysore soon, the Hindu Nesan, of the 20th October, welcomes the news published by the Mysore Patriot that there is no foundation for such rumours and that Sir M. Visvesvarayya would continue as Diwan until the various useful schemes promulgated by him bear fruit, as his retirement at this juncture and replacement by a new Diwan may frustrate the full accomplishment of the wise policy begun by him.

1. The following appears in the Hindu of the 30th October:—"The inability of the European members of the Indian Civil Service to understand the feelings of the people and perceive their point of view is notorious. It is illustrated in a pointed manner by the judgment of Mr. T. Austin, Sub-Divisional Magistrate in Ramnad. in a case under section 334, Indian Penal Code, in which he held that beating with a shoe is not an act of which a person of ordinary sense and temper should complain. This remarkable dictum bears eloquent testimony to the want of ordinary common sense and sense of propriety on the part of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, and shows such a callousness to indignity where the affected person is of this country that it cannot but evoke a feeling of resentment. . Could Mr. Austin, we ask, be so ignorant of the fact that beating with the shoe is deemed in India—whatever it may be elsewhere—a most revolting indignity to which a person could be put? The enormity of the offence does not lie so much in the amount of the injury caused, but in the use of the shoe for the purpose of beating. Such an act is held to be degrading and humiliating to a degree and that Mr. Austin should be ignorant of this is indicative of a gross disregard of the spirit and feelings of the people of this country."

2. Writing under the heading "Right of Way", Justice, of the 1st November, states:—"Right of way for all classes of His Majesty's subjects along roads maintained out of public funds has always been a very much discussed subject, at least in the district of Malabar. The condemnation of certain classes of people as not only untouchable but unapproachable by the superior castes has been a prominent feature of pre-British days. Even after the advent of the British this pernicious system has continued to flourish. . . The Talli road in Calicut is a case in point. . . We should like to know under what authority the Collector of the district has caused a notice to be put up restricting the use of this public road to certain classes of people only. . . At a time when the superior Brahman is waxing eloquent over the unity and equality of castes in India and is urging this as an argument in favour of granting Home Rule to India, the Talli road comes as an unpleasant reminder that the days of Varnashramadharma are not over yet. . . The Talli road is a permanent memorial to the existence of caste tyranny and class exclusiveness. The leopard cannot change its spots, the Ethiopian cannot change his skin and the Brahman cannot shed his caste exclusiveness; but the British Government in this country are here to hold the scales even, and what we should like to know is whether the action of the Collector of Malabar has the sanction of the Madras Government. We want to know whether Lord Pentland personally had anything to do with the recent notice in connection with the use of the Talli road as a public highway. If the Madras Government had no hand in the matter it is about time that they investigated the matter and overruled the action of the Collector. If on the contrary the action of the Collector was done with the consent of the Madras Government or at their instigation, no condemnation will be too severe for the action of the Madras Government."

3. The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 24th October, writes:—"One reason which Mr. Montagu gave for Mrs. Besant's internment was that she conducted a particular agitation and advocated in a particular way her policy during a time when there was no alternative policy in the field. That is about the most surprising statement which we have ever heard made in Parliament by a responsible British statesman. . . Does Mr. Montagu mean that it is open to anybody to foment and carry on a mischievous agitation for the reason that the Government did not shout from the house-tops what their policy was in governing India. It is a dangerous doctrine and the enunciation of it by no less an authority than the Secretary of State from his place in Parliament will be a direct invitation to all the wild elements in India to consider themselves rivals to British Power whenever they imagine that the Government have not forestalled them with a declaration of policy".

Mrs. Besant's release.

Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, Oct. 24th, 1917.

Cochin Argus, British Cochin, Oct. 27th, 1917.

Writing on this subject, the Cochin Argus, for the week ending 27th October, says:—"From the telegraphic summary of the recent discussion in the House of Commons regarding the release of Mrs. Besant and her associates, and from the editorial comments of the leading Home papers, we are afraid there is good reason to believe that 'the fat is in the fire,' and that far-reaching are to be the consequences of the hasty and ill-considered action of the authorities (it is difficult to say who these are) in cancelling the internment order of the Madras Government . . Mr. Montagu's defence in the House was of the most miserable description, and he added to the desperation of his own case by endeavouring to escape criticism with a most palpable quibble. If there is one thing the House of Commons will not do it is that it will not allow itself to be fooled, and Mr. Montagu will live to see (and we have no desire to set ourselves up as prophets) that his so-called explanation will return with boomerang effect and render it impossible for him to occupy for long the high position that he does. . . Even granting that there was no policy, 'alternative' or otherwise, in all this, was it justification for Mrs. Besant's infamous campaign (Mr. Montagu's sweet and gentle policy) of vilification and detraction of everything English in India, not a day passing without the Government, Supreme and Local, being held up to ridicule. If further the absence of an alternative policy justified Mrs. Besant's internment, and the introduction of an alternative policy, her release, surely Mr. Montagu is to blame in the matter. It is difficult though to deal with such political drivel seriously, and one can only hope that Mr. Montagu was led into making such a sorry exhibition of himself by not having read some at least of Mrs. Besant's effusions. A peaceable, peaceful man himself, with a large heart ready to tear itself with sympathy for all and sundry, he probably looked upon Mrs. Besant as a sucking dove of peace herself. The irony of the whole matter however is that the much prayed for political calm will not be found to exist when the visit to India takes place, for the Muhammadan internees have not been released as yet, and Mrs. Besant, though 'co-operating' so graciously with the Viceroy, is herself agitating in the matter."

Justice, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

Justice, of the 30th October, observes:—"We always thought that the official mind was inscrutable. After reading Lord Curzon's speech or such portions of it as Reuter has been pleased to telegraph out to India, the inscrutability of the official mind appears to us to be still greater. . . The Viceroy is the embodiment of everything that is inscrutable in officialdom. Lord Chelmsford in his reply to the Press Deputation indulged in some plain speaking about the political activities of Mrs. Besant. After that speech innocent non-officials thought that the same Viceroy could not have been instrumental in releasing Mrs. Besant unconditionally, and when the Secretary of State announced that he 'suggested' to the Viceroy the desirability of releasing Mrs. Besant non-officials again thought that the suggestion was a political rather than a hypnotic one. And now the non-officials are told that the Viceroy acted on his own responsibility. This reminds us of the story of a school boy who was asked to explain what responsibility meant. The school boy said, 'I have only two buttons to my trousers and if one of them were to drop off the whole responsibility would rest on the other'. We thought at first that the responsibility rested on the Secretary of State who suggested and the Viceroy who received the suggestion. It now appears that one of the two buttons has dropped off, and the whole responsibility rests on the other button. But what the non-officials want to know is by what process of celebration these changes in the official mind are brought about. We are told now that the Madras Government have loyally accepted the decision of the Government of India with regard to the release of Mrs. Besant. Perhaps they have. But we are informed that when they acted on the decision of the Government of India they did it very much like a small boy swallowing castor oil. Of course the small boy loyally accepts the decision of his mother that he should take castor oil. But all the same it leaves a nasty taste in the mouth."

The Government and the Panchama meeting at Madras.

4. United India and Native States, for the week ending 25th October, states:—"It is not easy to condemn in measured language the utterly irresponsible conduct of those non-Panchama politicians who made themselves so odiously prominent at the Panchama meeting at the Spur Tank in Madras . . These non-Brahmana advocates of hooliganism made use of the Panchama meeting for stimulating the worst side of the mob nature and harangued them to deeds of violence. That men connected with politics and journalism should so far demean themselves in open day light, as though they had lost their reason beyond control and were addressing a drunken mob shows the low level to which they are prepared to bring down Indian politics. We must call a halt to degradation of this kind, and we have no hesitation in calling upon the Government of Madras to arrest in time this process of counselling breaches of public peace and order. The impression has gained ground that the Madras Government has not been as impartial as it ought to have been in taking serious notice of a campaign of vile abuse of a section of His Majesty's subjects in season and out of season for no other fault than that their opinions do not carry weight with their detractors. . . If the Government should continue to take no notice of this campaign of personal abuse by three or four self-styled non-Brahmana leaders, the feeling of all sections of the population, irrespective of caste and religion, will become one of painful disgust with a situation that would seem to call for a change in the personnel of the Madras Government. We warn His Excellency in Council of the unwisdom of ignoring forces of disorder at their incipient stage; we make the appeal to His Excellency personally as we believe his councillors and some of his subordinates have failed to rise to a proper sense of appreciation of the gravity of caste antagonisms in India."

Justice, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

The Gōdāvari District Non-Brahman Conference.

5. Justice, of the 30th October, writes:—"The success of the First Gōdāvari District non Brahman Conference has transcended all expectations. Never before was such a vast and representative gathering of enlightened non-Brahmans so deeply interested in their future political progress held anywhere in this Presidency. . . No spectacle could have been dearer and more welcome to the hearts of those who for the past several months have been labouring hard in the face of vile calumny and dark intrigue for the uplift of the non-Brahmans of this Presidency by endeavouring to organise them and unite them all on a common basis and by a common tie of mutual interest and common loyalty to the same Government. . . The time for halting between two opinions is gone, and the time for action is come. Yes, the non-Brahman communities of this Presidency have been roused to a sense of their own position, and in organising themselves to promote their social and political interests, they are also strengthening the authority of the Government which has been their saviour and to which they look up for active help and enlightened guidance in the future. . . It is no wonder that in proportion to the success of this Conference is the chagrin and bitterness of the Home Ruler. His stock-in-trade has been vituperation and calumny, and he has made use of both on the present occasion, apparently for his own consolation. New India, for instance, falls foul of the President of the Gōdāvari Conference, the Kumara Raja of Challapalle. The Kumara Raja can well afford to treat with contempt the mumblings of a disappointod old agitator, who deluded herself with the hope that she could feed the non-Brahmans too on emotional rhetoric. But the non-Brahman belongs to a sturdy stock. He has a stake in the land and knows what he is about. New India uses such choice expressions as 'silly', 'mischievous,' 'senseless' and vocabulary of that description to characterise the address delivered by the Kumara Raja of Challapalli. Perhaps our contemporary has yet to learn that no case can be won by methods of this kind. What is it that is silly and mischievous? 'This aristocrat', says the critic who mistakes abuse for argument, 'has repeated the senseless accusation that Home Rulers are now demanding complete Home Rule'. But they are asking for the reforms embodied in the Congress League scheme. What is the Congress League scheme? Does it not propose to take the power away from the British Government and place it in the hands of a few elected members of the Legislative Councils? . . . No doubt the Home Ruler would let alone the army, the navy, etc. But that is not particularly complimentary to the Home Ruler. He wants to exercise all the power and patronage in the land, only the British people must protect him from external aggression and from also the internal fomentor of trouble. That shows the stuff of which the Home Ruler is made. But where is the senseless accusation in all this? The senselessness is all in the ignoramus who imagines that sensible people can be deluded by froth and fury. . . What is the use of arguing with an old Irish woman and her obsequious Indian followers who have yet to show that they understand the problem of Government on its practical side."

New India, Madras, Oct. 31st, 1917.

Mrs. Besant's methods.

6. In replying to the criticisms of Lord Islington and the Anglo-Indian Press on Mrs. Besant's methods of agitation, New India, of the 31st October, remarks:—"We do not wish to discuss a topic on which the Government wisely wants to see the curtain drop, and we are eager to co-operate towards that end, but in fairness to Mrs. Besant it must be pointed out that her 'violent' or 'wrong methods' have never been proven, and the very fact that she is released unconditionally clearly shows the truth underlying that story. Mrs. Besant's methods are the same today as they have been in the past; if she is not attacking the Government directly, it is because the Government have come to her point of view and are anxious to discuss calmly the problem of Home Rule for India. The Government of India, thanks to the aid given by Mr. Montagu, has seen the path along which they should proceed and have abandoned their former policy of 'no politics' and 'crushing Home Rule,' and hence all nationalists, including Mrs. Besant, are eager to co-operate with the Government."

The British Resident in Mysore.

7. The Karnataka, of the 31st October, writes:—"It is a matter to be noted that the Hon'ble Mr. H. V. Cobb, our British Resident, was not present at the opening of the representative assembly proceedings on Friday last. That is the one opportunity in the year for the representative of the Paramount Power to come face to face with the real representatives of the State; and the previous Residents in Mysore were careful never to lose that opportunity. If the Resident be—like Sir Hugh Daly—a man known for his nobility of disposition and sympathetic attitude, the popular representatives would specially value his presence; and the sight of his genial personality would remind them of the friendship and helpfulness that they can always look for at the hands of the power that is behind him. If, for any reason whatever, the Hon'ble Mr. Cobb was obliged to absent himself from the assembly on its opening day, we feel that a letter of sympathy and greetings from him would have been valued very highly. And we still hope he may be able to attend the assembly some other day before the session closes. The question is simply one of grace and courtesy; but we think that even these unsubstantial and more or less conventional amenities go a long way towards strengthening the Indo-British compact."

In attributing the fall of Riga mainly to the want of union among the Russians, the Dravidabhimani, of the 26th October, expresses almost the same sentiments as those expressed on this subject by the Swadesamitran of the 22nd idem, and abstracted in paragraph 10 of Report No. 43 of 1917.

Referring to a telegram received on the 27th October 1917 that the Russian fleet is in complete readiness guarding the entrance of the Gulf of Finland with a view to safeguard Petrograd, which is on the coast of the gulf, the Swadesamitran, of the same date, reports the escape of the portion of the Russian fleet which got cornered in the Gulf of Riga and appreciates the fact with which the Russian Commander managed to get out of the gulf thereby frustrating the object of the enemy fleet which was several times stronger than the fleet under him.

10. Adverting to the information said to have been received that a Bill to grant elective franchise to the Indians in Columbia, which is now under consideration in the Canadian Parliament, is likely to be passed into an Act, the Swadesabhandhu, for September, writes:—This is a right which should have already been conferred on the Indians. We trust that the Canadian Government, who have come forward to confer this right now, will also remove the other difficulties the Indians there are labouring under. They should repeal the executive order, which prohibits Indians from taking their families there. If similar measures are adopted in South Africa, Australia and other places also, the statement that the war has widened the angle of vision of the British Empire may be said to be true.

11. Referring to a large tract of country available for colonization in the northern part of Australia which is now said to be very thinly peopled, the Lokopakari, of the 29th October, says:—If the Indians are permitted to settle themselves in this part of Australia, they can prosper well, but the Europeans will not agree to it. Telegrams inform us that the islands of Oesel, Dago and Moon fell into the hands of the Germans. Though this news is depressing, today's telegrams have dispersed the fear that the Russian Navy in the Gulf of Riga may fall into the hands of the Germans. The safety at Petrograd and the independence of Russia depend on the skill which Russia is now to manifest. If Russia wills, she can put an end to the German offensive. 14. The Desabhimani, of the 20th October, takes exception to the recent circular of the Board of Emigration in South Africa regarding the proposal to levy a tax of 9*d*. per head of Indian labourers employed by non-Indians, and observes that it is the duty of all Indians to take steps for nipping in the bud such efforts on the part of the authorities in South Africa which are injurious to the interests of the Indians in the Colony.

II.—HOME ADMINISTRATION.

(b) Courts.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 27th, 1917.

A District Munsif's Court for Devakottai.

15. A correspondent writes to the Swadesamitran, of the 27th October, as follows:—The residents of Devakottai and other Chetties in the neighbouring places have to go to Paramagudi which is at a distance of about 40 miles or to Sivaganga at a distance of about 30 miles from Devakottai, if they have to institute civil suits. An individual who has to appear as a witness in a small cause suit in any of these places has to spend from Rs. 7 to Rs. 10. Apart from these difficulties, there are only four courts even in these places, one at Paramagudi, one at Manamadura and two at Sivaganga. It is hoped that the Government will realise the hardship of the people, and arrange to locate in Devakottai the Additional Munsif's Court which is now at Sivaganga.

INDIAN LAW GAZETTE, Madras, September 1917.

Village courts.

16. Adverting to the report on the working of the village courts in this Presidency during the year 1916 and especially to the fact that the number of cases filed in the ordinary civil courts and in the courts of village munsifs during the year is much smaller than that for the year 1915, the Indian Law Gazette, of the September, writes:—Many cases which ought to have been filed in village courts have been filed in and disposed of by District Munsif's Courts. If this practice is to be stopped, the establishment of village panchayats is necessary. The rules of nomination should also be modified so as to provide for the selection of competent persons for the post of village munsif. The Collector of Vizagapatam suggests that arrangements should be made for the village munsifs attending for some time the Courts of District Munsifs and learning their work; and the District Judge too is of opinion that provision should be made for the village munsifs being present at the Courts of District Munsifs on the days on which small cause suits are tried and disposed of so that these village munsifs may learn the procedure followed in the conduct and disposal of such cases. If this suggestion is accepted and given effect to, the work of the village munsif is bound to improve, and competent persons in villages would desire to become members of the village panchayat, which will then grow in prestige.

Education in England and India.

17. The Vivekachintamani, for October, summarises the proposals of Mr. Fisher in the New Education Bill now before Parliament under ten headings and observes as follows in English:—This is as true of India as of England. Will the Government provide the same facilities for "the education of the poor" people in this country and come forward to make the necessary sacrifice?

The same journal repeats this observation in its Tamil columns and adds—If the Government of India do not provide the same facilities for the education of the children of the poor people here as are sought to be provided in England, they will be guilty of partiality, which cannot do credit to a good Government. At present the Indians have no voice at all in this matter. Even in Mysore arrangements have been made to give education to all boys and even girls.

The improvement of rural education in India.

19. Adverting to the repeal, by the Government of Bombay, of their order prohibiting Law College students from attending Home Rule meetings, the Vaisyamitran, of the 15th October, echoes almost the same sentiments as those of the Lokopakari of the same date, abstracted in paragraph 11 of Report No. 42 of 1917.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakottai, Oct. 15th, 1917.

This paper also publishes in Tamil an abstract of the proceedings of a public meeting held at Salem under the presidency of the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Education in India.

21. Giving in Tamil an extract from the speech recently delivered at York by Doctor Fisher of the Educational Department in England, in which he is reported to have referred with regret to the unhealthy condition and the ignorance of a large number of children in Great Britain and observed, as a remedy for this, that education should be made compulsory in the case of children up to their fourteenth year, and that after this age these should be compelled to prosecute their studies for a specified period every year up to their eighteenth year, the Swadesamitran, of the 26th October, remarks as follows:—When even in Great Britain, where primary education is free and compulsory, a large number of children become useless, what are we to say of the condition of India where primary education is neither free nor compulsory and the facilities afforded for education are but meagre?

22. Adverting to a petition said to have been submitted to the Secretary of State for India by certain women interested in the progress of female education in India requesting him to receive a deputation of ladies during his visit to this country, the Hindu Nesan, of the 26th October, trusts that the Secretary of State would not let lose the opportunity, but grant the prayer of the Indian ladies, who desire to speak to him on the subject of improving the education of women here.

Students and civics.

23. The Swadesamitran, of the 26th October, publishes the proceedings of the anniversary of the "Vacation Club", Conjeeveram, celebrated on the 24th idem, when Mr. A. Rangaswami Ayyangar, the editor of this paper, is reported to have addressed the audience on this subject, in the course of which the following observations occur:—The Educational authorities are bound to impress on the minds of the students the various political rights and duties they have to exercise and discharge when they come of age, in respect of their country and their rulers. The Educational authorities in England have realised this duty rightly and are considering measures for the discharge of the same. Changes like this are taking place every day throughout the world, and in the newspapers particulars of these are published daily. Will it be wrong on the part of students, who learn these facts from the papers, to pay attention to such political matters? Is the order just, which has been issued to prohibit students from taking part in politics, with the view that we alone should be where we are, when the whole world is progressing? The authorities should take upon themselves the responsibility of giving students a political training, and teach them in their schools their duties and rights and how these are to be discharged or examined and the ancient histories of foreign countries which have come to an eminent position after a very hard struggle for freedom. It is because the present Educational authorities have not paid proper attention to these things, that doubts and difficulties often arise. Can books written by such persons as Sir Lee Warner serve this purpose?

Education of certain communities in Malabar.

24. Anent the request of the Nambudiri, Tiya and Mappilla communities of Malabar in the addresses presented by them to His Excellency the Governor of Madras during his recent visit to that district, to provide the necessary facilities for their education, the Dravidan, of the 26th October, trusts that the Government will evince sympathy with the Tiyas by encouraging them with grant of concessions in the matter of school fees and observes:—It will be good on the part of the Government to afford the necessary facilities for the spread of education among these communities and especially among the Tiyas and the Mappillas. But they should be made to receive their education only in schools which are useful for, and common to all classes of people; and it will not be proper for the Government to establish a school separately for each community.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Sep. 27th, 1917.

Commercial education.

25. In the course of a long article dwelling on the importance of commercial education and its neglect in India, the Vartakamitran, of the 27th September, observes:—No reform seems to have been introduced in India since 1850 in the matter of trade. Commercial schools were established in India for the first time in the year 1885. What have the Government done in this matter ever since? From the statistics which may be gathered to denote the condition of commercial education in this country, we find that on an average one in every 615 in Germany, one in every 1,200 in Japan and one in every 313,000 in India attend commercial schools. In the quinquennial report published in 1912 by the Government of India, it is stated that in the existing commercial schools education in commerce is not imparted in the way in which it ought to be. No other testimony is, therefore, needed to the statement that in India the Government are not taking any steps on the right lines in the matter of commercial education. Nothing can be more strange than the fact that the condition has been the same for the last fifty years in India, while every other country in the world is striving to progress at this crisis by means of its industries and trade. To say that the Government are not aware of the necessity for the spread of commercial education among the people is not right. The English first came to India for purposes of trade and it was the intention of the East India Company to impede the progress of industries in India and develop their own trade Though since 1857, India has been under the direct control of the British Government, it cannot be gainsaid that, on account of the loud cry raised by the English merchants from time to time, the Government could not adopt proper measures in this direction. The so-called commercial education that is imparted at present in India qualifies persons only for the posts of clerks and accountants and does not meet the requirements of merchants. Hence it is that business men are not willing to go in for this education. In the first place, there are not schools in India which can give instruction in subjects which are actually required by the commercial classes; nor are there competent teachers to give such instruction. Secondly, no schools exist in India where foreign languages other than English are compulsorily taught. The opinion of the English Government is that a knowledge of English will do. The entertainment of such an opinion in respect of India alone is not proper, while a study of the foreign languages is made compulsory even in the schools of England which give general education. Thirdly, there is the want of commercial enterprise in India. It is the duty of the Government to educate the people. To say that the people are not desirous of acquiring education is not right. The Government are bound to promote education among the people even as the head of a family is bound to improve the education of the members thereof. Therefore, the Government should establish commercial schools in different places and take the necessary steps for encouraging commercial enterprise among the people.

Trained teachers.

26. Referring to rule 140 of the Madras Educational Rules and to a notification, which is said to have appeared in a recent issue of the Gazette, under which trained teachers, who originally failed in the Matriculation Examination but subsequently come out successful in the School Final Examination under the concession granted to them to appear for this examination in private, are required to undergo further training in the higher grade, if they should teach classes of a higher grade, the Vaisyamitran, of the 22nd October, trusts that, even though it should be found necessary to give effect to the rule contained in this notification, the Government would exempt from its operation at least such of the trained teachers as came out successful in the recent School Final Examination.

27. The Vaisyamitran, of the 22nd October, reproduces from the Swadesamitran, of the 15th idem, the substance of an address by Mr V. P. Madhava Rao delivered before the Town Students' Literary Union, Madura, and referred to in paragraph 13 of Report No. 42 of 1917.

The water in the drains will be flowing on the roads. The drains are all closed up. The Corporation has not taken sufficient interest to afford relief to the people here. The Municipal Commissioner for Royapetta division has brought this to the notice of the Corporation without effect.

30. Referring to the report of the Gōdāvari District Board, the Andhrapatrika, of the 30th October, remarks :—. . . The taluk board have not devoted money freely to sanitation. Their explanation also for this is not satisfactory. . . The roads in charge of the District Board are not in a satisfactory condition. It is very regrettable. It is plain that the district board made no attempts towards the improvement of education or sanitation. No attempts seem to have been made to put down fevers. We regret to write that the administration of the district board is not satisfactory in any way. A European Collector of the district was the president of the district board. We hope for improvement at least under a non-official president.

(g) Forests.

31. The ryots of Tandarampattu write to the Swadesamitran of the 27th October as follows:—The fee levied for the issue of permits to cattle grazing in the Tiruvannāmalai Forest Range of the Tiruvannāmalai taluk, North Arcot district, has been enhanced and the charge for a cart-load of leaves removed from the forest has also been raised from As. 5, which was the rate two or three years back, to Rs. 1½, while, in the other ranges of this taluk, the rate continues to be the same as that of last year. The refusal of the ryots to undertake the responsibility of protecting the forest is given as one of the reasons for this enhancement in the District Forest Gazette. We do not know how far this is true. Nobody ever asked us either in person or in writing to manage the Tandarampattu forest by means of a panchayat. We do not understand the reason why all villages should be made to suffer thus for the act of a few villages which have declined to do as required by the Government. Our petitions on this subject to the District Forest officer and the Revenue Board have been of no avail. We do not see how we have wronged the benign Government. Some ryots, out of ignorance, attribute these acts of the authorities to their desire to secure adequate funds for the war. The grievances of the ryots in this matter are really indescribable.

CATHOLIC FAMILY INSTRUCTOR, Trichinopoly, Sep. & Oct 1917.

32. The Catholic Family Instructor, for September and October, is surprised at a few educated Indians dinning the Government with a demand for Home Rule at a time when the whole world is feeling the cruel effects of the war, and remarking that the majority of the people in this country do not know what is meant by Home Rule and referring to the various distinctions of caste and creed existing in this country, the way in which the lower classes are treated by the higher and the difference of opinion between the Hindus and the Muhammadans and again between the Brahmans and the non-Brahmans, concludes that Home Rule can never be possible in India unless the three following conditions which exist in the Colonies also prevail in India, viz.—

Home Rule for India.

(1) More than three-fourths of the people of the country should belong to the same caste or class.

(2) It should have its own army and navy.

(3) There should be sufficient facilities for its improvement in trade and industries.

MESSENGER OF THE SACRED HEART, Trichinoply, October 1917.

The Messenger of the Sacred Heart, for October, says:—There are many among the Hindus who clamour for Home Rule, with the object of creating any number of divisions in this country. For these, who rely upon the doctrine of karma, every method is sound, be it good or bad. They have no fear of God or conscience. There are many among them who venture to think that any offence may be committed secretly with impunity for the purpose of attaining Home Rule, and this has been amply proved by incidents in Bengal in the north and Tinnevelly in the south. But the Christians have a fear of God and a conscience. If they try to acquire Home Rule according to the rules of the country and their religion, no one can accuse them. But we cannot approve of the advice of the Hon'ble Mr. Das, C.I.E., a Christian, to his brethren to raise as loud a cry for Home Rule as the Hindus.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 22nd, 1917.

Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd October, publishes a Telugu version of the letter written by an English correspondent to the Sunday Times of the 2nd September, on this subject recommending that the Indians should be treated with such liberality as has been shown to the Colonies and that the former should be trusted and be given political powers.

India and Home Rule.

SATYAVADI, Mysore, Oct. 30th, 1917.

In an article under the heading "Are you a Home Ruler? the Satyavadi, of the 30th October, writes:—The following is a glaring instance of injustice. You will hardly believe it to be true. A student of the Madanapalle National College went to the Madras Eye Infirmary for treatment. The medical officer in charge asked him whether he was a Home Ruler. Confirming his inference from the paper relating to him he said he was. Then the doctor said: "There is no room for Home Rulers here." It is not easy to understand that medical institutions too are at present saturated with strong political bias and intrigue, but the Madras anti-Home Rule party in Madras seems to have grown so strong as not to tolerate even educational institutions established by the people themselves for their own benefit. It behoves the people to consider the matter. If incidents of this kind should multiply, we had better give up all talk about cruelty. If Lord Pentland should think over the incident calmly, he would be sure to exclaim "save me from my friends!"

Home Rule.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 25th, 1917.

33. The Swadesamitran, of the 25th October, writes:—As was observed by Mrs. Besant at the Gokhale Hall last Tuesday we have now been landed in a big struggle. Our people have understood our ideal and have come forward to support it, and the Government, too, have admitted that our ideal agrees with theirs and are sending Mr. Montagu here to consult us and ascertain our proposals to achieve this ideal. We have been successful thus far. But, if our high ideal is to be attained, we have to do important work only hereafter. Our enemies have just now realised the situation and are standing out ready for a combat. Without being ruffled by their cry, we should ascertain the extent of their strength. If the British public are against us, we can presume that our enemy is very strong. But a telegram received from Scotland today shows that the British public are with us. Some manufacturers in England, living upon their trade with India, may try to prevent our attaining our ideal, for fear that, in a free India, they may lose the special facilities they now enjoy and the European merchants in India may also be against us on the same ground. Though even these merchants concede outwardly that India should have Home Rule and should progress gradually, they say that this is not the proper time to discuss about the reforms to be introduced. But it is a postponement of the consideration of reforms that led to the Sien Fien riots in Ireland, and the question of granting Home Rule to her is now under contemplation. When every other country in the world is pondering over this very question at this very moment, why cannot India alone do it? Mr. Thonger, who presided at the recent meeting of the European Association here, said that it was the duty of the Europeans to guard the interests of the submerged classes. How have they till now discharged this duty? Mr. Thonger's speech clearly shows that the ire of the Europeans has been provoked by the Secretary of State listening to the words of the Indian leaders. They used till now to prevent this by means of the Anglo-Indians in the India Council. But the present Prime Minister and Secretary of State are not guided by this Council, and this is regretted by the Europeans. One argument adduced by them for opposing the fulfilment of our aspirations is that their interests have to be safeguarded. But how will their interests be jeoparadised? They will have all the privileges enjoyed by the other subjects and they may have to lose only a few special facilities enjoyed by them. When they began to do business in India investing their money here, did they enter into any agreement with the Government that the Indians should never be given any powers of administration? When they concede that the ideal of the British Government should be to grant Home Rule to India, we cannot understand their objection to a policy which will help the accomplishment of that ideal. At the meeting of the European Association referred to above, one gentleman said that we wanted to have power in our hands. He is quite correct. We want only power. We have had a sufficient taste of reforms which give us no power and what we now demand is only power. The proceedings of the Anglo-Indian meeting recently held at Allahabad show that they are a little moderate in their proposals. They do not raise a wholesale cry against the reforms, but only protest against the Executive Councils, being subjected to the control of Legislative Councils. Therefore they certainly approve of the popular representatives being in the majority in the Legislative Councils. This is one step in advance gained by us. We can settle the constitution of the Executive Councils with the Secretary of State. There is one point now to be noted by us. Anglo-Indians like the editor of the Madras Mail are claiming that they are essential for safeguarding the interests of the poorer classes. We should demonstrate the falsity of this claim to the Secretary of State. The petition suggested by Mr. Gandhi should be a monster one, in order to prove to Mr. Montagu that even the poor people in the village and others support us. Then he will himself understand that it is not the English merchants that protect the poor.

The present situation.

The state of India.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 25th October, says:—Devotion to duty has declined in the Indians, who have become dependent. They have neither self-confidence nor the spirit of enterprise. They have settled down into the belief that success and failure depend upon chance. In the present age, devotion to duty and enterprise are necessary for the advancement of the Indians. The condition of the country is unbearable. Industries and commerce have declined. The Departments of the Government are controlled by arbitrary authority. The British have now assumed a new attitude towards India. The Secretary of State for India is to come to India to see her political situation. New ideals have sprouted up in the minds of the Indians.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 26th, 1917.

The Anglo-Indian agitation.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 26th October, refers to the proceedings of the last meeting of the European Association here, in which a resolution is said to have been passed condemning the speech of Mr. Montagu in Parliament on the 16th idem, and writes:—The Secretary of State for India is now being hit from different directions. The Anglo-Indian papers assail him on one side and the European Associations on another. Men like Lord Sydenham have a sling at him even from England. Mr. Montagu has to withstand all this. When this is the lot of the Secretary of State for India, there is nothing strange in the Indian leaders and the public, who desire for Home Rule and reforms for India, being condemned. The attempt of the local European Association to thrust the full responsibility for the release of Mrs. Besant and others on Mr. Montagu in the face of his plain statement that the whole burden for it is on the Government of India, cannot be approved by any one. It is easy to pass a resolution, but, before doing so, one should see whether there are sufficient reasons for passing it. Judged from this point the resolution passed by the European Association is a baseless one. The Government of India confided in the future conduct of Mrs. Besant when they released her and nothing has happened since to mar that confidence, as Mrs. Besant has kept her word of co-operating to secure peace and quietude in India. There is no trace of an anarchical feeling in the country. So there is no use of the European Association falling foul of the Secretary of State. The policy announced by Mr. Montagu, as far as India is concerned, is not one which he is trying to force upon the Government of India as his own, but one adopted by the British Government, i.e., the British Cabinet. It is futile to blame the Secretary of State for India for the policy of the British Cabinet. If the European Associations and others dare, let them find fault with the British Government. If, without having the courage to do this, they threaten to oust Mr. Montagu from his office, it can only be deemed to be the act of cowards who always achieve their object by side blows. Besides, the agitation now carried on by the European Associations will only create a spirit of disunion between them and the Indians at a juncture when a feeling of amity should be developed between the two communities, and prevent the Government from introducing the reforms under contemplation.

The Anglo-Indian agitation.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Oct. 27th, 1917.

Referring to a meeting which is proposed to be convened in London under the presidency of Lord Sydenham to support the agitation now carried on by Anglo-Indians in India to defer the introduction of reforms in this country, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th October, observes:—It appears that the Europeans here will have to send a telegram to their friends in England to attend the meeting. If a meeting of influential persons is to be convened in London, why should a telegram be sent from here requesting the people there to be present at the meeting? If we ponder over this, we will see clearly the strength of the preposterous agitation carried on by the Anglo-Indians. Besides the Europeans here are raising a loud cry about matters likely to benefit the Indians, while the interests of these Europeans are not to be affected thereby prejudicially in any way. How, in these circumstances, is it proper for the Europeans in England to support such an unreasonable agitation?

Lord Sydenham and Home Rule for India.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Oct. 25th, 1917.

40. Adverting to the article of Lord Sydenham in the Sunday Times where he condemns the agitation of the Indians for Home Rule as a meaningless one and denies the claim of the Congress and the Muslim League to represent the views of the Indian public, the Hindu Nesan, of the 25th October, characterises the aforesaid article as a bundle of lies and observes:—If one who had been a Governor in India for five years, should speak like this, what is there surprising in people, who have not seen India or have very little experience of this country, speaking and writing as they like about it. The Indians will not have a high regard for British statesmen who make indiscriminate statements about them like this. Lord Curzon, who was not a Governor but a Viceroy here, is still alive. He should be taken to have a better knowledge of India and Indians than Lord Sydenham, and he is indeed a better statesman than the latter. When he is silent at this juncture without giving expression to his views either in the press or on the platform about India, her people and their ideal, why should Lord Sydenham, whose period of office as Governor here for five years should now be taken to have been spent in vain, come out with his views on the Indian questions? Perhaps he has taken a brief for all the Anglo-Indians. In the present constitution and attitude of the British Government, the impediments thrown by men of the stamp of Sydenham will be of no avail, however loud they may cry that the Indians are not fit to have reforms connected with self-government. The Government will pay no heed to it. It is now settled that the Secretary of State for India is to visit this country. He is sure to confer some permanent benefit on India in consultation with the Indian leaders and the public.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Oct. 25th, 1917.

The Dravidan, of the 25th October, is of opinion that Lord Sydenham has spoken nothing but the truth and refuting the arguments of the Indian Patriot against his views in that these arguments mean nothing more than the perpetuation of the principle that only a few of the educated Indians should for ever be deemed to be fit for working for the amelioration of the masses, which again results in the fact that the Brahmans are to be entrusted with all the responsibilities of the people of this country, and adds:—Who will justify the conduct of the Brahmans in seeking to get a control over the Government in the name of the very soldiers who are sacrificing their life in the field of war? Every one will appreciate the service rendered by Lord Sydenham in having made a plain statement on this subject.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 26th, 1917.

Medical facilities in the Madras Presidency.

41. The Swadesamitran, of the 26th October, writes:—Speaking generally, it is a known fact that there are not sufficient facilities in this country in the matter of education and medical help and that the Government are not spending much money on improving such facilities. To take an example, the number of hospitals throughout this Presidency which was 684 at the end of 1913, was no more than 709 at the end of 1916. Though this shows that 25 hospitals were opened within a course of three years, they are not sufficient. The Surgeon-General has himself stated that the percentage of hospitals in this country works only at one hospital for a population of 60,000. Though the number of hospitals here is not adequate to the wants of the people, even the number of independent English practitioners is not proportionate to the needs of the people; for, while there were 43,325 doctors in Great Britain with a population of 45 millions in 1915, there are only 1,354 doctors in this Presidency with a population of 43 millions. This clearly proves the necessity for an improvement in the medical facilities here. If this is to be done, the number of doctors must also be increased, which in turn necessitates an increase in the number of medical schools and colleges on a large scale. Though the number of those who resort to hospitals has been steadily increasing, that of persons who seek a remedy for contagious diseases is very small. These diseases cannot be ignored and special and sound arrangements and facilities are necessary to combat them. Those now in force should, of course, be said to be unsatisfactory and the fact of hospitals for contagious diseases being always in out-of-the-way places, which in a way prevents the people from resorting to them, can be quoted as an instance in point. Though the number of patients treated in hospitals for malarial fever is still very high, there seems to be a reduction in this number in places where anti-malarial measures have been adopted. But the doubt entertained by some, whether this may not be due to the increase in the number of private practitioners, is not without foundation. The number of those who resorted to hospitals in 1916 for leprosy was 8,339 and their number is gradually increasing; while that of the hospitals intended for them is very few. Many lepers are beggars in the streets and many again sell sweetmeats. Besides this, Colonel Donovan, who examined the health of boys in the elementary schools in the city, has declared that 6 per cent of the boys are susceptible of catching this disease. This brings out a necessity for prompt action being taken in getting the boys in all schools being examined.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, Oct. 29th, 1917.

Medical facilities in the Madras Presidency.

The Lokopakari, of the 29th October, comments on the same strain as the Swadesamitran, of the 26th idem, regarding the inadequacy of hospitals and doctors in this Presidency to meet the medical wants of the people and adds:—The fact that the number of deaths from smallpox has been greater in places where vaccination was resorted to than in those in which it was not adopted, gives room for the presumption that vaccination is not an effective remedy against pox. The increasing mortality among the people is due only to the inadequacies of the medical facilities in the Presidency and this can be specially said in the case of women and children. As the Indians have a greater faith in the Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicine than the English system and as they are now in a helpless condition owing to the inadequacy of the existing hospitals and doctors to meet their wants, the Government and municipalities should come forward to develop these systems. The insanitary conditions and the poverty of the people also in a way contribute to the high rate of mortality among them. The Government should take steps to remedy these grievances also.

The Prapanchamitran, of the 30th October, reproduces the above.

PRAPANCHAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

Medical help.

Referring to the triennial medical report of the Madras Presidency, the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th October, remarks :— Medical help does not seem to be satisfactory anywhere. The difficulties of the people, especially in villages and hamlets, cannot be described. This defect may be seen largely in malarial tracts and the villages of the Ceded Districts. The report says that Taluk Boards and Municipalities have no powers to open hospitals, and remarks that the Government too do not press the aforesaid bodies in this matter. The Surgeon-General preaches pious philosophy saying that the rich will deserve merit here and hereafter if they spend their money towards opening hospitals for the sake of the suffering poor. . . We cannot, alas, understand why the Surgeon-General cannot ask the Government to open dispensaries widely in villages. It is proper for the Government to take up this question first and give sufficient medical help to the people. In places which are far away from towns and villages, itinerant dispensaries must be largely established. . . A large number of people are suffering for want of medical help. There is a long distance between these people and dispensaries. It is doubtful what may happen to the patients before medicine is fetched from these far-off dispensaries. Instead of the Surgeon-General preaching sermons that would bring heavenly and earthly bliss, he would do immense good to the public if he should extend equal patronage to Ayurvedic hospitals and foreign ones. By this, the responsibility of the Government also will decrease to a great extent. Separate hospitals for lepers and those suffering from contagious diseases must be opened by the Government. . . The Government will have to discover methods for counteracting the spread of malaria.

42. In publishing the latter part of the proceedings of the anniversary of the Sankaralingam Reading Room in Muttupet, referred to in paragraph 56 of Report No. 43 of 1917, the Swadesamitran, of the 25th October, gives a summary of a lecture delivered on commercial education by Mr. K. Kuppuswami Pillai of Tanjore and publishes an abstract of the concluding speech of the president, Mr. A. Rangaswami Ayyangar, the editor of this paper, in the course of which the following observations occur :— Whether it is for the introduction of commercial education, for acquiring national education, wisdom and eminence, or for the creation of a brotherly feeling amongst ourselves, it is but essential that our country should, in our interests, be governed by us. This is indeed reasonable and true. This feeling, which has till now been entertained by a few, has now spread throughout the country by means of the press, and every one has realised the necessity of it.

MAHAVIKATA DUTAN, Madras, Oct. 27th, 1917.

Mahavikata Dutan, Madras, Oct. 27th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu and the release of Mrs. Besant.

The Mahavikata Dutan, of the 27th October, refers to the debate in the House of Lords on the responsibility for the release of Mrs. Besant and others and comparing the statement of Mr. Montagu to the story in the Bible that when the question was asked as to who was responsible for plucking the forbidden fruit, Adam pointed to Eve, who in turn pointed to the snake, observes:—The Secretary of State has got stuck in mire without knowing its depth. All the same Mrs. Besant is making a victorious tour throughout India. We do not know what all will happen before the Secretary of State goes here.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Oct. 29th, 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 29th October, also refers to this debate and says:—We know it is usual for those who conduct the provincial administration here, receiving immense salaries from the Indians to care more, after their return to England, for the interests of the Englishmen, who make flying visits to this country for purposes of living and profit, than for those of the people of this country. But in this debate in the House of Lords, all others, except Lord Carmichael who won the confidence of the people as the Governor of Bengal and Lord Curzon, who though he did not win such confidences, now co-operates with Mr. Montagu in the introduction of reforms in India, expressed themselves against our aspirations and condemned Mrs. Besant. This is no doubt in keeping with the longstanding principle of this house of always obstructing the progress of the ordinary people. Similarly, the Anglo-Indians have also exhibited their usual aversion to the advancement of the Indians. But this debate has also brought out that all these would not affect in the least the liberal attitude of the British public towards us now. The withdrawal by Lord Sydenham of his motion at the conclusion of the debate is itself a proof of this. Lord Islington's speech and the message of the Viceroy read out by him make it clear that no harm has resulted from the release of Mrs. Besant and that the impression of the Europeans that Mr. Montagu has forced his opinion on the Government of India and the local Government in this matter is a wrong one. We anxiously wait to see whether, hereafter at least, the Englishmen who have been carrying on a mischievous agitation and the few Indians who have attached a greater value to the confidence of these Englishmen than the love of their countrymen, will not give up their baneful work and strive for the introduction of Home Rule reforms in accordance with the wishes of the majority. If they do not do so, it will only redound to their discredit generation after generation but will not hamper the work of the people in any way.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 30th October, also dwells in detail upon this debate and characterising Lord Lansdowne and Lord Middleton, who supported Lord Sydenham, as men whose brains had long rusted away as far as a knowledge of Indian questions was concerned and referring to the withdrawal of his motion by Lord Sydenham as the close of a musical performance where the main songster fails for want of proper support from the auxiliary instrumentalists, concludes:—Now Lord Chelmsford has clearly stated that the agitation carried on about the release of Mrs. Besant is only a local campaign of minor importance. If the European Associations and the newspapers inciting them will give up, at least hereafter, agitating vainly about past events and attend to their own business, it will be possible for the Secretary of State for India, the Government of India, the Indian leaders and the Indian public to consider about the Indian reforms.

46. Adverting to the order said to have been issued by the Government of Madras repealing their previous order directing Mr. V. R. Karandikar, formerly of the New India office, to quit this Presidency, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th October, writes—There are yet other orders which the Government of Madras have similarly to repeal. For instance, the order prohibiting Mr. Krishnaswami Sarma from lecturing or writing within the limits of Madras and the Chingleput district should al so be repealed. Why should an order issued against a person residing in this Pr esidency continue to be in force, while that issued against a resident of another Pr esidency has been repealed?

The Punjab Provincial Conference.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 27th October, writes under this heading:—The Punjab has also woke up and held a separate conference for herself. It cannot be guessed how much Sir Michael O'Dwyer's mind would have been perturbed by the Punjab, which is indebted to his good will, joining the other disloyal provinces without respecting His Honour's friendly advice. Mr. Harikishen Lal, Chairman of the Reception Committee, asserted that the people of the Punjab were prepared to bear the responsibilities of self-government . . . Sir O'Dwyer said in the Imperial Legislative Council that self-government was not at all necessary for that province and exposed himself to ridicule, instead of cheerfully granting it self-government. Now at least His Honour has been given an opportunity to know the mind of the Punjab people The whole country is in one voice asking for self-government, and the Government, will do its duty to fulfil this wish.

The Punjab Conference.

While giving in Telugu the proceedings of the Fifth Punjab Provincial Conference, the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th October, reports the president to have said:— . . . The Indians fulfilled all the three conditions laid down by Mill for fitness for self-government. . . The real danger is an irresponsible bureaucracy cherishing un-British ideas. Its real fault is its confidence in its weakness. It is absolutely intolerant of criticism. . . According to Lord Morley, it is a machine and, as Mr. Montagu has said, it is not an efficient machine. . . All papers must be treated alike by the Government. It is not fair to put up with the acrimonious writings of the Anglo-Indian papers about Mr. Montagu. . . The Defence of India Act should not be used against the leaders of the country.

The release of the Muslim interned.

50. The Swadesamitran, of the 27th October, publishes the proceedings of a public meeting held at Vazhkudai in the North Arcot district on the 23rd idem under the presidency of Mr. Chinnaswami Ayyar of that village to pray for the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali, when the president is said to have spoken on the unfairness of applying an Act, which is chiefly intended as a war measure, for keeping persons in confinement for a long period without trial, and to have made the following observations in the course of his speech:—We do realise that we, as the subjects of the King-Emperor, are as much responsible as His Majesty and his officers for putting down anarchists. Our real grievance is that the Government have not properly understood our feeling in this matter. To consider as anarchists the loyal politicians who demand political reforms in India might not only be deemed to impede the progress of the people but also perhaps lead to the entertainment by the Indians of the belief that the Government have no sympathy for their progress.

The condition of the tanners.

51. Adverting to the various complaints appearing in the Press about the hardship caused to tanners in this Presidency by certain orders recently passed by the Government, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th October, observes:—Those who have watched the statistics about the export and import trade of our country would have easily seen what an important part the skin trade plays in our economic condition. The value of skins tanned and untanned exported from Madras alone amounted on an average to nearly a lakh of rupees every week before the commencement of the war. Though the export of tanned skins was mostly done through Anglo-Indian firms, almost all the tanneries here, except one or two, are run by our Muhammadan brethren. Several thousands of poor labourers are making a living from this trade, and several crores of rupees are invested in it. Therefore, if any orders are passed which either knowingly or otherwise injure this big industry, it is necessary that every one should immediately discuss the advantages and disadvantages of it. Judging from the several orders passed by the Government on this subject, it is clear that the main idea of the Government has been to secure an adequate supply of dressed hides for their own purposes. The precedure now followed by the Government is to classify the hides received by them on their own standard and pay for them at their own rates, auctioning those that are not required for them at the London market at a profit. This procedure is prejudicial to the tanners here in that they have to sell dressed hides to Government at a fixed rate while the prices paid by them for raw hides are not at all steady and that, as the quality of hides will change with the season, it cannot pay them to sell hides at scheduled rates, especially when even in tanning cleaner and better work is expected of them, and they are not allowed to adopt the devices which they used to for raising the weight of the hides. Though some of the reforms introduced by Government are generally acceptable ones, the way in which they have been given effect to cannot easily be approved. If the Government wanted to improve the tanning industry, they could have done it by encouraging the owners of tanneries and seeing that they are not put to a loss. Now, the question is whether this was done. If the rates offered to them were favourable why should they complain? What is the use of the Government increasing the restrictions on this trade and wounding the feelings of the tanners without dealing with them sympathetically?

Gazette notifications.

52. The Swadesamitran, of the 27th October, complains of the notifications in the Fort St. George Gazette about appointments and transfers being often enigmatic in character and instances it by pointing out that it is only by a very careful examination of some recent notifications that one could understand that Mr. T. Vijayaraghava Achariya is the Secretary in the Revenue Settlement Department and Mr. T. Ragavayya, a Collector.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 27th, 1917.

The wheel of liberty.

53. In a contribution under this heading a non-Brahman correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 27th October, dwells upon the way in which the velocity of the revolutions of the wheel of liberty has been affecting almost every country in the world after the beginning of the European war, and observes:—Will India, ruled by the English Government, which is the very embodiment of liberty, like the idea of continuing in a subordinate position in the future, though she is now fit to have Home Rule? Will England which is sacrificing its all for the purpose of safeguarding the liberty of the world and maintaining truth, hesitate to grant Home Rule to India, which is subordinate to it, and show its magnanimity? India desires, even as Ireland does, to attain Home Rule under the British Government. Will England, which is granting freedom to its Irish subjects, deny it to us? As the blood of Indian heroes is also being shed on the field of war, no one can raise the least doubt about our loyalty. The hands of India are lovingly entwined around England.

He then appeals to the Indians to make genuine efforts in the matter to the monster petition to be presented to Mr. Montagu without caring for the obstacles raised by a few against the Home Rule movement.

The Gōdāvari District Non-Brahman Conference.

Referring to the observations made by the Kumara Raja of Chellapalli in his presidential address at this conference, and characterising the same as having been made without much forethought, the Hindu Nesan, of the 29th October, observes that speeches such as the one delivered by this president at conferences like that held in Gōdāvari and the resolutions passed thereat cannot be conducive to the good of the country at the present juncture when the Secretary of State for India is going to visit India and receive recommendations for the reforms to be introduced here.

The Gōdāvari District Non-Brahman Conference.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 30th October, publishes the presidential speech, of the first Gōdāvari District non-Brahman conference which contains:—Our Viceroy classifies the political reforms under three heads. First, to confer special powers upon the local bodies in towns and villages and to improve them on the lines of self-government. It is good to do so. Though it was in their power to give necessary encouragement to the improvement of these bodies, the Government of India have not done this as yet. As the Government are interfering with each and every small affair of these bodies which Lord Ripon wanted to work on independent lines, these bodies lose all spirit of enterprise. For the same reason, self-respecting people abstain from taking part in these bodies. . . The Government may inspect their work, and interfere also only if there is any urgent occasion for it.

55. Adverting to the costly measures adopted by the Government to successfully combat tuberculosis and to the proposal to construct a building in the Spur Tank for the Tuberculosis Institute to be opened in Madras, a correspondent writing to the Ananda Bodhini, for September, makes the following observations:—Although we sincerely wish that this proposal should be productive of beneficial results, yet there is not the slightest doubt that this would cause harm to the people instead of good. Tuberculosis has been pronounced to be a disease of a highly contagious nature by all doctors alike, and the opening of an institute for the treatment of this disease in Madras will only serve to encourage its growth here. It appears that tuberculine injections, which have been tried for a few years as a remedy for this, have now been given up, and seeing that other methods of treatment have also proved to be ineffective, doctors have come to the conclusion that pure and dry air will give relief to persons suffering from this malady. It is on this principle that treatment is given to patients in the hospital at Madanapalle. As, however, pure air cannot be had in Madras, such treatment is impossible here, and the institution which is now proposed to be opened in Madras will therefore be found to be useless.

56. Dwelling on the importance of union, and attributing the present eminent position of Japan to the union and co-operation among her people and the low condition of India to a lack of union and co-operation among the different sections of the people of this country, the Vartakamitran, of the 27th September, observes:—As though the existing divisions in India, which are based on caste, creed and language, will not suffice, we are creating amongst ourselves thousands of divisions such as those caused by the Varnashrama Dharma and non-Brahman movements, and getting ourselves entangled in the deceitful snares spread by our enemies. On account of such divisions, we are paying no heed to our economic condition and are not making united efforts to establish industrial institutions in the country; and our wealth goes in consequence to foreign countries, which are known for their co-operation, and our position is lowered thereby. These divisions account for the contempt shown to the Indians in countries like Natal, Canada and Australia, while the Japanese are uniformly treated with respect there. We have read in the papers that the Indians are not allowed the freedom to walk on public roads or to have an equal seat with others in tramcars and that a European, who caused the death of an Indian, who happened to travel equally with others in a tramcar, by throwing him out of the car, was let off only with a fine. Not only in foreign countries, but even in our own country are there occasions for the Europeans to speak of us with contempt, for the law to be administered in one way to us and in another way to them and for the interests of our trade and industry being neglected.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Sep. 27th, 1917.

India's shipping trade

57. In the course of an article under this heading, the Vartakamitran, of the 27th September, observes:—The time was when Indian ships plied throughout the world and did business. Now our people do not know what is meant by a ship. If India's trade should improve, the Indians should have a large number of ships at their disposal. If England, which cannot produce all the foodstuffs required by it, is able to get on honourably, it is because of the large number of ships she possesses. Though the export and import trade of India is increasing day by day, the number of ships available for the purpose is not increasing. If the foreigners refuse to lend their ships for Indian trade, we need not say what India's lot will be. Even when it has come to this pass, no one has taken steps to develop ship-building industry in India. It is because the foreigners do the shipping for India, that she has to pay them 30 crores of rupees year after year. Consider what amount of wealth India could have accumulated, if these 30 crores had been retained here. Numerous are the hardships suffered by the Indian merchants on account of the want of ships. To add to this, the European merchants in India are throwing every obstacle in the way of Indian trade flourishing. So there can be no improvement in the Indian trade unless her shipping trade is developed. There is no use of relying on the Government for this. It can be done only by the united efforts of the merchants.

Mismanagement in mutts.

58. Dwelling at length upon the various ways in which the properties endowed for the maintenance of temples and other institutions attached to the Tiruvavadudurai Mutt are said to be mismanaged by its present head, a correspondent, writing to the Vaisyamitran, of the 22nd October, remarks that the religious neutrality maintained by the Government gives room to such unjust acts on the part of heads of Mutts.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakottai, October 1917.

Agricultural improvement.

59. In the course of an article dwelling on the importance of agriculture for the economic advancement of this country, the Vaisyamitran refers to the communication of the Government of India requesting the Provincial Governments to submit proposals and plans for the opening of agricultural farms and the establishment of agricultural schools and colleges in different provinces and observes:—Some doubt if these plans and proposals will be completed and carried out. Every one is aware of the financial strain caused to the Government since the commencement of the war. But the question is why necessary steps should not be taken now alone to establish these colleges within a year after the close of the war. For instance, the plans and estimates for the buildings required for these institutions may now be prepared and the requisite number of teachers sent up for agricultural training. Besides the Government may now decide the extent of pecuniary aid they can render to every province in consideration of the extra expenditure to be incurred in connection with agriculture. It is, therefore, hoped that the Provincial Governments will, without delay, render the necessary help in these preliminary arrangements. Though there is room for the Government to doubt whether such large expenditure would result in proportionate benefit to the country, yet when we consider the benefits derived by the Agricultural Department from experimental farms, it will be clear that the colleges to be opened would be productive of great good. Therefore the Government will do well to establish at present such institutions in certain specified districts—for instance, two in the northern, one in the western and one in the southern districts of this Presidency. Need we refer to the advantages accruing to the country, if only the Government would improve agricultural institutions without minding much the initial difficulties in the matter?

60. The Dravidan, of the 27th October, publishes, from the pen of its own correspondent, an abstract of the proceedings of a meeting held at Sattur on the 22nd idem, when Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu, who spoke on Home Rule, is stated to have observed in the course of his lecture that His Excellency Lord Pentland had acted without realising the feelings of the people, that in ancient days thousands of westerns had been serving as bodyguards of Indian Princes and that the Government would pay only Rs. 11 to an Indian who has taken his M.A. degree and enlists in the army, while they give a higher salary to an ignorant European soldier who cannot even sign his name properly.

61. The Swadesamitran, of the 29th October, publishes from the pen of a correspondent the proceedings of a public meeting held at Pursewalkum on the 28th idem under the presidency of Mr. T. V. Muttukrishna Ayyar, when several persons, who addressed the audience, are said to have emphasised on the necessity of Home Rule for the educational, industrial and economic advancement of this country, and for the removal of certain hardships such as those caused to agriculturists by the restrictions imposed by the Forest Department.

Lord Sydenham and the Indian aspirations.

63. The Swadesamitran, of the 26th October, writes:—There are but a very few representatives of the people in the Ceylon Legislative Council, and we have no reason, therefore, to expect them to command freedom of speech to a large extent. Yet experience shows that they enjoy greater freedom than their compeers here. In India the Police Department is considered to be next in importance to the Civil Service. It is doubtful, therefore, whether the Government here would grant leave to move a resolution in the Legislative Council finding fault with the head of that department. Yet it is strange that the Hon'ble Mr. Ramanathan has been permitted to move a resolution and speak on the same for over two hours declaring the Inspector-General of Police, Ceylon, unfit to hold that office.

64. Referring to a statement said to have been made by Saint Nihal Singh, the London correspondent of the Message of Bombay, that newspapers in England merely published the telegrams relating to the release of Mrs. Besant and the Anglo-Indian protest thereon in some corner without any comments and that an editor of a leading newspaper in England actually consigned to the waste-paper basket a telegram received by him from the Anglo-Indians protesting against this release, the Swadesamitran, of the 26th October, observes that the Home Rule party will, in these circumstances, gain strength in England if they can properly bring home to the British public and the British Press what the Indian aspirations are.

65. The Swadesamitran, of the 30th October, refers to how the report of the Public Services Commission has been a disappointment in the matter of redressing the legitimate complaint of the Indians, that the distinction between the Indian and Provincial Educational Services meant nothing more than reserving the former completely for the Europeans while there was practically no difference in duties between the two, and, appreciating the alternative suggestions made by the Government of India in this matter as being more liberal in spirit than the recommendations of the Commission and observing that the favourable attitude of the Government of India is due to its Education Member Sir Sankaran

The Civil Service and the Madras Mail.

66. The Swadesamitran, of the 30th October, expresses its surprise at the Madras Mail justifying the Civilians here being paid about three times the remuneration that is paid to the civilians in England and that in the face of the fact that these civilians are doing the very same duties, which the Indians in the Provincial Service are doing at far lower rates of salary, while this very paper condemned 33 years back the civilians from home being paid a far higher rate of salary than the people of India, and observes:—The grounds on which a higher rate of pay was fixed for civilians from home no longer exist. As stated by Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim in his dissenting minute, if 100 officers are required, more than 94 additional officers are maintained merely to enable these 100 to go on leave. So English youths should now consider India to be a heaven on earth and yet their salaries and allowances go on increasing. Why should the Madras Mail, which condemned a matter 33 years back, now support it? Perhaps the difference is due to the fact that Mr. Lawson was its editor then, and Mr. Welby is its editor now.

DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 31st, 1917.

Lord Sydenham.

67. The Dravida Patrika, of the 31st October, has a long leader condemning the views expressed by Lord Sydenham in his article to the Fortnightly Review and the Sunday Times on India and adds:—This gentleman was, to our misfortune, chosen as the Governor of Bombay in 1907 and, though he continued in this office for seven years and had a pleasant life of it during the period, receiving his salary from the Indian revenues, he did not confer any great benefits on the Indians and he does not like even now that the Indians should come forward. His present baseless attacks on Home Rule are intended only to retain the administration in the hands of the members of the Indian Civil Service. Therefore, let not the Indians believe the misrepresentations of our friends like Lord Sydenham, but walk in the path chalked out for them by their own leaders.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 23rd, 1917.

Lord Sydenham.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd October, says:—The grant of any the least concessions to the Indians is a bugbear to Lord Sydenham. He is of opinion that even Lord Islington's reforms are revolutionary. He is now the refuge of the Mail. He has all the characteristics of Anglo-Indians and may be said to be their ideal. He says . . . that the Congress and Moslem Leagues do not represent the masses. . . It is ridiculous that while saying that caste differences should disappear, he creates new castes. He says that if the Congress scheme is carried out the Brahmans and the lawyers will take all authority into their own hands. He does not say how that is possible. . . The truth is that if the Congress scheme is carried out, the Brahmans and the lawyers will lose their importance. It is difficult to understand by what principle of logic Lord Sydenham says that democracy which is paving the way for the equality of men in the west will produce opposite results in India only. While endeavours are made in the whole world to put down Prussian arbitrariness, Lord Sydenham and the Lord Bishop of Bombay are perhaps going to perpetuate arbitrariness in India alone. . . It shows the creative faculty of Lord Sydenham to divide the people into the valiant and the cowardly. . . He wishes chiefly the promotion of arbitrariness. There is nothing in the Congress scheme which fosters caste differences. The bureaucracy, of whom Lord Sydenham is the chief, has for so many years, turned a deaf year to the agitation of the people. It is on account of this indifference that the people hope to get necessary reforms carried out if they themselves wield the authority. Persons like Lord Sydenham place obstacles in the way of the people. . . By endeavouring to frustrate the object of Mr. Montagu in visiting India, and running counter to the times, the Anglo-Indians will be doing the greatest harm to the Empire. Those that throw obstacles in the way of statesmen like Lloyd George, etc., who wish to strengthen the Empire by making India a strong portion of the Empire, may be said to be the foes of the Empire. We pray that Mr. Montagu will not pay heed to them but will work for India's uplift.

68. The Andhrapatrika, of the 25th October, says:—The advancement of India is the only means of putting down German militarism totally The Empire of Turkey extends to the very gates of India. It does not conduce to the peaceful condition of Asia that Japan should have China under her protection. Far-sighted men say that there may be a commotion in Asia in a short time. The present war teaches us the lesson that we should not wait till a war breaks out, but should train up Indians and keep them ready for a war. For obtaining man-power, Indians should be given military training. The Arms Act should be repealed, and the latent valour and courage of the Indians should be stirred up. An Indian navy and an Indian airfleet should be formed. Industries should be promoted, and the misfortune of India depending upon foreign countries for the necessaries of life should be removed. In short, India has to be a chief portion of the Indian Empire without any defects and disabilities. Such an end cannot be brought about unless, along with the responsibilities, the rights also of the Indians are increased. They should be given economic and administrative freedom. Whether viewed from the point of view of justice or from that of self-interest, England cannot but give self-government to India at this juncture. Mr. Montagu thought over all this and made his announcement. . . The president of the meeting of the Madras European Association suggests that, at a time of war, there should be no agitation about reforms. But His Excellency the Viceroy sent his despatch about reforms to the Secretary of State at a time of war. An Imperial Conference was held to settle the Colonial question at a time of war. The Irish question is being settled at a time of war. The report of the Public Services Commission was published at a time of war. Mr. Fisher is spending money in England for the progress of education at a time of war. The Anglo-Indians are conducting a great agitation to frustrate the aspirations of the Indians, without taking into consideration that this is a time of war. Under such circumstances it is ridiculous to say that the Indians should not protest against any loss that may befall them even when the Government are contemplating to prepare a scheme of reforms without consulting the people. The Times of India has already shown the untruth of the statement that the European Association is wholly engrossed in work connected with the war. Till compulsory military training to Europeans was ordered, the number of men required by the Government did not come forth from them. Even after the compulsory system was introduced, many put forth a number of pleas to escape it. It is the Europeans that have raised a hue and cry when restrictions have been imposed on trade, Indians were able to collect an Indian Defence Force within the time fixed by the Government. Indians were the foremost to contribute to the War Fund and to take the war loan. The Indians have not been behind the Anglo-Indians in matters relating to the war. They have also earned the appreciation of the Government in those matters. . . The Mail and its followers are bent upon seeing that the Indians should not be given any liberties. In order to cover this object, they put forth the release of the interned as a pretext. Otherwise their resolution has no meaning. . . The labourers of Edinburgh have happily sent a wire to India asking the Indians not to fear and stating that all the labourers are on their side. The Indians may therefore be bold. The English statesmen who are far-sighted, and who wish the welfare of the Empire must give self-government to India, or England will be failing in its solemn undertaking.

Self-government and the Europeans.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 25th, 1917.

69. The Andhrapatrika, of the 25th October, has the following in English :— In the course of his presidential address to the Guzerat Educational Conference at Broach, Mr. Gandhi strongly urged that vernaculars should be the medium of instructions in India. According to experienced teachers he said what takes sixteen years to learn through the medium of English can be perfectly acquired in ten years through vernaculars The excessive burden of having to learn through a foreign medium had sapped young men of strength and vitality, dwindling away, as years go by, the power of initiative, originality, enterprise, courage and discrimination. He instanced the case of South African natives who have similarly suffered having accepted Dutch as the medium of education. In India he said foreign medium was creating an unnatural gulf between the educated classes and the masses at large. Speaking on the need of a national language he said it should satisfy the essentials such as being easy of acquisition by the officials as well as the masses and being a language spoken by the large number of Indians, and above all it must be the vehicle of religious, social and political intercourse. He said English did not fulfil all those conditions. Hindi language did. Therefore Muhammadan rulers did not replace it by Persian and Arabic.

It also gives a gist of the above in Telugu.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 26th, 1917.

India's voice regarding peace.

70. The Andhrapatrika, of the 26th October, says:—India also has newly secured representation in the Imperial War Conference. Those that went to that conference were not representatives sent by the Indians. They were appointed by the Government; there is the need to consult India in regard to peace. Indians have shed their blood in conquering the German colonies. They manifested their dash and daring, in overthrowing the foes. In the Colonies Indians are not looked upon as men. Indians, therefore, require separate territories to live happily therein and enjoy the rights of citizenship. For that purpose, the German colonies will be convenient. If it is decided not to give back the German colonies to the Germans, they should be given to the Indians to live in. This will remove the disabilities of the Indians in the colonies and settle the Indian problem satisfactorily. There will then be room to reward the valour of the Indians in a suitable manner. Those countries will be made most prosperous by the industry of the Indians. The Prime Minister will next Monday express his thanks in the Parliament for the help rendered to the empire by the Indian soldiers. It will be well if he declares that the wishes of the Indians also will be taken into consideration in drafting the terms of peace. In proportion as the independence of the colonies increases, so must the independence of India grow. India will not agree to be governed by the colonies even for one moment. India has no objection to the establishment of an Imperial Parliament. But she wants that she should be given an equal place with the colonies in that Parliament. We suggest that the advice of India also will be taken along with that of the colonies when peace is concluded.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 26th, 1917.

Political offenders.

71. The Andhrapatrika, of the 26th October, says:—The agitation that we had hitherto conducted related to the release of Mrs. Besant and her co-workers and Mr. Muhammad Ali and his brother. Our endeavours should not end here. Many educated young men are under internment and their parents are thus put to great trouble. Some others could not come to India and are suffering in foreign countries. At a time when it is believed that a new era will begin with the grant of political reforms, our brethren are not in a condition to enjoy the new happiness. Even the grant of self-government cannot remove this stain. So the whole country should work for the release of all persons on whom restrictions are placed. This should be deemed the first reform. . . An Act that was possible in Ireland will be possible in India also. . . We request His Imperial Majesty to note the feeling of the people in the matter and excuse all political offenders.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 26th, 1917.

The ayurvedic system of medicine.

72. The Andhrapatrika, of the 26th October, says:—At a meeting held in the Ayurvedic College to celebrate the pooja of Dhanvantari, the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma said that the rulers were not well disposed towards the Ayurvedic system of medicine, that all systems were smashed in the official machinery, that in course of time, the Ayurvedic system also might receive patronage, and that neither the rulers nor the doctors practising the Western system of medicine encouraged the Ayurvedic system. He also said that it was improper to declare it wrong on the part of a doctor to consult Ayurvedic physicians and that if self-government were granted to the country, there could be no room for such things. Mr. Kasturiranga Ayyangar said that 90 per cent of the people got medical aid from the Ayurvedic physicians, that it was improper not to promote the Ayurvedic system, that it was unfair to consider it wrong to have anything to do with the Ayurvedic physicians and that such a state of things could not last if the people should possess authority.

The same paper makes the following remarks :—Ninty per cent of the people are receiving medical aid from the Ayurvedic system of medicine. It is to be regretted that the rulers have passed Registration Acts and look upon Ayurvedic medicine with contempt.

73. The Andhrapatrika, of the 29th October, says :—Ungrateful Anglo-Indian conservatives who are receiving pensions in England from the Indian treasury are throwing obstacles in the way of reforms being granted to the Indians. They yet have in their view only the India of the days of Aurangazeb They wish that the people should always worship the Anglo-Indian authorities. The position of the Anglo-Indian pensioners, who, while exercising arbitrary authority in India with sun-burnt faces, forgot the virtues of democracy, and thought that India was intended for the sport of foreigners, moves us to pity rather than to indignation. Living long in India, they forget liberal ideals and become oblivious to the principle of the equality of man. Unable to adjust themselves to the democratic atmosphere, they become a separate race on their return to England. When Indian questions are discussed in the Parliament, they give out their experiences. Indian questions do not interest the people in England in general. Except when Reuter makes much of insignificant seditious incidents and wires to England about them, the English people are not conscious of the existence of India. Under such circumstances the words of the Anglo-Indian nawabs are deemed as conveying gospel truth. When matters relating to the advancement of India are brought up for discussion, these Anglo-Indians stand in the way and see that the authority of the people belonging to their race is not affected. This evil is fortunately going down by small degrees. The representations of the Indians are listened to in England. After the commencement of the war, the angle of vision of statesmen has changed to some extent. . . that Mr. Montagu comes to India to know the opinions of the people about the demand of self-government indicates the beginning of a new era. . . When Lord Lansdown breathed his "natural love" for India in the Parliament, Lord Islington gave a suitable answer to his indiscreet speech. . . The wonder of wonders is that Lord Curzon justified the acts of Mr. Montagu and His Excellency the Viceroy. . . Lord Sydenham at last withdrew his motion. The Madras Mail may now keep quiet, but it will not. . . May God make the Conservatives know that not only will they fail in their attempt to obstruct the tide of time, but that they themselves will sustain loss.

Anglo-Indians.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 29th, 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd October, publishes in Telugu a letter addressed by Mr. Pal to the Amrita Bazaar Patrika anent the speech of Mr. Das on the subject of Anglo-Indians. It contains the following:—The Anglo-Indians who have devoured the rights of the Indians are vomiting fire in indignation at the speech. It is an illusion on their part to suppose that their interests are in the hands of the present bureaucracy. They should understand that all their comforts are in the hands of the people. All wise men know that the present Indian bureaucracy cannot exist long. British statesmen have to introduce into India a new system of administration altogether and place India on a level with the Colonies, giving her independence. India should not be dependent at all. At the close of the present war Europe will be considerably weakened. . . Japan is likely to play the same part in Asia as Germany in Europe. If Asia is not saved in time, there will be the same confusion in Asia as in Europe. If the Anglo-Indians remember this and help India in getting Home Rule, it will be advantageous to themselves. They will do well to give up their present hostility and wickedness. . . Some of the ministers have realised that they cannot have peace until Indians are granted Home Rule at least to some extent. . . Those who cannot understand this and who attribute the declaration published newly by the present War ministers to the agitation of the Indians or to a liberal policy have no right to enter Indian politics. The British empire is in a crisis and only the loyalty of the Indians will save it. The Indian bureaucracy do not now appreciate the loyalty of the Indians. The Anglo-Indian traders are obstructing the Indians out of selfishness. The bureaucracy will not like to part with their irresponsible authority over the people. The Anglo-Indian merchants cannot part with the political facilities they enjoy by reason of their social relations with the members of the Government. The Government and the Anglo-Indians help one another in our country with the result that the political life of the Indians and the financial resources of India are day by day declining. For all this Home Rule is the only remedy. If that is granted, there will be no room for such unholy co-operation. The present bureaucracy and the Anglo-Indian merchants who are depriving us of our rights and freedom look upon the Home Rule movement as a formidable enemy. Such Anglo-Indians are indignant at Mr. Das for calling them by their Anglo-Saxon names instead of by their Latin names. When one takes my property and himself enjoys what should go to me, such a man may be said to have robbed me of my wealth. When I am not allowed the advantage of my wealth, it amounts to stealing my property. The Anglo-Indians appropriate our rights and privileges and take our money to their country without leaving anything to us. Is this fair ?. . . Mr. Das used these words for the sake of comparison and so they cannot come under the Penal Code. Unless matters are explained so clearly, the Anglo-Indian conscience cannot wake up. The Anglo-Indians are under a false impression that they are helping the Indians and that without such help, the economic condition of India would not have improved, and Indians would have continued in poverty. Mr. Das had to speak thus for the well-being of the Anglo-Indians, who will as time goes on will rid themselves of their egotism.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, Oct. 2nd, 1917.

The Anglo-Indians.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 2nd November, writes:—For more than a hundred years past the Anglo-Indians were the uncrowned kings of this country. All authority was centred in their hands. They were ruling autocratically in the guise of constitutional power. It is Mrs. Besant who laid the foundation of constitutional administration in this country. No body is bent upon wiping out Anglo-Indian authority altogether. Let them have all the power in their hands. Only let the power be exercised in a responsible manner. This is Mrs. Besant's main object and the Home Rulers' chief prayer. If the Anglo-Indians should act accordingly, no body can have any cause for dissatisfaction regarding them. If they should say however that they would continue to be autocratic and none shall oppose such autocracy, it is rather difficult to carry out this wish in this twentieth century. They may have thought that by restraining Mrs. Besant, their autocracy will remain unopposed. It is true that Mrs. Besant is leading. But there are hundreds of thousands of others in India who are even more ardent than Mrs. Besant about democratic rule. It follows therefore that no one should oppose this bid for democracy. If any should try, they are sure to be disappointed.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 29th, 1917.

Dasara festivities.

74. The Andhrapatrika, of the 29th October, says:—At a meeting of the citizens of Guntūr, it was resolved as follows:—The Deputy Magistrate acted arbitrarily. He despised the long-standing practices of the Hindus. He offended their religious feelings unnecessarily. In removing the idols put up in a house for worship and driving away the devotees that gathered there to worship them, he and Mr. Davis committed sacrilege. There is nothing wrong in that the shops were closed in consequence. . . We pray that the Government will take notice of the conduct of these high officers.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 29th, 1917.

A suggestion.

75. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 29th October, says under this heading:—The Standing Committee of the Andhra Conference should request Mr. Montagu when he visits India to give freedom to persons like Lala Lajput Rai, who, having no place of shelter in this vast country, have sought refuge in foreign lands, and not place obstacles in the way of their coming into our midst. Being imposed upon by the words of the subordinate officers, the Secretary of State entertains suspicions about the Mussalman lions. Only the other day their mother showed how far the words of the authorities are true. If Mr. Montagu had known this, he would not have stated in the Parliament that Mr. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali are in sympathy with His Majesty the King's enemies. May the committee think over the matter carefully and request Mr. Montagu to release them.

76. The Andhrapatrika, of the 27th October, writes under this heading as follows:—On account of the Moharrum riots here and there, it is talked about by our antagonists that the union between the Hindus and the Muhammadans is but a myth. . . By these, on the other hand, the necessity for Home Rule is established all the more. When the people begin to be under Home Rule, these riots will cease and the people will be able to understand the principles of Government. As the people cannot at present realise the responsibility of Home Rule, it happens that they behave without making up their differences. It will be found that, in any country, only after granting Home Rule, prejudices of caste and creed have disappeared.

Moharrum riots.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 27th, 1917.

77. The Andhrapatrika, of the 27th October, reports Mrs. Annie Besant to have said in the course of a lecture:—If industries should thrive, protection is necessary in the early stages. You cannot have this unless you have Home Rule. You must primarily wish for national progress. Then you must think of serving the empire. Else, your country will be only a garden for raising raw material to be exported to other countries. It is not one's duty to lose one's self in the service of the empire.

Merchants.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 27th, 1917.

78. The Andhrapatrika, of the 29th October, says:—A European in Calcutta shot two Muhammadan boys while attempting to kill a dog. Perhaps Indians appear to Europeans to be no better than beasts. If such offenders are punished adequately, they will conduct themselves carefully in the future.

Two Muhammadan boys shot by a European.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 29th, 1917.

79. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 29th October, writes under this heading as follows:—There is a rumour current that Mr. Narasimha Achari is very anxious to be in charge of the division and that the Khaji had promised him to help him in the attainment of his object. . . The pandals erected in the bazaar street were ordered to be pulled down. From this it was talked about that the original orders of the Deputy Magistrate were given effect to. We cannot understand the justice of this. . . In the piecegoods bazaar street a panja was installed and a pandal, constructed in front of it. The Mussalmans refused to remove the pandal in spite of orders from the authorities who did not interfere with them afterwards. Seeing this, the Vysyas constructed a pandal in the same street to conduct a Harikathakalak shepam (a religious discourse). The Mussalmans persisted in its removal and attempted to do it themselves. A wise man among them having interfered, they went to the Khaji. The Khaji thereupon went and saw the District Collector who appointed him as the Special First-class Magistrate and with whom he has influence. Shortly afterwards, the Khaji, the Collector, the Superintendent, the Deputy Collector and all came with their men to the Vysya's pandal in the bazaar and ordered the removal of the pandal. "If the Musalmans would remove their pandal, we would remove ours" said a sowcar. He was immediately arrested and the pandal was pulled down. From this, it is clear that the Hindus should hold their peace whatever the Musalmans may be doing. It is feared that in future the houses of the Hindus lying close to the panjas may be pulled down. . . The authorities are on the side of the Musalmans in every way. . . What is the cause of such commotion in Guntur in which there are educated men? Who are chiefly responsible for this, the Muhammadans, the Hindus, or the authorities? Our answer is all of them. The Khaji is on the side of the Muhammadans. Mr. Chimakunti Basaviah is on the side of the Hindus. Both are B.A's. What is the good? . . . The talk is that a demi-official order was received from the Government that the Muhammadans should not be interfered with. It may not be true. If it is, it is regrettable. Why is the Government so partial to the Muhammadans? What is the harm that the Hindus have done them? Everything seems to be suspicious. . . However, the actions of the authorities are not very satisfactory. We do not know the future. Perhaps a law will be passed that no Hindu shall go before the Muhammadan tazias in procession. As long as this Khaji lives these quarells will not cease in our town. It remains to be seen if, in this matter also, the Government will speak in favour of the Muhammadans.

Dasara and Muharram at Guntur.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, Oct. 29th, 1917.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

80. The Andhrapatrika, of the 30th October, observes under this heading as follows:—. . . The Mail says, it knows which officer of the Government is responsible for lowering the prestige of the Government and increasing the strength of the Home Rulers. Even if no mention is made of the name of the officer, it may be guessed that the Mail has in its view Sir Sankaran Nair. From its present excited attitude, the Madras Mail does not shrink from condemning or attributing dishonesty to anybody. It has lost its reasoning faculty. . . It may be readily seen that the secret of the agitation is to create obstacles to the grant of reforms. . . . If the European Association should spoil this great work (the grant of reforms) which the rulers and the ruled intend to bring about, this sin will cling for generations to their name.

The Mail's abuse.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

81. The Andhrapatrika, of the 30th October, gives a Telugu version of the lecture by Professor K. Ramanuja Achari, which is published in the Hindu of the 29th October.

What India wants after the war.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 31st, 1917.

82. In its leader under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 31st October, cites the opinions of the Herald and the New Statesman condemning the attitude of the Anglo-Indian papers and advocating the grant of self-government to India.

The termination of the hostilities of the Mail.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 31st, 1917.

83. The Andhrapatrika, of the 31st October, says:—The report of the Mesopotamian Commission has made it evident that the present bureaucracy is not omniscient. The Mail wrote so long ago as in 1884 that the Indian Civil Service was unsuited even to those days. Needless it is to say that that service altogether unsuited to the present requirements. Mr. Dadabhoi Nowroji said that as the officers of the Civil Service are paid most, India is put to unnecessary expenditure. While the Minister of the United States of America is paid Rs. 37,000, a Member of the Indian Government is paid Rs. 80,000. Why should India, which is poverty-stricken, spend so much more than the United States which is prosperous? The Mail wrote that it was improper to bring inexperienced young men on high salaries and place them above those who had begun with small pay and risen in Government service step by step. It asked why, while Military officers were serving in non-Regulation provinces with efficiency with small pay, it was not possible in the rest of the Provinces. There is no separate Civil Service caste in England with special rights. Such a caste was needed in the beginning of the British Government. But now the conditions have changed. The Mail concluded its article as follows:—"If the expenses of the maintenance of the Civil Service should be borne by the British public, that service would surely be discontinued by the time the Parliament met again." It is a surprise that the Mail which wrote like this thirty-three years ago has now changed its attitude so enormously.

The Madras Mail: its past view.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 31st, 1917.

84. The Andhrapatrika, 31st October, says:—The Superintendent, Government Press, says that though the Government direct their officers to use paper very economically and carefully, the latter do not pay heed to the orders of the Government. This is a fact. We also often receive big covers in our office. While the letters are short, the covers containing them are long. We hope the officers will think over this matter and see that the Government is not put to unnecessary expenditure at a time of war.

Economy in the use of paper.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 31st, 1917.

85. In recommending the name of Mr. G. Harisarvothama Rao to the office of President of the Andhra Students' Conference, a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 31st October, says:—There is the God Tilak for the Mahrattas, the high-souled Moti Lal Ghose for the Bengalees, Lala Lajpat Rai for the Punjabees, the sage Gandhi for the Guzeratis, and the patriot Muhammad Ali for the Muhammadans. Is it not because of the presence of this great man that the Andhras feel proud of their self-confidence, and honour? The students will do well to discharge their duty by electing him as the President.

The Andhra Students' Conference.

86. The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd October, gives in Telugu the remarks of the Pioneer on Mr. Montagu's statement about Mrs. Besant's release. ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 23rd, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's statement.

The same paper publishes in Telugu the remarks of the Amrita Bazaar Patrika on the same subject which contains. . . "When Mr. Montagu comes to India the Anglo-Indian agitators, we are afraid, may try to do him injury. . ."

87. The Andhra Bazaar, for October, says:—Foreigners are doing their best to subdue our country in trade. If we yield to them, we will be ruined. We are already suffering, having yielded to the Europeans to some extent. . . If the Government had not placed certain restrictions, our country would have derived large profits by trade. Our countrymen should now, when we are suffering, understand the evil of industrial slavery. We hope that they will induce the Government to spend large sums on industries, and impose prohibitive duties on imports and thus develop the industries in India. ANDHRA BAZAAR, Cocanada, October. 1917.

India's trade and industries.

The same paper says on another page that it is not possible that the Indian industries will develop without the aid of the Government.

It also in another note states that in England the labourers are demanding wages at higher rates and that about 200,000 labourers are ready to strike work.

88. In an article under this heading the Satyavadi, of the 30th October, writes: —We should be possessed of power for the future. We should make it clear to Mr. Montagu who is coming to us that the Indian nation will not put up with any pseudo "reconstruction." We shall not be satisfied with anything short of real political power. What kind of power is it? It is not for the Madras Mail or the Pioneer, or the Englishman or the Statesman to define it; nor is it for the "European Association" or the "bureaucracy" to do so. The power that we ask for should be the spontaneous demand of our own hearts and coming from our own lips. If the Indians demand any particular power, it will be given to them. We should state what we want. It is not for them to say what they would give. The days of boons and rewards are past. The days of demand have come. We shall say that we want this or we want that and we shall obtain the same. If you fail to give it, well, agitation! You will have to face that! SATYAVADI, Mysore, Oct. 30th, 1917.

Swaraj.

89. In a leader under the heading "the crisis in India", the Malayala Manorama, of the 28th October, refers to the agitation that is carried on by the Indians for obtaining Home Rule for India, and observes that, if Home Rule be granted, the condition of the Native Christians will be deplorable. The paper adds that the people of India have not, by education and capacity, reached that stage when they may be safely entrusted with the Government of their country. MALAYALA MANORAMA, Kottayam, Oct. 28th, 1917.

The crisis in India.

90. The Qaumi Report, of the 23rd and 24th October, has articles reviewing and criticising the appeal. QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Oct. 23rd & 24th, 1917.

Fukhri's appeal.

The Qaumi Report, of the 25th October, also has comments adversely on Fukhri's appeal. QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Oct. 25th, 1917.

"A review of Fukhri's appeal."

91. The Qaumi Report, of the 24th October, publishes a letter from Haji Abdul Latif reporting that in a public meeting of the Mussalmans of Arcot held on the 15th October the following resolutions were passed:— QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Oct. 24th, 1917.

Anti-Home Rule meeting at Arcot.

(1) That we have no need of Home Rule, the grant of which would result in the rule of bigotry and selfishness.

(2) That the British Government should have special regard to the advancement of Mussalmans.

(3) That Arcot may be made the headquarters of a district in commemoration of the forthcoming visit of the Secretary of State for India, as Delhi was made the capital of the country in commemoration of the visit of His Majesty the King-Emperor.

(4) That this meeting requests the Government of India to set all the Mussalman internees free just as Mrs. Besant has been released.

The correspondent says that the meeting terminated after praying for the prosperity of the King, for the speedy and victorious termination of the war, and for the abiding loyalty of the Muslim subjects.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Oct. 25th, 1917.

"Our imperative work."

92. The Qaumi Report, of the 25th October, writes:—At present there is clamour for reforms in the country and the people are inviting the Muhammadans' attention to the proposals of the Congress and Muslim Leagues and are endeavouring to persuade them to accept them.

Now is the time for us to announce that the Muhammadans should act with consideration and deliberation and not be hasty in the matter of reforms.

It is not enough simply to have faith in the proposals because they have been published by the League or because they have been approved by a few gentlemen. On the other hand, we must carefully examine every part of the proposals and satisfy ourselves that it does not possess anything harmful or destructive to our nationality and religion leaving us eventually as Indians pure and simple.

The editor, referring to the proposed reforms of the Congress and the League, says:—We will discuss these in later issues and prove that most of the proposals are such as may prove injurious to Muslim interests. Some honourable gentlemen, who are desirous of founding a Muhammadan party of Moderates, are vigorously working for the attainment of that object.

III.—Legislation.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

The Indian Succession Act.

93. Referring to the conflicting decisions given by the Madras High Court in 1902 and the Bombay High Court recently regarding the interpretation of the term "close relation" in a section of the Indian Succession Act, under which the former court held that the wife of a person did not come within the perview of this term for purposes of inheriting his property, while the latter court held a different view altogether, the Swadesamitran, of the 30th October, observes:—We cannot blame the Judges of the High Court for such conflicting decisions, as they have to give their decisions only in accordance with the provisions of the law. Need we say, therefore, that this anomaly cannot be got rid of, unless the law which gives rise to such contrary decisions is properly amended?

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Oct. 27th, 1917.

The Burma Ghee Adulteration Act.

94. Referring to the beneficial results likely to accrue from this Act, the Hindu Nesan, of the 27th October, insists upon the necessity for a similar law being enacted in every province to prevent the adulteration of ghee, as in these days adulterated ghee is very often passed for and sold as pure ghee.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, Oct. 26th, 1917.

Adulteration of ghee.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 26th October, refers to the Burma Ghee Adulteration Act, and urges the necessity of the other Provinces also passing such an Act. It observes that impure ghee impairs health and the mixture of fat offends religious sentiments.

IV.—Native States.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Oct. 29th, 1917.

The Pudukkottai State.

95. The Hindu Nesan, of the 29th October, has a long leader on the administration of the Pudukkottai State as seen from the report connected with it for 1916-17 in the course of which it expresses its regret at the increase in the excise revenue during the year, as it indicates that the habit of drink has claimed a larger number of victims in the year and concludes by observing that, though it should be admitted that the State has been improving in proportion to its extent and system of administration, it has to be said that, if the Raja stays in his territories and conducts the administration with a capable Diwan, it will be possible to improve the State still further.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

Diwanship of Mysore.

96. Adverting to the extension of the term of office of the present Diwan of Mysore for a period of two years, the Hindu Nesan, of the 30th October, writes:—This news will give satisfaction to all people of Mysore interested in her progress and to all those who are interested in the progress of native states in general. None would have entertained the belief that His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore would attach much importance to the time-limit of five years and stand in the way of the seeds sown by the Diwan for the progress of the State growing and bearing fruit. His Highness is not one of those who are Maharajas only in name and waste their time without realising the administrative responsibility of the State. It is a clear proof of his administrative wisdom that he has not preferred at this juncture to appoint any one else, however, capable he may be, in the place of the present Diwan. We can know of the work done by Sir M. Visveswarayya only after the period of seven years of his Diwanship expires, and not now. It cannot be said that he is paying attention only to the progress of Mysore. In these days of agitation for reforming the constitution of the Government of India, he considers that Native States too should find a place in it and says that, as the Government of India have on many occasions to dispose of matters relating to Native States, so far as they affect matters concerning the whole of India, these States should also have their own representatives in the Imperial Legislative Council and that arrangements should, therefore, be made to provide for such representation in the new constitution of the Indian Government.

97. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th October, writes:— . . It is necessary for the progress of the country that, in the Native States also, should spread the desire for Government by the people. In some matters, Native States like Mysore and Baroda are more rapidly advancing than British India. Institutions of self-government are being speedily introduced in these States. Desire for self-government is gradually increasing in the Native States . . We point out, with reference to Sir Visweswarayya's words, the necessity for the consideration, by the Government and the leaders, of the proper place the Native States should occupy in the reconstruction of the empire.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Oct. 27th, 1917.

Native States.

98. In a leading article giving a summary of the Diwan's speech in the Mysore Representative Assembly, the Vokkaligara Patrike, of the 31st October, quotes the Diwan's reference to the place of the Native States in the future constitution of the Government of India and remarks that the Diwan's utterances will be highly welcomed as tending to raise the status of the Native States and hailed with great joy by the people of Mysore in all parts of the Province.

VOKKALIGARA PATRIKE, Bangalore City, Oct. 31st, 1917.

The Government of India and the Native States.

Writing on the same subject, the Vrittanta Patrike, of the 1st November, endorses the Diwan's view that in any scheme of reforms touching the constitution of the empire the interests of the Native States ought always to receive adequate consideration and that since the advocates of Home Rule say nothing about the Native States, the Diwan was right to have observed "that it was all the more necessary that a suitable machinery should be provided in the new constitution to elicit the views and safeguard the interests of the States and ensure to them their rightful place in the Councils of the Empire."

1. The following appears in the West Coast Spectator of the 3rd November :— The Talli road dispute, Calicut.

The West Coast Spectator, Calicut, Nov. 3rd, 1917.

"The fat is evidently in the fire in Talli, and the socially and diabetically exclusive residents of that salubrious quarter will forgive us the use of a metaphor, which we find appropriate to the subject. Mr. Thorne ordered two notices to be put up, forbidding polluting castes the use of certain roads and nadas in Talli, but the very next day one of the notices was found floating in the Talli tank and the other had ceased to be readable owing to a thick coating of tar. . . On hearing of the Estate Collector's ukase, Mr. C. Krishnan, one of the most prominent Tiya gentlemen of this town, in company with a prominent Brahman friend of his, went into the forbidden quarter yesterday and handed in a letter at the Estate Collector's office, detailing what he had done and explaining that he had done it in order to test the legality of the prohibition, seeing that the roads in question were public and were vested in the municipality. The outcome of Mr. Krishnan's action will be awaited with interest by the general public."

2. The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 31st October, writes: —"Lord Sydenham did well to move for papers in connexion with Mrs. Besant's internment and release and the debate on the motion has helped in clearing the air a little. . . Lord Lansdowne who has considerable experience of India and who took a leading part in shaping the Minto-Morley scheme of reform described Mrs. Besant's activities as sinister. His lordship urged upon Mr. Montagu the need of proceeding warily and avoiding all appearance of paltering with disaffection and he regretted the blunder committed in the treatment of Mrs. Besant which he said had greatly alarmed the loyal classes in India. We may point out to Lord Lansdowne that no alarm was caused either by her internment or her release, as the incident is really of no consequence, but what has alarmed the people of India is the hesitating policy of the Government in dealing with a movement which has caused enormous mischief especially to the student population, and in parleying with Mrs. Besant as if she was a great factor in Indian politics, whose good will was necessary for the stability of British rule. . . The people of India who realize the blessings of British rule know that the British policy here was one of peace and progress and nothing has occurred to disturb them in the belief. We do not suggest that a declaration of policy is a blunder, and the British Government should do their work in grim silence. All that we contend is that we in India were not exercised over the absence of a declaration, and Mr. Montagu's announcement has not altered the situation in any way. . . No responsible public leader in India ever construed Mrs. Besant's internment into an attempt to suppress free discussion. And it is still less true to say that if Mrs. Besant had not been released they would have kept up a distracting controversy. Lord Islington spoke of the agitation of the European community against Mrs. Besant's release, as the apprehensions of a section of the community. Here again he has been misinformed. The apprehensions, whether well-founded or not, are of the whole European population with a few individual exceptions, and his lordship must be aware that the large body of officials are not permitted to express their views on the situation one way or the other. The Anglo-Indian Press and the non-official Europeans have expressed themselves pretty plainly, and their opposition cannot possibly be ignored. . . The impression left on one's mind by the debate in the Lords is that Lord Islington has been at great pains without much success attending his efforts, to explain away certain portions in Mr. Montagu's statement which have justly provoked criticism both here and in England." Mrs. Besant's release.

Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, Oct. 31st, 1917.

3. The Non-Brahman, for the week ending 4th November, states :—"What is today in the Moslem mind? To speak honestly, the Moslems in a body would join Home Rule today if Home Rule meant not the tame nineteen-member memorandum but the extreme end of The Moslem interned.

Non-Brahman, Madras, Nov. 4th, 1917.

Besantine violence at its worst, to spite the British . . . Those who say that the Muhammadans are on the side of the Government and are against extreme steps speak falsehood. The Moslems await for a masculine Beasant who will lead them against the Government of India through the paths that Mrs. Besant led the Home Rule agitation. The Moslem mind has grasped the situation well. Loyalty does not pay. Agitate, take advantage of every event, and then the Government will hear, not till then. . . . When Lord Chelmsford's hand is shaking Mrs. Besant's hand in amity and admiration, the Government dare not assert that the language used by the Alis is in any way violent. The Alis suffer because they are true Moslems. And every true Moslem feels the internment. They are martyrs, and if there is a spark of statesmanship anywhere in India we appeal to it to assert itself before it is too late and the Mussalman passes completely into the hands of Mr. Tilak or Mrs. Besant. We appeal to the Government of Madras to write to the Viceroy on the seriousness of the situation. When men like Khan Bahadur Ahmad Tambi Marakkayar, Khan Bahadur Badr-ud-din Sahib, who have stood by the Government, in the darkest days of Home Rule turn against the Government, the significance cannot be lost sight of. And we hope that Lord Pentland's Government will clearly pass the word on to Lord Chelmsford that the Madras Moslems are preparing for an agitation of which India will hear by and by . . . Has the Government no opinion at all in the matter? Is it really true that the million of Moslems can be ignored? Is Mrs. Besant found to be such a powerful force as to a peaceful atmosphere? Well, let the Government beware. . . . We now know who is the real force that shapes the Government's policy—not the Viceroy in Council, not the Secretary of State in Council but Mrs. Besant in Council. . . . We appeal to the Government to recall how the announcement of the Secretary of State of slow marches towards the goal of self-government was received with derision by New India and the circle of Home Rule press . . . With Mrs. Besant on the right hand and Mr. Montagu on the left hand, the bureaucrat thinks he is safe. The Moslem population has no leader. The politician is a cunning man who waits for whatever he can get, and then claim for more. The Moslem politician sides with Mrs. Besant for a calm atmosphere. But the real Moslem feels every moment miserable, and if the Government will not release the Alis, public spirit among the Moslems would come to mean stern, unbending opposition to the bureaucrat—as stern and unbending as Mrs. Besant's which is labelled constitutional in Parliament. Oh, for a leader who will convey the warning to the British Government!"

Justice, Madras, Nov. 5th, 1917.

The monster petition for Home Rule.

4. In a leader under the heading 'Petition, Press and Platform,' Justice, of the 5th November, says:—"Mr. Gandhi's experience in South Africa as a leader of the Indian agitation in that country is unique. . . . Mr. Gandhi's experience of leadership in that agitation would hardly help him under the altogether different conditions which prevail in this country. His suggestion to get up a monster petition to the Secretary of State with the signatures of many millions of Indians is as quixotic as his advice to students who wished to become inmates of his proposed home at Ahmedabad to walk all the way thither from their respective homes instead of travelling by trains. There is something picturesque and romantic in these ideas of Mr. Gandhi. They take us back to the ancient days when Rishis prayed in forests and hill tops and brought about rain or sunshine at their will and in response to their prayers. As the French officer said about the Charge of the Light Brigade 'it is magnificent but it is not war', we may say of Mr. Gandhi's ideals that they are magnificent but they are not politics.

"Mr. Gandhi could not have imagined the doubtful methods which the Home Rulers would adopt in order to carry out his innocent and impracticable scheme. Signatures are being obtained from all and sundry to a monster petition to the Secretary of State at the innocent suggestion of Mr. Gandhi. Samples of the kind of lies which are being utilized to secure signatures are contained in many letters we have received since this extraordinary scheme was set on foot. Here is a letter from an Indian sepoy who was home on leave and whose signature was obtained while he was visiting the temple in his native place, by a Brahman on the pretext that the signature was required for a Sadhvishayam. . . . Another correspondent writes to us that the main misrepresentation on which signatures are obtained is the one which assures intending signatories that all taxes would be abolished under a Home Rule Government. Yet another correspondent informs us that among the misrepresentations made for securing signatures are the following :—(1) Under Home Rule there would be no taxes and if at all any, the taxes would be very light. The British rulers are burdening the people with oppressive taxes and while the Indian ryots and landlords are suffering, the collected money is being drained away into England to be wasted among foreigners. (2) The British people are actually keeping us in a state of slavery and using India for the purposes of aggrandizement. (3) The education of the country is being consciously starved by the Government while they find money to be spent on the exodus and in the India Office. (4) A lot of other arugments of similar nature, and in the end "Home Rule" will free us from the thousand miseries to which we are subject under the British administration." . . The signature-hunting that is carried on in India at the present time has its serious side. The securing of signatures is only a cover under which dangerous political propagandism is carried on. The agents who are collecting signatures in their enthusiasm for their work depict the conditions under Indian Home Rule in Utopian colours and paint British rule in far darker colours than is true. It is this method of circulating disparaging remarks about British rule that is the objectionable part of the present signature-hunting expeditions. This is even more serious than the spread of political propaganda by wandering Sadhus and Byragis. The present propagandists are more educated and more ingenious than the Sadhus. The Government of India may be under the happy delusion that a calm political atmosphere has been obtained and that all that they have to do is to prepare quietly the paraphernalia for Mr. Montagu's triumphal procession. We hope that the Government of India will be a little more wide awake to what is going on in the country and not rely too much on the apparent and superficial calmness of the political atmosphere."

The Home Rule League and the Secretary of State's visit.

5. Justice, of the 5th November, remarks :—"Last evening the Brahmans and the Non-Brahmans who hang on to them held what they called a public meeting of the citizens of Madras in the Gokhale Hall. Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar and his adherents have suddenly become alive to the necessity of maintaining the prestige of the Secretary of Sate for India. When Mr. Chamberlain held that high office, no anxiety was shown in respect of his prestige and authority, and probably Mr. Montagu himself would have been no better than Mr. Chamberlain had he not released Mrs. Besant. The Secretary of State who released Mrs. Besant has become a sort of supreme pontiff. Doubtless the same Mr. Montagu has taken no action in regard to the Indians who are interned. What of that? Indians may all be ignored. Not so the Irish lady who, we are told, is an Empire-builder. An Empire-builder? Yes, an Empire-builder she wants to be for her Brahman disciples whose empire over the rest of the Indian population has been a fast vanishing influence under the Government of the justice-loving British nation."

JUSTICE, Madras, Nov. 5th, 1917.

Mrs. Besant and the Moslem interned.

6. The Hindu, of the 7th November, writes :—"The statement relating to the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali made to the Indian public by Mrs. Annie Besant through a telegraphic message published in New India, and republished elsewhere, will be read with deep disappointment throughout the country. Neither the attitude of the Government of India nor Mrs. Besant's manner of dealing with it would be viewed with satisfaction by the Indian public. To most people in the country Mrs. Besant's intervention in this matter would not have appeared as judicious under the present juncture; and its result was a foregone conclusion. . . An influential deputation composed of some of the prominent Hindu and Muhammadan leaders throughout the country would have had greater chances of making its voice heard with effect, than a representation from Mrs. Besant. . . We have no doubt whatever that Mrs. Besant did her best to endeavour to persuade the Viceroy of the justice and necessity of releasing Mr. Muhammad Ali and his brother. We are not, however, satisfied that the grounds on which Mrs. Besant seeks to palliate the attitude of the Government are at all sound."

THE HINDU, Madras, Nov. 7th, 1917.

Writing on this subject, Justice, of the 8th November, says: "The distinguished 'ally' of the Government of India has done her duty by the innocent Muslims who joined the Home Rulers in their cry for the release of Mrs. Besant. Herself a quondam 'interned,' she was granted an interview by the Viceroy so that she might plead the cause of the Muhammadan brothers who are undergoing internment. Mrs. Besant, with or without the permission of the Viceroy, gives an account of the interview in a telegraphic message published in Tuesday's New India. . . We have all heard of the fox which having got into a pit induced a goat to come down, and mounting on its back effected an escape leaving the goat in the pit. Muhammadan sympathy was enlisted for Mrs. Besant during her internment and now that Mrs. Besant is released, the Muhammadans are left in the position in which they were before her release with regard to the help which could be afforded to the Comrade editors. . . True to her undertaking that she would endeavour to secure a calm atmosphere for Mr. Montagu, she counsels patience to her Muhammadan supporters. The Government of India are right from their point of view. Mrs. Besant gives the Government of India a certificate of sincerity and honesty. . . The Government of India should be mightily pleased with this testimony from one who has not always thought well of them. But who is this confident of the Government of India who gives out Government secrets? 'We know who he is. He comes from Sheffield.' Is he not the Madras Mail's emasculator-in-chief of the Government of India? If, as Mrs. Besant says, the present critical stage of the war alone prevents the Government from releasing the interned brothers, why does she not advise the Muhammadans to acquiesce in their decision? She would on the other hand help them to fight it out in courts of law, with all the public excitement which such suits must necessarily cause. She would act as their honorary treasurer. She would place at the disposal of Muhammadan friends papers prepared for her own case. But why does Mrs. Besant play this double role of apologist of the Government of India and of an adviser of agitation (not violent of course) to the Muhammadans? She wants their support in her Home Rule propaganda. They should support her in the Congress chair. So she turns the hose on the whole system of Government and asks the Muhammadans to join her in attacking the whole citadel. . . This is how the distinguished 'ally' of the Government of India supports them in the eye of the Indian public, calling them a foreign Government and imputing to them want of courage and statesmanship.

JUSTICE, Madras, Nov. 8th, 1917.

"If the Muhammadans are wise in their generation they will have nothing to do with a person who uses them for her own purposes, drops them when necessary, only to pick them again when it suits her. But what is one to think of a Government who allow a person whose freedom they had not long ago restrained to stand forth as the vindicator of their ways before a highly sensitive people like the Muhammadans whom she befriended before she entered into a co-operative alliance with them?"

Justice, Madras, Nov. 8th, 1917.

The Zamindars and Home Rule.

7. Writing under the heading "Pull Devil; Pull Baker", Justice, of the 8th November, observes: "The Hindu announces the 'awakening of the zamindars. We never heard it called by that name before. A manifesto signed by several zamindars and published in the local papers expressing the opinion of the signatories against Home Rule was, according to the Hindu 'brought about by reactionary non-official and official influence' and the adoption by the 'Landholders' Association of a mutilated Congress and Muslim League scheme by a majority of one is called the awakening of the zamindars. The so-called awakening is nothing more or less than the capture of certain zamindars by Brahman Home Rulers. . . The Brahman has always been attached to the zamindar as a parasite. We have seldom come across a zamindar who is not accompanied by a Brahman parasite. And now the parasite turns adviser. Ever since the anti-Home Rule manifesto was issued by some of the zamindars, Brahman activity to capture the zamindars for the Home Rule agitation has been most pronounced. Apparently some of the zamindars have now been captured. We are credibly informed that included in the majority who voted for the adoption of the modified Congress scheme were some Brahman vakils who were acting as proxies for absentee zamindars. . . The zamindars are modest and therefore only want representation in the British House of Commons and House of Lords in order that they may take part in the management of the affairs of Great Britain. This is only tit for tat. Since Great Britain has interfered in the management of Indian affairs for such a very long time it is time that the Indians interfered in the management of the affairs of Great Britain. The suggestion is highly practical and is sure to be granted even before Mr. Montagu leaves India. . . Apparently the piece de resistance of the zamindars' scheme is to be found in resolution No. 12 which says that 'some of the important ancient zamindaris in India should be raised to the status of Ruling Chiefs or at least admitted to the honors and privileges accorded to the latter.' When the Home Ruler asks the man in the street to attach a signature to the monster petition, he offers him the inducement of the coming Utopia where nobody pays any taxes. . . . But the inducement offered to the 'enlightened' zamindars to swallow the Congress League scheme is the prospect of pop guns and other paraphernalia of Ruling Chiefs. The Natives States in India as they exist at present are inhabited by people who have never been British subjects. Their existence is based on existing treaties. But to convert the inhabitants who for several generations have been British subjects into subjects of Native States, is a proposition which even Commander Wedgwood will find it rather hard to support. . . . The awakening of the zamindars has done nothing more than divide the zamindars also into two opposing camps of Home Rulers and anti-Home Rulers. There is no harm in that. We suppose that both these parties of zamindars will appear before the Viceroy and the Secretary of State and represent their views; and since the Secretary of State is expressly coming over to India to listen to the opposing views on Indian questions let him have a run for his money. Let him find out that the old days of unanimous Congress resolutions are over and that we in this country are capable of thinking for ourselves and having our party differences, and if there are any who cannot think for themselves the Brahman Home Rulers will do that job for them".

8. Justice, of the 9th November, remarks:—"We are sorry that we are not in a position to satisfy the curiosity of many correspondents who have written to ask about the details of the movements of the Secretary of State for India. . . . Many want to know whether Mrs. Besant will be one of the party. We do not know. Others suggest that if she is not to be one of the party whether it is not advisable to include her in the party in order that she might be available to put right if anything goes wrong in the carefully prepared 'calm political atmosphere'. We do not think it is absolutely necessary that both the architects of the calm political atmosphere should be included in the party. It would, we think, be sufficient if one of them is there, and as the Viceroy, we understand, is to be one of the party he would be able to undertake temporary repairs if anything goes wrong with the calm political atmosphere."

IV.—Native States.

9. The Karnataka, of the 3rd November, has the following:—"It is both astonishing and disgusting how the week-end politicians of our Representative Assembly air their views in an easy style regarding the great reforms that Mysore is supposed urgently to need. For fifty weeks in the year these gentlemen keep quiet as if they were conscious of nothing for Mysore to improve or innovate. All of a sudden, the curtain rises on the Assembly stage—twice in the year now—and we are treated to an almost endless palaver of perfervid public spirit. All sorts of representations—from sublime to stupid, from serious to silly—are pressed upon the ear of an indulgent Government; and the confabulation closes with none the wiser for it."

The Mysore Representative Assembly.

Karnataka, Bangalore City, Nov. 3rd, 1917.

In a further article on this subject, the Karnataka, of the 7th November, says:—"If there is one thing, more than another, which the latest session of our Representative Assembly has served to prove and confirm, it is this: that the assembly is at present suffering from an unendurable amount of morbid flatulence and that steps should at once be taken to replenish and strengthen the purificatory and vitalizing elements in its constitution. 'Numbers' who delight in speaking for speaking's sake should be compelled to make room for members with whom speech is the result of study. In other words, the time is come, as we have so often pointed out for the establishment of a distinct 'party' in the assembly—with an intelligent mind and an intelligible programme. . . . There has developed in the assembly of late a type of pseudo-leadership—a parvenu spirit which defies all laws of propriety and practicality. Impertinence is made a substitute for independence and wordy vehemence is made to do duty for soundness of argument. Plausible proposals—which no doubt may be to a certain extent based upon facts and may yield an amount of sound sense after careful analysis—are so urged with an extravagance of demagogic abandon that the cause only suffers by the advocacy. . . . The Diwan has spoken of the 'self denying labours' of members of the committees of the Representative Assembly. Every one knows that this mere conventional compliment—bland 'bunkum' to speak in Yankee style".

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

Vartakamitran, Tanjore, Oct. 4th, 1917.

Emigration to Fiji.

10. Adverting to the description by a gentleman in New Zealand of the Indians as an uncivilized people devoid of all good qualities, a correspondent to the Vartakamitran, of the 4th October, says:—This gentleman has evidently formed this impression of the Indians from those in the Fiji Islands. The reason for the deplorably immoral condition of the Indians in these islands is the disproportion in numbers between the male and the female settlers there. The Fiji Islands, the northern portion of Australia and some parts of South Africa are not in such a condition as to be colonised by any other races than the Indians. That is why the European planters get Indian coolies there, but they are intent only upon making a profit by means of the labour of the Indians and do not care about the advancement of the latter. Why should our countrymen help to enrich the pockets of these evil-minded Europeans? Of course, the emigration of indentured labourers to foreign countries has now been prohibited under the Defence of India Act. Why should the Defence of India Act be applied to this purpose? Why cannot the very system of indentured labour be abolished? Evidently the fear that it might reduce the income of the Europeans stands in the way. The loss of money to the Europeans is considered more important than the loss of honour to the Indians! It is understood that the Government of India have been asked whether Indian officials would be prepared to go to Fiji on a salary of between £100 to £200 a year for managing the Indian coolies there. No Indian should go to such a distant place for this low salary. The Indians should not proceed to this place until they are given all the privileges enjoyed by the Europeans.

Swadesamitran, Madras, Nov. 1st, 1917.

War in Italy.

11. Referring to the Austrian advance upon Italy, the Swadesamitran, of the 1st November, observes:—Last year the Austrians made an advance on Italy under the impression that the Russian Army had been weakened. But, as the Russians defeated the Austrians in a few days, the Austrian forces in Italy had to fall back and hasten to the Russian front. A similar attempt is being made this year. Even now the situation in Russia has made it possible for the many Austrian contingents in the Russian front to come to Italy. But this year the Russian Army is not in a position to give timely assistance as it did last year. Besides this, the Austrians advancing upon Italy are helped also by some German contingents. It need not be stated that the condition of the Russian front and the season are helpful to the Germans. In this very season last year the Austrian and German forces together brought about the surrender of Roumania and in the same season in the year before the last these two forces conquered Servia Some British papers are anxious about the present situation and call upon the British to give proper assistance to Italy lest it should share the fate of the aforesaid two countries. But there can be no comparison between Italy and those two small States. As the Servian Army was in a deplorably weak condition at the end of 1915, the assistance of the French and the British did not help it much and it had to surrender to the forces of General Von Mackenson. The Roumanian Army, though larger in numbers, was defeated in spite of the assistance of the Russians, on account of inexperience on the field of war and the incapability of its commanders. But the condition of the Italian Army is quite different. Though the Italians might not have expected that the Austrians in the Russian front would turn upon them, the latter are not very strong and especially they are not stronger than the Italian forces. In addition to numbers, there is the experience gained by the Italians for the last two and a half years. Besides this, the French and the British are in a position to help Italy by sea. Roumania was surrounded by the enemy and was not in a position to have any communication with other allies than the Russians. But Italy is not in this predicament; nor is she a country without good port or railways like Servia She has again an abundance of implements of war and British guns are already assisting them. We daresay that the Italian Army which is far stronger than the enemy can well protect its country, and the French and the British are prepared to render all possible assistance. It may be the motive of the present Austrian advance upon Italy is to gain possession of its northern part with the products available therein and then to defeat the Italian army. The Germans may also expect that this advance may necessitate a portion of the French and British forces in the western front being sent to the assistance of the Italians which will naturally reduce the pressure on them (the Germans) in the western front. But even if the French and British carry on mighty operations in the western front, it will not affect the Italian front much, for the enemies in the western front are Germans, while most of the opposing forces on the Italian front are the Austrians. So the allies should give direct assistance to Italy.

The Swadesamitran, of the 3rd November, reverts to the same subject and says:—When the London papers expressed their anxiety at the present predicament in Italy and were afraid that she might share the fate of Servia and Roumania, many thought that they were exaggerating the juncture in Italy. Still, the telegrams received today about the retreat of the Italians make us doubt whether the fear entertained by these papers can be said to be entirely unfounded. We see from the telegrams that the Italians have been forced to give up all the places they captured in Austria within the last two years and that the enemy has advanced for 20 miles inside Italy. Though the enemies claim to have captured enormous number of troops and abundance of ammunition, we do not think that they could have seized much of ammunition, as the Italians are stated to have destroyed all their munition stores. We learn also that all internal dissensions in Italy have disappeared on account of this reverse and we will mention here the opinion expressed by a military expert that Italy cannot be destroyed.

12. The Hindu Nesan, of the 3rd November, writes:—Though the retreat of the Italians communicated by Reuter is rather discouraging and gives room to anxiety, the Germans cannot devastate Italy. — HINDU NESAN, Madras, Nov. 3rd, 1917.

The war.

Judging of the loss of ships sustained by the British during the last week, the fact that, though the number of submarines is said to be increasing, there is a fall in the tonnage of ships sunk, is a matter for gratification

The Dravida Patrika, of the 7th November, writes:—Ever since the war began, we have been regarding every new move of Germany to be her last attempt. Some days back, when the Germans attacked Riga, we expressed the same opinion. Before the thought of the invasion of Riga could be forgotten by us, we have the news that the Germans have invaded Italy. The Italians are stated to have withdrawn into their territory and we are informed that the opposing forces are much stronger in numbers than the Italians and that they are led by very efficient German commanders. Such being the case, the allies should not treat this matter lightly. No doubt the Italians are very experienced in war and with the timely help of the allies they will surely drive away the Germans who are now inside Italy. But, if this is to be, the allies should immediately help them in several ways. Of course the Englishmen are not timid people like the person, who seeing his friend about to be attacked by a tiger, got upon a tree to save himself. If, as is stated by many, this is the last attempt of Germany, we can take it that the help now rendered by the allies will end the war. — DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 7th, 1917.

The war.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 3rd November, says:—The German armies are crossing the mountain ranges which form the crown of Italy and are entering that country. The Italians have given up the positions they had occupied for two years and a half with great prowess, and are retiring. But they have destroyed behind them the ammunitions, the bridges, provisions, etc., so that the Germans may not get the benefit of them. When the holy land of Italy is trodden by the Germans, which Italian's heart will not burn with patriotism? As the enemy goes on advancing, the internal dissensions of the Italians are disappearing and their unity is being strengthened. Some timid people ask if Italy also will share the same fate as Roumania and Servia. Italy has sufficient strength. They will certainly have help from the Allies. The Americans announced that they would help. There is therefore no occasion for fear. — KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Nov. 3rd, 1917.

The war.

13. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Swadesamitran of the 5th November, refers in detail to the present political condition of Ireland and the stage at which the question of granting home-rule to her is, and observes:—Whatever — SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Nov. 5th, 1917.

The political condition in Ireland.

the decision of the convention brought into existence for determining this question finally may be, it will be advantageous only if the different parties in Ireland agree to this decision. If, on the other hand, any one party is opposed to it, the British Cabinet should evince an interest in the matter of reconciling this party. From a scrutiny of the history of Ireland, it is clear that it is only if the system of Government decided upon for this island gives satisfaction to all classes of people in it, that it will benefit not only Ireland but the whole Empire.

Arabia.

14. In giving a short history of this country, the Dravida Patrika, of the 7th November, makes the observation that, if the Arabians had been a civilized nation, they could have gained a control over the Suez Canal, which is now in the hands of the English, and centred the trade of the world in their hands, and that they could have utilised the Persian Gulf for purposes of trade by laying a railway similar to the one now laid by the Germans in the eastern end of Arabia.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 6th, 1917.

The importance of the Italian theatre.

15. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 6th November, says:—There are facilities for shelter for the Germans on the upper part of the Tagliamento. With mountain ranges in the rear, the enemy may bring pressure to bear on the retiring Italians. To avert such an evil, the Italian army will have to go as far back as the Plave—60 miles beyond the Plave there is the valley of Ediji. If the Italians go there, they will have a good position to fight from. They can then have a single war front. It will then be difficult for the enemy to make a stand. Though it may be convenient for strategic purposes that the Italians should go so far as Ediji, that will not be proper from a political point of view. To surrender the whole of Venetia to the enemy will be discouraging to the people. So it may be supposed that there will be a great battle between the Tagliamento and the Plave. It appears that the Italians have retreated because they were outnumbered by the enemy's forces. The English and the French have not left the Italians alone. Mr. Lloyd George and others went to Italy. A portion of the English and the French forces has landed in Italy. . . Taking a far-reaching view, it may be stated that the Italian offensive is favourable and not unfavourable to the allies. The German invasion will help the spring offensive of the English and the French, and the final victory of the allies.

II.—HOME ADMINISTRATION.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Oct. 31st, 1917.

Prison reform.

16. The Dravidan, of 31st October, expresses its opinion that the existing jails are not suited to the modern times and that the punishments inflicted, though appearing to be very severe, have not been instituted in such a manner as to reform the prisoners and referring to the resolution of Mr. Ramayaningar in the Imperial Legislative Council in 1914 suggesting the desirability of appointing a committee to consider about the question of jail-reform and the sympathetic observations of Sir Reginald Craddock at the time indicating the readiness of the Government also to move in this matter, says:—

No committee has yet been appointed, though it is three years since it was suggested. As this matter forms a main basis for our civilization and social reform we should, without the least delay, request the Government to do the needful. It is a blind belief on the part of many that very severe punishment will reform offenders speedily. On the other hand it only serves to harden the minds of offenders still further. So we trust that our benign Government will take the necessary steps to reform the prisoners on the best lines they deem fit.

(d) Education.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

The Indian social injustice and the educational system.

17. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Dravidan, of the 30th October, while admitting that the advent of the British rule removed many of the obstacles that were thrown in the way of the education of the lower classes by the previous Brahman predominance, deplores that the educational prospects of the lower classes are in no way very bright even now partly on account of the plea of want of funds on the part of the Government and partly on account of the traces of the baneful effect of the caste system continuing still, as can be seen from the difficulty experienced by the children of the depressed classes in getting admission to schools and, remarking that it is the want of education that is responsible for the destruction of the industries of the country and the suffering of the working classes, including agriculturists, observes that, as both the Government and the popular leaders are responsible for this state of affairs, it is the duty of the Government on the one hand to devise easier methods, than what are in vogue now, for spreading education among the poorer classes and that of the popular leaders on the other to take an interest in the matter and make the ordinary parents realise the value of education and encourage their children to have it.

Commercial education.

18. A correspondent, signing himself K. K. Sami, makes the following suggestions regarding the improvement of commercial education in this country in an article contributed by him to the Vartakamitran of the 4th October:—At the outset schools, which, with the name of commercial schools, impart only such instruction as befits students for clerk's posts should be separated from those that give purely commercial education. The teaching of foreign languages should be made compulsory in these schools. Really intelligent students should be given scholarships. Students should be attracted to such schools by offering them several facilities such as low fees, scholarships, etc. Every commercial school should have a museum containing commercial products attached to it. Instructions in these schools should be imparted only through the vernaculars. The worldly knowledge of the students studying therein should be improved by their being taught about the economic condition of India, the foreign countries in which there is a demand for Indian raw products and the facilities that exist for each benefiting the other. Lastly, the Government should render assistance in several ways. At present, statistics regarding Indian trade are not available for the people. Copies of these statistics should be supplied to each commercial school and lessons on such statistics given to the students. It is by means of such measures and by the Government co-operating with the people that our commercial education can improve and our merchants can with a wider knowledge improve their economic resources.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Oct. 7th, 1917.

Educational progress.

19. The Dravidan, of 1st November, while refuting the statement of those who complain that the British Government pay no attention whatever to education in this country, admits that there are some defects in the present system of education and makes the following suggestions to remove the same and to improve education generally:—

DRAVIDAN, Madras, Nov. 1st, 1917.

(i) The Government should open a larger number of schools and see that every village has at least one school in it.

(ii) Night schools should be started for the benefit of the children of the labourers, who have to work for their living in the day time, and free education imparted to them therein.

(iii) Scholarships should be given to all deserving students.

(iv) The Government should grant sites free to philanthrophists among the people, who come forward start schools, for the school buildings to be raised thereon and give also liberal annual grants as a matter of encouragement.

(v) All unnecessary expenditure should be curtailed by the Government and the savings resulting therefrom utilized for starting new schools. 'Want of funds' should no longer obstruct the cause of education.

(vi) The popular leaders also should take steps to create an enthusiasm in the people and to make them send their children to school, for one of the reasons why, in spite of the active efforts of the Government to spread education, the number of educated persons in the country is so small is that ordinary people do not realize the value of education and send their children to schools.

Students and their views.

20. The Vaisyamitran, of the 29th October, takes exception to the authorities of the Presidency College, Madras, in having revoked the scholarship of a student for his having freely expressed some opinions in an essay and observes that even, if there is anything wrong about the spirit of students, the college authorities can rectify it by good advice.

VAISYAMITRAN, Dēvakōttai, Oct. 29th, 1917.

DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 7th, 1917.

21. The Dravida Patrika, of the 7th November, writes:—For a long time the Madras Mail and other Anglo-Indian papers have been jealous of students gathering in large numbers to hear political speeches. In referring to the lectures of patriots like Mrs. Besant and Madan Mohan Malaviya, these papers, which are inimical to home-rule, used to say that such patriots addressed a mass of students, who were making so much noise as not to allow the lecturers proceed. As if this will not do, these papers have again been attributing the enormous failures in the University examinations to the students having attended political meetings. This is a lie of the basest character. We cannot understand how the attendance of students at public meetings which are usually held in the evenings, a time at which the students take rest, can lead to their failure in examinations. Somehow, whenever an order is issued by the Government on any subject, the Madras Mail used to have its say on the same subject on the previous day. This was the case even with G.O. No. 559. Lord Pentland did not give his best consideration to this subject. This child of Lord Pentland requires a good number to nurse and foster it; but no one will come forward to undertake this duty. The Principals, who attended the Principals' Conference held some months back, declared that it was impossible to nurse this child and that the fittest thing would be to throw it away, as the Spartans of old did, on a high mount to furnish a hearty meal for the crows and the vultures. Moreover, the sight of this child is too dim for it to secure its food of its own accord. It has to be done for it by others. So its victims, the students, being young take care to actively hide themselves from its view Though it is six months since this Government Order was passed, the students are still attending political meetings in thousands It is only among students that one can find enthusiasm and ardour The members of the young India party, which has sprung up in Bombay are all youths and not old men But, by saying these things, we should not be taken to approve of students attending political meetings in contravention of the Government Order. We only want to point out that it has not been possible to give effect to this Government Order. The Headmasters and Principals of institutions have perhaps oral instructions to find out students who attend political meetings. When there is a general complaint that the present lot of schoolmasters is to do more work and get less pay, they have to thank their own stars for their having been asked to do also police or Criminal Investigation Department work as a part of their duty without any increase of salary. We thought that it would be hard to come across a teacher who would haul up a friend's son as having attended a political meeting. But we regret to note that we were entirely in the wrong; for Mr. Shankunni, the Principal of the Victoria College, Palghat, has come in to claim this honour. Similarly, three colleges and all high schools in Nagpur have been closed. When the parents are giving English education to their boys at a great sacrifice, what can they do, if the schools themselves are closed? Has this Government Order come in to obstruct education altogether? Though, at present, students have, with an unparallelled patience, to gather in their brains much of useless matter and the majority of the lessons they read are of no use to them in after-life, they will no longer like the idea of their being kept in a subordinate position. Their sense of self-respect has been undergoing this change for the last fifty years and the fact that the students in the aforesaid colleges have not yet joined is a sufficient proof of this. When every one demands political privileges, should not the students have a right of managing their affairs as best as they can. Students in colleges are all of them over sixteen years of age, and, as such, have the capacity of discriminating between good and evil. To say that serious harm would result from a student listening to a speech of his father in a conference betokens gross want of intelligence. It is a mistaken impression that boys should have a better regard for paid teachers than for their parents. No scheme has yet been framed to give free and compulsory education to the children. The parents have, with great difficulty, to manage to pay the school fees for their children. Why then should the supervision of these children be subject to Government Orders? If, as is obtaining in the western countries, the Government meet the expenditure for educating these children, they will be justified in claiming to supervise the education. But, if the Government expect to have a control over education when it is the parents that pay for it, we do not think that the latter will agree to such a proposal.

G.O. No. 559 and the students.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 2nd, 1917

22. The Andhrapatrika, of the 2nd November, says:—That one Mr. V. Venkata Rao has written to the New India saying that he received reliable information to the effect that an Andhra University will be soon established at Rajahmundry.

An Andhra University.

Spread of education in India.

23. The Andhrapatrika, of the 5th November, says :—Speaking on behalf of Mr. Montagu in the House of Commons, Mr. Fisher said that on account of the war, endeavours to spread education in India have been slackened. If this gentleman be the same Mr. Fisher that is spending large sums of money for spreading education in England, will he inform us why there are no such obstacles in England and clear our doubts ?

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras. Nov. 5th, 1917.

The Headmasters' Conference.

24. Referring to the proceedings of the recent Headmasters' Conference, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 2nd November, observes :—The Hon'ble Mr. Stone who presided over the Conference did not forget to throw cold water on the resolutions at the very outset by remarking that he was not bound to give effect to the resolutions passed at the Conference. It is therefore doubtful how far the resolution urging an increase in the pay of headmasters will be given effect to. We may trust, however, that Mr. Stone, for his own part, will do his best in this matter. Another important resolution passed at the Conference was that elementary science, history, etc., of the British Empire, and other subjects of group B in the high school classes should be taught in the vernacular. This must be deemed to augur well for the future of the Indian vernaculars. Since the subjects of this group do not form part of the University examinations, it is of little consequence, however, whether these subjects are taught in the vernaculars or in English.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Oct. 31st, 1917.

Plague at Bantwal (South Kanara).

26. Referring to the outbreak of plague at Bantwal (South Kanara), and the urgent need of some improvements in the sanitation of the town by constructing some new roads and removing the congestion in some quarters by means of suburban extensions, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 2nd November, says that the measures indicated by the President of the Mangalore Taluk Board in this connexion would require about Rs. 10,000 and that it is to be hoped that the Government will promptly offer the necessary pecuniary aid and help to eradicate the plague from a town which is already a hot-bed of malaria.

(h) Railways.

The East Indian Railway.

27. The Vartakamitran, of the 4th October, refers to the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Sir Rahmat-ul-lah in the Imperial Legislative Council suggesting that the Government of India should take over the East Indian Railway after the expiry of the lease in 1919 and manage it, and makes the following general observations regarding the desirability of the railways in a country being managed by the Government :—Though the major portion of the income of the railways in India is contributed by the third-class passengers, no railway has done anything for the convenience of these passengers. It is all the same whether the railways exist or not, as long as they do not attend to the convenience of the public. Moreover, the merchants are put to serious hardship on account of the scarcity of waggons and there seems to be some truth in the complaint that the authorities of the South Indian Railway in Madras attend first to the needs of the European companies. When the workmen in the workshop in the Great Indian Peninsula Railway at Bombay went on strike, the Directors of the Railway in England attached greater importance to the words of their officials in Bombay than to the hardships of their workmen. How can an administration conducted from a place 6,000 miles off from here be beneficial ? Our readers may be aware of the complaint of the Indian Chamber of Commerce in Bombay that, during the recent strike of the postmen there, the Postal officials had arranged to deliver letters properly to European companies and not to Indian merchants. When such mistakes occur even in a department under the direct management of the Government, what doubt is there of there being defects in the management of the railways by the railway companies ? Moreover, all the railways have been laid with the money of the Indians and the only right of the companies is that of running trains over them. Now all the profits derived from this business go to the English companies. All that our representatives demand is that these should go to the Indians.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Oct. 4th, 1917.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras. Nov. 7th, 1917

The Administration Report of the Salt Department.

28. In the course of its review of the Administration Report of the Salt Department for 1916–17, the Andhrapatrika, of the 7th November, says:—There was an increaseover the previous year in the number of officers who resigned their appointments. It cannot but be said that this is chiefly due to the arbitrariness of the bureaucracy. If graduates are appointed in this department irrespective of their caste or creed, there cannot be this evil. . . Not even one case connected with this department has been dismissed. The Magistrates cannot ordinarily dismiss such cases. Every one knows it. As a large number of accused persons were punished this year, Rs. 240–8–0 have been given away as rewards. We are at a loss to know why, while good salaries are being paid to the officers of the Salt Department, rewards also should be paid to them. The Hon'ble Mr. K. R. V. Krishna Rao once intimated that he would put a question in the Legislative Council regarding this. But we do not know what he has done in this matter.

The Defence of India Act.

29. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 2nd November, writes:—After the cancellation of the famous internments of Madras, we had thought there would be no more internments in India under the Defence of India Act for some time at least. We are now undeceived however by the report of another fresh internment published in the Modern Review. There was recently a riot between the Hindus and the Moslems at the time of the Bakr-id festival in Behar. On this occasion one Babu Asesh Kumar Bannerjee, a correspondent of the Amrita Bazaar Patrika and the Bengali, went to Arrah and gave publicity to certain facts regarding the riots. The local authorities thereupon accused him of spreading objectionable news and interned the Babu under the Defence of India Act. From the manner in which this Act is being put into operation ever since it was promulgated, we must observe that the authorities seem to pursue the methods of some of those quacks who have just one medicine which they prescribe for every conceivable disease and prefer this new well of a Defence Act in place of the ocean of a Penal Code (to drown a victim). When they can have as much water as is needed from this well itself why would they trouble themselves with that ocean of a Penal Code! Well!!

Gokhale's Education Bill and the officials.

33. In the course of a biographical sketch of Gopala Krishna Gokhale appearing in the Dravidapatrika, of the 31st October, the following remarks occur as to how the compulsory Education Bill introduced by him fell through in the Imperial Legislative Council:—When Mr. Gokhale moved his Education Bill in the Imperial Legislative Council in 1911, several officials raised many spurious objections on the side of the Government; but as he had drafted this Bill after careful consideration for many years, Mr. Gokhale had ready answers for all these objections. Till then, it was usual for the Indians in the Council to withdraw their suggestions, if such obstacles were raised on the official side. But, when Mr. Gokhale pointed out that every objection raised on the side of the Government against the Bill was groundless, the Government had no other alternative than to leave the matter to be voted upon. The Bill was, however, rejected, as the officials were in the majority.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, Nov. 5th, 1917.

Anglo-Indians.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 5th November, says:—The Anglo-Indians are afraid that after the grant of reforms to India their relations may not get high appointment easily. The resentment and sorrow, which they feel when they anticipate that the time of their sons ruling India like Padushas will come to an end, must only be imagined. They are at this juncture doing their utmost to obstruct the carrying out of the reforms. They are not aware that Mr. Montagu is acting in accordance with the spirit of the times. Thinking that he is acting against their interests, they are pouring the fire of their indignation over him. A correspondent to the Evening Standard says that India is disturbed with the idea that the Government are going to introduce dangerous reforms. He has not stated which people in India entertain such an idea. It may be said with some truth that some Anglo-Indians and a few Indians who followed them entertain that idea. But if the writer above-mentioned should say that fear regarding the reforms has overtaken the whole of India, his ignorance could not but invoke pity. The people do not know what reforms the Government are going to give them. The obstacles which the Anglo-Indians place in the way of Mr. Montagu, fearing that the days of their selfish ends are drawing to a close, have inspired the people with the fear that the forthcoming reforms may not be favourable to their advancement. This is borne out by the resolutions passed in the Gokhale Hall yesterday, protesting against the agitation of the Anglo-Indians. The contempt which this writer has for the educated classes is shared by the whole of the race to which he belongs. The reason for this is obvious. It is the educated classes that try to occupy equal positions with them. It is they that give publicity to the aims of the people. It is they that, in order to reduce their arbitrary authority, want self-government. The day on which they began to give education to the Indians was an evil day for their splendour. . . People like this writer have failed to take into their consideration the advantage of the empire, the objects of the war and the honour of England, but have been working for their own ends. English statesmen will not pay heed to the indignant utterances of the old-fashioned and despondent Anglo-Indians.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Nov. 6th, 1917.

The Anglo-Indians and Mr. Montagu.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 6th November, refers to the observation made by the Viceroy in his reply to the addresses presented by the Karachi Chamber of Commerce and the Muhammadan deputation that waited on him at Karachi, that both the Europeans and Muhammadans in this country should, in making their representations to Mr. Montagu about the reforms to be introduced in India, ascertain the opinions of other communities also on this matter and try to fit in their views with those of the others, and adds:—If, in the face of this appeal by the Viceroy, a few vain agitators among the Anglo-Indians preach that Mr Montagu should be boycotted by them socially, they are at perfect liberty to do so. It will not reflect any discredit on Mr. Montagu that a section of the Anglo-Indians is keeping away from him; nor is there any necessity for, or any purpose to be gained by, his mixing with the Anglo-Indians, who are spreading scandals about him.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakottai, Oct. 29th, 1917.

Mr. Montagu and the Anglo-Indian agitation.

Referring to the agitation carried on by the Anglo-Indians against Mr. Montagu in the matter of his pronouncements in Parliament about the reforms to be introduced in India, the Vaisyamitran, of the 29th October, observes:—"We have to conclude that avarice and self-interest are after all at the bottom of this agitation. These Anglo-Indians are holding all the high appointments in the Government and, by taking the lead in the industrial and commercial concerns of this country, are making enormous profits by utilising Indian labour and raw products to their own advantage. That is why they resent the demand of the Indians for reforms. They are trying to mar the spirit of union among the people, as they are afraid that such a union will be prejudicial to them. Their idea is that, if the Indians get home-rule, their influence would be curtailed. But truth will win and, as a divine spirit of liberty is spreading among the Indians, these Anglo-Indians can no longer treat them with contempt. Brethern! do not be led away by the words of these Anglo-Indians. The home-rule propaganda carried on by our leaders is not intended to benefit the Brahmans alone but all classes. So, let us all co-operate in making this work a success. We have a word to say to the Anglo-Indians. We would ask them to note that their objects can be fulfilled only if they have a fraternal love for the Indians. From the ancient time (i.e., the time when the whole of Europe was submerged in the darkness of barbarism), the Indians have been famous for their wisdom, religious knowledge, wealth and civilization. So, the statement that the Indians are not fit for home-rule is, on the face of it, a pretence set up by the enemies of Indian progress".

DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 7th, 1917.

The Dravida Patrika, of the 7th November, also attributes the Anglo-Indian campaign against Mr. Montagu to the fear of the Anglo-Indians that the racial hatred and distinctions which prevail in the existing administration and their arrogance as belonging to the ruling race will have to go to the wall, if India is granted home-rule.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

The Sahabad disturbances.

35. A correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 30th October, dwells upon the amity that existed between the Hindus and the Muhammadans from the time of Akbar and referring to the 650 arrests that are said to have been made in connexion with the recent disturbances at Sahabad, observes:—It is a matter known to all that, as the people have no power in India, the officials commit many mistakes, considering themselves to be the masters of the people and not their servants. When the subordinate officials, who have not a high standard of education, see that their superior officers entertain such a stupid notion in spite of their education they are prepared to cause every kind of inconvenience to the people, treating them like cattle, merely to satisfy their petty arrogance. So we request the authorities to direct the Police to arrest persons concerned in the Shahabad riots after a careful inquiry and to punish also such as are really guilty.

The DRAVIDAN, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

Stray notes.

36. The Dravidan, of the 30th October, has the following stray notes on a variety of subjects:—Water is bad; milk is adulterated; ghee is adulterated. If there is thus adulteration of every food-stuff, how can the people residing in the city live without disease or complaint? But if this adulteration is to be prevented, the people, Government and the merchants should all combine, as it affects the interest of all people.

The Surgeon-General regrets that proper facilities do not exist in the hospitals now for accommodating persons suffering from contagious diseases, and this is seen clearly in the case of the measures adopted in connexion with plague. When a patient, who is not in a position to move, is removed to a solitary plague camp and subjected to all kinds of restrictions, it affects him even more seriously than the disease.

So it is necessary that proper arrangements should be made for accommodating in hospitals also patients suffering from contagious diseases.

Stray notes

The Vartakamitran, of the 4th October, has the following stray notes on a variety of subjects :—

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, Oct. 4th, 1917.

The majority of the Universities in India only train students for clerks' posts. Though the Universities at Calcutta, Bombay and other places have made separate arrangements for scientific research, the Madras University has not taken any step in this direction. All the same, it grew wild with the Mysore University in the beginning.

* * * * * *

Though it is now 50 years since Universities where established at Calcutta and other places, why should scientific research and education be at a discount in India still? Though lakhs of rupees have been given to the Calcutta University for purposes of scientific research, it has not been able to produce more than a Bose and a Ray. What is the reason for this? Is it want of money or the incapability of the Professors of the University?

* * * * * *

It appears the Professor for Economics in the Calcutta University, when questioned by the Syndicate about his not having done the work entrusted to him properly, replied that he was subordinate to the Government and not to the University. What use can there be of professors who are provoked when questioned about a dereliction of duty. All this is due to the Government having a sort of control over the University.

37. Adverting to the proceedings of the meeting of the European Association held at Madras on the 23rd October 1917 for protesting against the statement made by Mr. Montagu in Parliament about the release of Mrs. Besant, a correspondent to the Dravidapatrika, of the 31st idem, says that one feature of the speeches made at the meeting was the vituperation showered on home rulers, who were characterised as a gang of seditionist, and observes :—We give the lie direct to the statement that we are seditionists. Can we become seditionists if we do not follow the example of the Anglo-Indians, who, having settled in this country and enjoying to the full all that it can afford, are always intent upon marring its progress? Is it sedition to seek the welfare of our country, to correct the capricious acts of the Government and work for bringing about a permanent union between the Englishmen and the Indians, or is it sedition to conspire against the Secretary of State, shower the worst invectives on the Viceroy or devise means of throwing the Government immediately into an abyss? Our people know well which of these constitutes sedition, and we need not point out that it is those, that adopt the latter methods are seditionists. But some may like to know why, contrary to facts, these Anglo-Indians call us seditionists. Evidently they are making much of the disloyalty of others in order to screen their own disloyal attempts. We are stated to be a small section intent on mischief. It is a known fact that we do not form a small section and the thoughtful have known for years that we are not given to mischief. We have never conspired to unseat ministers. We have never given support to the traitors to humanity like Mr. Curtis, who secretly worked to get 310 millions of people within their grip. In these circumstances the statement made by our European brethren that we have a tendency for mischief only indicates their stupidity or their great skill in uttering falsehood. Then again the Anglo-Indians claim to safeguard the interests of the ordinary people here and Mr. Welby is stated to raise a cry against reform only in the interest of our masses. One European predicted at the meeting that, if home rule was granted, the Brahmans would crush the ryots like anything. Let us take all these things for granted; what then? Have the hardships suffered by the ryots disappeared now? Have those who have been taking the life out of the ryots become good men now? However bad their lot may be under home rule, they can hardly be worse than what they are now.

Industrial facilities in England and India.

38. Referring to the observations of Dr. Addison of England dilating upon the necessity of scientific knowledge being applied for the purpose of finding out the possible uses to which raw products could be put and of opening libraries containing information on industrial and commercial matters at all industrial and commercial centres, the Swadesamitran, of the 31st October, asks:—"If there is a necessity for scientific research and libraries of industrial works in England, what are we to say of India?"

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Oct. 31st, 1917.

Shoeing declared to be no offence.

39. The Hindu Nesan, of the 31st October, takes exception to the pronouncement of Mr. Austin, the Sub-Collector of Rāmnād, that shoeing is no offence, and observes:—Every one in India will admit that shoeing is an offence and it has from time immemorial been considered an act of grave insult. But Mr. Austin thinks otherwise and has acquitted a man who was punished by the lower court for having beaten another with a shoe. If Civilians of the type of Mr. Austin are in the charge of Revenue divisions, no unjust acts will surely be committed there! This officer is a standing illustration of the fact that Civilians cannot understand the opinions and the sense of self-respect of the Indians, however long they may move with them. How can the Indian public be expected to have a regard for officials of this type who merely exercise authority without any idea of the customs and habits of our people?

The national assemblies and the Secretary of State for India.

40. The Swadesamitran, of the 1st November, welcomes the suggestion made in the Press that the Secretary of State for India should be invited to attend the session of the Congress and the Muslim League at Calcutta, and observes:—There is a mighty advantage indeed in the Secretary of State being present at the annual session of the Congress and the Muslim League. The head of a province, who was present at the Congress at Lucknow, seems to have told Mr. Muzumdar that he was convinced by what he saw that the Indians were fit for home-rule. Will not the same impression be created in the mind of Mr. Montagu? True it is one or two Provincial heads have attended the national assemblies before this. But, as a visit by a Secretary of State for India will have a special importance, we hope that the leaders in the country will take prompt steps in the matter.

The monster petition to Mr. Montagu.

41. A correspondent writing from Arasur in the Ponneri taluk to the Swadesamitran, of the 1st November, communicates the proceedings of a public meeting held at Puduvayal village in the same taluk on the 27th October 1917, in which the claim of Mr. P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar to represent the non-Brahmans was questioned and Mr. T. M. Krishnaswami Ayyar in appealing to those present to muster strong in signing the monster petition to be presented to Mr. Montagu is alleged to have referred to the fact that not even a single Bill brought forward by representative members in the local Legislative Council with a view to benefit the people was passed in it and stated that this was due to the official majority in the Council.

Monster petition to Mr. Montagu.

A correspondent from Devakottai contributes an article to the Swadesamitran, of the 3rd November, in which he gives the substance of the reforms demanded by the Congress and the Muslim League, and, appealing to the Nattukottai Chetti community to support these assemblies by affixing their signatures to the monster petition to be presented to Mr. Montagu, observes that the affairs of the Indians can be managed much better by themselves than by others.

A public meeting at Tuticorin.

42. The Swadesamitran, of the 1st November, publishes in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting recently held at Tuticorin under the auspices of the local Home Rule League and the Peoples' Association, when Mr. Krishnama Achariyar of Ottappalam is stated to have, in the course of his lecture on the "Present political situation in India and the Congress-Muslim League scheme of reforms", dwelt on the actions of the bureaucracy and the present pitiable condition of India and observed that India had a right to ask for home-rule. In his presidential speech, Mr. Michael is said to have endorsed the views of the lecturer and remarked that home-rule was required not in the interest of the Brahmans only but in the interest of all Indians and that the object of the present non-Brahman movement cannot succeed.

43. The Swadesamitran, of the 1st November, reproduces in Tamil a special cable said to have been received by the Pioneer regarding the comments of the Morning Post on Lord Curzon's objections to Mr. Montagu's being held responsible in his present official capacity for the speech he made prior to his appointment as the Secretary of State for India. This is published in English in the Hindu of the same date.

The Swadesamitran, of the 1st November, publishes the proceedings of a public meeting held at Satyamangalam on the 26th October 1917 when one of the resolutions passed demanded the immediate release of Messrs. Release of the Muslim interned.

The Swadesamitran, of the 3rd November, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a Muslim meeting held at Trichinopoly on the 30th October 1917 in which Mr. M. K. Muhammad Hanif the Secretary of the Young Muslim's Association, is reported to have observed, in moving a resolution demanding the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali, that the delay of the Government to release these leaders while they had released Mrs. Besant and others was creating a bad impression in the minds of seven crores of Muhammadans in India, who did not merit such a treatment at the hands of the Government, considering the sacrifices they have made in this war.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Nov. 6th, 1917.

Release of the Muslims interned.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 7th November, says:—Mrs. Besant sent a wire to the New India stating that she spoke to His Excellency the Viceroy about the interned Muhammadans, and that the authorities do not mean to release them because they are in sympathy with Turkey. We are at a loss to know what objection there can be to release them when responsible men stand security for them. It is necessary to satisfy the Muhammadans if a calm atmosphere is to be created. As in Ireland the political offenders should be pardoned. We request that the Government will see that all the Indians enjoy the benefit of the reforms they are going to give.

The Gōdāvari Non-Brahman Conference.

In commenting on the proceedings of the Godavari Non-Brahman Conference, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st November, says:—Government has to be carried on in accordance with the wishes of the people. The Congress scheme of reforms was prepared in pursuance of this principle . . . There does not appear to be much difference between the resolutions of the non-Brahman conference and the reforms laid down by the Congress. There is no reason why the conference has not approved of the Congress scheme fully. If, while agreeing to give full independence to the Provincial Governments, the rulers do not extend the powers of the people, the way will certainly be paved for the increase of arbitrariness. The fact that at the village of Tarimela more than a thousand royts have assembled under the presidentship of Diwan Bahadur Kesava Pillai and completely accepted Congress reforms shows the trend of public opinion in this country.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Nov. 2nd, 1917.

The Anglo-Indian agitation.

46. Adverting to the curious interpretation given by the Anglo-Indian papers to the words of Lord Curzon in the House of Lords, that Mr. Montagu was going out to India on the strict understanding that he would deliver no speech, the Swadesamitran, of the 2nd November, writes:—What we gather from the words of Lord Curzon is only that, as Mr. Montagu is going here to ascertain personally the views of leading men and institutions in this country regarding the reforms to be introduced, he will only conduct an inquiry and express no definite opinion. But the Anglo-Indian papers view these words in a different light and cry out that Mr. Montagu's hands have been tied up. Some papers are pleased to assert that Mr. Montagu will be practically interned while he is in India and those that accompany him do so only to watch his conduct. Of course the Indians are not unaware of the motive of the papers writing in this strain. But what impression would be created in the minds of the ordinary people by the Anglo-Indian papers writing like this day after day? Will not the attitude of the Government of India, who put up with this campaign of insult against Mr. Montagu, make the ordinary people think that the Government are only playing a part to please the Indians? We need not dilate upon the dangerous results that may ensue from the creation of such an impression. Even our popular leaders knowing the truth cannot but entertain small doubts in this matter; for requests made by certain institutions to the Local Government for permission to receive and entertain Mr. Montagu are stated to have been refused. We cannot understand the reason for this. Perhaps the Government thought that, as Anglo-Indians openly asserted that they would boycot Mr Montagu socially, it would give room to a misconstruction, if Indians were permitted to entertain him. If it is so, the remedy now adopted by the Government will, we can certainly say, not only create unnecessary misunderstandings but will also frustrate the very object with which it is applied.

Our readers will note that a new Anglo-Indian Association has been started in England to help the agitation now carried on by the Anglo-Indians. All the influential Anglo-Indians, who, having served in India, receive pensions from the Indian revenues, are now bent upon safeguarding the glory and influence of the men of their class and have begun to try to prevent the Indians, who pay them their pensions, from having the blessing of home rule. We have no fear from straightforward Englishmen. But the Anglo-Indians will try to tamper with the opinion of Englishmen by claiming to have a special knowledge and experience of Indian affairs. Our people should prevent this. Proper steps should be taken to acquaint England with the real situation here. The Government should be requested to see that the prestige of Mr. Montagu is maintained.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Nov. 2nd, 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 2nd November, reproduces in Tamil the proceedings of an Anglo-Indian meeting held at London, under the presidency of Lord Sydenham, when he is stated to have remarked that the release of Mrs. Besant was one of the greatest blunders ever committed by the Government of India. These proceedings appear in English in the Hindu of the same date.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Nov. 2nd, 1917.

The Hindu Nesan of the same date comments in the same strain upon the Anglo-Indian interpretation of the utterance of Lord Curzon in the House of Lords regarding Mr. Montagu and adds:—The enemies of the progress of India are evidently jealous of Mr. Montagu being favourable to this country and are reviling him in the worst language possible. They speak as if the British Cabinet hav eno confidence in Mr. Montagu and are sending others with him only on this account. If such language is used about Mr. Montagu, how can his prestige or dignity be maintained? If he is insulted like this, will it not reflect on the British Cabinet itself? What happens to one member of the Cabinet to-day may befall others also to-morrow. So this kind of writing should be immediately put a stop to. Both the British Government and the Government of India are bound to prevent a section of the Anglo-Indians in England and India insulting Mr. Montagu like this without realizing in the least that he is a high official vested with the responsibility of the Indian administration as an insult offered to him is an insult offered to the British Cabinet itself.

The Anglo-Indian agitation.

The Swadesamitran, of the 5th November, reiterates its resentment against the campaign of insult carried on by the Anglo-Indians and their press against Mr. Montagu and the refusal on the part of Local Government to grant permission to Indians to give entertainments to Mr. Montagu and, referring to the public meeting held at Gokhale Hall, Madras, on the 4th idem, to express the opinion of the Indians on this matter, observes that a perusal of the proceedings of this meeting will show that it is only the Indians that are loyalists at heart and that the Anglo-Indians, who are hostile to them, are only experts in securing their own interests. SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Nov. 5th, 1917.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Nov. 2nd, 1917.

Lord Sydenham.

The Swadesamitran, of the 6th November, refers to the statement of Lord Sydenham that, before introducing political reforms on a liberal scale in India, female education and social reform should be spread throughout the country, and quoting the apathy of the Bombay Government, when Lord Sydenham was the Governor, in the matter of a concession demanded by the people of Bombay for the grant of a free site for a Women's College and the active opposition of the same Government, during his tenure of office, to the Civil Marriage Bill introduced by Mr. Basu, as instances to prove that Lord Sydenham had really no sympathy for the advancement of female education or the spread of social reform in India, observes that the sympathy now evinced for India by the men of the type of Lord Sydenham is only a pretence. SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Nov. 2nd, 1917.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, Nov. 3rd, 1917.

51. The Swadesamitran, of the 3rd November, continues its comments on this subject from a previous issue and observes :—It is a point to be noted as to why, in spite of the enormous demand for tanned hides by the Government and the facilities for the export of this article being practically nil, the Government are not able to obtain an adequate supply of such hides. The skin merchants say that this is due to the rates offered by the Government not leaving them much of margin by way of profit, considering the quality and finish expected by the Government. There are only two ways of remedying this. Either the Government should increase their rates, or they should find out means to reduce the price of raw hides and tanning barks. If the second suggestion can be carried out, it is apparently unnecessary to think of the first, as it means wastage of money. The Government are stated to have prohibited the tanning of sheep or goat skins only with the second motive referred to above. They might have expected that, if this tanning was stopped, the demand for tanning barks would be reduced. But, it has to be noted that only tender barks are used in tanning sheep or goat skins and that they will not do much for tanning hides. The condition of those trading in tanning barks has also to be taken into consideration. These have invested large sums of money for taking out leases in forests for the supply of tender barks and the prohibition by the Government of the tanning of sheep or goat skins has come as a blow upon them ; for they are being put to much loss, there being no one to purchase the large stock of tender bark accumulated by them. So, if the Government had prohibited the tanning of sheep and goat skins in order to bring down the price of bark which was not much useful in the tanning of hides, they should have to be deemed to have acted without due consideration. But they might have thought that, if the tanning of sheep and goat skin was prohibited, the merchants doing this business would also take to the tanning of hides. If so, they should have encouraged the tanners by explaining the emergency to them and the results would have been quite satisfactory. As it is, the Government seem to have acted hastily on account of the emergency.

52. The Swadesamitran, of the 3rd November, reports one of the speakers in the Special Provincial Conference held at Lahore recently to have made the following statements in the course of a speech delivered by him condemning the enforcement of the Indian Press Act as being contrary to British nature :—I know of cases in which some moderate and respectable editors have been punished under this Act for having expressed what they felt, though they never wrote anything to wound the feelings of the officials. It is not only the papers conducted in English that suffer by this Act. The position of the vernacular papers is even more pitiable. The lot of these poor papers at the hands of the local authorities cannot be described. Why should influential papers which can be helpful to the interests of the country and the Government be enslaved? The Press Act might, perhaps, have been necessary in the olden days. It is not desirable to enforce hereafter a measure contrary to British nature.

the City, while in the mufassal the civil surgeons can be made to do the same work in the schools within their respective ranges. This paper is of opinion that the question of medical inspection should not be dropped or postponed on the plea of want of funds and suggests the desirability of the rules laid down by Sir George Newman in England for the purpose of safeguarding the health of the school-going population being adopted in India.

55. The Dravidan, of the 3rd November, publishes from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a non-Brahman meeting held at Vijayamangalam in the Coimbatore district on the 20th October 1917, in which several speeches are reported to have been delivered pointing out that it was not fair on the part of the Brahmans in towns to aspire for home-rule, while it was not necessary for the vast majority of the non-Brahmans in rural areas in their present condition, that it was these Brahmans, who, in the mediæval period, made the non-Brahmans follow their principles and duped them, that the Government should, without acting on the words of the educated classes alone, conduct the administration in accordance with the wishes of the generality of the people, that, as the village officials were only creating factions in villages to increase their own income, special efforts should be made to establish panchayats, so that the people might get out of the cruel grip of the village officials and manage their affairs themselves and that the Government should be requested to attend to the introduction of compulsory elementary education in this country, soon after the present stress caused by the war was over, as it was want of education that was at the bottom of the existing evils in India.

Under this heading the same paper says:—There is no antagonism between the social and the political sides of the awakening of the Panchamas. Those who take a narrow view of the Panchama movement, join hands with the enemies of the national movement and do harm to the mother country, are traitors, and the sooner they are removed from their honourable positions, the better for the country. The Indian nation should see its real nature. It should select honest men as its leaders. It should reject traitors to the country. Till then, there can be no regular progress. This is not the time to rake up the past, to judge by western standards the conditions prevailing in the east in ancient times, to insult the ancient sages, and set up races against one another. What we now want is reconciliation.

Achariyar is reported to have presided and delivered a speech dwelling upon the historical proofs, still in existence, of the attention bestowed by the ancient Hindu and Mussalman kings on the improvement of agriculture, industries and trade in this country, the hardships resulting to the cattle from the present restrictions of the Forest Department, which never existed in those days and the necessity of improving agriculture, trade and industries in the interests of the advancement of the country.

The present condition of India.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Nov. 6th, 1917.

61. Anent the enquiry now being conducted in the United Provinces about the cultivation of long staple cotton in India, in order to meet the demand of the Lancashire merchants for this kind of cotton, the Hindu Nesan, of the 6th November, says:—Though the incurring of a heavy expenditure by the Agricultural Department in India on the introduction of the cultivation of long staple cotton may be advantageous to the Lancashire merchants, it will not be beneficial to India. It will be foolishness on the part of the Indians to give up cultivation of grains at a small cost, which they used to do till now, and take to the cultivation of this cotton in order to enrich the Lancashire merchants. So, this matter should be kept in mind in the enquiry now conducted on this subject. Before going into the question of how far the cultivation of long staple cotton will be useful to the Lancashire merchants, the point as to how it will affect India and the Indian agriculturists should be considered.

66. The following observations occur in the course of a short biography of Mr. Bal Gangadar Tilak in the Dravida Patrika, of the 7th November:—He is one who very calmly accepted the imprisonment which he had as a reward for his having sought the welfare of India. The Anglo-Indians, who were jealous of his work for the progress of India and the confidence which the Indians had in him, began to misinterpret his religious fervour as an attempt to create disputes and dissensions between the Hindus and the Muhammadans. Even ordinary patriots would be anxious to remove the petty differences between the Hindus and the Muhammadans, even if any exist. So it is the height of ignorance to say that such a devout patriot as Mr. Tilak wanted to create enmity between the Hindus and the Muhammadans. He was not for any half easures connected with home rule to be introduced in India. The type of home ule contemplated by him for India can be said to be Indian rule not subject mostly the control of England. For expressing this view he was prosecuted for sedition nd convicted. The fact that a discussion of home rule was not against law was ade clear only two years back. So, the speeches of Mr. Tilak thirty years back ounded a jarring note on the ears of the Anglo-Indians. They criticised him very everely and he was again convicted for sedition in 1903. Ever since Mr. Tilak ent to jail, several Indians have taken a vow to work for their country. The xample of Mr. Tilak has now convinced numerous Indians that they will have to olly put up with every ordeal they may have to pass through in working for the elfare of their country and that the greater the suffering of the Indians the speedier ill India be benefited thereby.

Home rulers and hospitals.

67. The Vaiyamitram, of the 29th October, reports the officer in charge of the Ophthalmic Hospital, Madras, to have told a student of the Madanapalle College that there was no room in he hospital for home rulers and regrets that an Indian home ruler should be denied reatment in a hospital conducted by the money of the Indians.

Income-tax.

68. While appreciating the efforts of Mr. Tottenham, the Collector of Rāmnād, in collecting a large amount by way of income-tax in that district as a result of the appointment of account-nts with special qualifications to check the accounts of the assessees and assist the ollector in determining their incomes, the Pandiya Ne an, of the 29th October, bserves that, as the system of appointing such accountants, as an experimental easure, in the districts of Rāmnād, Madura and Madras for purposes of income-tax eems to work well, the extension of the system to other districts also may lead to he collection of a pretty large amount under the head of income-tax, without ncreasing its rate.

The Bakrid disturbances in Bihar.

69. Adverting to the Bakrid disturbances in Bihar, the Dravidapatrika, of the 7th November, observes:—It is a question to be considered as to why these disturbances should take place only in British India, while the Hindus and Muhammadans are moving quite amicably in Hyderabad and Mysore. Some Anglo-ndian papers say that they are due to want of union among us. This may be true. But why should the union existing between the two communities in the Native States lisappear in British India alone? The Amrita Bazaar Patrika points to our bureau-rats as being the root-cause of such disturbances. The bureaucrats do not seem to ave given up their mischief yet. No other explanation can be given for them.

The wealth of India.

70. In the course of an article contributed to the Dravidapatrika, of the 7th November, referring to the immensity of the wealth of India during the Moghul period, the following tatement finds a place:—The main reason why, though the people in India enjoy etter peace and safety under the British rule than was the case under the Moghul ule, India was far richer then than now is, that the Moghul kings resided in India, nlike the present rulers, who live in a distant land and whose visits to India can nly be compared to those of a bird to take its prey, and that, in those days, Indian noney did not flow into foreign countries as it does now.

An order for prosecution.

71. The Desabhimani, of the 23rd September, says that the District Magistrate of Guntūr directed the prosecution of Chatti Narasimha Rao, a member of the Executive Committee of the Guntūr Home Rule League, for carrying a photo of Mrs. Besant etc., in his arm to a neeting held at Guntūr, on the ground that he thus violated the order of the District Magistrate prohibiting any procession in connexion with the meeting. The paper emarks:—We were proud that our District Magistrate was a peaceful officer and hat the police would not interfere with the business of others unnecessarily. We egret that this has turned out to be an illusion.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, Oct. 21st, 1917.

73. The Hitakarini, of the 21st October says:—Mr. Muhammad Ali and his brother have stated that they would never conduct themselves in a hostile manner towards the Government politically, and that they would come foremost to unsheathe their sword against Turkey in politics. It is regrettable under such circumstances that the Government have not yet released them. . . . This has given room for the people to think in this manner: "In releasing Mrs. Besant, etc., the Government showed their love for their own race. The blood relationship has prevailed above everything else. This is partiality. If that is impartial why have the Government not released the Muhammadan brothers, etc.?" We hope they will think over the matter deeply, release the interned, and win fame. This year, the Muslim League cannot hold its sessions without Mr. Muhammad Ali as President. May all the Indians continue their strong endeavours to see that the Ali Brothers and others are released by the Government.

All went out. Two persons only were arrested and taken to the police station. The Deputy Collector went away taking with him the pictures and the fruits that were there. The Police pulled down the pandal. It is not known why the pandal of the Hindus was removed while that of the Muhammadans was not. We learn that the Hindus are therefore discontented.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 2nd, 1917.

76. The Andhrapatrika, of the 2nd November, says in its leader:—The dishonour done to Lord Sydenham in the House of Lords has not been enough. It was being said for a long time that a meeting of the Anglo-Indians would be held. Nothing could be more pleasant for the Anglo-Indians living happily in their native land with Indian money than to obstruct the advancement of India. As stated by the Mail, the visit of Mr. Montagu is deemed by them to be a danger to the country . . . The meeting of the Anglo-Indians was held in London. The resolution of Lord Sydenham in favour of the formation of an Indo-British Association was accepted by all with acclamation. If there be anybody who thinks that the release of Mrs. Besant is the chief cause of the agitation among the Anglo-Indians, today's telegram will clear their doubts. From a perusal of the summary of the speeches, it appears that the Anglo-Indians fear that the Indians may be given reforms. They are afraid that the prestige of their community as well as the strength of the bureaucracy may be affected in the country. To obviate such a catastrophe, they try to appoint a new association and run counter to the times. The House of Lords not responding to his suggestions, Lord Sydenham has begun to decry the Government for releasing Mrs. Besant. He is of opinion that unless the Government treats the people with arbitrariness, their prestige cannot be preserved, and that bureaucratic Government is a traditional right among the people of the east. According to his opinion, only those that behave subserviently to the Anglo-Indians are loyal . . . Mr. Shorrocks said that any delegation of financial powers to an elective body in India would result in chaos. There is nothing strange in these words. Statesmen are aware that the grant of financial independence to representative bodies means a reduction of the arbitrariness of the Anglo-Indians and assumption by the Indians of the responsibility of the Government. This is the undation of responsible Government. If the people are given authority over the xchequer, the princely comforts now enjoyed by the Anglo Indian traders will be educed, and the revenue of the country can no longer go to them. So this speaker ave expression to his natural fear. Sir John Hewett, who was the ruler of the nited Provinces, has not forgotten India. He has worked for not giving an Exeutive Council to those provinces and is still working for the advancement of those rovinces. . . When a few Anglo-Indians are governing thirty crores of Indians, hy should he suppose that educated Indians who number as many as the people of ngland cannot look to the administration of their own country? Commissioner ooth Tucker said that India enjoyed the greatest independence in the world. If at is so, it will be proper on his part to establish in his own country the system revailing here and justify his name. It will be possible neither for Lord Sydenam nor for his followers to run counter to the spirit of the times. They will no ore be able to obstruct the establishment of freedom than Mrs. Partington was able obstruct the current of the sea with her broomstick. While England is fighting r maintaining liberty in the world, will it not be ridiculous to attempt to suppress e desire of the Indians for liberty. The words of the Lord Bishop of Madras breathe e truth. He said: "We should understand that it is impossible to base Govern-ent on anything but the wishes of the Indians, and that in this country we are the rvants and not masters of the people." The Lord Bishop of Calcutta said on the ay of the war anniversary: "The first duty of the rulers is to give the people aining in self-government. If we do not apply our ideals to India, it will be ypocrisy to say before God that we have been working for liberty." We hope at English Statesmen will ponder over the objects of the war, and grant self-overnment to India without paying heed to the words of Lord Sydenham and thers.

The agitation of the Anglo-Indians in London.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 7th November, reproduces in Telugu from the Bombay Chronicle the proceedings of the meeting of Anglo-Indians in London, in which a speaker is reported to have said:—When the affairs of the eople of the East are considered, it is a great wrong to deem them human beings. hough they impose upon those who do not know India, and pose themselves as uman beings, they are not human beings.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 7th, 1917.

An Anglo-Indian meeting in ondon.

Another speaker is reported to have said:—It is a condign punishment that ay be dealt out to disloyal persons demanding political rights to see that they are anged.

Another speaker is reported to have asked:—Has the intellect of His Excellency the Viceroy become blunted? Or is he a puppet in the hands of a ew who has been appointed by a crazy and revolutionary Government?

Under this heading, the Desamata. of the 31st October, says:—Though Lord Lansdowne is ignorant of the changes that have taken place in India since his retirement, his love for the nglo-Indians dragged him into the discussion on the resolution of Lord Sydenham the House of Lords. He said that the release of Mrs. Besant has inspired the inds of many loyal people with fear, and spoke many such parrot-like words. . . ven Lord Curzon, who is considered to be the chief of the Anglo-Indians, has stified the action of Mr. Montagu, to the surprise of the Anglo-Indians.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Oct. 31st, 1917.

Anglo-Indian indignation.

77. The Andhrapatrika, of the 2nd November, says:—It is necessary to make India a strong portion of the Empire if India is to advance and the Empire become efficient. Mr. Churchill has already pointed to this necessity. In the present war the ndian soldiers have saved France from falling into the enemy's hands. If we think eeply, we will see that success in the war will necessarily depend upon the help of the ndians. India can supply innumerable forces. The materials obtainable in this ountry will be enough though the war may last for any number of years. But the ndian industries have to be developed for this. Repressive measures like the Indian rms Act should be repealed if the Indians should grow valiant. A navy and an air eet have to be formed in India. This requires money. To obtain money, the cost of he administration has to be reduced and the people should be given authority over the Industrial development in ndia.

exchequer. If the people are given administrative powers, they will gladly discharge their administrative responsibility. Then India will not add to the weakness of the Empire, but to its strength. So it is that the people and the far-sighted English statesmen have undertaken to prepare a scheme of self-government for India. At this juncture, the increase of the prosperity of the country depends on the Indians. Under the present bureaucratic Government, the Anglo-Indian traders wield the whole influence. At least when self-government is newly commenced, it is necessary that the Indian merchants should bring their influence to bear on the Government and make the country prosperous. Just as the Bank of Bengal and the Bank of Madras are a prop to the plantations in Assam and the Nilgiris respectively, so also should the swadeshi banks be to the swadeshi movement. As these facilities can be had under a system of self-government the Indian merchants should from this moment try to develop the Indian industries.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

78. The Andhrapatrika, of the 2nd November, says:—It is stated that Lord Henry Bentik, who is said to have shown sympathy for the people of Africa, is to accompany Mr. Montagu to India. Mr. Charles Roberts who is said to have regard for Mr. Gandhi is also coming with him. He has been distinguished for his love for India and may their visit prove advantageous to the country.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 3rd, 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd November, says:—Mr. Montagu is full of kindness, and wishes the welfare of the people. He will surely grant our desires. We hear that he is coming to our country with some restrictions, that he should not speak freely with anybody in our country, that he should not give out his views to anybody, that he should come here as a clerk, enter the affairs of the country in his diary, and express his opinions in England on his return there, and that he should not speak even one word in our country. Perhaps so long as he is in this country, the laws of this country will apply to him also. It is regrettable that an Englishman like Mr. Montagu submits to such restrictions. Has he no freedom of speech? May the Government at least free Mr. Montagu from such restrictions, having regard to the freedom of their race!

Hindus and Muhammadans in Kurnool.

80. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 2nd November, writes:—The Hindus in Kurnool who expected that the Magistrate would effect a reconciliation between them and the Muhammadans were disappointed. This has made the Muhammadans inimical to the Hindus. While music was going on in front of a Vysia's house, some Muhammadans dragged the musical instruments out and behaved riotously. The police constables there helped the Muhammadans, increased the commotion and threw the blame on the Hindus. While on the night of the 27th certain Muhammadans were going to the samēē tree in the guise of Jagadguru with Brahman disciples speaking indecent language, the authorities stopped them.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 3rd, 1917.

Self-government and the masses.

81. The Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd November, says:—It is indeed for the sake of the voiceless masses of India that Lord Sydenham is newly establishing an Indo-British Association. Nobody else takes the same interest in the welfare of the Indian masses as the Anglo-Indians. . . This disinterested kindness of the Anglo-Indians to the Indian masses and their labours to free them from the fetters of the advocates of home rule are, indicative of their liberality ! But if they examine their history, they will see the insignificance of the representation given to the people in the Parliament and other democratic institutions. The Amrita Bazaar Patrika gives a suitable reply in regard to this matter. In the House of Commons there does not appear to be much representation of the people. There is no representation at all of the people in the House of Lords. Yet the British Parliament is considered to be the abode of popular freedom. For a long time even the rich had no representation in the Parliament. In 1832 began the representation of the middle classes. Till 1885 the masses were not represented. After the commencement of the war, an agitation has appeared among the industrial classes about their rights. They are only now making efforts to maintain their rights. The war ideals of the equality of man and the freedom of the individual have inspired them with enthusiasm The Reynolds journal points out that many members of the Parliament lack the knowledge and the capacity required to enable them to represent the industrial classes and exhorts the industrial classes and trade unions to take pains to remove this state of things. It appears that the representation of the people is not efficient in England which has long been enjoying self-government. Yet in England, which has self-government, there has not happened any catastrophe. Under such circumstances, we do not see the propriety of Anglo-Indian pensioners imagining dangers that exist in no country and creating fears about self-government. What antagonism is there between the educated classes and the masses and what close relationship, between the bureaucracy and masses? The educated classes and the masses belong to the same country, speak the same language and follow the same religion. . . Their interests also are identical. The Anglo-Indians have no such relationship with the masses of India. Lord Sydenham and his followers have to say how, under such circumstances, the educated classes will subject the masses to difficulties and how the Anglo-Indians will undertake to save them. . . History makes it plain that in England awakening of the people only came after the grant of reforms, as evidenced by the report of the Parliamentary Committee established to enquire into the state of local self-government in England in the days when the people were not able to carry on even local self-government.

82. The Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd November, says :— An examination of the full text of the speech which Mr. Asquith delivered at Leeds on the 26th September makes those who advocate the division of the country on a language basis, enthusiastic. For the redistribution of kingdoms in Eastern and Central Europe, he enunciated the principle that they should be reconstituted according to social and historical traditions and according to the aims and aspirations of the people. It is in accordance with such principles that Indian leaders urge the necessity of dividing India into provinces based on the languages spoken. As in Europe, so in India also, such a reconstitution of the territories is a matter of necessity.

Division of the country into provinces.

83. The Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd November, gives the proceedings of a meeting held at Washermanpet at 6 p.m. on the 2nd November. It reports Mr. A. Rangaswami Ayyangar to have said :—When Mrs. Besant demanded reforms which the congress has been demanding for thirty years, the officers of the Government enforced rigorous measures. The Government then adopted peaceful methods. Signatures are now taken all over the country to the Congress-League scheme, in pursuance of Mr. Gandhi's suggestions. There is nothing fraudulent in this. In this country it is only in our presidency that differences of opinion exist.

Home Rule.

The paper reports Mr. Rangayya Nayudu to have said :—Though many advantages have been derived from the British Government, poverty has increased. Trade has gone into foreign hands. The handicrafts have declined. People had to go to foreign lands. . . . Unless self-government is secured, the non-Brahmans cannot make any progress in education and other things.

The paper reports Mr. Wadia to have said :—The agitation of the westerners is selfish. If we get Home rule, they will be the losers. The officers of the civil service will have no authority. The accumulation of immense wealth by the European merchants will be obstructed. That will annoy the Europeans who are so egotistic as to suppose that they are gods. This egotism should disappear. The Europeans need not leave India. They must treat us as their equals. The idea that they are superior to us should leave them. We are to suppose that in some matters they are not our equals. . . . They only know to blame Mr. Montagu. . . . Their loyalty appears only in decrying His Excellency the Viceroy.

Home Rule for India.

The Satyavadi, of the 6th November, writes:—India is ever on the onward march of progress, and a huge empire has been established. Is there any one who doubts that the grant of Home Rule will infuse a new spirit among the Indians? What kind of spirit, do you think, this will be? It will endow every man and woman with power. India will make enormous strides of progress. She will be brimming with wealth and greatness. Her status will be firmly established. Is there any one who is so slavishly inert that neither heaven nor earth can move him to obtain such a prize? If not, come—all those who love their motherland, come, proclaim your views! In asserting your birthright, in the cause of the motherland to whom we have pledged our word, let us all fearlessly march forward, come along.

A representation to the Maharaja of Bobbili.

86. In reply to a letter of the Maharaja of Bobbili expressing his views on the non-Brahman movement a correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 1st November, writes to the following effect:— . . . You appear to preach a sermon to the South Indian People's Association. bristling with errors . . You say that Brahmans have turned to account their opportunities and risen to eminence in the intellectual field. Let us examine the truth of this statement. During the transitional times when the Imperial power in India broke up and petty chiefs wielded sway over groups of villages which came under their power, these nominal Brahmans (Brahman-name bearers), actuated by deceipt, insincerity, arrogance, spite and jealousy towards the other communities. misinterpreted the Upanishads, monopolised learning, fabricated Puranas, imposed upon the ignorance of the chiefs and gained eminence; their path to this eminence lay not along the path of truth. There can be no sin in condemning these nominal Brahmans, whoh ave selfishly deceived the four crores of other people in the country created by God, . . . did injustice to mankind, and became traitors to the country. . . A parable may illustrate the fact that the antagonism is dictated by self-preservation and not by any enmity. The planter of a mango grove saw that his grove would not thrive. On reflection, he detected that some thorny shrubs that surrounded the mango trees absorbed the manure, and then rooted up those shrubs . . . There is much evidence to prove that these Brahmans gave out that begging was their profession, and by means of false representations made before the non-Brahmans and the rulers acquired education. It will be seen that the non-Brahman communities lagged behind in education on account of the neglect of the non-Brahman chiefs and of the English rulers, deceived by these Brahmans. You say that for two generations to come we cannot stand competition with these "Brahman-name bearers," and what you say is indeed true. They carry on begging telling a lie "We are your gurus and you will have spiritual merit only if you make gifts to us."

They catch hold of "the tuft on the head, if that can be reached and the feet, otherwise." They take petty gifts during annualc eremonies. They preach falsehoods and fictions, and making money, pass the B.L. degree examination, plead injustice in the name of advocates of justice, and extort exorbitant fees. They are indeed experts in these, in which the non-Brahmans cannot compete with them, for not merely two, but even a hundred generations to come. We can firmly assert this . . .

87. The Andhrapatrika, of the 6th November, publishes in Telugu the speeches delivered at a public meeting held at Washermanpet on the 5th November. The paper reports the President to have spoken to the following effect:—Though the British were ruling the country for more than a hundred years, they have not made us capable of governing ourselves. As there are three Englishmen and one Indian in the Executive Council, nobody listens to our words there. During the Muhammadan rule, Indians were the Ministers. That practice continues even now in Hyderabad. The Americans gave self-government to the people of the Philippine Islands, who are behind us in every respect. Why should not the English, who gave self-government to the South Africans who fought with them some ten years ago, give self-government to the Indians? The paper reports another speaker to have said:—While the English people come to India and return home with pensions, and are happy, we are starving without food. Yet we do not ask them to leave our country. . . An Indian Civil Service officer is started with pay of Rs. 500 and in 10 or 15 years he is paid Rs. 2,500. Our countrymen are not paid more than 7 or 8 hundred rupees, howsoever long their service may be. This is due to the authority being in the hands of Europeans. We want that that authority should be vested in us.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 6th, 1917.

88. The Desamata, of the 31st October, says:—Babu Asesha Kumar Banerji who was writing to the papers about the unrest in the Arra village has been imprisoned for reasons not known to any body. It was first said that he was so punished under the Defence of India Act, but it was afterwards stated that it was not so. The authorities then stated that they meant to keep him in the jail till the unrest is suppressed. The Behar Government ordered his release, but the subordinate officers do not appear to have released him as yet. It is not known why he has been imprisoned and why he has not been released though ordered to be released. The authorities will release him at an early date and give out the reasons for punishing him.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, Oct. 31st, 1917.

89. Under this heading, the Desamata, of the 31st October, says:—The indigo ryots in Behar have long been suffering under the planters there. Half of the Champeran district has been let to European planters under cowle. By the unselfish endeavours of the great Mr. Gandhi the unjust wrongs done to the ryots by these planters, who are greedy and who wield unlimited authority, have been brought home to the minds of the members of the commission. The ryots were hitherto enduring the wrongs helplessly. . . Eight years ago, Mr. Gourley was appointed to report on the complaints of the ryots. He was a fair-minded and generous-hearted man. He submitted a report pointing out the wrongs done by the planters, but the report was not published probably because the authorities feared that it might rouse the indignation of the planters. But now by the persistent efforts of Mr. Gandhi and by the sympathy of the ruler of the Province and the President of the Enquiry Committee, some justice has been done to the ryots. . . Under the existing system, the ryots are slaves. . . The ryots under a certain planter have to pay him unjustly every year 3 lakhs and 50 thousands. Though the indigo ryot of Behar has not full justice done to him even now, it cannot but be said that by this Enquiry Committee, he has had some relief at least. Until the Tikkadar system is wholly abolished, the troubles of the ryots cannot see their end.

But the order of externment was cancelled, and we are glad that the Government have rectified the mistake they have made. It appears there is one Krishnaswami Sarma who has been punished similarly under the provisions of the Defence of India Act. We hope the order against him also will be revoked.

91. The Andhrapatrika, of the 6th November, reproduces from the Amrita Bazaar Patrika its article on the Congress-League scheme, which contains:—Self-government is not asked for by the Indians chiefly for putting down the unrest in India. Self-government is essential for securing the ability to fight against the enemy in defence of the empire.

The Congress-League scheme.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 6th, 1917.

If we do not demand self-government in accordance with the spirit of the times, we will be deemed traitors to the people and also to the empire. We must not be satisfied with the Congress-League scheme of reforms as regards Provincial Governments. We must have complete independence in Provincial administration. In the matter of Provincial Governments we must not rest satisfied with four-fifths of the Legislative Councils being elected members as proposed by the Congress-League. We must demand strongly that there should be no members at all nominated by the Governments. All the members of the Provincial Legislative Councils should be elected members. As in the Philippines there should be no room in the Provincial Governments for members nominated by the Government. Only the elected members are competent to know the requirements of the minor communities. Members nominated by the Executive Governments will not be of use.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, Nov. 7th, 1917.

The Karnatas and separate province movement.

92. The Andhrapatrika, of the 7th November, says:— Mr. Raghavendra Rao of Dharwar has written in the Karnataka that the Andhra movement and the similar movements that followed it in some other parts of India have opened the eyes of the Kanarese people, who now have realised their backward condition. The organisers of the Karnata movement have admitted that the Andhra movement has inspired the desire for a separate province in the minds of the people of Maharashtra, Guzarat, Sind and Karnata. This shows the importance of the Andhra movement. In the Conference held at Dharwar on the 27th October it was resolved to submit to Mr. Montagu a memorial urging the necessity of grouping together all the Kanarese districts in British India and constituting them a separate province.

A protest meeting.

93. The Andhrapatrika, of the 5th November, gives in Telugu the speech of Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar at the protest meeting held at the Gokhale Hall on the 4th November, which appears on page 3 of the Hindu, dated the 5th November. The Andhrapatrika, of the 6th November, gives in Telugu a gist of the speeches of the other speakers at the meeting.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Nov. 3rd, 1917.

Bikkavole conference.

94. In its leader reviewing the proceedings of the non-Brahman conference at Bikkavole, the Kistnapatrika, of the 3rd November, remarks:- If Indian civilisation is judged by western experience, it may lead to perverse theoriet and specious arguments. Our educated people have not yet opened their eyes and discovered to what embarrassments western society is subjected to for want of social stability. Systems daily changing, changes dictated by every exigency, fervens desire for change, restless ambition, high-handed arrogance, the pride of wealth, the oppression of the poor and selfish competition, lead to continued misery. There is nothing more mad than to suppose that the social excitement and frenzy of the west is a sign of health. Western civilization may well be compared to intense fever. It lacks peace, bliss, love and beauty. It is a restless machine, a lifeless exhibition, a factory that renders man heartless, a leech that sucks the sap of the weak, a cloud that intensifies the gloom of delusion. The virtues of liberty, equality and fraternity are but imaginery in the west. To the westerners, their own land is golden. It is hence that their liberty has resulted in complete dependence. Their vision cannot transcend this visible world. Where is equality in it? To seek to bring about external equality is to destroy world's evolution. It is thus that, even as their liberty has ended in dependence, their equality, both objectively and subjectively, has assumed the form of a terrible war. Next as to their fraternity: where can we have individual liberty based upon egoism, and where a fraternity characterised by cosmopolitan instincts? The individual in the west has been dedicated to national egoism. How can fraternity thrive where there are no self-sacrifice and self-dedication? The westerner is a material being. His race is a commercial race, his morality commercial morality, and his methods commercial methods. What nourishes self-seeking cannot be liberty, nor what asserts rights equality. What is based on politics and commerce cannot be fraternity. The westerners are constantly subjected to dangerous social revolutions for want of a proper conception of the three sentiments—liberty, equality and fraternity. It is to be regretted that Indians should abandon their own ideal of duty (dharma) and take to the mad ways of the west. The non-Brahman movement has been started, neither in contemplation of the ideal of duty, nor on a consideration of the constitution of the society. Differences of caste and merit are condemned merely for the sake of political rights. No wonder, therefore, that the non-Brahman movement has proved to be an edifice raised on weak foundations. Outward reform cannot be lasting. Self-examination will reveal how practicable this theory is. It remains to be seen how far the Kumararaja of Challapalli is prepared to renounce his Kamma caste, and mix up with those of the lower castes . . . The matter has to be fully discussed whether the non-Brahman movement will respect or reject caste . . . What place can Ramarayaningaru, who thinks himself a Kshatriya, have in the non-Brahman movement? Is Mr. Tyagaraya Chetti, who does not eat but what is cooked by a Brahman, to lead a campaign against caste-division? We are at a loss to know with what ideals these are going to conduct the non-Brahman movement. Will this be adopted only for the attainment of official positions? or are they going to work for the obliteration of caste in social and religious matters? The Kumararaja has but recited what he has learnt from his western preceptors, when he cited from the puranas, the Gita, etc., passages to prove that, from the beginning the Hindu society has kept down the non-Brahmans. . . Are they to conduct the non-Brahman movement who, while they denounce brahmanical power only for opposing the "Home Rule," resort to brahmans in their "homes?" The absence of the Vaisyas and the Kshatriyas from this conference, establishes that the non-Brahman movement, which is characterised by such inconsistencies and self-contradictions, and dictated by a short-sighted and fond admiration of the west, has failed to meet with the approbation of the many. . . . This impassioned feigning of an equality that is not rooted in the heart may prove to be not only ridiculous but also dangerous. . . Do not lower human life for commerce and politics. Since the vision of the westerners is bound by political and material limitations, their society is subjected to continued misery, resembling a hunger never to be appeased, a fever never to be quenched, a race that has no goal, and a music unregulated by the keeping of time. . . The scheme of self-government formulated by this conference lags behind that of the Coimbatore Conference. . . It has no consistency, no aim, and no cogency. Its only object is to contradict what the Congress advocates. But nothing can frustrate the Home Rule movement. . .

The discontent of the Revenue officers.

95. A correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 3rd November, says:—The evil practice of Huzur clerks inspecting the Taluk offices obtaining in the Revenue Department does not obtain in the Police and other departments . . . The Tahsildars, it is to be regretted, fear the Huzur clerks like boys, and even graduate Tahsildars who expect to become Deputy Collectors, are put to this dishonour . . . Nobody nowadays sees how papers are dealt with. They only see how many papers have been disposed of. An instance will explain this. A ryot applies in summer for order to take some earth from the bed of a tank. The application passes through several hands and the applicant receives the order so late that the season having changed, the tank will not permit of earth being taken by the ryot. The ryot could not remove the earth the next summer, for the order given him is considered by the village officers to have ceased to have any force. Every one ought to note this injustice. Such applications are sometimes also lodged. The Huzur clerks make long remarks on unnecessary matters, but do not note why papers are lodged. In their inspection reports, no remark will be found about the injustice done to the ryots. There is therefore no use of their inspection. The Collectors or the divisional officers should make the inspection themselves. If they do so, it will increase their capacity and the subordinate officers will be freed from dishonour and hardship.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, Nov. 3rd, 1917.

An emigrant to Trinidad in distress.

96. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th November, says with reference to a registered letter received from one who emigrated to Trinidad, by his brother at Tirupatipuram village, Tanuku taluk, Kistna district:—The misery of the mother and the wife of the emigrant is beyond description. The Government should note how many such mothers and wives may be suffering and should abolish emigration altogether, as suggested by Mr. Gandhi. Since this man went away, the people in the village fear every stranger coming to the village as though he were an agent of a depot-keeper. The Government should see that young men do not fall into the clutches of the depot-keepers. This being a village we do not know how to answer the registered letter received from the emigrant. We are awaiting a reply.

The correspondent has annexed the registered letter which is to the following effect:—It is not possible to escape from fate. To return to our country I have not even one pie in my hands. I am in difficulty for food and clothing. All those that have come to this country are suffering without even a pie. It takes two months to return to our country from Trinidad. So please send me Rs. 210 to meet the charges of my voyage and another Rs. 210 to absolve myself from the agreement I have executed here. Send the amount by money order. I shall repay the money on my return. If you do not believe me sell my share of the lands and send money.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, Nov. 2nd, 1917.

The Indian Reforms and Anglo-Indian opposition.

97. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 2nd November, writes:—It is hardly necessary to inform our readers that there has been some change in the political situation in India from the moment Mr. Montagu became the Secretary of State. His very first act was to make a pronouncement on the question of Home Rule for India with the approval of His Imperial Majesty. Accordingly His Excellency the Viceroy too immediately in a speech in the council expressed his concurrence in that policy and also put it into practice to some extent by releasing the interned in Madras. Other incidents too happened quite in accordance with the public opinion. There can be no doubt that all this is due to the leadership of Mr. Montagu. These sympathetic acts of Mr. Montagu one after another have stirred up the bile of the non-official European community engaged in trade, etc, and these non-official Europeans have been holding meetings at Calcutta, Madras, etc., and cursing Mr. Montagu and the Indians, and the nationlists in particular, and have been urging that "India ought not to be given self-government." Their chief argument against the grant of self-government is that the Europeans have vested interests in this country On this plea the non-official Europeans (not only the English, but all Europeans including the French, the Americans, the Russians and the Dutch) are doing their utmost to prevent the grant of the self-government which is about to be given. How disgraceful and selfish are their attempts in this connexion is evident from the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah's reply.

The paper next quotes Mr. Jinnah's reply to a press representative and says that though Mr. Jinnah has proved the hollowness of the argument about vested interests, the non-official community, blinded by anger, is still ceaselessly vociferating in opposition to Indian political aspirations.

The same paper in another article observes:—The opponents of Home Rule are not to be found in India alone; for, in England itself there is Lord Sydenham sounding the bugle of opposition to Home Rule. In the opinion of this ex-Governor of Bombay, to put it briefly, the Congress, the Moslem League and the signatories to the Memorandum of the Nineteen are all anarchists. His chief word of advice is that India should have a larger measure of social reform, and caste differences should disappear; then alone will India be fit for self-government. Well said! Oh Sir! Your English society is free from all blemishes and it has reached its height of morality, isn't it? But why should we quarrel over your absurd arguments when Mr. Montagu himself is coming to India to introduce the principles of self-government among us? You are welcome to go on with your arguments. Yet, the futility of your attempts to attack Mr. Montagu in Parliament the other day will have taught you that this meaningless opposition is unavailing.

SUPPRABHATAM, Trichur, Nov. 7th, 1917.

Indian reforms and the Anglo-Indians.

Referring to the Anglo-Indian opposition to Indian reforms, the Suppra-bhatam, of the 7th November, writes as follows:—We should be sorry if we do not get what is due to us. Our gain will be Anglo-Indian's loss. Their livelihood lies in our starvation. Plenty to us means scarcity to them. If we do not work strenuously and with one voice at this juncture, we shall be worsted by them and we shall never again be able to raise our heads. Hence, brother Indians, give up all your quarrels, racial, religious, etc., and be one as it were.

SATYAVADI, Mysore, Nov. 6th, 1917.

India and the Empire.

98. The Satyavadi, of the 6th November, writes:—We are sometimes apt to forget that India forms four-fifths of the whole Empire and that so long as India is weak and useless, the empire too will remain weak and useless. If India be powerful and tranquil, she will be a source of strength and protection to the empire and a terror to the foreign aggressors. It would therefore be the duty of the statesmen of the empire to help India to be valorous and contented at least for the protection of the empire. During Lord Curzon's regime Sir Daniel Hamilton, one of the Councillors, in a novel article gave expression to a very significant matter. He said "we have conferred peace upon India but not the power to rise in the scale of nations. India forms four-fifths of the empire, but has not the strength of even a fifth of it. When the four-fifths of the empire remains weak, four-fifths of the strength of the empire is lost. This lack of progress in education, medicine, sanitation, politics, etc., is due chiefly to the dearth of funds."

How did this dearth of funds arise? This question has once been answered by the late Mr. Gokhale who had made a deep study of economics. He said: "I can safely affirm that it would not be a very incorrect estimate to say that India's annual contribution to England's political control is twenty crores of rupees. The other ten crores of rupees goes from England as our industrial expenditure (sic). Not even the richest country in the world can survive this drain. The result is that we shall have difficulty in finding even a little capital for the revival of our industries." From this it is evident how selfishly indifferent they are to our advancement and how they debilitate the whole empire. Another question which we would ask the statesmen of the empire is whether the interests of the Indians should for ever be subordinated to those of a few wealthy Englishmen. The future relations between India and England will depend on the answer to this question. Those who have the interests of the empire at heart therefore should consider this point before everything else. The Times in an article on the memorandum of the nineteen had the audacity to say that India had not contributed a single rupee towards the expenses of the war. The same Times only two years ago has said that India has contributed Rs. 1,90,00,000 in aid of the empire in 1907. The contributions from all the independent States together come to only Rs. 36,00,000; and yet, in the memorandum relating to the services rendered to the empire, there is no mention of India's name even.

The Governor of Madras and the deputations of certain associations in Malabar.

99. * Referring to His Excellency the Governor's replies to the various addresses during His Excellency's recent visit to Calicut, the Kerala Patrika of the 20th October points out that while members of the Janmi Sabha and the Yogakshema Sabha can stand on their own legs, the Tiyas are unable to make any substantial progress in education without Government help, and that therefore their prayer for increased educational facilities deserves sympathetic consideration by the Government, and observes that it is to be hoped that His Excellency the Governor will be pleased to consider carefully and sympathetically the two requests of the Calicut Municipal Council, namely, (1) to accord their sanction to make primary education free, and (2) to render pecuniary assistance for the widening of the roads in the 'Gujarati Street.'

KERALA PATRIKA, Calicut, Oct. 20th, 1917.

The timber merchants of Nilambur.

100. The same paper draws attention to the inconvenience and hardships of the timber merchants in Nilambur on account of certain new but unnecessary rules made by the authorities, whose duty, however, it is to give them all possible assistance.

The Governor of Madras and the Keraleeya Ayurveda Samajam.

101. In commenting on the reply of His Excellency, the Governor of Madras, to the address presented to him on the occasion of the opening ceremony of the Keraleeya Ayurvedic Pharmacy at Cheruthuruthi, the Yogakshemam of the 2nd November expresses surprise that a person occupying His Excellency's position should have said that such enterprises would not receive any help from Government unless experiments as to the nature and action of Ayurvedic drugs had been duly conducted and recorded, suggests that if the Government desire to ascertain the efficacy of Ayurvedic medicines in curing diseases, they should employ at their own cost some competent person for that purpose, and doubts if any Administrator would have ventured to express such an opinion, had he not been a non-Indian.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, Nov. 7th, 1917.

Calicut Town Magistrate's Court.

102. Referring to the rumour that the Calicut Town Magistrate's Court would be shortly abolished, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 7th November, points out that the Stationary Magistrate, who is proposed to be entrusted with the duties of the Town Magistrate, will not be able to discharge such duties in addition to his own, as he is also the Superintendent of the Sub-Jail and as he has to attend to treasury work when the Tahsildar is on circuit, and thinks that, instead of abolishing it, either of the two courts should, as it observed in June 1911, be located in the centre of the taluk so as to be convenient to all people.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Oct. 30th, 1917.

The logic of honours.

103. The Qaumi Report, of the 30th October, publishes the following, from a correspondent, regarding the Collector's Darbar held at the Pachaiyappa's Hall yesterday :—It is obvious that the recipients of honours are only those persons who have, in some way, rendered meritorious services to the Government and, that the latter, as a matter of principle, confers decorations on those only whose signal services have been for the benefit and good of the country and the Government. But Khan Bahadur Muhammad Aziz-ud-din Husain Sahib Bahadur, Collector of Madras, has given expression to such talismanic philosophy with respect to honours that if his major and minor premises were put together, they would, according to ancient Arabian logic, involve an inverted problem. The following are some of the Collector's deductions :—With regard to one individual he said that the honour was conferred upon him for loyal and conscientious services rendered to the Bank of Madras, to the Hindu High School, Triplicane, and to the Madras War Loan Fund. It seems, therefore, if a person works for the pay he draws he thereby becomes entitled to an honour. The second case is still more interesting. The Collector observed that the gentleman had for many years discharged his duties in a praiseworthy manner. The third case is much more amazing. It appears the recipient, after a very successful career at the bar, became the Judge of the City Civil Court.

If such be the distinguishing features which emerge from the Collector's interesting solutions of his problems of logic, the public are unable to congratulate the Government in the matter, for, it is obvious that every street can produce half a dozen or so, possessing these qualifications, but who have not yet been decorated by the Government.

The Collector's deductions lead us to conclude that the claims of such persons have been overlooked by the Government. We are obliged to avoid mentioning the application of the Collector's logic to Khan Bahadur Muhammad Bazl-ul-lah Sahib Bahadur, though this too was not devoid of interest.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, Oct. 31st, 1917.

"The secret of our failure."

104. The Qaumi Report, of the 31st October, writes :—The question of the release of the Muhammadan detenus is still hanging fire, and no one knows when or how the Government intends to liberate them. Mrs. Besant has been set free because her crime was different, and her colour different. She had many supporters in Parliament and in the streets of England, while we, on our part, made no little outcry. Although Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali's offence, as represented to us, is graver yet the voice of their supporters is fainter and the strength of their backers is extremely little He has been selected the President of the Muslim League and a member of the Congress deputation. But they are still interned, and if this goes on, God forbid ! they will remain. Muhammadans convened meetings, and Hindus made demands, but no one formed a definite plan, and it is not possible that we may succeed in attaining our object by mere agitation and argument.

The Madras Mail raised a great outcry at Mrs. Besant's release, but having failed in its endeavours it declared "Our theatre of war at present is England". We consider the same remedy will prove effective in the case of our disease also. It is now useless to make representations or demands in India. We should appeal to the bar of the English people, and to the King, and prove that our internees have really been made the object of suspicion for which no proof can be deduced from facts. We are sure that Lord Chelmsford too would help in the matter, should Parliament be disinclined to release them and Lord Hardinge, in whose regime they were interned, would probably give evidence in Parliament as to the nature of the reports on which action was taken, what he actually saw and heard and what his real feelings are at the present time. We know that when they were interned there was much disturbance and confusion and that expediency was regarded as more essential than justice. We hope that Lord Hardinge, who quoted us in support of his own innocence, will now bear testimony to our innocence. We trust him as he trusts us, and it is now time for Lord Hardinge to reveal the secret of his expediency.

105. The Qaumi Report, of the 1st November, has an article on the marginally-noted subject of which the following is the summary :— It is an open secret that during the Bakrid feast, the Muhammadans sacrificed their lives and property also. The Hindus acted barbarously and made the poor Mussalmans the object of their cruel and plundering attacks. From various reports it appears that even the chastity of women was not respected. Had the authorities not rendered timely assistance and the Mussalmans not remained law-abiding this fire would have spread far and wide and perhaps would still be blazing.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Nov. 1st, 1917.

Who is the accused ?

106. The Qaumi Report, of the 2nd November, says that a correspondent writes that—In Cuddapah and other surrounding places the practice has hitherto been that, whenever the Dasara and the Muharram coincided, the Hindus used to postpone their feast. The custom that obtained in the Chittoor, Proddatur, Badvel and other taluks of the Cuddapah district has been that Hindus on such occasions perform their pujas in their temples without carrying their idols out in processions. In former times decisions of such kind were made and both parties lived without any friction. But this year the Divisional officer, who is a Brahman, allowed the Hindus and the Mussalmans to observe their respective feasts together. When the order was appealed against, the Collector gave no satisfactory decision.

Qaumi Report, Madras, Nov. 2nd, 1917.

"Tyranny over the Mussalmans of Chittoor in the Cuddapah district."

On the 25th October the Mussalmans carried their Punjahs (symbolical hands) in procession, and while returning the Divisional Magistrate permitted the Hindus to carry their idols. Accordingly the Hindus brought their idols with music playing behind the Punjahs. A few Mussalmans approached the Divisional officer with a request to stop the Hindu procession for a while to allow the Mussalmans to return home. But the officer declined to listen to this request. In the meantime, it is not known whence, some stones were thrown. Thereupon the Magistrate gave the order to fire. When the Mussalmans, who had been to the Divisional Magistrate to represent matters, became a load (of what, not mentioned) eight or ten wounded, that were brought to hospital, are under treatment, among these three or two are in a dangerous condition. Many others have also been wounded, but their injuries are not serious. When the Hindus had permission, they began to break the doors of Mussalman houses, to beat Mussalman women, and to plunder their property. In addition to this they demolished the walls and the door of the mosque, smashed the vessels used for ablution purposes, the chandeliers, and devices to pieces and began digging, in order to undermine the mosque. This was prevented by the Deputy Superintendent. The Punjahs were also destroyed and their drapery burnt to a cinder.

On the morning of the 26th October the Collector, who is a Bengali Babu, arrived on the scene and viewed the bodies and immediately returned to Cuddapah. Chittoor is about 7 miles from Cuddapah. At 12 o'clock the Doctor arrived under the orders of the Collector and held a postmortem examination. The bodies were allowed to be buried in the afternoon. This is the 31st October and the men who had left Chittoor have not yet been able to return to the place because of the fear of the Police and the Hindus. In the district as well as in the town of Cuddapah all the officials, except two, viz., the Judge and the Superintendent of Police, with a Mussalman Deputy Superintendent, are Hindus.

Alas ! Oh Mussalmans ! You have not a single sympathiser. There is no man of learning among you, and even if there be one he has given his heart to Home Rule.

Understand ! and understand well !

If Home Rule were granted Mussalmans would become as rare as the Anka in India. See how they have disappeared from Spain. Value the gracious shadow of the British Government.

There is justice in the faces of those white men without whom you would be buried alive.

Although there has been much oppression, I have written you a very brief but correct account. No Hindus have been injured, nor have they sustained the loss of a single pie.

No Mussalman has opposed the Hindus. Mussalmans have lost their lives for nothing, have been wounded and charged with crime. Their mosque has been desecrated, their houses have been plundered, their women have been molested, and their Punjahs have been destroyed. Alas! There is none to enquire into our condition.

If this is correct will the Hindus and the Mussalmans still refuse to admit that their unity is based on wrong principles?

Qaumi Report, Madras, Nov. 3rd, 1917.

A Mussalman meeting against Home Rule.

107. The Qaumi Report, of the 3rd November, has the following from a correspondent. A meeting of Mussalmans was held on the 1st November at the Mukhbir-i-Dakhan Press. It was enthusiastically organised by Moulavi Saiyid Muhammad Abdul Qadir Sahib, Proprietor and Editor of the Mukhbir-i-Deccan. Khan Babadur Mirza Abdul Husain Sahib, Persian Consul, was in the chair. Among those who were present were Nawab Raof Ahmad Khan Purthoo, Moulavi Shah Zahid Husain Sahib, Mehkeri, Nawab Muhammad Abdul Huq Sahib, Nawab Muhammad Abdul Qadir Sahib, Haji Saiyid Muhammad Abdul Qadir Sahib Jilani, Moulavi Yakhri Sahib, C. Abdul Hakim Sahib, Mr. Abbas Husain Sahib, etc.

The chairman spoke in Urdu and dwelt on the losses likely to accrue from Home Rule. After the first resolution was moved the Hon'ble Mr. Y'aqub Husain rose and proposed that the meeting would adjourn for Namaz and hence the consideration should also be postponed.

Chairman.—Why do you move such a proposition?

Mr Y'aqub Hasan.—I want to speak.

Chairman.—You can speak on any other resolution.

Mr Y'aqub Hasan.—I am not a Home Ruler, and I want to speak on this resolution.

Chairman.—I will not allow you to speak.

The resolution was then passed unanimously and Mr. Y'aqub Hasan, Moulana Abdus Subhan Sahib, Sowcar C. Abdul Hakim Sahib left the meeting.

Mr. Muhammad Usmān Sahib, B.A., spoke in English and said certain persons, although they do not ask for Home Rule but demand reforms which amount to Home Rule. The following resolutions were passed:—

Resolution I.—That this meeting of Mussalmans unanimously resolves that the present condition of India is not suitable for demanding Home Rule, that in such a case, especially the national and religious rights of Mussalmans will certainly be jeopardised. Hence the administration of the country should not be subjected to a change by which the communities that are numerically small in number will suffer.

Resolution II.—That this meeting resolves unanimously that in the future reform of the country, national and religious rights of Mussalmans should be recognised, that the reform scheme of the Congress League and the memorandum of the nineteen members will really be injurious to Mussalmans and that on principle we do not concur in them.

Resolution III.—That this meeting of Mussalmans moves that the Secretary of State should sanction the principle of the Imperial and Local Governments in India which will not be prejudicial to the interests of Mussalmans.

Resolution IV.—That this meeting unanimously resolves that in order to give effect to these resolutions a committee should be appointed consisting of the following with powers to add to their number:—

(1) Nawab Raof Ahmad Khan Bahadur Purthao.
(2) Moulavi Tajam-ul-Husain Khan Bahadur.
(3) Moulavi Fakhri.
(4) Nowab Muhammad Abdul Qadir Sahib.
(5) Sowcar Muhammad Saad-ulla Badsha Sahib.

(6) Nawab Muhammad Abdul Huq Sahib.
(7) Moulavi Muhammad Ghouse Sahib.
(8) Moulavi Zahid Husain Sahib, Mehkeri.
(9) Saiyid Muhammad Abdul Qadir Sahib, Proprietor of Mukhbir-i-Dakhan.
(10) Moulavi Abdul Rahman Sahib, Shatir.
(11) Moulavi Haji Muhammad Fuzl-ul-lah Sahib.

Cochin tramway scheme.

109. In speaking sarcastically of Diwan Mr. Bhore's tramway scheme, the Supprabhatam, of the 7th November, points out that it looks as if it were prepared with a view only to safeguard the interests of the Planters and not of the State and that if any future dispute arise between the Darbar and the Planters when at the end of eighteen years the former may wish to raise the rates to be fixed now, the Madras Government will give a decision that those, agreed to by the planters, must be accepted, and observes that it is easy to understand what sort of a man is Mr. Bhore who has, knowingly or not, prepared a scheme which is so ruinous to the State. (b) Courts.

1. New India, of the 15th November, has the following:— New India, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

"A monstrous claim.

The Courts and British-born subjects.

"As if the people of India are not already suffering under a number of galling racial differences, the Indian Daily Telegraph appeals for their accentuation in a shape which will throw the whole country in a state of terrible indignation. It seems a Eurasian in the Indian Defence Force, accused of murder, has demanded that he shall have the privileges of a European at the trial, simply because for the Defence Force purposes he is classed among Europeans. The Telegraph supports that claim. When the Indian claim is growing more insistent for the removal of all racial bars, acquiescence in the demand of the Lucknow accused will shock public feeling most vitally. The claim now put forward is monstrous, and deserves immediate public notice."

(e) Local and Municipal.

2. The Indian Patriot, of the 15th November, observes:—"We do not know whether much significance can be attached to the Tiyya meeting at Calicut which resolved upon passive resistance as a protest against the closure of public roads against them. A committee has been appointed to frame measures, and the members of the Committee are mostly educated men who surely would not play with passive resistance. The Tiyyas cannot afford to inaugurate any large scheme of passive resistance. Their point today is not that they should be given access to public roads, but that the pollution attached to their caste should be removed. It is a large question, and while the sympathy of the educated classes will surely be with them, we doubt very much whether passive resistance can be of any avail. . . This is not a question to be decided at once; and while it is true, and certainly possible, that a close trade unionism of the Tiyyas might bring their masters on their knees, no one who realises their present stage of progress will ever believe that they could be organised for passive resistance. A very heavy responsibility rests upon the leaders. They may easily raise difficulty in principal towns, and the contagion may spread even to the country parts. Trade unions cannot be easily established; they demand a state of education and organisation which certainly do not exist among the Tiyyas. A few educated people do not make the community, and it would be very unfortunate indeed if, in a hasty moment, the leaders should commit their community to any rash stop." Indian Patriot, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

3. The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 7th November, writes:— Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, 7th Nov. 1917.

The monster petition for Home Rule.

"Mr. Gandhi's name has always stood for whatever is clean and above board in public life whether in South Africa or in India; and we fear that his reputation is likely to suffer in the hands of some of those who have been entrusted with the task of obtaining signatures to a petition to Mr. Montagu. . . All may be fair in politics or war, but such devices are most likely to defeat the object of the petition if Mr. Montagu should come to be apprised of the way in which the petition has been got up. After all, the merits of a petition depend upon the reasonableness of the demands contained in it than upon the number of signatures appended to it. A 'monster' petition may be an object of curiosity fit to be exhibited at a museum as an example of human energy and ingenuity, but it will hardly impress a practical statesman who will look more to the contents of a petition than the number of subscribers to it. . . Signature-hunting may be as amusing a pastime as stamp-collecting, but as a factor in politics it is really of no consequence."

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 10th Nov. 1917.

The Madras Mail.

4. The following appears in the West Coast Spectator of the 10th November:—"The Madras Mail has charged the Viceroy with telling a lie in regard to His Excellency's telegram to the Secretary of State read by Lord Islington in the House of Lords. If this is not bringing the authority of the Viceroy into contempt, what is? We hope Lord Pentland will have sufficient courage to put the Indian Press Act against this paper which has for long been creating class hatred and lowering the prestige of the Government of India. . . During the company days they had a rough and ready method of dealing with European journalists who brought the company's authority into contempt. It was nothing short of deporting those people from India. We think that this method would admirably suit the present conditions. Why not make use of the Defence of India Act? Altogether, we think it is time some of the Anglo-Indian journalists were sharply told to shut up and give up the game of creating class hatred and bringing into contempt the Government by law established in British India.'

New India, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

The Secretary of State for India.

5. New India, of the 14th November, remarks:—"We reprint from the Bombay Chronicle an eye-witness's story and our contemporary's remarks thereon on the strange behaviour of the Bombay officials on the occasion of the arrival of the Secretary of State for India. We are now thoroughly convinced that the bureaucracy are doing all they can to prevent Mr. Montagu being accorded a hearty reception by the Indian public. . . It is a contemptible thing, and the Indian press should thoroughly expose it everywhere. We have good reasons to believe that officials of Local Governments are deliberately preventing a hearty reception and welcome being given to Mr. Montagu and his friends. . . We think, under the circumstances, Indian bodies should appeal to the Viceroy and the Secretary of State direct, and point out to them the scandalous manner in which Mr. Montagu's visits everywhere are sought to be made more or less useless. Such a disgraceful attempt ought to be foiled. The Indian public ought not to put up with such an attitude on the part of those whose dislike for the Secretary of State and for the Viceroy has not altogether been silent in the past few weeks."

New India, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

New India and the bureaucracy.

6. New India, of the 14th November, states:—"We have often made clear in these columns that our "campaign of calumny," as it is wrongly called, is not levelled against any official, high or low, European or Indian. We have always attacked the wrong system, the faulty methods, the objectionable ways. Sometimes we could not but, as matter of example, name person or persons who were the offending parties, but even then we have attacked the misdeed or the misconduct and not individuals. One of the points to be made quite clear to Mr. Montagu and his friends is that under the existing circumstances it is absolutely necessary to criticise the misdemeanours of bureaucrats, though the criticism is far less scathing than that common in England. . . Our contention will be readily understood if we add to our remarks the fact that this pernicious system, which has created and maintains a bureaucracy, turns gentle and amiable Indians into human beings who are not lovable. For, take into account the unpopularity of the Indian bureaucrats; they are not fully trusted or looked up to with esteem and regard from the hour they enter the magic circle of officialdom. The Indian press is not free from attacks on the Indian bureaucrat, and handles him in almost the same manner as it handles the white bureaucrat. From personal experience we know that something happens to the poor mortal once he passes through the peculiar initiation belonging to the fraternity of the bureaucrats. His point of view is changed, his outlook becomes narrow, his humanity undergoes a transformation, he is more a machine than a man. We can only trace the metamorphosis to the system of which he becomes a mighty sun or a humble planet. . . In the constitutional changes so much discussed at present will the personal relation of the official with Indian society be taken into account? The Congress League Scheme, by giving a proper place to the official, both European and Indian, has solved the difficulty, for, we feel certain, that if the reforms therein advocated are granted, the relation between the members of the ruling caste and those of the ruled will become more friendly and harmonious, to the mutual advantage of all."

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

7. In giving a short history of Egypt, the Dravidapatrika, of the 14th November, describes how this country, which was one of the uncivilized countries before the year 1882, has now improved in several ways under the agency of the British administration and says:—With all this, there is no peace in Egypt, and there is an agitation there for the grant of Home Rule to its people. The Congress which was held at Cairo in 1908 wired to the British Prime Minister to recall all the Englishmen from Egypt immediately. This will show how much the Englishmen are hated in Egypt. In the convention which was concluded by the British in 1887, they have declared that Egypt would be sufficiently improved in 1890 and that they could then leave the country. It is now thirty years since this convention was concluded. Egypt, which was expected to attain a flourishing condition in three years, has not attained it in thirty years. Does this indicate capacity of administration on the part of Englishmen? If Egypt has improved now, the British have no reason to remain there. If she has not, she can never do so. So the demand of the Egyptian Home Rulers is quite justified. But who would like to give up a flourishing country and all that is in it? Who has forsaken love of land? Whoever might have done it, the westerns have not and the present war is a proof of it.

Egypt.

Dravidapatrika, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

8. The Andhraprakasika, of the 7th November, has the following under this heading:—. . . The Italian theatre is in a pitiable condition. It is learnt that, as Austria hopelessly beaten by Italy from the beginning threatened Germany that she would make separate peace (with the Allies), Germany has sent her troops in large numbers to Italy and is routing the Italians completely. When the Italian troops retreated, they retreated in order and without loss. They are now encamping on the other side of the Tagliamento. It is feared that the Italians may have to leave Udine. There is no doubt that Italy is in a miserable plight, but it is mad to suppose that Germany can reduce Italy to the position of Servia and Roumania. A huge battle may take place on the plains of Venice. But Italy is sure to win when she has the Allies' help.

The war.

Andhraprakasika, Madras, 7th Nov. 1917.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 10th November, says:—The pressure of the Germans is increasing in Italy. The Italians have yielded up the region of the Tagleamento and the mountains thereabout. They are marching to the banks of the rivers in the south. It is not yet known where they will make their stand. The French and the English armies are about to come to this theatre to help the Italians. At the instigation of the enemy some of the Italian soldiers have revolted and are deserting. But arrangements are being made to see that the treachery does not spread. The Italian soldiers may probably make a stand on the Plane near Venice. Into this region, the English and the French soldiers are pouring day and night. It is not known whether the Germans can march so far. As the cold season is setting in, it is hoped that they will discontinue going forward. At any rate, the Allies are ready to obstruct the advance of the Germans and protect Italy. Some Russians in Petrograd are revolting against the Government. We regret to learn that some Russian soldiers in the Russian theatre are fraternising with the Germans. It is not known when the difficulties of Russia will be over. M. Kerensky, the Russian leader, will restore peace.

The war.

Kistnapatrika, Masulipatam, 10th Nov. 1917.

9. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 12th November, reports Mr. Francisco Batistessa (sic), an Italian, to have written to the Times of India thus:—Instead of getting sympathy and justice, from those whom we are sincerely helping we are

The Italian retreat.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 12th Nov. 1917.

meeting with contempt and arrogance. They must have confidence in us and show justice. They need not show us favour or kindness. The French papers state that, though unfortunately, the Italians have retreated, the loss can be soon retrieved. But the papers in cities like London, have begun to write dishonourable articles. . . It is an exaggeration to state that the present situation in Italy is most regrettable in the history of the present war. At all times in the world, greater reverses have happened. . . . We have not seen anywhere else a miserable situation like the one in which the English soldiers were killed to the last man at the Khurdu Kabul pass, and that attending the retreat of Napoleon from Moscow.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 13th Nov. 1917.

Russia and the peace-danger.

10. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 13th November, in an article under this heading, writes:—Mr. E. G. Dillon has written a very thoughtful article on Russia and the peace-danger in the July number of the Fortnightly Review. He is of opinion that the hopes placed by the Germans in their submarines and those of our own Government in the efficacy of the blockade can hardly be reckoned any longer among the decisive factors on either side. . . Both of them are powerful factors of reckless destruction. At the head of a Central European League, Germany bids fair to become the mistress of a continental Europe. Whatever may compel Germany to do in France or Belgium, nothing can hinder her from acquiring hegemony on the entire continent. If President Wilson, his Government and his people can be induced to fight for the readjustment of the balance of power, if they are able to throw the requisite fighting force into the field in time to bring the struggle to a victorious issue, victory may be considered to be within the range of practical politics. It is not possible to say whether this can be done. . . He thinks that a war conducted until 1920 on a scale required by a military decision might bring peace with victory but it would also bring victory with suicide. It is doubtful whether President Wilson who holds such strong views in the matter can be induced to throw in his lot with the Allies to fight for the readjustment of the balance of power. To this should be added the fact that there are ten million German people in America, ostensibly with America but in their heart of hearts for Germany. Russia has become impotent and is on the high road to suicide. The different provinces of Russia have been trying to become, and some have already become, republics. It would be no wonder if, in the fullness of time, these provinces become a number of separate States and if the Republic of Russia becomes a federal Republic like the United States of America. All these go to show that the final victory of the Allies is also a question of extreme optimism and the gospel of optimism will, in nine cases out of ten, lead to disappointment and danger. The whole of Mr. Dillon's article is calculated to fill us with a thrill of fear and disappointment for the future stability of the world. This need not disconcert us. Germany is engaged in an unrighteous war. Unrighteous individuals and nations are bound to fall in the end, though helped by science and diplomacy. We may rest assured that justice and righteousness will win.

II.—HOME ADMINISTRATION.

(d) Education.

YADARTAVACHANI, Kumbakōnam, 19th Oct. 1917.

Students and political meetings.

11. The Yadartavachani, of the 19th October, approves of the order issued by the Government prohibiting students from taking part in political meetings on the ground that the students have not the required knowledge or experience to discuss politics.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 7th Nov. 1917.

Students and politics.

12. The Desamata, of the 7th November, says:—On account of the harshness of the rulers of the Central Provinces, the position of the students there is very miserable. The order prohibiting students from attending political meetings, has led to three Colleges and six secondary schools being closed. . . If we had self-government, it is improbable that such orders would be passed. If they should be passed, they could not stand against public opinion.

13. The Swadesamitran, of the 9th November, refers to the appointment in Bombay of an independent committee to conduct an examination which will be common to the students now appearing for the Matriculation and School Final examinations, and says:—In this Presidency those who pass the School Final examination conducted by the Government are denied admission into Colleges on the ground that they have not the qualifications required of them by the College authorities. The subjects for the school final examination are prescribed by the Government, and the boys study them and pass the examination. If after this they are said to be wanting in qualifications to take the collegiate course, what is it due to their own fault or that in the training undergone by them? We think our Government and University would do well to consider the advisability of introducing the Bombay scheme even here.

The Government and the School Final examination.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 9th Nov. 1917.

14. The Hindu Nesan, in its issues of the 10th and 12th November, reproduces an article on this subject appearing in the Vartakamitran of Tanjore of the 27th September 1917, and abstracted in paragraph 25 of report No. 44 of 1917.

Commercial education.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 10th & 12th Nov. 1917.

15. Adverting to the conference that was recently held in the Government House to informally discuss about the provisions of an Education Bill to be brought up in the local Legislative Council for improving the elementary and secondary education in this Presidency, the Hindu Nesan, of the 12th November, while appreciating the invitation of some non-officials also to be present at this conference, expresses its opinion that it would have been better if some managers of schools other than missionaries had also been invited to it.

An Education Bill.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 12th Nov. 1917.

16. The Kistnapatrika, of the 10th November, reports Sir Rabindranath Tagore to have said:—As education is imparted through English, it does not spread. If we examine the matter carefully English language is the chief obstacle to us. If we deem the English language to be our sole refuge, education will not go beyond the towns. . . Can we not clothe western knowledge in our language? Is our language inferior to Japanese? The Japanese took the vow to introduce the western scientific knowledge into their colleges, fulfilled it and are enjoying the fruits thereof. We do not make bold to say that higher education should be given only through our vernaculars. The majority of Indians cannot afford to learn the English language. Only a few can do so. Should the rest remain in darkness without education? Cannot the Universities do something for those who do not know English? Is such a horrible state of things found in any other country than ours? . . . It appears to me that the capacity to learn languages is limited in many students. If such students are not conversant with the English language, it is difficult for them even to pass the School Final Examination. . . Should the students who are not capable of learning this language for some reason or another, be for ever excluded by the University authorities? . . If the helpless millions are not given education, what is the use of wasting the revenues of the country? Is it to keep them in ignorance, that so much money is spent? My contention is that from the primary classes to the Matriculation examination, education should be imparted through the medium of two languages, on parallel lines . . . The children of the rich may be fed by the wet nurse, but what objection is there to the children of the poor sucking the milk of their mothers to their fill? . . . If the spread of education should wait for text books, then trees may as well wait for leaves, and rivers, for banks.

The vernaculars.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 10th Nov. 1917.

17. The Qaumi Report, of the 11th November, writes:—The other day a small Educational Conference was convened at Government House, the proceedings of which are still a secret. We do not wish to criticise the wisdom of such a step, but the constitution of the conference, which we have only just ascertained, moves us to consider, what benefit is likely to accrue to Mussalmans therefrom. Only two Mussalmans, one an official and the other a non-official, were invited to this conference. The names of these fortunate gentlemen are the Hon'ble Khan Bahadur Muhammad Aziz-ud-din Husain Sahib, Collector of Madras, and Khan Public Educational Conference.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 11th Nov. 1917.

Bahadur Ahmad Thambi Marakkayar Sahib, Member of the Legislative Council. We do not question their personal charms, ability, or experience, but the question is why instead of these two gentlemen, Mussalmans, whose educational ideals are known to their co-religionists and who have already represented and served them in educational matters, were not nominated. Khan Bahadur Muhammad Aziz-ud-din Husain Sahib has been away from Madras for a long time. He has only quite recently returned and is just reviving the sympathy and attachment which he has naturally for the capital of the Presidency. He probably realises that it is not the Madras of his magisterial days and that the national educational problem has passed the preliminary stage. Similarly, Khan Bahadur Marakkayar Sahib lives in Negapatam, and the society in which he moves is totally different from that of the generality of the Mussalmans in Madras, besides so far he has not taken a prominent part in the matter of Muhammadan education. It is probable that Khan Bahadur Muhammad Aziz-ud-din Sahib may have been nominated as an ex-officio member, but the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim Sahib and Khan Bahadur Muhammad Bazulla Sahib could have been similarly nominated. These two gentlemen have taken a keen interest in the question of the education of the community. They have helped the Mussalmans in many ways, and because of their practically permanent residence in Madras they have acquired an intelligent grasp of the aims and aspirations of the community. The community on its part wholeheartedly trusts them.

The Hon'ble Yakoob Hasan had also a better claim as a non-official than the Hon'ble Marikkayar, inasmuch as he has already taken a leading part in the matter of Muhammadan education. In all fairness his educational knowledge and experience were more worthy of consideration. We do not understand how the Government ignored the claims of these three influential Mussalmans. If there were any special grounds of expediency for doing so, we have no desire to discuss the matter any further. If, however, there were none, we have reason to be surprised. The Government has acted in a manner altogether unexpected. God grant that the outcome may be favourable to Mussalman claims! This is what we hope for from God.

(f) Land Revenue and Settlement.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 9th Nov. 1917.

Darkhast lands in South Kanara.

18. In a leading article urging the undesirability of assigning waste lands of communal use to private individuals on darkhast, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 9th November, says:—

If the Government should assert that these waste lands belong to them and that the people have no right to their use, it is difficult to see how the latter who have been depending upon these lands from time immemorial for grazing cattle and obtaining leaf manure, fuel, etc., for agricultural purposes can possibly go on with their work of cultivation without them. The system of giving away darkhast lands which were being used for communal purposes from time out of mind is therefore a serious transgression of the rights of the people. It is difficult to see how this mode of depriving the cultivators of their simple existing agricultural facilities is consistent with the efforts of the Government to improve agriculture by means of exhibitions, conferences, etc. The hardship caused by this deprivation of leaf, fuel, etc., is so great that many of the poor people unable to subsist on agricultural work migrate to the hills and plantations for coolie work. It will thus be evident that it is imperative from the stand-point of public good to restrict the assignment of waste lands available on darkhast. It might be said that the Government will thereby lose a source of help to the poor homeless and depressed classes. It is on this ground that the (so called) "Charitable institutions" are able to obtain these lands. Their motive is no doubt laudable and just to all appearance. It is true that some of the institutions do justify their title. But we regret to observe that the charitable intentions of many an institution which has obtained lands on darkhast are seldom seen to be carried into practice. Some of the institutions tender their darkhast, use their influence and take possession of lands existing for communal purposes ostensibly for the settlement of homeless people; but once these lands are in their hold, it is not difficult to see how far they go to relieve the helpless for whom they were said to be intended. We refrain from indicating particular instances lest we should be guilty of holding up others to ridicule, but we must observe that it is also unnecessary to give examples when we have such glaring instances of this before our very eyes in the Mangalore taluk itself. We have no quarrel with these refined beings. All that we wish to point out is that once these lands available for darkhast go into the grip of these "Charitable institutions", there is no hope of the people ever benefiting by them. Why should these institutions not use their own funds and buy private lands? With the exception of the Depressed Classes Mission, there is hardly any institution which styles itself "charitable" whether Indian or foreign which has no funds of its own. We wonder why these bodies under the guise of charity should thus selfishly seek to deprive the people of their agricultural facilities by dispossessing them of their communal lands.

(h) Railways.

19. The Vartakamitran, of the 11th October, writes:—When railways were first laid in India, the Government guaranteed to the companies, which laid them, 5 per cent interest on the capital invested by them, and the Government of India have till now paid nearly sixty crores of rupees to these companies by way of compensation for the loss sustained by them by way of interest. For a long time, railways in India have been a loss to the Government of India, as railway companies seem to have attempted to show always a loss account, ever since the Government of India guaranteed interest. But the Government do not seem to have suffered any loss from the railways managed by themselves. On the other hand, they have been quite profitable. So it is the opinion of the Indian economists that foreign companies should be prevented from taking leases of Government railways. It cannot be said that sufficient capital will not be available in India for managing railway companies. It will not be a great task if the people take even a fourth of the efforts they put forth for collecting money for the War Funds. Foreign companies care only for their own profits and, as again all the high appointments in the railways are given only to the Europeans, the Indians are deprived not only of the salaries paid to these people, but also of the administrative experience gained by them. Moreover, if the Government take over the management of the railways, the profits now made by the companies will go to the Government and the latter may then reduce the burden of taxation on the people in a way. They can also reduce the railway fares and remove the grievances of the third-class passengers.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 11th Oct. 1917.

20. A correspondent, writing from Sengalipuram to the Hindu Nesan, of the 7th November, reports some railway workmen, who fully approved of the reforms suggested in the monster petition to Mr. Montagu, to have regretted their inability to sign the petition, as their superior railway official had prohibited their doing so without his permission, and questions the right of the railway officials to impose undue restrictions upon their employees expressing their opinions freely in matters other than those pertaining to their department.

21. In reviewing the report on the working of the Salt department during 1916–17, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 14th November, deplores the increase in the number of resignations of officers in the department, which, in its opinion, could be reduced to a minimum only by a decrease in departmental punishments, by the offer of attractive salaries and by a change in the attitude of some of the higher officers towards their subordinates.

22. In an article dwelling upon the deterioration of sugar industry in India, the Vartakamitran, of the 11th October, refers to the internal evidence available in Tamil classics that sugar-cane cultivation was in a very flourishing condition in this country in ancient days, and observes—In old European works they have described sugar as the "sweet salt" of India and the sugar-cane treacle as "bamboo honey". It may surprise many to learn that Europeans of those days were so ignorant. But what will surprise wise men more is that such ignorant men have improved in intelligence and have been in a position to take over our industry and supply sugar to us in enormous quantities, while we are in the pitiable condition of shamelessly getting the sugar, which was once manufactured by us, from foreigners. Statistics relating to Indian agriculture show that cultivation of sugar-cane began to go down in India only after the Englishmen gained a control over the country. When other nations are doing their utmost to improve education and industries, and do other useful things to the people in the countries under their charge, it is really our misfortune that our Government do not pay any attention to this. It is a harder task to revive a ruined industry than to start a fresh one. In the case of an industry which has died, it is quite natural that the workmen who have once suffered therefrom are not bold enough to try, of their own accord, to revive the same. It is the duty of the Government in such a case to take this trouble in the interests of the country. There are Agricultural Departments in India in every province. But there is no one to check their work. If there is an association in each province to whom the Director of Agriculture will have to answer regarding the work of his department, there will be no room for the gradual deterioration of agriculture in the country.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 11th Oct. 1917.

Honorary Assistant Registrars of Co-operative Societies.

23. Adverting to the recent order of the Madras Government promulgating a scheme under which Honorary Assistant Registrars of Co-operative Societies will be appointed, provided they are prepared to serve on probation for three months at their own expense, the Vartakamitran, of the 11th October, doubts whether any one will come forward to take up this work, and adds—There are very few among the people who have a thorough idea of co-operation. We doubt if many of the Inspectors in the Co-operative department and those who run co-operative societies have a correct idea of this word. If they have, a large number of co-operative industrial concerns should doubtless have been started in this country as co-operative societies have been. We have to conclude that the present offer of the Government to take non-officials also to work in this department has been made only with the idea that they can call upon the Indians to work without any salary and when no one comes forward they can accuse the people of not taking public work even when offered to them. We would suggest that subsistence and travelling allowances at least should be paid to honorary workers, in which case many educated people will be ready to take up this work.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 11th Oct. 1917.

Control of mines.

24. Anent the order recently passed by the Government that owners of mines should not transfer them to any one except the British, the Vartakamitran, of the 11th October, says:—This restriction is indeed necessary. But it would have been better if the order had declared that only Indians and the companies organized by them can work mines in India. When the Europeans, who settled in South Africa, claim that country to be theirs and prevent the Indians getting into it other than as coolies and deny all privileges even to the people of Africa, how can the empowering of foreigners to work the mines in India be justified? Our benign Government have done well now at least to declare that others than themselves cannot carry on this industry in India. We await the day when gradually this privilege can be enjoyed by the Indians themselves.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 7th Nov. 1917.

The Muslims interned.

25. The Swadesamitran, of the 7th November, expresses the opinion that the news conveyed in the message of Mrs. Annie Besant to New India of her interview with the Viceroy regarding the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali is bound to cause great disappointment and surprise to its readers and observes:—According to Mrs. Besant's message, the Government of India seem to have come to the definite conclusion that, considering the present stage of the war with Turkey and their onerous responsibilities at this juncture, it will not be a desirable measure to release the Muslim brothers. The Government are bound to communicate to the public the grounds on which they have come to this conclusion; for it can be safely presumed that they had not this opinion at the time when the release of Mrs. Besant was thought of. In replying to the question of the Hon'ble Mr. Jinnah on the 5th of September last regarding the release of Mrs. Besant, the Government voluntarily made a statement that they were ready to release other persons too than Mrs. Besant who have been interned under the Defence of India Act for conducting a violent political agitation, on their giving an assurance that they would not indulge in such agitation. There was a supplemental question by the same member whether the Government intended considering the case of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali, and it was stated in reply by Sir William Vincent that the case was already under the consideration of the Government. So, it is clear that on that date no decision had been come to by the Government of India, either unanimously or by a majority, about these two brothers; nor was it stated then that there was, in addition to political considerations, a matter connected with the war, which might alter the opinion of the Government, as far as these two Muhammadan brothers were concerned. Moreover, when the Government promised to consider their case, every one took it to mean that they agreed to follow the same procedure in the case of these two brothers as was adopted in the case of Mrs. Besant, whether their internment had a political or a military significance. So the whole of India anxiously awaited that the Government of India would carry out their promise after getting the required assurance from the interned, and the Government cannot be unaware of this. Even when it was subsequently learnt that the Government had sent a police official to the interned to get their signature in an undertaking, it could not be suspected that the Government entertained the suspicion they now avow. It was the opinion of all that, if the interned had signed the undertaking immediately without demanding any changes in it, they would have been released forthwith. Hence, when subsequently the Government refused to release them on the ground that they evinced sympathy with the enemy, both the Hindus and the Muhammadans believed that, if the Government could be convinced of the said sympathy of the interned being no more than religious and of their readiness to fight on behalf of their Emperor, the attitude of the Government could be changed and the release brought about. Nothing has happened to the knowledge of the people during the internment of these brothers to make the Government change their original view. So we cannot say that, in consideration of the excitement created by this matter throughout the country, the Government have given a satisfactory explanation for not releasing the interned. We will repeat that, in view of the agitation that may crop up in the country about their release, the wisest policy on the part of the Government will be to continue their full confidence in the Muhammadans of this country and release the two brothers.

The interned Muhammadans.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th November, says:—The people are growing more obstinate in demanding the release of the interned Muhammadans. The delay in releasing them has been a source of disappointment. . . It will be well for the meeting that is to be held in the Gokhale Hall for considering this matter to endeavour to get pardon for all political offenders. It is not a characteristic of noble men to work for only influential persons and to sleep over the case of others.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 10th Nov. 1917.

Internment of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 9th November, publishes a note about the announcement of Mrs. Annie Besant that a society is formed for collecting funds for conducting a case in the Indian Courts regarding the internment of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali, and that the petition prepared on behalf of Mrs. Besant has been sent to one of the relatives of the interned brothers.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 9th Nov. 1917.

The status of Consuls in India.

26. The Swadesamitran, of the 7th November, reports the Leader of Allahabad to have taken exception to the Persian Consul in Madras having presided at a meeting of the Muhammadans, and expressed an opinion against the grant of Home Rule to India and to have observed as follows:—"Can a Consul of a neutral country interfere in the internal affairs of India, and has he the right of speaking on a matter concerning the Indian Muhammadans? The Consul of a neutral country may today speak in favour of the Government; but tomorrow he may talk differently. Therefore it will be desirable to prevent the Consuls from ever interfering in politics."

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 7th Nov. 1917.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 7th Nov. 1917.

Boycott of foreign goods.

27. The Swadesamitran, of the 7th November, publishes a communication from a correspondent in Trichinopoly giving a brief report of a lecture delivered by Tiruppur Varadarajulu Nayudu there on the visit of Mr. Montagu to India, in which the following observations occur:—The agitation carried on by some Anglo-Indian merchants gives room to the apprehension whether, in spite of the announcement of the Secretary of State for India that the necessary reforms will be introduced in the Indian administration, the hardships suffered by Indians may not cease. As all the Members of Parliament are elected by foreign merchants, these merchants have a great deal of influence. But we have a weapon, which can impair even this influence, to which we should resort in this critical juncture. That weapon is only that we should not think of foreign goods even in our dreams.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 7th Nov. 1917.

The Agricultural department.

28. In commenting upon the Administration Report of the Madras Agricultural department for the year 1916-17, the Hindu Nesan, of the 7th November, observes:—The Government approve of the appreciation of the Director of Agriculture of the efforts made by Messrs. Thomas, Paddison and Tottenham to improve the quality of cotton in Tinnevelly. There is nothing strange in this. It is quite natural for the civilians to praise one another whenever there is an opportunity and that even in Government reports. They do not care whether the opportunity is suitable or not. The Government are glad to note that the fact of new agricultural methods demonstrated in the Government farms being followed by other people also is a direct proof of the regard which the people have come to have for the Agricultural Department. Let the Government be satisfied with this. They should also try to get the agricultural experts required for their department through their Agricultural College and make the work of the department more useful to the people.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 7th Nov. 1917.

Weapons of political agitation.

29. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Dravidan, of the 7th November, questions the wisdom of Mr. Gandhi in suggesting the presentation of a monster petition to Mr. Montagu on the reforms to be introduced in India on the ground that what succeeded in South Africa may not succeed in this country, owing to the many differences that exist between the two countries, and remarks:—Leaving this alone, it is now clear that the Brahman Home Rulers are adopting several devices for getting signatures to this petition. Some of the misrepresentations made by these Brahmans in carrying out this work are as follow:—

(i) If Home Rule is granted to India, taxes will be abolished or at least reduced much. The English rulers are blindly levying heavy taxes. When poor people are having a hard time of it here, they are carrying away all money to England for others' enjoyment.

(ii) The Indians are being treated as slaves, and the foreigners are retaining India only for their own interests.

(iii) The Englishmen are incurring enormous expenditure on the annual exodus of the Provincial Governments to the hills and on the India Office and purposely spoiling the education of the country.

These and other misrepresentations are made by the Brahmans and they also say that many existing evils will disappear by the establishment of Home Rule. It is quite certain that if Home Rule is granted, the avaricious Brahmans will appropriate all taxes and ruin the country. The existing prosperity is due only to the English rule. So let not our brethren be deceived by the words of the signature-hunters.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 13th Oct. 1917.

The co-operative movement.

30. The Vartakamitran, of the 18th October, refers to the enquiry set on foot by the Mysore Darbar to ascertain the extent to which the people in that State have been benefited by the co-operative movement and invites the attention of the Government to the necessity of conducting a similar enquiry in every district in this Presidency.

PANDIYANESAN, Madura, 5th Nov. 1927.

Medical facilities in the Madras Presidency.

31. The Pandiyanesan, of the 5th November, reproduces portions of the comments of the Swadesamitran and Lokopakari, of the 26th and 29th October, respectively under this heading regarding the inadequacy of the existing hospitals and the number of doctors to meet the medical wants of the people and the desirability of the Government developing the Ayurvedic and other indigenous systems of medicine, in which the ordinary Indian has a greater faith than in the English system, which are abstracted in paragraph 41 of Report No. 44 of 1917.

32. The Swadesamitran, of the 8th November, writes:—We need not say that many existing impediments will have to be removed, if the industries and trade of India can improve. First of all, facilities should be provided for industrial education and training. Next, capital is required for establishing industrial factories and carrying on trade. Lastly the support of the Government is also necessary to provide industrial facilities and protect trade. The main reason why many industries started in the country from time to time on account of the swadeshi enthusiasm failed is that they were begun by men having no experience of modern industrial methods. For an industry to thrive, the middleman, who serves to introduce the manufactured articles into the market, is also necessary and this class has not yet appeared in India. Moreover, owners of factories in India should be able to withstand foreign competition, if they are to find a sale for their goods. Industrial banks are also necessary to render pecuniary aid to the industries in the country. If such banks are established in India, the main impediment in the way of her industrial advancement will be removed. Everyone will, therefore, be glad to hear of the proposal of Tata & Co. to establish such a bank in this country. We cannot dwell upon the advantages of this bank until we get full details about it. But we learn that some Englishmen are going to assist the bank and we would like to know the nature of their connection with it. It is a matter for consideration whether it will be desirable to give them a position in new industries which will make it possible for them to impose restrictions in the matter of carrying on these industries. It is on account of the great influence that the Englishmen have in almost all important industries that our people are not able to raise their heads. It is, therefore, the opinion of several that these Englishmen should not be allowed to have an inordinate influence at least in the industries to be newly started. So, if without careful consideration, Tata & Co. start an industrial bank, with the support of the foreigners, it will only lead to our retrogression and not progress.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 8th Nov. 1917.

The condition of Indian industries.

33. The Hindu Nesan, of the 8th November, reproduces in Tamil the comments on this subject of the Dravida Patrika, of the 7th idem, referred to in paragraph 34 of Report No. 45 of 1917.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 8th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu and the Anglo-Indian agitation.

34. Referring to this visit, the Dravidan of the 8th November, remarks that as even some Europeans, who have been in India for a very long time, have found it very difficult to understand the real condition of affairs in this country, it will be a hard task for Mr. Montagu to do so within the short period of his stay here and appeals to the Non-Brahmans to be on the alert to meet in time the wily efforts that may be made by the Brahmans, who will try to gain their end by hook or by crook with the aid of some Non-Brahmans, who are playing to their tune, and to apprise Mr. Montagu of how the Non-Brahmans have been kept for long without any privileges in a down-trodden condition by these Brahmans.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 8th Nov. 1917.

Mr Montagu's visit.

The Swadesamitran, of the 9th November, extends on behalf of the Tamilians of South India a hearty welcome to Mr. Montagu, who goes here with a sincere love and sympathy for his fellow subjects of the Empire, and observes:—Mr. Montagu belongs to the Jewish community, to which belonged Jesus Christ, and which after having been persecuted in every country by despotic rulers, sought refuge several centuries ago in the English country known for its liberty. So he should have a clear knowledge of how the ruling races have been wounding the feelings of the community generation after generation by treating them with contempt and insulting them. It is true that Mr. Montagu has evinced much sympathy for our aspirations. It is true again that the statements already made by him and the lectures delivered by him support our demands and that our people have often had definite assurances in this matter. But it has been the experience of this poor country that promises made from time to time on political matters proved to be no more than empty words, if they are not fulfilled immediately. All people, both literate and illiterate, are now aware of how the assurances of the Government from the time of the Parliamentary statutes of 1833 up to the recent promises of several ministers after the proclamation of Queen Victoria have been of no avail on account of the want of liberty on the part of the Indians. Mr. Montagu knows the real reasons why the popular influence did not thus prevail and he has dwelt upon them beautifully during the debate on the Mesopotamia Report in Parliament. It may, therefore, be stated that we need not lay stress upon them. But it is necessary to point out the severity with which the Anglo-Indians are openly insulting Mr. Montagu and objecting to his carrying out the laudable purpose of his visit. We would also request him to note the attitude of several officials who, as far as we know, are actively bringing out obstacles and impediments which crop up in secret, exaggerating vain discussions and differences and attempting to advance spurious objections secretly. Unless he sifts all these things and sees that he is not influenced by them, it will be very difficult to secure in the end suitable Home Rule reforms for this country. It is, therefore, our fervent prayer that the efforts of the Secretary of State for India, the Government of India and the Indian leaders may succeed without any such impediment and secure the welfare of the country.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 9th Nov. 1917.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 9th Nov. 1917.

Adverting to the same subject, the Hindu Nesan, of the 9th November, says:—The statement of the Anglo-Indians that the proposed visit of the Secretary of State for India would prove to be a day-dream has after all been belied. He has today landed in Bombay in spite of the insults heaped upon him by the Anglo-Indians May the visit of Mr. Montagu, who sympathises with the Indians and their aspirations and who has come here to know their opinions about political reforms, prove to be a happy one! May the moment of his setting foot on this land of Barata prove to be an auspicious one indicative of numerous coming benefits for India.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 10th Nov. 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 10th November, refers to the party accompanying Mr. Montagu and observes that the very fact that it includes Lord Donoughmore and Mr. Roberts who have a ripe experience of Parliament and command its esteem, Sir William Duke with liberal views and Mr. Seton, who has made a fair reputation in the Home Civil Service, is sufficient to prove that Mr. Montagu will ascertain the views of all people without giving room for any partiality.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 12th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

The Lokopakari, of the 12th November, welcomes Mr. Montagu to India with the conviction that his visit will prove beneficial to her and appeals to all classes in India to impress upon him that the main grievance of the Indians is that the several Parliamentary statutes, that the Indians should have equal privileges with the other subjects of the empire, have not been given effect to on account of the Indians not having sufficient powers in the Indian administration and that therefore the necessary reforms should be introduced to make the Indians enjoy all the privileges of the British Colonies.

The same paper refers in another article to the statement of the Anglo-Indians, that Mr. Montagu will never perhaps come to India, having been falsified and appeals to them to realise that the demand of the Indians for Home Rule, which has been by the way strengthened by the agitation of Anglo-Indians against it, is not intended to injure the Anglo-Indians in any way, and to make the task of the Secretary of State easy by joining with the other communities in India and propose such concessions as will bring about the advancement of the country.

PRAPANCHAMITRAN, Madras, 13th Nov. 1917.

The Prapanchamitran, of the 13th November, reproduces both the above articles.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 13th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

Referring to the news of the arrival of Mr. Montagu at Bombay, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 13th November, writes:—The articles written by Sir Valentine Chirol and the London Times on Mr. Montagu's visit go to show that he is coming in order to make a personal study of the situation in India, by discussing administrative matters with Indian as well as Anglo-Indian leaders and to arrive at some conclusions which, they agree in thinking, would promote the interests of the rulers as well as the ruled. The Indians will be sure to welcome all just changes. Anglo-Indian writers seem to suggest that they want unrestrained liberty. The Anglo-Indians will thereby be only setting an example for the Indians to follow. It is to be hoped that Mr. Montagu, the British Government, the British Parliament and the British public will ensure that this shall not be so.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 9th Nov. 1917.

The Swadeshabhimani, of the 9th November, writes:—If there is no tit for tat, then it means that one side is weak. We are glad to observe however that the Indian nation of late has been able to meet every reply with a rejoinder. Big authorities threatened us with the words that we must put the idea of self-government out of our minds and they interned the leaders of the movement. But popular protests grew in strength in all quarters and the authorities naturally had to withdraw their words as well as their hands. Now a new problem has cropped up. Mr. Montagu during his stay in India will have none of his high powers. He will not utter a syllable. Neither the Local Governments nor the non official Europeans will entertain him at social parties. Mr. Montagu will come and go like an interned person. This is the kind of picture drawn by the Anglo-Indians blinded by selfishness both here and England. We must say that the non-official European community here and its elders—the Tory party—in England reached their height of selfishness when they threatened to accord such treatment to such an exalted officer of the Indian Government as Mr. Montagu. It is again the turn of the Indians to meet them with a rejoinder. That is why Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar condemned this movement in such strong terms and cabled to the Prime Minister that the object of Mr. Montagu's visit will be defeated if he is not endowed with full authority. We are glad to observe in this connection that our officials as well as the members of the European community are now and then giving the Indian nation excellent opportunities of learning how to carry on constitutional agitation. India must be thankful for this kind of education which she is able to get.

The Pulivendla Non-Brahman Conference.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 8th Nov. 1917.

35. The Dravidan, of the 8th November, reproduces in Tamil a further portion of the presidential address delivered at this Conference and referred to in paragraph 63 of Report No. 45 of 1917.

DRAVIDDN, Madras, 10th Nov. 1917.

The same paper of the 10th November, reproduces in Tamil the concluding portion of the above address, the resolutions passed at this Conference and its proceedings thereafter as published in the Justice of the 6th idem.

Department of Industries.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 10th Nov. 1917.

36. The Hindu Nesan, of the 10th November, comments as follows on the Administration Report of the Madras Department of Industries for the year 1916–17:—The fact that the Government have quietly recorded this report without expressing any opinion thereon makes us presume that the Government found nothing in the work of the Department to deserve special praise at their hands. The report shows that while the expenditure of the Department in the year under review was about two and a half lakhs of rupees, its income during the year was not more than Rs. 19,000. From this it is clear that it has been working at a loss. Properly speaking, there cannot be any better opportunity than this period of war to improve the industries of the country, and yet the Department of Industries has not done much in this direction. The main reason for this is the difficulty in getting industrial experts to demonstrate the working of new industries and the required machinery for running such industries. Unless these two are secured, much benefit cannot be derived from this Department whatever may be its expenditure.

The paper then details the efforts made by the Department to improve the manufacture of pencils in this Presidency and adds that hundreds and thousands of paper and pencil factories are required in India.

The Madras Mail and the present situation.

YADARTAVACHANI, Kumbakōnam, 25th Sep. 1917.

37. The Yadartavachani, of the 25th September, condemns the action of the Madras Mail in raising a hue and cry against the Government for having listened to the unanimous prayer of the Indians and released Mrs. Besant and others and suggests that, as the attacks of this paper amount to sedition and tend to create discord between Europeans and Indians, it should be directed to furnish security under the Press Act, and its Editor interned. These comments were reproduced in the Hindu Nesan, of the 1st October, and abstracted in paragraph 59 of Report No. 40 of 1917.

MAHAVIKATA DUTAN, Madras, 10th Nov. 1917.

The Anglo-Indian agitation.

38. The Mahavikata Dutan, of the 10th November, reproduces from the Swadesamitran, of the 2nd idem, the Tamil version of the proceedings of an Anglo-Indian meeting held in London, under the presidency of Lord Sydenham, appearing therein and referred to in paragraph 46 of Report No. 45 of 1917.

CATHOLIC NESAN, Madras, Aug., Sep. and Oct. 1917.

Demand of security for the Catholic Nesan.

39. The Catholic Nesan, for August, September and October, takes exception to a security of Rs. 500 having been demanded from its Editor evidently relying upon the misrepresentations made to the authorities about it and adds:—Our readers as well as the Government should know that we have nothing to do with politics. It is really regrettable that, knowing the faithful loyalty of the Indian Catholics, our Government should have taken this step listening to the spiteful tale of one or two persons. As we do not want to disobey the Government, we have paid the security and begun to publish the paper again. Whatever our enemies may do, we are not going to give up the good work we have undertaken. We have decided to conduct the paper more zealously than before.

CATHOLIC NESAN, Madras, Aug., Sep. and Oct. 1917.

Diwan Bahadur L. D. Swamikannu Pillai and the Indian Catholic Association.

40. The Catholic Nesan, for August, September and October, elsewhere refers to a circular letter said to have been addressed by Diwan Bahadur L. D. Swamikannu Pillai a few days before the general meeting of the Indian Catholic Association to the members thereof, who are Government officials, warning them against taking part in a political agitation against the Government and threatening them that, if they did not heed his warning, he would himself have to report against them to the Government, and remarks:—There are none in this Association who are carrying on an agitation against the Government. Perhaps Mr. Pillai means by the word "agitation" the confusion that now prevails on account of a difference of opinion among the members. It is for Mr. Pillai himself to say how the rupture between two parties in a public work can be termed political agitation. The Indian Catholic Association has not dabbled in politics till now and will not do so. So, we are not in a position to understand the new interpretation given to the object of the Association by Mr. Pillai. Moreover, we have not heard till now of highly placed officials like Mr. Pillai having threatened other officials of his community by means of such secret letter. Has he done this under the impression that on account of his eminent position his action can never be wrong? We trust that the Government or the members of the Legislative Council will bestow their attention on this matter and ascertain the reason for his having acted like this.

Income-tax.

42. In the course of a leader on this subject the Vaisyamitran, of the 5th November, reproduces the comments of the Pandya Nesan, of the 29th October, on the same subject which have been abstracted in paragraph 68 of Report No. 45 of 1917.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 12th Nov. 1917.

The Non-Brahman leaders' conference, Bezwada.

43. The Dravidan, of the 12th November, reproduces in Tamil the presidential address of Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar at this conference, which appears in extenso in Justice of the same date.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 12th Nov. 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 12th November, gives in Tamil an abstract of the above address and comments on it as follows:—In the first portion of the address Mr. Chettiyar vents his wrath against the Brahmans who demand Home Rule and in the latter he too demands Home Rule. He says that he cannot understand how those who are demanding only the gradual introduction of reforms suddenly pray for complete Home Rule. Evidently he does not see that the Congress is now demanding only one or two reforms which will form the first step towards Home Rule. He repeats the old complaint of the Anglo-Indians that we are demanding Home Rule as a reward for the help rendered by us for the war. He has not noted the answer of the Congress League party for this that we are demanding only the fulfilment of a promise made in Parliament that, as the war has dispelled the want of confidence in us on the part of the authorities, they are prepared to give us some powers. Mr. Chettiyar utters an untruth when he says that the Brahmans have not assisted the Government with men and money. In places where the Brahmans were allowed to enlist in the army, they did not hesitate to do so and the United Provinces can be quoted as an instance in point. If the Brahmans have not enlisted in the army in this Presidency, the Government are themselves responsible for it. As for the help rendered by the Brahmans in money, an examination of the Government accounts will show that the statement of Mr. Chettiyar is wrong. He admits that the progress of local self-government has for some reasons been impeded. The Brahmans now demand reforms which will be the basis for Home Rule only to prevent such impediments occurring again. Mr. Chettiyar dwells upon the necessity for primary education. Does he not know that when a Brahman brought forward a bill in the Imperial Legislative Council some years ago to enable all people to have the benefit of primary education, the Government rejected it on the ground of want of funds? How can he say that this excuse will not be repeated again? If, as is demanded by the Congress and the Muslim League, the control of funds is in the hands of popular representatives, will they not be in a position to incur sufficient expenditure for the education of children? Mr. Chettiyar suggests, as if it were a new proposal of his, that the people should without going to courts settle their disputes by means of panchayats. Mr. Chettiyar should have had a personal knowledge of the several attempts of the Brahmans and others for many years to introduce a law on this subject at meetings of the Legislative Council at which he himself was present, having proved futile. He does not evidently realise that, unless the number of popular representatives in the Legislative Council is increased, as is demanded by the Congress and the Muslim League, the desire of the people to settle disputes by means of panchayats may after all prove to be a day dream. Lastly, he consoles the men of his party with the statement that the time of acquisition of Home Rule by them is not far off. What else do the Home Rulers say? No one demands Home Rule and complete powers immediately. We ask only that the foundation for it should be laid. But there is one difference between our request and his. We demand Home Rule for all people, be they Brahmans or non-Brahmans. Mr. Chettiyar demands it perhaps for the non-Brahmans alone.

The conference of non-Brahman leaders.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 12th Nov. 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 12th November, says under this heading:—

Persons like Sir Valentine Chirol, who were opposed to the aims of the Indians have now changed their opinions. But Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chetti, the President of the conference of non-Brahman leaders, holds opinions which are more retrograde than the opinions held by these persons formerly. His speech reiterates what the unsympathetic Anglo-Indian historians have written. Most of the things contained in it have been proved by recent investigations to be untrue. . . Advocates of freedom want greater powers of self-government under the British suzerainty. The country has not made any advancement in education, commerce, agriculture and industries, and the Home Rulers say that Home Rule is the only remedy for this evil. In his speech on the Mesopotomia Report Mr. Montagu stated that there is no room for progress under the present system of the Government. He has said that the present system of administration is inflexible, antedeluvian and unsuited to the times, and that if in the light of new experience, this machine of government, which is a century old, is not reconstructed, the British cannot guide the destinies of the Indian Empire in future. From these words it is evident that great changes have to be effected in the machinery of the Government. Statesmen have found such changes to be necessary not only for the advancement of India, but also for the benefit of England, the efficiency of the empire, and for victory in the war. Doctor Rutherford stated that an invaluable opportunity to strengthen the empire offered itself in 1914, that the British lost it, that if the British statesmen had possessed at least a hundredth part of the wisdom which Mr. Campbell Bannerman had, they would have at once given complete self-government to India and Egypt, and raised large armies in both the countries to march up to the gates of Constantinople. He said: "As stated by Mr. Lloyd George, a free people could safely defend their homes. The grant of responsible Government is the only charm that can put an end to all social and religious animosities. Any delay or neglect in this matter will end in danger. The Mesopotamia Report has opened the gate to self-government. . . Dependence upon others is a canker to national greatness and to the splendour of noble qualities." Doctor Rutherford quotes the following words of Sir John Seely: —"We think that a national Government conducted by the Indian people will be more beneficial, for though such a Government may be backward in civilization, yet it will suit the conditions of the country." British statesmen like Mr. Montagu are doing their best to get an opportunity like the one they lost in 1914. The readers may think for themselves if, in this matter, the shortsighted utterances of Mr. Tyagaraya Chetti are of more use to the efficiency of the empire than the words of advice of statesmen like Mr. Montagu and Doctor Rutherford. . . It appears strange to Mr. Tyagaraya Chetti that the Indians should demand self-government of the Britons, who have pledged themselves to secure independence to all the small States in the world. Mr. Tyagaraya Chetti himself admitted at the end of his speech that, under the British Raj, trade, commerce, education, etc., had not progressed and that the old state of things was much better. He said:—Our rulers have not thought it fit to give us the education that would enable the country to progress in industries and commerce. The education now given only enables us to be quill-drivers, teachers and pleaders. We want scientific education which will be of use in promoting trade and commerce. The Government have to reform their educational policy accordingly." Mr. Chetti has to understand that it is to spread such education in the country that the people urge the necessity of a change in the system of Government. Self government is the only remedy to set right the defects. . . Self-government is necessary to make the people competent to govern themselves. The history of the British Colonies and that of the Philippine Islands bear out this. We are at a loss to know why Mr Chetti ignores this truth and vilifies the advocates of self-government, especially the Branmans.

The Non-Brahman Conference, Bezwada

The Andhrapatrika, of the 12th November, publishes the speech delivered by Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chetti as President of the Non-Brahman Conference held at Bezwada, which contains: When the people are told that their taxes will be reduced under self-government, they feel glad and, without any thought, affix their signatures to memorials. The Government and Mr. Montagu have to note the deceit practised in getting signatures to Mr. Gandhi's scheme. These deceitful practices will become manifest if Mr. Montagu selects one or two signatures made in some streets in Madras and ascertain through the Government what the signatories understood about the scheme and why they signed it.

Home Rule for India.

45. The Dravidan, of the 9th November, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an abstract of the proceedings of a public meeting held on the 31st October 1917 at the "Broadway new-line public maidan", Madras, when the compliance of the demand of the Brahmans was objected to on the grounds that the present juncture, when the attention of the King-Emperor was wholly engaged in the prosecution of the war, was not a suitable opportunity for demanding concessions from the Government, and that it would be dangerous to confer Home Rule on India before the Dravidians acquired the full benefit of English education and union was established in the country by the abolition of caste system.

The Dravidan, of the 12th November, publishes, as reported by a correspondent, the proceedings of a non-Brahman meeting held at Kangayam on the 4th idem, when one of the speakers is said to have taken objection to the present agitation for Home Rule on the grounds that no country with only four per cent of its people being educated had ever acquired self-government and that, if India was granted Home Rule now, the administration of the country would be in the hands of the educated classes, who are at present only Brahmans, and would lead to the oppression of the non-Brahmans.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 12th Nov. 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 12th November, publishes an abstract of the proceedings of a meeting held at Nayaniyappan Street, Madras, on the 9th idem for the purpose of justifying the grant of Home Rule to India, at which Mr. N. Vedachalam Pillai, as president, is reported to have observed that one object of those who demand Home Rule is to relieve the present Government of the pressure that may be felt by them in having to maintain a large number of Indians, who, for want of education and money to make a living, may prove to be a heavy drag upon them.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 12th Nov. 1917.

The Dravida Patrika, of the 14th November, quotes a portion of a letter of Sir Valentine Chirol to the London Times advocating the grant of reforms to India at the present juncture and observes:—Does not Sir Valentine Chirol's letter show that the mischief of anti-Home Rulers has not told in England? There are very few indeed who have the heart to condemn the grant of Home Rule to India repeating in the same breath that England has entered into this terrible war only to secure the freedom of Belgium and other countries in Europe. Now that the vision of even Sir Valentine Chirol, who was one of the most virulent opponents of Home Rule, is widening, it is clear that other opponents of Home Rule will not make much fuss hereafter. So we see that we can hope for the establishment of a system of Government acceptable to the Indian public and responsible to them direct.

Home Rule.

Referring to its previous report of an incident under the heading "Are you a Home Ruler" (vide report No. 44, article 32 last paragraph) the Satyavadi, of the 13th November, explains that the report arose from a misunderstanding on the part of the student in question who was merely told by the medical officer that his complaint was not of a nature that required admission as an in-patient into the hospital. The paper finally remarks:—We are glad to announce that our remark that Home Rulers were said to have no place in a hospital supported by public funds is groundless."

SATYAVADI, Mysore, 13th Nov. 1917.

India and the empire.

46. The Andhrapatrika, of the 8th November, reports the Amrita Bazaar Patrika to have said—It is not out of kindness or out of an intention to allay the agitation in India that the London Government have published the new scheme of reforms. To maintain their empire is more their object than to satisfy the Indians. The English statesmen have understood that the future welfare of the empire depends upon granting Home Rule or self-government to India. This is the reason why it has been announced that responsible Government will be introduced into India and why Mr. Montagu is coming to India. . . The British had been doing hitherto without the help of India. The present war has introduced new conditions, and the British need Indian soldiers and Indian money not only to defeat the Germans in the present war but also to save the empire from the fear of the enemies in the future. In fact, the whole burden of the empire is in the hands of the Indians. If therefore the Indians do not now sacrifice their men and money for the protection of the British Empire, Great Britain will fail to prosecute the war to a victorious end, and will find herself in trouble even after the war. . . If the Indians are not given Home Rule or self-government at an early date, they will not like to sacrifice their life and wealth for the protection of the empire.

Political reforms.

47. The Andhrapatrika, of the 8th November, says:—Of the schemes of reforms heretofore announced, only the Congress scheme lays the foundation of self-government and paves the way for the goal. It is the duty of the people to give their consent to it. That the Non-Brahman Conference of Pulivendla has approved of the scheme with slight changes shows that the non-Brahman community is not opposed to national ideals. . . By accepting, in the form of a resolution, the principle that the Executive Councils should be under the control of the Legislative Councils, which is enunciated in the Congress scheme, the Madras Landholders' Association has expressed its full approval of the demand for self-government. The other resolutions followed only the Congress scheme. From this it is plain that the words of those who say that the reforms laid down by the Congress are revolutionary and that all but the agitators are opposed to them, are meaningless. . . The answer given by the interned Muhammadans to the Raja of Muhammadabad should have dispelled all suspicion. It is strange that Mrs. Besant tries to justify the fear of the Government that the sympathy for Turkey which the interned Muhammadans have in their hearts may translate itself into action. Indians must request the Government to begin a new era by granting pardon not only to the interned Muhammadans but to all political offenders. As all should equally enjoy the benefit of the reforms, we request the Government to create circumstances similar to those created in Ireland.

Self-government.

50. The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th November, says:—Mr. Montagu has come to this country. Self-government is essential for the progress of the people, for the stability of the empire, for efficiency of administration, and for victory in the war. It is very necessary for bringing the rulers and the ruled together in closer bonds of love, and for the economic, the industrial, the moral, the administrative and the military strength. Self-government is necessary for the glory of England Justice, righteousness and even self-interest declare its necessity. Self-government cannot but be granted to India in the present circumstances. There is no use swimming against the current. Our opponents will do well to realise this truth, help the nationalists and not stand in their way. We hope that the Conference of the Andhra non-Brahman leaders will, at this juncture, do its duty by giving its approval to the Congress scheme of reforms.

51. The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th November, says:—The endeavours of the Mail to see that Mr. Montagu does not land in India have proved a failure. As by the arrival of Mr. Montagu, unceasing sorrow has overtaken that paper, the Indians will do well to sympathise with it.

Non-Brahmans and education.

52. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 5th November, refers to the opposition of the Brahmans to the endeavours of non-Brahmans to establish a Vedic school at Vellatur (Guntūr district) and says:—See how these Brahman Home Rulers are trying to thwart the educational propaganda of non-Brahmans. We suggest that the forthcoming Non-Brahman Conference should request the Government to warn the Brahmans against such acts.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 5th Nov. 1917.

Separate representation.

53. The Andhraprakasika, of the 5th November, says:—It is dangerous to place any faith in the words of the Home Rulers especially after Mrs. Besant has stated that it is impracticable to insert in the Congress League scheme anything about separate representation. We must be on our guard in this matter. There is no limit to the deceit practised by the Home Rulers in trying to make Mr. Montagu understand that the whole of India has approved of the Home Rule propaganda.

54. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 5th November, invites the attention of the Government to the fact that the members of the Agiripalle Home Rule League are imposing upon the ignorance of the illiterate masses and taking their signatures or marks. He says that he asked the illiterate people not to listen to the words spoken by those members against the Government, and that if the Government should enquire they would find that 99 per cent of those who affixed their marks did so without being told as to what they are affixing their marks to.

55. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 5th November, protests against the appointment by the Guntūr District Association of one Paturi Appayya to represent to Mr. Montagu the grievances of the non-Brahmans, inasmuch as that gentleman is an advocate of Home Rule. The correspondent requests the association to call for a meeting of the non-Brahmans to enable the majority of them to select one to represent their cause to Mr. Montagu.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 5th Nov. 1917.

56. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 6th November, cites as an instance of the wickedness of the advocates of Home Rule, the incident in which he was called an educated fool by a student for refusing to sign the memorial suggested by Mr. Gandhi and says:—While the tyranny of these cruel men is such even under the benign British Raj, can they be controlled if India gets Home Rule? If Home Rule is granted at this juncture, there will undoubtedly be bloodshed all over India. Those who are after immediate Home Rule should know that their lectures would only turn out to be so many cries in the wilderness. . . It is not proper on the part of the Government to neglect the fact that students also are taking part in politics.

The wickedness of Home Rulers.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 6th Nov. 1917.

57. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 9th November, writes under this heading as follows:—The United States of America took possession of the islands in 1898. . . In March 1910 the Americans appointed their civil officers in place of a Military Government. . . . Mr. Ravel describes the magnanimity of the Americans as follows: "It is commendable that the Philippinese should be granted freedom under the Jone's Bill. This will prove immensely advantageous in the matter of international political development. The Americans have, in all their past declarations of independence, proclaimed that the people should be governed with their consent. Consistently with this, the Americans have now disinterestedly determined to give to the Philippinese complete independence. The like of this we have never heard or seen in any history." In India also, under the Hindu administration, the people as well as the dependent States were allowed complete independence. Never did the Emperor interfere with the affairs of small kingdoms. The dependent States, one and all, implicitly obeyed the Imperial commands. . . The Indian method of treating the conquered is observed today by the Americans in relation to the Philippinese. Just like some of the Anglo-Indians and some of the Hindus seeking official positions, who are protesting against the grant of Home Rule to India, there was a republican party who were opposed to the grant of immediate self-government. Nevertheless the Americans are giving the Philippinese with the speed of a railway train, the right to manage their affairs independently and are affording necessary facilities. When the Americans occupied the Philippinese all except a few in that country were illiterate. But the Americans spent their own money and took many of the Philippinese to their country and educated them there. They even gave them encouragement by entertaining them in Government offices. Thus, all the offices under their Government passed into the hands of the Philippinese. I represent that it is desirable that our Government should also do the same thing for us.

In 1911 one half of the number of the High Court Judges including the Chief Judge was composed of the Philippinese only. Even in Civil Service the proportion of the number of the Philippinese employed was 67 per cent and the proportion of the Philippinese in Municipal offices was 90 per cent. In every department it was the Philippinese that were most prominent. For the last five years it has been the Philippinese that formed a majority in Imperial and Provincial services. While the Americans are thus giving the Philippinese complete independence, the bureaucracy takes us to be mere children and tell us that it is not time yet for us to get self-government. They say that even in the municipal and the district board affairs we should not exercise complete liberty. It is said that even in such small matters we should be subject to their control. We have been enjoying happiness under the English Government for the last 175 years. And yet it has not been possible for them to make us fit for Home Rule. The Americans could, however, in a minute make the Philippinese steeped in darkness their co-partners. In all respects (in the matter of education or civilization) the Philippinese cannot equal the Indians. When such weak people could obtain all rights, that we, who are great by reason of our education, our intelligence, our unparalleled martial spirit, should be declared unfit for such rights is ridiculous. When the Philippinese could become capable under the American Government, what is the reason that we Indians should fail to become so under the British Government which is a fountain of all facilities? The cause of all this is the difference in the methods of administration. I, therefore, wish that the British Government, who have taken a vow to protect the good and to punish the wicked and to further the cause of human liberty, may adopt the American system of administration.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 9th Nov. 1917.

Welcome to Mr. Montagu.

58. The Andhrapatrika, of the 9th November, in its leader under this heading, writes :—"We heartily welcome Mr. Montagu on behalf of the Indians. . . Mrs. Besant only discovered the desire for freedom inspired by the war ideals, and did not create it. She gave shape to that intense desire and fanned it into a flame. Repression, instead of quenching it, has only fanned it into a blaze. The authorities directed their attention to India. They understood that the unrest that had spread in India was only in consonance with the time spirit. The Mesopotomian Commission's report has made it clear that the present system of Government is not suited to the present conditions. All statesmen immediately opened their eyes. They understood that the administration of the country by the bureaucracy which gained a name for efficiency was not able either to give satisfaction to the people or to make the administration efficient. Statesmen are of opinion today that it is necessary to make the empire more consolidated. Unless the empire gains in solidarity, it cannot be possible for people of all parts to make a united attempt to gain a victory when such critical times present themselves. To secure such a condition the various parts of the empire should bear equal responsibility and to make them bear such responsibility equal rights shall also have to be granted. If India is to co-operate in working for the prosperity of the empire the financial and the industrial condition of India must be placed on a stable footing. The people must recognise their own responsibilities and render help to the cause of the empire. It is, therefore, necessary that India should be placed on an equal footing with the other parts of the empire. This is the chief reason for Mr. Montagu declaring that the Indians will be given a responsible government. It is quite plain that granting Home Rule to India is not only for securing the prosperity of the Indians, but also for securing the prosperity of the empire as well. This principle is recognised by all far-sighted statesmen. Even Sir John Rees and Lord Curzon, who are opposed to Indian aspirations, have, owing to the exigencies of war, viewed the Indian problem in a liberal spirit and found the truth. Only a few such individuals as Lord Sydenham and the Madras Mail are still groping in darkness. What is most wonderful, we find from today's telegrams that even Sir Valentine Chirol, writing to the London Times, justifies the visit of Mr. Montagu. When even Sir Chirol, who is strongly opposed to the Home Rule movement, speaks with approbation the new policy adopted by the Government, it becomes apparent that the progress of India is a political necessity. The London Times has also declared that Mr. Montagu should visit India and ascertain the wishes of the people and satisfy them. It is certain that those who have recognised the interests of the empire, whether they are conservatives or liberals, are all at one as regards India. The members of the Labour party in Hull in England have expressed their sympathy for the desire for self-government. Our aspirations, therefore, cannot but become fruitful, however much the opponents of Home Rule may present obstacles. It would be right that they should recognise this truth even now and work for the amelioration of the Indian nation.

The first thing that Mr. Montagu has to do is to pardon political offenders. If the new era is begun with this liberal policy, the gift of reforms will make the whole of India feel happy. We represent to Mr. Montagu that this step is absolutely necessary for creating a calm atmosphere in the country. . . Small changes are not useful. . . At first must be granted reforms which do not fall short of those recommended by the Congress, and then it is necessary that not only a promise be given that complete self-government will be granted in a few years but it must be clearly stated what progress will be made in each year.

Further, we beg Mr. Montagu to take into his deep consideration the question of dividing the country according to the languages spoken, which is necessary for the perfection of Home Rule. The Government have already begun to form the provinces of Bengal, Bihar and Assam on the language basis. The Uriyas, the Kanarese people, the Maharattas and the Andhras and other communities intend submitting memorials pressing the need for dividing the country according to the languages spoken. Though they all desire for separate provinces for each one of them they all base their wishes on the principle of a division of the country on the language basis. As a solution of this problem is the principle means for the efficiency of Home Rule we pray that Mr. Montagu will take up the question for his consideration.

The Indians are eagerly awaiting the arrival of Mr. Montagu. We wish that his visit to India may prove a great help to the prosperity of the country.

59. The Desabhimani, of the 4th November, refers to the Dasara-Muharram trouble in Guntūr and quotes from the Andhrapatrika of the 29th October, the telegraphic message already reported on page 2634 of the weekly report.

60. While giving the proceedings of the pro-Congress Non-Brahman meeting held at Bezwada, the Andhrapatrika, of the 12th November, reports the President of the Reception Committee to have said: If we lose this opportunity afforded by Mr. Montagu's visit, we will be ruined. The party of Justice among the Non-Brahmans are, under the evil influence of the Anglo-Indians, bent upon doing great injustice to India. We have to defeat that treachery. The hatred of Brahmans should end. We have to tell Mr. Montagu that we will not accept anything short of the Congress scheme.

The pro-Congress Non-Brahman Conference.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 12th Nov. 1917.

The paper reports the President to have said: When necessary, I will be ready to quarrel with the Brahmans. But when Anglo-Indians wish to make capital out of our quarrels, I will join the Brahmans, maintain the honour of the country and not do harm to it. Those that are ignorant of other countries are so foolish as not to wish for self-government and are under the leading strings of others. But it is a fact that those who returned from other countries are anxiously awaiting for the time when they will have self-government. See with what contempt we are being looked upon in the British Colonies. When the vessel in which I travelled arrived at Cape Town, the people there stated that Indians should not land there. Cape Town is a town within our empire. The reason why we are looked down upon within the empire is our dependence on others. Swaraj means the maintenance of our self-respect. We do not demand swaraj with swords in our hands. We are begging for it. It is ridiculous that our brethren say that it is wrong to beg for it. Swaraj alone is our salvation.

66. The Hitakarini, of the 4th November, reproduces from another paper an article which contains the following remarks:— Some time ago out of every twelve marriages in America, there was one case of dissolution of marriage. Now divorce suits have increased and the ratio of divorses to marriages is 1 to 8. Mr. Bose surmises that the day will come when there will be as many divorces as there will be marriages in America.

the Congress, and that the conference would have fared better if any person more conversant with politics than Raja Ankinidu Prasad Bahadur had been elected President.

The spirit of Mr. Gokhale.

63. In describing a vision, the Hitakarini, of the 4th November, reports the spirit of Mr. Gokhale to have said:—Without considering the future political goal of the Indians, I have drafted my scheme, which, I admit, has no connection with the present requirements. It is not possible to correct from the spiritual world a mistake done in the material world. I am sorry for my haste. Should I now be in the world of matter, I would propose greater reforms than those formulated by the Congress, and make the opponents shut their mouths. Victory is certain in spite of all obstacles. . . We are doing tapas for the salvation of the country. His Highness the Aga Khan, whom I believed to be my friend, has published my scheme which was drawn up too long ago to meet the present requirements, and has proved unfaithful to me. . . My countrymen, I hope, will not misunderstand me.

The Eastern systems of medicine.

64. The Hitakarini, of 4th November, says:—The opinions expressed by the Government of Madras about the Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicine has disappointed the people. His Excellency the Governor has said that these two systems are not established, and cannot be relied on, and that it is not proper to spend Government money for their development. . . When matters like this come up for decision, we feel the necessity for self-government.

The zamindars.

66. The Kistnapatrika, of the 10th November, says:—A great agitation is passing over the country. Those who do not want swaraj, demand reforms. Those who say that this is not the time are preparing addresses. Even the zamindars, who expressed themselves against the grant of self-government have now, in expiation of their old sin, set about the preparation of a new address. We congratulate the zamindars on the fact that they are ahead of the non-Brahmans in their demand for swaraj. They have almost approved of the Congress scheme. They have asked for privileges which even the Congress has not asked for. . . On the whole, the reforms which the zamindars have decided upon are highly praiseworthy. That the zamindars have removed the dishonour that the meeting at Bikkavolu has brought to this presidency and that they have resolved to tread in the path of the Congress, augurs good to the country.

Mr. Asesha Kumara Banerji.

67. The Desamata, of the 7th November, refers to the trial of Mr. Asesha Kumara Banerji and says:—He is tried at Arrah by a special tribunal under the Defence of India Act. The trial began yesterday. Till now no newspaper correspondent has been tried under the above Act. This is the first trial under its provisions. Alas! His three children and his wife are helpless now. Liberal-hearted men will do well to send contributions and protect them. The Amrita Bazaar Patrika will gratefully receive the contributions and transmit them to the members of the family of Mr. Asesha Kumara Banerji. Not only newspaper editors and correspondents, but also newspaper readers should note this.

Musalman meetings.

68. Referring to the proceedings of some anti-Home Rule Musalman meetings, the Desamata, of the 7th November, remarks that the proceedings were unfair and calculated to damage the interests of the country.

69. The Desamata, of the 7th November, says:—Though the Landholders' Association have not approved of the Congress League scheme, they laid down a scheme on the main principles on which the Congress League scheme was based. Even the resolution that the majority of members in the Imperial Legislative Council should be officials would have been thrown out, if the President had not given his casting vote in its favour. . . We are glad that the zamindars have come forward to help on the progress of the country and remove the slander that the zamindars are against the grant of self-government.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 7th Nov. 1917.

70. The issues of the Desamata, of the 31st October and the 7th November, contain an article from the pen of a correspondent on the subject of separate class representation, in which the correspondent remarks:—When the Madras Government increased the members of their Legislative Council, they gave prominence to this matter. The introduction of the principle of separate class and creed representation sows the seeds of racial and religious antagonism in the Legislative Council. It sets up one class against another. . . We submit that the principle of separate representation suggested by the Government of India, and the decided opinion of the Government of Madras in the matter, keep peace, union and good Government away from His Majesty's subjects. . . It is not known why separate representation, which has not been allowed to castes like those of the Kshatriyas and Vysias, has been allowed to Brahmans. The constitution of the local Legislative Councils, approved of by the Government, is dangerous, radically defective, and worthy of being entirely rejected. It is also difficult to understand why separate representation has been given to Barristers and other lawyers.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 31st Oct. & 7th Nov. 1917.

71. The Andhrapatrika, of the 12th November, reproduces under this heading an article from the Amrita Bazaar Patrika, which contains:—Many are not aware that Indian military officers were able to march western soldiers into war. Some examples of this will be found in the history of the Sepoy Mutiny by Mr. Kai Mallison (sic). On page 148 of the history, it is stated that Indian soldiers were commanded by Indian Commanders. An English soldier never thought it below his dignity to fight under an Indian Commander. On page 149 it is said that the Bengal sepoys fought equally well with the English soldiers in the battle of Plassey. On page 153, it is said, "Under the impression that we are doing good to the Indians, we take into our hands the appointments in the Civil and Military services. We are employing the Indians in rough and menial service. . . Such discourteous treatment of the Indian officers has changed the character of the sepoy regiments. Men of high birth have given up joining the army." When some months ago, we said that in the battle of Plassey, the Bengal sepoys fought most bravely and excelled the western soldiers, the Anglo-Indian papers ridiculed our words. What answer are they going to give us now?

Indian Commanders.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 12th Nov. 1917.

72. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 13th November, writes:—The London Times has an article on Mrs. Besant. It says that her internment has only served to add to her fame and popularity; that it was a mistake to have interned her; that it never upheld the policy of interning her; that there was no harm in her being elected President of the National Congress; and that she would drop into obscurity if the Government should wholly ignore her activities. Mrs. Besant has during the last 40 years earned greater fame in the United Kingdom than even the editor of the Times. Even Gladstone and Huxley were afraid of discussing political and scientific problems with her. What place can others have by her side? Mrs. Besant adds to the glory of the empire. To India she is believed to be Fortune incarnate. No human being is infallible. Mrs. Besant is no goddess. But no woman has ever equalled her in point of ability.

Mrs. Besant.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 13th Nov. 1917.

73. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 9th November, writes:—We had some time ago placed before our readers the advantages of grouping districts into various divisions on the basis of language, and it is more than a year since we suggested that the Kanarese-speaking population now scattered over different areas in different provinces

A Kannada Province.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 9th Nov. 1917.

should agitate that they should all be brought together under a separate province. We are now glad to find, however, that the Dharwar press in the (Bombay Presidency) and the Karnataka of Bangalore announce that our brethren of Dharwar have undertaken this laudable task. If a race or community becomes scattered over different provinces, their history, language, traditions and status, etc., get altered for the worse and their position from a national point of view loses its importance. The movement of the people of Dharwar therefore (for the formation of a separate Kannada Province) is highly praiseworthy. But we cannot say that the proposal of the Karnataka to bring all the educational institutions of the various Kanarese districts under the Mysore University, will be unanimously welcomed. It seems impracticable that while all other administrative control remains in the hands of the British, educational control alone can be transferred to Mysore. Like the Mysore Diwan's suggestion that the Native States should have their representatives in our Legislative Councils, the Karnataka now suggests that the Mysore University should spread its jurisdiction beyond the province. It may be true that the Mysore University's methods of education are among the best. We do not gainsay that point. But the policy of extending the work of the University beyond Mysore will benefit Mysore rather than anybody else. What we wish to point out is that it would not be well to trouble ourselves with anything more than to aim at bringing the Kanarese-speaking people of the Bombay and Madras Presidencies under the same administrative division.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 9th Nov. 1917.

The alleged arrogance of a Civilian officer.

74. Referring to an article in the Hindu, of the 1st November, regarding what it styles "An instance of arrogance", the Swadesabhimani, of the 9th November, gives a summary of the report alleging that Mr. G. W. Wells got offended with a Baniya, because he made a curious sound in removing phlegm from his throat which the officer mistook for an act intended to annoy him, and that the latter summoned him and made him kiss the toes of his boots.

The paper remarks that it is too early in the present stage of the report to comment on Mr. Wells's conduct; and that it is to be hoped that the Government will hold a due enquiry in the matter.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 9th Nov. 1917.

The health of school children.

75. Referring to the importance of arranging for the medical inspection of school children and to the report of the Surgeon-General on the result of the work tentatively done in this direction in the city of Madras, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 9th November, states that when it has been found that 20 per cent of the students absent themselves owing to their being subject to tubercular complaints and more than 5 per cent are subject to leprosy and other skin diseases and when even these preliminary enquiries have brought these facts to light, it is easy to see how imperative it is that the Government should provide a closer and more thorough inspection of all school children to prevent the spread of contagious or infectious diseases. The paper adds that the Surgeon-General's remarks on this subject are highly welcome.

VOKKALIGARA PATRIKE, Bangalore City, 14th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu and the backward classes.

76. In an article welcoming Mr. Montagu to India, the Vokkaligara Patrike, of the 14th November, says that it is earnestly expected in all quarters that Mr. Montagu will not overlook the interests of the various backward classes and the importance of giving them the right to elect their own representatives to the various administrative councils and other local bodies.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 14th Nov. 1917.

Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar.

77. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 14th November, in a lengthy leading article extolling Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar for his firmness in upholding Mrs. Besant, says that just as the British are engaged in a struggle for vindicating justice and righteousness, Mr. Subrahmanya Ayyar fought for the release of the interned, heedless of Anglo-Indian wrath and opposition in order to strengthen the ties between the rulers and the ruled and that it is in accordance with his cable to Mr. Montagu representing the situation in India that Mr. Montagu is now coming to this country to consult the Government, the representative bodies and leaders, including men of the type of Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar and to draw up a scheme of reforms which will strengthen the bonds of love between India and England for which the Indians must be primarily thankful to Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar. The paper says that Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar, Mrs. Besant, etc., are incarnate beings, who are born as the patriots of the country for the vindication of justice.

78. Under this heading, the Satyavadi, of the 13th November, in continuation of the article reported last week (vide Report No. 45, article 98), says:—According to Sir D. E. Wacha, even in normal times India is incurring a lavish military expenditure characteristic of war times. This is evident from the pre-war military expenditure of the self-governing States such as Canada and South Africa compared with that of India. It will thus be seen that while even such a prosperous State as Canada is spending only five per cent of her gross revenue for her military defences, India has been paying at the rate of 22 per cent. If the expenditure of Canada be taken as a standard, India is reasonably bound to pay only about £4,000,000. Thus India has been paying an excess of £15,000,000 a year, so that her armies may be ready to protect the Empire at a moment's notice. Lord Hardinge in his memorable speech in the House of Lords in his own defence said that India was quite exhausted by the help she gave during the first few months of the war. At the time when England was quite unready to enter the fields of this terrific war, our well-trained Indian army marched forward to the gates of Paris and swung back even such a formidable modern army of the Germans. If India had not voluntarily made that terrific sacrifice of lives at that juncture, it is impossible to say what the situation would have been today. This sacrifice of life, after all, is but a trifle by the side the other sacrifices which India has made. During the 15 years prior to the war, India has spent here (in India) Rs. 4,00,00,00,000 for the maintenance of British and Indian troops; while Canada has spent only £20,000,000. Every year 5,000 English soldiers trained with Indian money are being sent here and about 15,000 British soldiers trained in India for five years with Indian money leave this country; for the training of British troops in England and the maintenance of British troops in India, India is spending Rs. 20,00,00,000 annually. It has spent Rs. 3,00,00,00,000 in 15 years for the British army. About 300,000 British troops and officers trained with Indian funds were available at the outbreak of the war.

SATYAVADI, Mysore. 13th Nov. 1917.

India's services to the Empire.

79. Referring to the addresses presented by the Yogakshema Sabha and the Tiyya community to His Excellency the Governor of Madras during His Excellency's recent visit to Calicut, the Lokaprakasam, of the 5th November, points out that, while they deserve every possible help from the Government in the matter of education, the Nambudiris will not be justified in demanding a representative of their own on the Legislative Council before their community has made some progress in education. In the opinion of the paper, the demand of the Tiyyas for special educational facilities is not one that deserves the attention of the Government, as no obstacles are thrown in their way, and as poverty, which is the cause of their backwardness in education, is not a thing that is confined to that community.

LOKAPRAKASAM, Trichur, 5th Nov. 1917.

The Governor's visit to Calicut.

80. The Qaumi Report, of the 6th November, referring to the announcements made by Mr. Montagu, the Secretary of State for India in Parliament and to that of Lord Chelmsford in the Imperial Council, on the 20th August, on the subject of self-government, the ultimate aim or ideal of India, opines:—We do not consider it necessary either to clamour for Home Rule or to weep and wail in opposition to it. At the same time, it is incumbent upon us to carefully and diligently consider how our community is going to exist, and whether we can preserve it by supporting or opposing Home Rule. It is evident that the existence of our community cannot be maintained by supporting the Home Rule propaganda, we shall be obliged to efface our religious zeal and become Indians pure and simple.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 6th Nov. 1917.

The road ahead.

In our zeal for Home Rule we forget that we did not come to India to sacrifice our nationality, or conquer this land in order to submerge our national individuality in the sacred waters of the Ganges. History bears witness to the fact that we never acted on the principle "When in Rome do as Rome does." Wherever we went and with whatever people we mixed, we preserved our nationality intact. If, therefore, in our desire for, or love of, Home Rule, we are today prepared to become pure Indians, it will not be wrong to say that we have ignored the teaching of our holy religion and the examples of our forefathers. Similarly opposition to Home Rule is no friend of our nationality. Those who consider Hindus to be a source of danger should also reflect that their nationality also is in danger. When national dress, national honour and national ideas all gone, where is our nationality?

It is deplorable that anti-Home Rulers are afraid of political change, but do not dread irreligiousness.

We are not yet capable and wealthy enough to rule our country, nor are we so ignorant as to be utterly indifferent to the administration of the country. Our political education is still incomplete, and, therefore, we need the foreigner to be our ruler. We have been educated up to a certain standard, hence we require an opportunity to put our knowledge into practice. It is folly to estimate our position as greater or less than this.

If, by misrepresenting matters or forming principles on false conclusions, we obtain self-government, it will mean nothing but loss to us.

In all things we should be moderate. For the present, our citadel is situated midway between support of, and opposition to, Home Rule.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 10th Nov. 1917.

Arrival of the Secretary of State for India.

81. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 10th November, referring to the arrival of the Secretary of State for India, writes:—The news of Mr. Montagu's arrival in India has doubtless been received with extreme joy by members of all communities whether they be Home Rulers, pro-Home Rulers or anti-Home Rulers. They are pleased and fervently hope that their request will surely be granted.

The question of granting Home Rule to India is still pending A few Hindus and Mussalmans are trying their best to explain and prove that a band of union has been formed between the two communities.

Hundreds of thousands of Indian Mussalmans are of opinion that the demand for Home Rule is improper as it will give rise to sedition and rebellion and destroy concord and unity. Moreover it will put an end to the very existence of Muhammadans in India. The reputed leaders are either under the control of the Hindus or members of the Congress, or are such who will prefer the cry of Bande Mataram to that of "God is Great."

The editor urges the Muhammadans to demand the rights for which they are eligible.

Mr. Montagu will not reply to any deputation or address. On his return to England he will represent the state of affairs and circumstances relating to India in Parliament where they will be considered.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 10th Nov. 1917.

Arrival of Mr. Montagu.

82. The Qaumi Report, of the 10th November, has the following on the arrival of Mr. Montagu in India:—Many people will be surprised to hear that Mr. Montagu, the Secretary of State for India, arrived quite unexpectedly at Bombay yesterday morning and left the same evening for Delhi. But in these days nothing is surprising for the activity and piracy of the enemy are well known and consequently an unexpected arrival of this kind is a remarkable achievement.

We welcome Mr. Montagu and think that it is his duty to discriminate between right and wrong and not to allow himself to be deceived.

Our community gives him a hearty welcome, as a disciple of a philosopher like Lord Morley of whose tenure of office the right of separate election, which the Mussalmans enjoy today, is an outstanding memorial.

In renewing our welcome to him, we wish to remark that the British Government is now fighting in defence of weak nations, and we therefore hope that our community, which is weaker in education, wealth and numbers, will be the first to receive a correspondingly larger measure of support. We do not ask for our lost empire, but we do demand the restoration of our lost dignity.

The case of Mr. Muhammad Ali, Mrs. Annie Besant and the Viceroy.

83. The Qaumi Report, of the 7th November, gives a translation of Mrs. Besant's telegraphic report of her visit to His Excellency the Viceroy regarding the release of Mr. Muhammad Ali published in a recent issue of New India.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 7th Nov. 1917.

Mrs. Besant's advice.

84. The Qaumi Report, of the 10th November, refers to the advice of Mrs. Besant, given by her, after her return from Simla, after seeing the Viceroy about the release of Mr. Muhammad Ali, etc., to the effect that funds should be collected, and appeal preferred in the High Court first and then in the Privy Council, and observes:—We think the community must have read Mrs. Besant's message with feelings of disappointment and chagrin. Some gentlemen may be pleased that she has completed a great labour of love and given extremely sympathetic advice, but we cannot refrain from deploring her friendship and sympathy. It is very regrettable that by her meddling in this affair, she has dashed the hopes of our community to the ground. Although Mrs. Besant is an eloquent speaker, but how can her tongue express the sympathy a Mussalman tongue would voice? Kind-hearted though she be, how can she have the tender feelings of a Mussalman heart?

A deputation was about to be sent to the Viceroy, but Mrs. Besant, in her precipitancy and enthusiasm lost sight of sound methods. Had she reflected a little, she would not have been in such a hurry to put difficulties in the way of our national and religious affair and to create an awkward situation for the deputation.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 10th Nov. 1917.

IV.—NATIVE STATES.

Muhammadans in the State of Pudukkōttai.

85. A correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 7th November, complains of the inordinate preponderance of Brahmans in the service of the Pudukkōttai State and of the hardships suffered by the Muhammadans especially in the State on account of this, and, referring to the restrictions in force in the State against the Muhammadans taking water from the Pallava tank in the middle of the town of Pudukkōttai and against any Muhammadan entering the newly-constructed vegetable market with meat in his possession, appeals to his co-religionists not to join the Home Rule campaign of the Brahmans.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 7th Nov. 1917.

The Native States.

86. The Andhrapatrika, of the 12th November, says:—The Maharaja of Bikanir has urged the necessity of a separate conference to protect the interests of Native States. In his reply to this, His Excellency the Viceroy has said that if a scheme be made ready in this matter, he will place it before Mr. Montagu before he leaves India. The request of the Maharaja is a proper one. He represents that in the reconstruction of the empire, it is necessary that the rulers of Native States should be given their due place.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 12th Nov. 1917.

The Chiefs' Conference.

87. Referring to the Chiefs' Conference, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 15th November, writes:—Including the bigger zamindars, the number of Indian Chiefs comes to about 600. A third of the Indian territory belongs to them. The Government have made adequate arrangements for their education and training in administrative work. The British Government are eager to organise new divisions for this type of administration, and the Government of India also wish to add fresh territories to the area already under their control. The matter is under the consideration of the Home Government as well. These Chiefs may eventually be able to constitute a House of Lords as in England. If the representatives of the people in the National Congress and Provincial Conferences be recognised by the Government and given some status such as that of the Mysore Representative Assembly, these representatives will constitute the House of Commons. If the Provincial Conferences should form local Parliaments and their representatives forming the National Congress should form a central Parliament and the Chiefs should form the House of Lords and the administration should be conducted by these bodies, there can be no doubt that India will make excellent progress.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 15th Nov. 1917.

Malayali, Tangachcherry, 7th Nov. 1917.

Removal of the Malayali Press to Tangachcherry.

88. In a long leader the Malayali, of the 7th November, points out that its press and office have been removed from Quilon to Tangacherry, because the latter is a country belonging to Britain, where freedom and justice reign supreme, and because it desires to expose official jobberies, corruption and high-handedness, which in Travancore are the order of the day. It admits that Travancore has made great progress during the reign of His Highness the present Maharaja, who has undoubtedly the welfare of the people at heart, but that great care is taken to keep His Highness ignorant of the many wicked deeds, perpetrated by the officials. It then pays a tribute to Diwan Bahadur Mr. Krishnan Nayar's goodness of heart and high principles, but thinks that what Travancore now badly needs is a Diwan who, besides being good natured, has the courage to put down with an iron hand corruption, jobberies and high-handedness. It hopes that Mr. Krishnan Nayar will bear in mind that which he must now employ in Travancore is the "iron club", and that in the discharge of his duties, as His Highness's Minister, he should not, while respecting the orders of the British Government, allow himself to be influenced by the frowns or smiles of others.

(b) Courts.

A Judicial appointment.

1. In an article under the heading "A Rumoured Jobbery", the Hindu, of the 17th November, states:—"It is said that a strong effort is being made to get a junior Indian Barrister appointed to the office of Subordinate Judge. The young man, we are assured, has no practice worth mentioning, but is influentially connected and has lately tried unsuccessfully to cut a figure in local politics. A correspondent desires us to enter a protest against the suggested appointment 'on behalf of the hardworked Subordinate Judiciary'. We are quite sceptical about the efficacy of our protest in matters of this sort. The members of the Subordinate Judiciary have the right to look for a safeguarding of their interests to the High Court under whose direct supervision they do their work. It is the proper function of the High Court to see that the work of the Subordinate Judiciary is duly appraised and appreciated, and that its members are not subjected to unmerited supersession. Appointments to judicial offices and promotions of officers ought to be determined entirely by the opinion of the High Court who are in a far better position to exercise a sound judgment than the Executive Government. We need hardly say that the Judges of the High Court, who are interested to the impartial administration of justice and in the morale of the Subordinate Judiciary, are bound to vindicate their own position by entering their strong protest when necessity arises for the same. It is an anomaly of the present system that the Executive Government has the power to appoint sub-judges and to determine their promotion. To add to the objectionable feature, the judicial portfolio is held by a Member of Council, who is a member of the Indian Civil Service and who has held in the course of his career various executive appointments including that of the head of the Police Department".

Hindu, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

(d) Education.

The University of Madras and college discipline.

2. Justice, of the 17th November, writes:—"We are glad that the Syndicate of the University of Madras has chosen to assure college authorities of its desire to support them in the task of checking insubordination and maintaining discipline. Of late, owing to the questionable methods adopted by certain political propagandists, that task has become exceedingly difficult. . . . Most of these students scattered over the Presidency are not and could not be under the direct and immediate control of their parents and guardians, and these latter naturally look to the college authorities to keep them under proper control. It is therefore necessary that the authority of the heads of colleges must rest upon an unassailable basis. Under these circumstances the Syndicate of the University has not been a day too soon in giving its own assurance of support to the Principals of colleges."

Justice, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

Writing on this subject, the Hindu, of the 17th November, says:—"The latest authority to uphold the prestige of tactless Principals, and justify the existence of draconian rules regarding students' conduct is the Syndicate of the University of Madras. . . . This information is confirmed by the extraordinary circular to Principals of all affiliated colleges issued by the Syndicate of the University, a copy of which has been sent to us 'for information'. The circular, which will be found elsewhere, is unhappily worded and reveals a spirit of vengeful impatience with students' indiscretions which cannot be reconciled with the dignity, reserve and judicious frame of mind attaching to a responsible body. . . . We fail to understand the significance of the statement that the decision to pass this severe sentence, on the strikers of the Palghat College, was unanimously arrived at in the Syndicate. If it means anything, it only indicates how easily certain timid minds are liable to be influenced by clever but disingenious appeals in regard to the necessity for maintaining discipline and the potential dangers of leniency. This act of taking the blood of the students after it was generally supposed that the unfortunate affair had ended with the re-admission of most of the strikers by the Principal a few days ago, will come on the public as a great surprise and will assuredly tend to revive a controversy which we had hoped had been happily closed. . . Such exhibition of intolerance and impatience in regard especially to repenting young men who have at the worst been guilty of no more than an exaggerated zeal for their self-respect, is an outrage on propriety. The circular contains a lecture on the duties of students. We are firmly of opinion that students of colleges should obey the rules of discipline and submit to authority ; otherwise their education will be spoiled and habits of disobedience so cultivated cannot but work to their disadvantage in later life. While we hold this view, we, at the same time, expect from those who have to exercise this authority over students, tact, commonsense, a disposition to bear with students' innocent foibles, just treatment and a forgiving and generous temperament. A resolution is coming up at the next meeting of the local Legislative Council relating to the Palghat College, and we trust that the draconian character of the punishment inflicted on the students and the reactionary attitude of the Syndicate will be sufficiently dealt with during the debate."

Hindu, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

New India, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

New India, of the 19th November, observes:—"It is one of the saddest signs of the time that Educational authorities and students are constantly to be found in bitter antagonism, the authorities trying to crush the boys with the powers placed in their hands, the boys being turned into either cowards or rebels. We never hear of the Educational authorities advising the Principals and Professors to show a little tact, discretion and kindness; they are not rebuked for making insulting remarks to and about Indians, nor for setting subjects for essays on subjects certain to be viewed differently by Anglo-Indians and Indians, nor for punishing the essay-writers, if they, as is natural, take the view of their fathers on controverted topics. All the blame is poured out on the boys, and they are punished—the case before us is Palghat—by the Syndicate with shocking severity, ruined for life for what is, at the worst, a boyish fault. . . In this particular case some students followed a procession connected with the late internments and did no more; was there ever a lad, in any country, who, seeing a procession, did not accompany it? Yet this is the crime which has led the Syndicate to destroy the career of three lads, shutting them out from all University examinations, while others, who struck because the Principal called in the police to turn a lad out of the class room—what an exhibition of incapacity and folly!—are rusticated for terms extending to five years. One stands aghast at such cruelty, and the language of the Syndicate circular is as brutal as the sentences. . . The only result of their ill-advised action will be the springing up of National Colleges in all directions, in which discipline will be maintained by mutual love and respect, not by punishment and terror, and in which happiness will replace sullen discontent and veiled rebellion."

Hindu, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

The Government and school discipline.

3. Referring to the replies given by Government to questions regarding breaches of school discipline, in the Madras Legislative Council, the Hindu, of the 21st November, says:—"The attitude of surprising indifference shown in regard to the scandalous incident in the Presidency College confirms our suspicions about the readiness of the authorities to look at such matters from the proper perspective. In answer to a series of questions on the revolting occurrence, put by Mr. A. S. Krishna Rao, the Government have admitted all the facts relating to the punishment of Mr. Krishna Rao, son of Mr. Amrita Rao, Assistant Professor in that college. . . The amount of harm done to the moral sense by this senseless and unjust punishment is very considerable, and it is astonishing to know that the Government do not intend to take any action in the matter. We cannot conceive of a worse act which is calculated to encourage moral cowardice in students. In regard to the Palghat College affair, the Government replied in answer to an interpellation that it was a fact that the Hon'ble Mr. Stone refused to receive a deputation, but it was not a fact that it was a deputation of parents and guardians. The distinction sought to be made between the deputation that was ready to meet Mr. Stone and the deputation which Mr. Stone was willing to meet is worthy of a pettifogging lawyer, but it remains an undoubted fact that Mr. Stone came away from Palghat without having heard what the students and their parents and guardians had to say on the incidents that have had such unexpected consequences."

New India, Madras, 22nd Nov. 1917.

The University of Madras.

4. New India, of the 22nd November, writes:—"The experts in the local University have been playing for more than two years a very significant game the direct result of which is to continue the huge slaughter in the Intermediate examination. . . The experts are divided into two camps: one, headed by Mr. Stone, is for making the courses in English less taxing and thus avoiding slaughter; the other party, headed by the redoubtable Mr. Mark Hunter, is convinced that the courses of study are quite perfect. So whenever a proposal for relief is brought forward, Mr. Stone repeats the panacea and Mr. Hunter duly adds that some other method of reform must be thought of. Both these parties are united in opposing the resolution moved; and thanks to the officialisation of the University, these experts easily carry the day, with the result that the scandal drags on to the misery and ruin of thousands of households in this Province.

"It is probably futile to discuss this scandal any longer. The experts whatever their professions publicly are not prepared to mend matters; and since they have a clear majority, relief is impossible until the constitution of the Senate is radically altered, and the University is purged of these perverse bureaucrats. . . These bureaucrats seem to think that if merely they utter a few consoling words, the people would not think them to be guilty; in other words that they would be judged by their words and not the inevitable result of their actions. Probably, some of them also exploit the knowledge that the people of India are helpless in the matter, because the Government has been systematically declining to end the scandal on their own responsibility; but by devastation of that type they are strenuously sowing the seeds of acute discontent—the growth of which no well-wisher of the empire can watch without serious alarm. These few experts are annually convincing thousands of households in Madras that their misery is due to a few perverse persons, dressed in brief authority, who, on some excuse or other, decline to end the slaughter of the innocents on their own initiative or on the initiative of others. And we ask the Government of Madras whether a source of such serious mischief should be allowed to continue unchecked."

Mrs. Besant and the Moslem interned.

5. In commenting on Mrs. Besant's account of her interview with His Excellency the Viceroy regarding the internment of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali, the Cochin Argus, for the week ending 17th November, states:—"Mrs. Besant displays, what is for her, an astonishing readiness to look at this particular problem of internment, not only from the standpoint of an admittedly irresponsible people, but also from the standpoint of the Government, which is responsible for the safety of the people and for the integrity of this country. We need scarcely say that there is very substantial difference between this present attitude and the one, which Mrs. Besant relentlessly maintained, until the responsible Government of this Province found it necessary to order her internment in the cause of public safety and tranquility. . . Today, Mrs. Besant is pleased to admit that this same bureaucracy may act from honest motives and with the laudable object of protecting the people against themselves, as well as against internal and external enemies. . . In our opinion, Mrs. Besant's latest move is nothing better than a clumsy effort to run with the hare and hold with the hounds, and if she thinks she has heaved dust in the eyes of the Government, she will not be long in opening her own eyes to the fact that she has not succeeded. So far as her own political following is concerned, Mrs. Besant has doubtless already discovered that her latest enterprise has only resulted in lowering her from the exalted political pedestal, upon which an emotional people had hastily installed her three years ago, when she began to dangle the toy of Home Rule in front of them. A rift has appeared, indeed, in the Home Rule lute, and we are inclined to think that it will widen sooner or later. Mrs. Besant made the mistake of developing the spirit of intolerance among her once submissive followers, and now, as a result of her own policy, she finds that they are in no mood to tolerate even their own prophet and teacher when she says or does anything which they consider injurious to their own campaign. Later on, Mrs. Besant herself will possibly come to recognise that Home Rule, immediate or even in the near future, is not the best thing that could happen for India and that this country had better get along for a considerable time longer under a cautiously modified arrangement of its existing system of administration. Lord Morley was certainly not a young man, when he came to realise that, for a country like India, the pace of political progress should be most guardedly regulated, so we need not despair of the conversion of even Mrs. Besant. That interview of hers with the Viceroy may yet prove to have been for the real good of this country."

Compartmental self-government.

6. The Hindu, of the 19th November, remarks :—"The Indian public throughout the country will have perused the so-called agreement arrived at in Bengal between a few Europeans and a few Indians about the impending constitutional changes with feelings of deep distrust and dissatisfaction. It is noteworthy that there are no prominent congressmen among the signatories to that hybrid document, but it is matter for pain and astonishment that a few Indians of marked ability have so far lacked in political foresight and perspicacity as to be drawn into an unworkable compromise which has all the elements of disgraceful surrender in it and which, if not promptly and completely disowned and exposed, would develop a tendency to travel beyond the limits of Bengal where it has had its tragic birth. . . The poverty of political insight exhibited by those responsible for the Calcutta scheme is only equalled by their blind faith in the possibility of the persuasive art with a certain type of Anglo-Indians who arrogantly claim to prescribe the lines of progress in India and define the stages of such development. The result of this deplorable lack of prudence and discretion has been a miserable policy which is full of promise of future trouble and bitterness, if not scotched in time."

Hindu, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

The Madras Legislative Council.

7. The Hindu, of the 20th November, writes :—"The Madras Legislative Council met today after a period of six months from a memorable session at the close of which His Excellency the Governor made a speech which, as we stated at the time, had better not have been delivered at all and the evil consequences of which have not yet altogether disappeared. . . A hiatus of six months between one session and another is a formidable obstacle to the ventilation of grievances and it is obvious that such expression of public opinion loses its value, force and freshness when it is not made in time. . . There is another formidable impediment which, even if these normal features had been present, would still have virtually gagged the mouths of the elected representatives. Under the Council Regulations the President of the Council is clothed with the power of disallowing questions and resolutions which is most arbitrary and oppressive in character. . . We understand that as many as ten resolutions were disallowed for the present meeting. . . Among the resolutions rejected is one of which notice had been given by, we believe, the Hon'ble Mr. T. Ranga Achari, which sought to invite the attention of the Government to certain articles in the Madras Mail and their tendency to inflame public feeling. Mischievous statements, unworthy allegations, damaging assertions against the integrity of Indians and of the highest European officials, sly suggestions calculated to produce ill-feeling between different classes of people in a spirit of perfect abandon, are being indulged in day by day with no known attempt to bring the paper to its proper bearings. It is incredible to us how a discussion of the means whereby this incessant vilification could be put an end to could be more against public interests than the affording of seemingly perfect freedom to that paper to continue the discredited and dishonorable campaign. . . The denial of an opportunity, in such circumstances, to call the attention of the Government to the mischief caused by the continuauce of the disgusting crusade is a proceeding which is neither just nor proper. The Madras Government has been alert to exhibit its signs of displeasure and resentment at criticism in Indian newspapers of its repressive policy. The feeling of the people at what they take to be differential treatment accorded to English and Indian newspapers is already strong and the result of the disallowance of a resolution on the subject is most unfortunate, and likely to do damage to the prestige of Government. The impression exists—whatever its justification—that Anglo-Indian journals are allowed a latitude which is denied to newspapers conducted by Indians."

New India, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

Writing on this subject, New India, of the 20th November, says:—"The tone of the replies given by the Government of Madras to the interpellations in the Legislative Council is indeed striking. Not a single useful suggestion of the Honourable Members has been accepted; and from first to last, all important information has been refused. When the questions referred to the vagaries of the men on the spot, the Government have refused to interfere. We do not remember any occasion when the Council was dealt with in so unhappy a manner. . . Several of the scandals that have in recent weeks shocked public life in Madras, naturally figured in the interpellations, and in the case of every one of them, the Government have backed up the persons whose performances were called in question. . . Such a policy was widely expected; but few would have anticipated the tone in which public opinion has been treated."

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

Arabia.

8. The Hindu Nesan, of the 14th November, reproduces the short history of this country appearing in the Dravida Patrika, of the 7th idem, and abstracted in paragraph 14 of Report No. 45 of 1917.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

The war.

9. The Swadesamitran, of the 15th November, refers in detail to the points raised by Mr. Lloyd George in his speech delivered at Paris advocating a more solid union among the allies in the conduct of the war and, approving of his suggestions that the responsibility of guarding Italy from all danger at this juncture should be wholly undertaken by France and Britain, the duty of determining the different fronts in which the allied armies should operate being vested in an inter-allied war council, and that it is necessary to prevent any foodstuffs reaching the enemy countries, remarks:—The open passage that is now available for the enemy in the east through Servia and the possibility of his having a passage through Russia also, in case the confusion in that country should continue or she should back out of the war, should also be taken into consideration. On the other hand, the question how far the blockade of enemy countries can be strengthened by the enemy being prevented from gaining ground in Italy and by the assistance of America should be considered. Besides this, the direct aid of the allies in Italy will also have another advantage of nipping in the bud the efforts of the German spies who are trying to create in Italy, as they did in Russia, a party for peace through the socialists. Every one will be glad to note the statement of Mr. Lloyd George that, while French and British forces will proceed to the Italian front in large numbers, the attempt to defeat the German forces in the western front would not abate in the least. We can cheerfully expect the position in Italy to have a favourable turn before the next summer, and we can also hope that the assistance of America will be forthcoming by that time.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

The war.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 14th November, says:—There are no indications of the war coming to a speedy conclusion. The war in Italy has created a critical situation. The confusion in Russia has gone beyond all bounds. It is sure that victory will be gained by the Allies in the western theatre. The time has come for the deep consideration of the food problem on account of the critical situation newly brought about. . . The English are determined to put down German militarism and establish independence in the world. There can be no doubt about the final victory of the English, who are manifesting so much self-sacrifice.

Kistnapatrika, Masulipatam, 17th Nov. 1917.

The war.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 17th November, says:—The internal condition of Russia is very miserable. There is no food and the poor are starving. There is no fixed Government. Internal dissensions have increased. The revolutionists have taken Petrograd, and are determined to make a separate peace with the Germans. This state of things has enabled the German army in the Russian theatre to march to the Italian theatre. The German advance in Italy is due to the opportunity afforded to the Germans by such a state of things in Russia. The Italians had to retreat at a quick pace. The greater portion of their army has been saved though some part of it is lost. The Allies are rendering suitable help by pouring their armies into Italy in large numbers. Mr. Lloyd George has candidly laid bare the present state of affairs. In the matter of the army, the Germans have singleness of command. The want of this among the Allies led to the loss of Servia and some other countries. Mr. Lloyd George announces that he has remedied this defect. It is hoped that the armies of the Allies will hereafter concentrate their efforts.

The war.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 10th November, reports the London Correspondent to New India to have written:—The war has been raging with severity in the Italian theatre. Both parties are fighting well, but the Italians have met with reverses. The Allies are sending armies to their rescue. In Russia also, the war is very severe. The people did not consent to the treasury, etc., being transferred to Moscow. The Allies are victorious in the Mesopotamian theatre. The Turks have met with great loss. The people in London are spending sleepless nights, for the enemy airships are dropping bombs in the nights. Though the people are put to great loss, our soldiers are guarding the city and are frustrating the enemy's endeavours. ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 10th Nov. 1917.

The war.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 17th November, describes the internal troubles in Russia and remarks that the anarchical condition therein had led to untold distress. The paper next refers to the enemy offensive in Italy and thereupon remarks:—The British press is extolling the qualities of the Italians and is expressing great sympathy for them. This shows that the enemy attacks against Italy are growing very severe. The German Press calls the Italians treacherous and demands that their very name should be wiped out. Good and evil are alike to be found in every quarter of the globe. In the west they think of God when they are in distress. At other times they are atheists. They are wise after the event and only then begin to see that as they sow so must they reap. Even then they seldom have faith in God. However that may be, the condition of Italy is very deplorable at present; and makes us feel very sad. SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 17th Nov. 1917.

The Italian front.

10. The World Advertiser, of the 15th November, says that the Italian retreat is reported to be due not to the pressure of the enemy, but to discontent among a section of their own army and that the latter is the cause of the victory gained by the enemy. WORLD ADVERTISER, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

Referring to the news that the Italians have begun to evacuate Venice, the Swadesamitran, of the 20th November, hopes that though this city is being evacuated now as a precautionary measure, the Italians will not give it up to the enemy easily and feels sure that the allies will render timely assistance to Italy to frustrate the plans of the enemy.

The condition of Russia.

11. The Swadesamitran, of the 20th November, says:—Telegrams received today show that the extremists have gained the upper hand in Russia and some people doubt whether her future condition may make her useless as far as her support to the allies is concerned. The extremists and socialists seem to be determined in concluding peace immediately. If it were not for Mr. Kerensky, the confusion that now prevails in Russia should have begun many months back. It is really unfortunate that his efforts to restore order in that country and make Russia stand by her word to the end should have failed. SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

II.—Home Administration.

(d) Education.

The promotion of boys from elementary to secondary schools.

12. The Swadesamitran, of the 16th November, publishes a communication from a correspondent complaining of the great hardship resulting to elementary schools and the pupils studying therein by the rule that those seeking admission to secondary schools will have to pay one year's fee of the class below that to which they seek to be admitted and regretting that though it is now nineteen months since a resolution passed at a conference held in the office of the Director of Public Instruction in March 1916 that this penal fee should be cancelled was submitted to the Government of India for approval, no orders have been passed on it as yet. SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 16th Nov. 1917.

Students and politics.

13. The Swadesamitran, of the 16th November, publishes in Tamil the gist of a letter written by Mr. G. S. Arundale, as Private Secretary to Mrs. Besant, to the Secretary to the Students' Association, Nagpur, about the part to be taken by students in political work. This letter appears in English in New India of the 15th idem. SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 16th Nov. 1917.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

14. Adverting to the orders passed by the Syndicate of the Madras University in the case of the students of the Palghat College, who were expelled by the Principal, and to the circular issued by the Syndicate to the Principals of Colleges assuring them of its hearty support in maintaining discipline in Colleges, the Swadesamitran, of the 17th November, remarks:—The European professors and the educational authorities concerned in this merciless disposal might perhaps have lent themselves to it either on account of their ignorance of the real condition of students or on account of certain narrow ideas already entertained by them. But we cannot explain in any way how the Indian professors and the members of the Syndicate in general agreed to this disposal. We are anxious to learn that they were not a party to this merely to get a good name. The Syndicate warns the students that, even if the professors and Principals of the Colleges, who are directly affected by the strike of students, excuse their conduct, they should not rely upon the Syndicate also excusing them. If there is no blame upon the students and if, owing to exuberence of youthful energy, they commit any act unable to put up with the hardships to which they are subjected by their professors, is there no one to do justice in such a case? If the Educational authorities, the University authorities and the professors join together in treating the students unsympathetically what is to become of them? It is our opinion that those in the position of parents, who have sent their children to distant places for education, or those who can realise their condition, cannot get excited like this and spoil the progress of education.

The Victoria College, Palghat.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 19th November, refers in detail to the punishments inflicted on the students by the Syndicate and remarks:—This order will doubtless make the people tremble. Are these students youths or heinous culprits?

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 19th November, is also surprised at the Syndicate having inflicted on some students of the Palghat College punishments, which the paper concludes are too severe when compared with the mistake said to have been committed by the students, and observes:—There are many who hold the students of Colleges in India by the nose. The first among them are the Principals of Colleges in which they read. Then come the Director of Public Instruction and the Government of the province concerned. Besides these, there is the University which, rightly or wrongly, holds itself responsible for University education. The professors and Principals of Colleges in India have for some time past, instead of being kind to the students under their charge, been making much of their authority and the hold they have over the students and creating as many obstacles as possible in the way of the latter. Anything done by the students is construed to be an offence against discipline and they are charged with disobeying their professors and Principal and punished therefor more severely than they deserve, which we detest. These students are not given education free nor do they enter into an agreement, when they are admitted into colleges, that they would subject themselves to particular punishments for particular mistakes. Under these circumstances, if they commit any mistakes, the best course will be to warn them, considering their age, and not to exercise authority over them. Compared to the students in highly civilised western countries, those in Indian colleges should be considered to be very quiet youths. Such being the case, it is a matter for consideration whether the Principals, who have a tug with these students, without understanding their nature, deserve to occupy that position. If, instead of doing this, the higher authorities side with the Principals in their freaks, we cannot deem their act to be a considerate one. Though the Syndicate should have powers to do good or harm to the students undergoing the University course, they should exercise these powers only for the benefit of the students and not so as to injure them permanently. But the Syndicate of the Madras University seems to be inclined to do more harm than good to the students.

Referring to the general circular issued by the Syndicate about their readiness to support the Principals of Colleges in maintaining discipline in their institutions, this paper says that even an enemy, if he be a true warrior, will refrain from using his weapen against weak individuals such as youths and women and that it cannot regard the action of the Syndicate, in having thus ruined the students of the Palghat College and vaunting about their capacity of ruining the students in general, to be in keeping with their position.

15. The Hindu Nesan, of the 16th November, dwells upon the apathy of the Government of India and some of the Provincial Governments in the matter of making primary education compulsory and referring to the steps taken by the Corporation of Bombay to introduce free and compulsory primary education in that city and the acceptance by the Government of the Punjab of a resolution, brought up in that Legislative Council, that primary education should be made compulsory in that province, says:—When the Director of Public Instruction in the Punjab is in favour of compulsory primary education, there is no reason to believe that Directors of Public Instruction in other Provinces will be against it. Perhaps these as well as the Provincial and Imperial Governments are awaiting a suitable time for making primary education compulsory. We would like to impress on them that the suitable opportunity would not crop up of its own accord and that, if steps are being taken in that direction, the time will adjust itself.

Compulsory primary education.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 16th Nov. 1917.

16. The Kistnapatrika, of the 17th November, reports Sir Rabindranath Tagore to have written. Our University may be compared to the die-casting machine. It does not turn out wise men. It only records attendance. It helps the work-a-day world to know market values. . . Let us establish a living institution by its side. While it makes noise and sends bales to the market, the tree of the living institution planted by its side, will give food and shelter to thousands of birds. There is no need to enter into a reconciliation with that old and useless machine. Let us drive it to the Police Stations, law courts and jails which are the abode of civilisation. If we want shelter and fruit, level it to the ground, and establish in its place institutions like those that existed in the Vedic age.

Indian Universities.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 17th Nov. 1917.

(f) Land Revenue and Settlement.

17. In continuation of an article in a previous issue (vide Report No. 46, article 18) the Swadeshabhimani, of the 16th November, writes:—Having already shown that the assignment, on darkhast, of lands used for communal agricultural purposes, such as grazing and fuel, is undesirable from the point of view of the people, we should now like to point out that such assignment is undesirable in the interests of the Government themselves, where it is done for the benefit of the foreign missionaries and commercial bodies. It might be that these privileges to foreign settlers, such as traders and preachers of the gospel, are regulated by international compacts; but it is notorious since the outbreak of the present war that these agreements are apt to the regarded as mere scraps. An ally, a benevolent neutral, or a neutral might prove an enemy tomorrow and an enemy of today might be an ally some time hence. To grant these foreign institutions, therefore, interests of a permanent nature would be to ignore all responsibility in the matter. Those who are today or who have been for some time past prominent among the European allies of our Government have grown very clever in helping themselves through their trade, etc., to study all details of the internal conditions of the country and in enlightening their Home Government both openly and in private. If, perchance, any of these nations should prove hostile, they will have acquired much valuable information without difficulty, which they can turn to practical account. It is hardly necessary for us to bring these matters to the notice of our far-seeing Government The present war itself will have made this point sufficiently clear to them. Though these foreigners are able to get from our Government the privilege of settling here, they would not accord us the same privilege in their country! The Ramakrishna Mission, however, is an exception; but that is in liberty-loving America; whereas in India, there are over so many missions and traders enjoying every possible privilege. This is very mortifying to us from a political standpoint. We are constrained to mention all these points at this length, because we find that the major portion of these darkhast lands in our district (South Kanara) have of late been passing into the hands of these charitable institutions. The assignment of these darkhasts as large holdings of nearly a hundred or more acres in extent to single holders is also equally undesirable. The difficulties in regard to cattle-grazing in a single town such as

Darkhast lands in South Kanara.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 16th Nov. 1917.

Mangalore is enough to show the consequences of assigning waste lands of communal benefit to individual wargdars. If the Government are afraid of losing their revenue of a rupee per acre, they might assign these lands in small plots of a few acres each to adjacent wargdars. The extent of such land necessary for the farm requirements of each holding may be determined by experts. We hope that our able and far-seeing Collector will consider all the suggestions made by us on this subject and advise the Government accordingly. We learn that His Excellency during his recent visit has ordered that popular representations on this subject should be made to the Collector. This is why we dwelt on this topic at this length in two successive issues. We wish to add that the people should, above all, urge on the attention of Government, the desirability of appointing village committees, so that all local requirements in this respect might afterwards be easily made known through these committees. It is to be hoped that the District Association will exert itself on behalf of the people in urging the formation of such committees.

(j) Salt and Abkāri.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 16th Nov. 1917.

The rise in the price of salt.

18. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 16th November, writes:—Salt is one of the articles which have gone up in price in our market at present. The cause of this abrupt rise is explained in various ways by the people, but the departmental report now issued throws more light on this point. South Kanara and Malabar have to get their supply of salt from the Bombay Presidency. This year there was a decrease in the quantity imported from there, and further, the export of salt from our presidency to places such as Rangoon was more than normal, with the result that the price per maund was raised by As. 5 at the beginning of last year and As. 3 at its end. Besides, the report shows that owing to certain changes in connection with the salt factories of Madras, some unnecessary expenditure had to be incurred. It is questionable, however, whether these causes served to increase the price nearly one and a half times as at present. As salt is admittedly one of the prime necessaries of life, and indispensable to the rich and poor alike, it will be conceded that this doubling of its price will be felt a great hardship by the poor. Further in these days of epidemics such as plague, to withstand which some of the most celebrated doctors have recommended the consumption of salt in larger quantities, it is unfortunate that the price of salt should have gone up like this.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's arrival in Bombay.

19. Adverting to the precautions taken by the Government of Bombay to keep the arrival of the Secretary of State for India secret and to the rude way in which the police there are said to have driven out the public, who assembled at the harbour to have a look at the Secretary of State, the Swadesamitran, of the 14th November, observes:—The authorities could have issued a notice beforehand that no one should be present at the landing place. Till now no Secretary of State visited this country like Mr. Montagu. He goes here to ascertain personally the aspirations of the Indians, and the people are usually eager to have a look at high officials. It is, therefore, really strange that the authorities did not note the feelings and attitude of the people who gathered there.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

The arrival of Mr. Montagu.

The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 14th November, extends a hearty welcome to Mr. Montagu and his colleagues, congratulates them on the preliminary success of their mission, and observes that his arrival in India in his capacity of Secretary of State for India is an unparalleled, historical and memorable event and something to be proud of, for it demonstrates not only Mr. Montagu's present regard but also His Majesty's love for India.

It hopes Mr. Montagu will succeed in his endeavours, but remarks that the country is not yet ready to assume any extraordinary responsibility, and hence reforms should be introduced with a view to the promotion of arts, industries and education and to the assuring of numerically small communities not being left behind in the race.

It is understood that he will arrive at Madras on the 14th December, and in connexion therewith the paper says that it will look forward with pleasurable anticipation to seeing this distinguished visitor.

The Qaumi Report, of the 14th November, continues its adverse comments on Fakhri's appeal.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

20. In commenting upon the presidential address of Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar at this conference, the Hindu Nesan, of the 14th November, characterises his attacks on the Brahmans as being most impolitic and, observing that the fear entertained by him that, if India should be granted Home Rule, the non-Brahmans would be completely ruined, is baseless, takes exception to his remarks against the aspirations of the Indian public.

The non-Brahman Leader's Conference, Bezwada.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

Referring to the same subject, the Dravidan, of the 14th November, says that Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar has a much better claim to be the leader of the people both by his education and experience than the non-entities, who are pushed forward as leaders by the Home Rulers, and expresses its appreciation of the sentiments expressed by him and the warning given that the non-Brahmans should not be led away by the wily tactics of the Brahmans.

Dravidan, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

The Lokopakari, of the 19th November, characterises the presidential address delivered at this conference by Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar as an inconsistent production and refutes the arguments of Mr. Chettiyar in the following strain:—It is a wrong notion on the part of Mr. Chettiyar that Home Rule would lead to the predominance of Brahmans. On the other hand, it is only the other classes that will predominate then. The Home Rule movement in India is only an off-shoot of the general desire for liberty which is apparent throughout the world, and it does not inculcate hatred towards the British Government. Mr. Chettiyar's speech seems to be an attempt to create a feeling of hatred against the Brahmans.

The Bezwada Conference.

Lokopakari, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

The Prapanchamitran, of the 20th November, reproduces the above.

Prapanchamitran, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 16th November, represents the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Bezwada non-Brahman Leaders' Conference to have said in the course of his address:—Our Government have blindly made University examinations the means of securing appointments. Such qualifications as strength of character, administrative skill, experience, etc., which are essential for public service have lost all attraction. The Brahmans having a retentive memory pass the different examinations and secure Government appointments. It is not their fault. It is the fault of the Government.

21. In the course of an article in the Dravidan, of the 14th November, dealing with the form of language to be used in the addresses to be presented to Mr. Montagu, while he is in India, the following observations occur:—After Mr. Norton left Madras, the Government of Madras abolished the teaching of grammar in schools in this Presidency and their orders abound in grammatical errors. When the Government themselves use ungrammatical language, we think there will be nothing wrong in using the same language in the addresses to Mr. Montagu, who is at the helm of such a Government.

Mrs. Besant and the interned Muslims.

24. The Dravidan, of the 14th November, takes exception to the statement made by Mrs. Besant in her message published in New India of her interview with the Viceroy in connexion with the release of the Muhammadan leaders in internment, that the Government have to maintain their prestige and responsibility in this matter, and observes:—We are at a loss to know in what other matters the Government of India have no prestige or responsibility to maintain. If Mrs. Besant also thought that these Muslim leaders were guilty of a grave crime, she should have properly advised the Muhammadans to accept the decision of the Government quietly. But strangely enough she suggests that the case of the interned Muslim leaders should be taken before a court of law and that a fund should be raised for this purpose. We do not think that this attempt of hers to rouse the feelings of the Muhammadans is a desirable one. The secret motive of this foreign lady, who has given her word to maintain a calm atmosphere in India at this juncture, to set on foot a great agitation on an important subject, which will engage the undivided attention of all, is evidently to win over the Muhammadans to her side. We have great sympathy for the interned Muslims. They are the true sons of the soil, and their present pitiable plight cannot but cause regret to all the Indians. We hope all the Muhammadans will make a representation to the Secretary of State praying for their release. But at the same time they should keep in mind Mrs. Besant's tactics.

The monster petition to Mr. Montagu.

25. The Dravidan, of the 14th November, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, a communication by the members of the Jakkamanāyakanpatti Dēvanga Dēvabrāhmana Maha Sabha of Bodinayakkanūr town, Madura district, that they had hastily affixed their signatures to the monster petition, that is now to be presented to Mr. Montagu, under the belief that the suggestions made therein would be productive of good to the people, and that as they now understand that it contains no proposals for improving the condition of the people, that portion of the petition signed by them should not be presented to the Secretary of State for India.

MAHAVIKATA DUTAN. Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

The monster petition to Mr. Montagu.

The Mahavikata Dutan, of the 17th November, says that certain objectionable methods have been adopted in getting signatures to this petition, and characterises the efforts of those who get signatures as an attempt to throw dust into the eyes of Mr. Montagu. It remarks that, even if the signatures are all taken to be genuine, the total number for the Presidency comes only to about six lakhs in a population of nearly three crores, which may be taken to indicate that the majority are not for Home Rule.

The interned Muslims.

27. The Swadesamitran, of the 16th November, reproduces in Tamil, as published in the Hindu of the same date, the proceedings of a public meeting held on the 15th idem at the Gokhale Hall, Madras, under the presidency of Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar, to express disappointment at the continued internment of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali, and to take such measures as will be necessary for their release, and, in commenting on the proceedings of the meeting elsewhere, expresses the hope that, as the presence of a large number of Hindus and Muhammadans at the meeting indicates their sympathy with the Muslim brothers in internment and as this meeting has, therefore, proved that the Hindus and Muhammadans are at one regarding these brothers, the Government may realise at least now the unnecessary pain and anxiety caused to the people by the continued detention of the Muslim brothers and order their release and appeals to all to contribute liberally to the fund proposed to be raised for contesting the cases of these Muslims and others in internment in a court of law.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 16th & 17th Nov. 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, in its issues, of the 16th and 17th November, also reproduces in Tamil the proceedings of the meeting referred to above.

The Muslim interned.

Adverting to the message from Mrs. Besant, published in New India, of the 6th November, of her interview with the Viceroy about the Muslim brothers in internment, an abstract of which it publishes elsewhere, the Liva-ul-Islam, of the 15th November, observes:—The whole country views the contents of the message of Mrs. Besant with regret. The Indian public are not satisfied with the justice of the position taken up by the Government of India or the procedure adopted by Mrs. Besant. It is the opinion of many that in the existing condition of the country Mrs. Besant should not have interfered in this matter. The people should not, therefore, deem this affair to have ended and give it up. As many have been incessantly carrying out that the two Muhammadan patriots are unjustly in internment, without any sufficient cause, we hope both the Hindu and the Muhammadan leaders will devise proper means for obtaining justice for the interned.

LIVA-UL-ISLAM, Madras. 15th Nov. 1917.

A correspondent of the same paper says that the Muslims in India have been provoked by the assurance of the Viceroy in the Legislative Council that the question of the release of the Muslim brothers was under consideration not having been followed up by their release.

Internments.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 16th November, writes:—Is it fair to release Mrs. Besant and fail to release Ali brothers? Did our brothers do more harm than the Sin Feiners who wanted to wage war against England? Why should they be released and our countrymen kept under restriction? The Government of India will surely release them if the Hindu and the Muhammadan leaders join into a committee and request them to release all the persons interned before Mr. Montagu's arrival. There is difference between Mrs Besant asking and our countrymen asking. If the Government do not consent to release them, we cannot willingly co-operate with Mr. Montagu. Whether we get swaraj or not, our brethren should have liberty. If the Government reject our request, the Moslem League and the Congress should not hold their sessions. There should be no negotiations with the Secretary of State for swaraj. The policy of passive resistance should be at once resorted to.

The Cotton Committee.

28. Adverting to the work of the Cotton Committee which is now conducting its inquiries into the facilities that exist for the cultivation of long staple cotton in India, the Hindu Nesan, of the 15th November, observes that the inquiries of this committee cannot result in much good to India, as they are conducted only in the interests of the Lancashire Mill-owners, and that the Indians cannot, therefore, be expected to take an interest in the work of this committee.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

The Cotton Committee.

Anent the enquiry conducted by the Cotton Committee into the facilities for introducing the cultivation of long-staple cotton in India, the Lokopakari, of the 19th November, and the Prapanchamitran, of the 20th idem, observe:—This enquiry is intended to benefit the cotton manufacturers of Lancashire. We should only try to start industries which will benefit India much. It is necessary that our Government should note that India will not be benefited by carrying on an industry which is useful to foreigners.

The duty of the Indians.

29. The Swadesamitran, of the 15th November, publishes an appeal to the Indians by one A. K. Vijaya Kirti Nayanar to make a united representation to Mr. Montagu regarding the reforms to be introduced in India, in the course of which the following observations occur:—The main reason why India has not improved in spite of the numerous benefits she has derived from the British rule is the fact that wrong opinions begotten of the acts of the bureaucrats in India and the spirit of jealousy and avarice on the part of the Anglo-Indians are made to influence the British public and the highly placed European officials here and to obstruct the progress of the country. Our main grievances now are that the higher appointments are mostly monopolised by the Englishmen and denied to the Indians, that the bureaucrats and the Anglo-Indians do not give an impartial treatment to the Indians and that the elected members are not in the majority in the Legislative Councils. We have a right to claim what is our due and no one can deny it to us. Now that Mr. Montagu is here in order to have a personal knowledge of the aspirations of the Indians, it is the duty of every Indian to forget all differences between them and give their united support to the reforms embodied in the scheme drafted by the congress and the Muslim League.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Nov, 1917.

Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar on Home Rule.

30. A correspondent from Chidambaram signing himself N. Dandapani Pillai contributes an article to the Swadesamitran, of the 16th November, in which he refutes seriatim the arguments adduced by Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar in his presidential address at the Bezwada Conference against the Brahmans and the grant of Home Rule to India.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 16th Nov. 1917.

Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar on Home Rule.

The Dravidan, of the 16th November, grows wild over the remarks of the Swadesamitran, about the speech of Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar at the Bezwada Conference, and referring to the dubious tactics said to have been played by the Brahman Home Rulers in the matter of accepting the necessity for communal representation in the Councils of the Empire, observes that the Congress can never be taken to be representative of the majority of the people in South India. It refutes the arguments of the Swadesamitran that Mr. Chettiyar was unnecessarily fomenting disunion among the people by remarking that the awakening of the non-Brahmans has not been brought about by Mr. Chettiyar individually but by wounded feelings which have long been kept under control.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

A Home Rule meeting at Vāzhkudai.

31. The Swadesamitran, of the 15th November, publishes from the pen of a correspondent the proceedings of a public meeting held at Vāzhkudai on the 9th idem to support the resolutions passed at the meeting held in the Gokhale Hall, Madras, on the 4th idem, at which one Mr. Chinnaswami Ayyar is reported to have made the following observations in the course of his presidential remarks :—During the debate in Parliament about the release of Mrs. Besant, the main question asked was not about the grounds of the release but about the person who ordered it. As in executive administration, one who issues an order has got the right of cancelling it, there is no meaning in the question raised in the Parliament, and the Secretary of State could have well declined to give an answer. That he replied even to this unnecessary question indicates his patience. Seeing that every community in Europe is used to such violent methods of agitation, for which it has now been definitely ascertained that Mrs. Besant was interned, there is neither rhyme nor reason for the agitation still carried on about the release. The attitude of the Anglo-Indians in the matter of the visit of Mr. Montagu to India only goes to prove that they are hostile to our welfare. Some English papers make fun of there being political agitation even in petty villages, and accuse the leaders here of stirring up such agitation. We are really sorry that we should be condemned, and our capacity belittled by these people who have no idea of us. Petty villages had no importance fifty years back, but now they are quite different.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 16th Nov. 1917.

The Secretary of State for India and the Congress.

32. The Swadesamitran, of the 16th November, expresses its regret at the Secretary of State for India having declined the invitation to be present at the next session of the congress and observes :—Is it not to ascertain personally the aspirations of the Indians that the Secretary of State has come here ? In the congress all the leading popular representatives will openly give expression to the wishes of the people. Therefore a visit to that assembly will give the Secretary of State a clear idea of the real condition and aspirations of the Indians. Besides it is seen from Lord Morley's Recollections that His Majesty King George himself had expressed his appreciation of the congress when he was Prince of Wales. How can a refusal of the Secretary of State to be present at such an assembly refrain from causing pain to the Indians ?

33. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Swadesamitran, of the 16th November, dwells upon the absence of union among the workmen in India, as exists in the western countries, so as to enable them to guard themselves against oppressive acts on the part of their employers and the necessity for proper steps being taken from now to prevent unnecessary rupture between the capitalists and workmen in this country, in view of the possibility of a large increase in the near future in the number of factories here and, referring to an article in the Bombay Chronicle which accuses Sir Dorab Tata and Sir Fazulbhoy Currimbhoy of not cross-examining the witnesses appearing before the Industrial Commission sufficiently to find out the real condition of the Indian workmen, expresses the hope that these two gentlemen will evince proper interest and sympathy for the workmen, forgetting for the while that they are themselves capitalists.

The Nalla Ayan, for November, has a leader on the demand for Home Rule for India, in which it says that the cry for Home Rule has been got up by the Brahmans with interested motives of self-aggrandizement and warns other classes, especially the Catholics, who have been, in the opinion of this paper, happy only under the British rule, against rallying to this cry.

VANNIKULAMITRAN, Madras, November 1917.

The Maharikata Dutan, of the 17th November, makes fun of the Home Rulers, who abuse the Englishmen as birds of passage with no stake in the country, and accuses them of being an ungrateful class, in that they have forgotten that all the comforts which the Indians enjoy now are due to the efforts of the Englishmen.

MAHAVIKATA DUTAN, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 14th November, has a leader on Home Rule on the lines of the article published in its issue of the 10th October, which is to the following effect:—

Home Rule.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

From the very beginning of history it has been the practice of the Aryans to subdue contemporary nations. They gradually drove the Dravidians towards the Deccan and took possession of their land. The subjugated were called Sudras or Maliches. The Naga race that had established a powerful and extensive kingdom in Northern India was destroyed by them. The survivors were called "Andras" and the nobles of the race were given the title of Vysias.

The editor refers to the extermination of the Buddhists in India by the Rajas subordinate to Sankara Achariyar and says—

In short, the policy of the Aryans has always been to regard themselves better than others and to treat with severity all opponents and, when they succeeded in pasifying them, they called them Sudras, Vysias, Mulaichas, etc., and subjected them to such cruel and barbarous laws as were calculated to deprive men of their senses.

Manu Shaster, chapter I, says that Brahmans, when born, should be regarded as the best of creation. In fact, they must be regarded as lords of the universe and as the masters of the world. No king could impose any taxes on them or sentence them to suffer the extreme penalty for murder. Moreover it is laid down that a Sudra, desiring to sit beside a Brahman, should be branded or banished.

If Hindus are treated thus, will Mussalmans (Wallachas unclean as they are called) escape such treatment after the Aryans get Home Rule?

It is well known that the Hindu Congress was dead against Mussalmans politically and viewed the Muslim League with scorn and was thinking of how best to exterminate it. But this being a difficult task it contrived to bring about a union. It is, on this account, that the Muslim League is in danger. On the one hand, the Hindus are endeavouring to put an end to it and make Congress-wallahs of the Mussalmans. On the other hand, Mussalmans themselves are tired of it because it no longer mirrors Muslim ideals. In this way the League will reach a position which will make its existence and non-existence on a par.

What is taking place in municipalities and district boards is no longer a secret. Do not men of insight see the darkness that prevails in different Government offices?

The recent occurrence at Behar on the Feast day is deplorable. The Mussalmans were not even allowed to say the prayers of the feast. Many were killed. Hundreds of respectable people were insulted, the villages were plundered, and helpless respectable Mussalman ladies were caught in calamities. It is said that nearly six hundred thousand men took part in the riot. These men not only treated the Mussalmans cruelly but also had no regard for the Government. When matters were represented to the Home Rulers, they said, "This is the work of ignorant people. Educated Hindus do not approve of this." Moveover they added, "Government's hand had much to do with the kindling of this conflagration."

It is regrettable that these political leaders do not take this affair seriously. Do they not know that leading politicians, jagirdars and wealthy men are at the bottom of it and these are now in custody?

After discussing the subject at length it thinks that after the grant of Home Rule, things will take a serious turn and that Mussalmans will have to repent.

PANDIYA NESAN, Madura, 12th Nov. 1917.

The Agricultural department.

35. The Pandiya Nesan, of the 12th November, has a leader on the condition of agriculture in this Presidency, in which it refers to the efforts made by the Government to improve the same and, commenting on the review of the Government of the administration report of the Madras Agricultural Department for the year 1916-17 in the same strain as the Hindu Nesan, of the 7th idem, as abstracted in paragraph 28 of Report No. 46 of 1917, observes that, if the condition of agriculture in the country should improve, efficient demonstration farms should be opened in every district and agricultural colleges started in important centres.

36. A correspondent to the Hindu Nesan, of the 19th November, complains that the festivals, etc., in the devastanams in Kaveripatnam in Salem district are not done properly, though the Government are giving grants to these devastanams and suggests the desirability of the Government appointing a committee to see that the trustees of the devastanams receiving grants from Government do not misappropriate the funds of such devastanams and that the festivals, etc., therein are performed properly.

Factories in India.

37. Referring to the efforts now made to start factories in India for the manufacture of such articles as are not available owing to the war a correspondent to the Pandiya Nesan, of the 12th November, observes:—Before new industries are started here, steps should be taken to see that the duties imposed on articles manufactured in India are reduced to a reasonable level, the duties on foreign articles increased and a restriction imposed upon the foreign articles imported into this country. After bringing about these reforms, the Government should start suitable industries in different places in India and devise means for their improvement. As for the capital for these concerns, half of it should be contributed by the district municipalities and half divided into shares to be taken by private individuals. The money paid by the people for purchasing such shares should be exempted from income-tax for some years. If the Government would adopt the same procedure for collecting money for this purpose as was adopted in the case of war loan, ten times as much as was collected for the war loan can be collected for this purpose. We are glad to learn that the Maharaja of Mysore has promised to supply as much bamboo as may be necessary for the manufacture of paper in India. If all Zamindars, Rajas and big men had followed the example of the Maharaja of Mysore and had come forward to help the people, there would have been no necessity for the poor Indians to go to South Africa and suffer hardships under the merciless

Englishmen there. We hope that the Government will act upon the suggestions made above and try to improve the industries in the country, as the development of industries here will only be beneficial to Englishmen and not affect them prejudicially.

The Swadesamitran, of the 17th November, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a non-Brahman meeting said to have been held at Shiyali on the 14th idem at which a resolution is reported to have been passed denying the claim of Mr. Tyagaraya Chettiyar to be the leader of the non-Brahmans. SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

The Indo-European agreement at Calcutta.

The Swadesamitran, of the 19th November, comments as follows upon this agreement:—We do not object to the Europeans proposing any number of new schemes of reforms. But we do not see the necessity for Indians, who fully sympathised with the Congress and Muslim League, ignoring the scheme prepared and settled finally by these two institutions and coming out with a new scheme. The gist of the Congress-League scheme is that a beginning should be made in getting the Government to be responsible to the people, a principle which has been accepted as a sound one throughout the world. So the only matter to be considered is whether the people are fit to undertake the responsibility and do justice to it. Our contention is that the people of this country are better fitted to take up this responsibility than the people of other countries were when they took up a similar responsibility. If our people are fit, as stated above, the Congress-League scheme should be given effect to and, if they are not, other means should be devised to make them fit. So those who have ignored the Congress-League scheme and begun to make other proposals have taken it for granted that our people are not fit to take up the responsibility of the administration. We doubt if these Indians have a correct idea of the extent of worldly knowledge acquired even by the people in villages within the last few years. If they have, they could not have accepted a scheme of Mr. Lionel Curtis of the Round Table. According to this scheme, the popular influence will exist only in name and another curious feature about it is that the laws framed by the Provincial Legislative Councils on matters connected with trade, industries, etc., will have to be approved by the Secretary of State for India. The result of this will be that, if a law passed by a Provincial Legislature in the interests of the industrial advancement of the Indians should affect European capitalists prejudicially, the latter will raise a hue and cry about it in England and bring pressure to bear upon the Secretary of State for India not to approve of it. The Indians who have signed the support of this new scheme seem to have ignored their own capacity and rights and acted on the impression that they would be wise only in demanding as much as the authorities are prepared to give. But these are bound, when they SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

propose a new scheme, to prove how the Congress-League scheme has become unsuitable. If, without doing this, they yield, with an eye upon self-interest, to new schemes promulgated by others they cannot be held to be fully alive to their responsibility in securing the progress of the country at a critical juncture.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 20th November, also publishes the protest of Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar and others against the Indo-European agreement concluded at Calcutta and, condemning the said agreement in a leader, observes that the Anglo-Indians, who were all along scheming to frustrate the attempt of the Indians to present a cogent scheme of reforms to Mr. Montagu, have succeeded in drawing some mad Bengalis into their snare.

42. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Dravidan, of the 15th November, observes that the Government are in a way helping the perpetuation of the social evils in the country created by the caste system by their opening separate schools for each community and that, if social reform should be effected in the country, the Government should notify that all people irrespective of caste can traverse the public streets maintained at public expense, that schools maintained exclusively for a particular community will be closed and that all classes of people can seek admission into the existing schools.

Referring to the enormous profits derived by the Government from these plantations in 1916–17 and to the arrangements made by them for the sale of quinine at cheap rates to the people at the mufassal post offices, the Swadesamitran, of the 19th November, regrets that the same system has not been introduced in the post offices in the city, and suggests the desirability of the Government taking steps to make quinine available for the ordinary people at cheap rates either at the post offices or elsewhere in the city, as it is a well-known fact that malaria has been playing havoc here and the people have no other alternative now than to buy quinine at exorbitant prices from private dealers.

Agriculturists and banks.

44. In the course of an article contributed to the Hindu Nesan, of the 19th November, by a correspondent on this subject, in which he dwells upon the apathy of the agriculturists of this country in deriving the fullest advantage from the raw products available therein, the following observations find a place:—It is the duty of the Government to correct the mistakes committed by the people owing to indifference and carelessness. If the Government have not done it till now, it is because there is no law that the Government are responsible for the faults of the people. In the ancient days, when the country was ruled by Rajas, they took care to see that the people did not suffer any hardship, as they were born and bred up in this very country and wanted to be useful to it. Why should our rulers, who have hailed from a foreign country, be anxious about the prosperity of our country and its people? Naturally they will have an interest only in their own country and not in others. But, if it is asked whether they would allow the country to be ruined, the answer will be that they will maintain the prosperity of the country just at that level which will suffice for their collecting the money required by them.

The meeting of the All-India Muslim League at Lucknow.

45. The Hindu Nesan, of the 20th November, reproduces in Tamil a portion of the proceedings of this meeting at which resolutions are said to have been passed indicating the strong resentment of the Muhammadans in India of the detention of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali in internment without charging them with any definite offence and praying for their release and expressing the opinion of the Muhammadans that the work of the secret police in connexion with the Arrah riots was not satisfactory.

46. A correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 17th November, dwells upon the hardships caused to the tanners in India by the restrictions imposed by the Government upon the tanning of skins and the export of tanned skins or hides, and regrets that while America and Japan are able to purchase raw hides and skins from here and make a profit by manufacturing articles therefrom, Indians are not permitted to derive any benefit from the products available in their own country. He is surprised at the statement of the Viceroy that the tanning industry in this country is more flourishing after the Munition Board began to purchase hides and skins in India than it was ever before, and says that it is only certain companies, which have been given the sole right, by the Government, of purchasing tanned hides that make a good profit thereby and that the poor people engaged in the tanning industry are, as a matter of fact, suffering a loss of nearly 30 per cent. He adds that the action of the Government has practically led to the destruction of the only industry which was flourishing in India, and that the tanners as a class would be ruined completely soon, unless the Government realise their hard lot and seek proper remedies.

47. Referring to a Muhammadan meeting said to have been held at Royapettah under the presidency of the Persian Consul, at which a resolution is reported to have been passed against the grant of Home Rule to India, on the ground that it would greatly benefit only the Hindus, the World Advertiser, of the 15th November, says that as the object, with which Home Rule is demanded is to impart education and distribute other benefits equally among all classes, it is only a demented brain that can conceive of its doing harm to the Muhammadans.

48. Adverting to a novel procedure said to be adopted by the Postal authorities in Bombay in training the clerks of that department for the work of the postmen, in case a strike of postmen as occurred recently should recur, the Dravidapatrika, of the 21st November, says:—The money spent for this purpose in this period of war could, with advantage, have been spent upon giving increased wages to the postmen, who were sent away for having demanded it. But it is foolish to expect better decisions than this from our experts.

Postmen's strike in Bombay.

49. The Dravidapatrika, of the 21st November, takes exception to the notice said to have been issued by the Estate Collector under the Zamorin of Calicut that Tiyyas should not traverse certain public roads, and hopes that this order will be cancelled without delay, as Collectors are expected to take an impartial view when considerations of caste crop up.

Caste restrictions even in the twentieth century.

DRAVIDAPATRIKA, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

50. Referring to the meeting of the local Legislative Council to be held on the 20th November, the Swadesamitran, of the 17th idem, writes:—The last meeting of the Council was held on the 24th May last at Ootacamund and it is to meet again on the 20th instant. Thus the administration has been conducted for nearly six months without convening any meeting of the Council. This fact itself proves that the statement of Lord Morely in Parliament in appreciating the existing constitution of the council that the Indians would share in the daily administration of the country has come to be no more than a dream. These six months, during which the council did not meet, have not been barren of any event concerning which there was a necessity for the Government and the popular representatives exchanging views. It is during this period that events causing much anxiety and excitement to the people have occurred and roused public feeling throughout the country. It would not have been possible in England to avoid calling for a meeting of the Parliament at a similar juncture. But it has been possible in India, because the people have no influence or power in the administration of the country, they being centred in the hands of the bureaucrats. That is why the administration has been carried on ignoring the existence of a Legislative Council, though such a council exists as a result of a Parliamentary statute. Though a meeting of the Council is to take place now, there is not the certainty of the doubts of the people on various subjects being cleared. The public have to know now whether the Government have taken any definite steps to suppress the activity of the Home Rule Leagues. They know that individual officials in different places have not been favourable to the Home Rule party, for which there is no justification. Now that His Majesty's Ministers and the Government of India have agreed to introduce some reforms in this country, what all the Home Rulers do is to impress on the Government and the people the particular reforms that are necessary. It is only for understanding this that the Secretary of State for India has come all this way. So the Government and the officials should be grateful to the Home Rule League for having taken the trouble to give a definite shape to popular opinion here and they need not try to harass it. It appears that notice of certain questions was given with the idea of ascertaining the attitude of the Government in this matter. But we see from the agenda for the meeting that these questions have been disallowed by His Excellency the Governor. His Excellency has the power of disallowing a question or a resolution only if it is against public interests. If questions or resolutions connected with the liberty of the people, their union and the existence of friendliness among them are deemed to be against public interests; what else is conducive to public interests? Those who framed the constitution of the existing Legislative Councils did it no doubt in a liberal spirit; but those who framed the rules for the conduct of business in these Councils have deprived the people of any benefit from the Minto-Morley reforms in practice. We hope this point will receive the attention of the Secretary of State for India.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

In commenting upon the proceedings of the meeting, the Swadesamitran, of the 20th November, observes:—The number of questions on the agenda of the meeting shows the interest the elected members have been evincing in the affairs of the country. But the replies of the Government to these questions are bound to cause great dissatisfaction to the public and their representatives in the Council. The Government do not seem to realise that in asking these questions the elected members are only discharging their duty to those who elect them and that these questions are intended only to acquaint the Government with the existing grievances and make the administration of the country move on correct lines. In answer to a question whether the Government officials were trying to prevent people from becoming members of Home Rule Leagues, it was stated that His Excellency's speech at the last meeting of the Council was communicated to all officers for their guidance in the matter. But in reply to a question whether the Government officials were taking an interest in getting members for non-Brahman and anti-Brahman associations, it was pointed out that, as the existing rules prohibited Government officials from taking part in political movements, no separate orders were necessary. How were the Government justified, in the face of these rules, in communicating the opinion of the Government to all officers in the case of the Home Rule Leagues alone? While admitting that they had read in the papers about the circular issued by the District Judge of Guntūr calling for information about the vakils in that district who took an interest in Home Rule Leagues and the swadeshi movement, the Government stated that they had not a copy of the circular with them. It is really strange that the Government, while denying that they issued any such instructions to their officials, should take no notice of a District Judge unnecessarily interfering in a political movement. It is necessary that the officials of the Government should so conduct themselves that the Government are not taken to be partial to any one of the different political movements in the country. So it will not satisfy the people if the Government stop with the statement that they have no copy of the circular and take no further action about it. As for the question about two articles in the Madras Mail regarding the release of Mrs. Besant and the Home Rule movement, it was stated on behalf of the Government that no action has been or will be taken about them. The Government officials would do well to realise that, in virtue of the announcement by the British Government that Home Rule is the ideal of the Indian administration, the people have a right of carrying on any political agitation, subject to law, for attaining this ideal, and conduct the administration impartially, though their own individual opinions might differ from those of the people. The statement that the Government could not take any action regarding the occurrences during the Panchama meeting in the Spur Tank, as the accounts published about it were conflicting, comes as a surprise upon us. We know that, in other political meetings, the police take detailed notes with special interest, and that, at times, the Government issue definite orders, even before a meeting takes place, about the manner in which it is to be held. The replies of the Government to a number of other questions were not satisfactory.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

The Madras Ligislative Council.

Referring to the forthcoming session of the Madras Legislative Council, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th November, says:—The Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar sent a resolution regarding the order issued to Krishnaswami Sarma under the Defence of India Act. That resolutiun was rejected as being opposed to the welfare of the people. We are at a loss to know how such rejection of the resolutions of the representatives of the people is conducive to public good. . . The idea has spread among the people that while the rule that Government officers should not take part in Home Rule meetings, is strictly enforced, the rule that they should not take part in Anti-Home Rule meetings is not duly enforced. The sooner this impression is removed by the Government, the better. It is plain that the Anglo-Indian Association is taking part in politics and are working in opposition to the aspirations of the people. If the Association is going to present an address to Mr. Montagu regarding political reforms, it is unlawful that there should be Government officials in the Association. Equal justice should be dealt to both the Indians and the Anglo-Indians. The Association has in a recent meeting spoke very insultingly of His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State. Under such circumstances, it is unlawful to allow to the Anglo-Indian officials in the Association rights which Indians do not enjoy. The people say that the Government officers have rendered great help to the non-Brahman conference held at Bikkavolu, and that they are dissuading persons from attending the forthcoming Gōdāvari District Conference as representatives. Again while teachers are prevented from taking any part in the Home Rule movement, Mr. O. Kandaswami Chetti and others are freely taking part in anti-Home Rule political movements. It is difficult to understand the reason of such irregularities. We request the Government to put an end to such things and to deal justice to all alike. The announcement of Mr Montagu has created a calm atmosphere and the Government have adopted a peaceful policy. It is therefore unjust under such circumstances to keep Mr. Sarma and others still under restriction. The Government will do well to remove such restrictions and help to begin a new era. The people are kept ignorant of what takes place in the Conference of Collectors held annually at Ootacamund. At a time when mutual confidence between the Government and the people should be promoted, there is no necessity to keep the proceedings of this Conference secret. . . We pray that the Government will cancel their order regarding students and politics in accordance with public opinion. We know what answer the Government will give to the question of the Hon'ble Mr. Krishna Rao, if the Government will take any action against the leading articles of the Madras Mail of the 19th and 22nd September. . . The relations between the people and the Government are growing more and more friendly. Under such circumstances, it is the duty of the Government to remove all old restrictions and begin a new era altogether.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

The Indian teachers and the army.

51. A correspondent to the Lokopakari, of the 19th November, appeals to all Indians and especially the teachers to enlist in the army and proceed to the front, and prays that the Government may be pleased to permit the teachers to enlist and pay their salaries to their families during their absence.

DRAVIDAPATRIKA, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

52. The Dravidapatrika, of the 21st November, offers a hearty welcome to Mr. Montagu and, dwelling upon his liberal views and sympathy for India, observes:—There is nothing strange in the Indians being anxious to give a good reception to him, as they know that he goes here with the sincere object of introducing useful reforms. It is the conduct of the Police in Bombay in driving away the Indians, who had gathered at the harbour, to have a look at him, that is surprising. Mr. Montagu has come to India in order to improve the condition of the people and not for giving an interview to the officials. Some are under the impression that the Indians have not been permitted even to see him, merely to hide the pitiable condition of India from his eyes. Is it not enough if his own assurance, given in England, that he would not express his views while here, is kept up? Why should the Indians be prevented even from entertaining him? Leaving the past alone, let us hope that the people will not be driven away by the Police at least when Mr. Montagu comes to Madras and other places, and that they will be allowed to receive him well.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 15th November, represents a humorous correspondent to the Bombay Chronicle to have written :—The arrangements made by the authorities in connection with the landing of Mr. Montagu were so strange that most of the people were ignorant of the event till after he left for Delhi. . . . A reliable person told me that the Government kept the matter secret because they learnt that if it were made known some Europeans would keep him in confinement and not release him till the Cabinet should recall him. It is stated that an editor of a Madras paper, who is the leader of this "Secret Society" and whose threats cowed down both the Home Rulers and the Government was the first to plan such a confinement. . . .

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 11th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu.

In welcoming Mr. Montagu to India the Hitakarini, of the 11th November, suggests that he should first visit Madras, because in no other city are there as many problems to be grappled with and as many opposing views to be heard as in Madras.

SAMPAD ABHYUDYA, Mysore, 22nd Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 22nd November, writes :—Mr. Montagu arrived in Bombay like a common individual and proceeded to Delhi. There was no presentation of addresses, souvenirs, and the like; no processions, parties or eulogies. This has caused some disappointment in some quarters. At the visit of His Imperial Majesty too, the people were not allowed to arrange for gorgeous receptions. Mr. Montagu acts just as if he were a private individual and not the holder of the exalted office of Secretary of State. Those who have rank and power cannot see the country as it really is; they cannot observe the true hardships and grievances of the people. In days of yore, the rulers of India used to travel in their kingdom in disguise. Showy receptions cannot achieve the purpose of these visits. India is now in a critical condition. Mr. Montagu has come to India in order to study local conditions and find a remedy for the political disease of this country. This is not the time for addresses, worship and the like. We heartily approve of the manner in which he has arranged his visit.

MYSORE STAR, Mysore, 18th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

Writing on this subject, the Mysore Star, of the 18th November, remarks :—All Indians will be deeply grateful to Mr. Montagu for coming to this distant country to ascertain the real wants and wishes of the people despite the dangers entailed by the war. In according our hearty welcome to him, it is our earnest wish that he may be able to enter into the true feelings of the people and propose changes which will conduce to the advancement of all classes and communities alike.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 16th Nov. 1917.

Referring to the same subject, Swadeshabhimani, of the 16th November, remarks :—The result of Mr. Montagu's visit will be known only after his return to England, probably after the close of the war. That is to say, he will say nothing when he is in India, as he has powers only to hear. There is not the slightest doubt that he and his party will be well able to do this work.

DRAVIDAPATRIKA, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

The late Mr. G. Subrahmanya Ayyar.

53. In the course of a short biography of the late Mr. G. Subrahmanya Ayyar published in this paper, the following observations occur :—He read in the St. Peter's College at Tanjore, which, though it has been imparting education to hundreds of Indians, had only a step-motherly love for them. As has been the case with every public worker in India, he got into the hands of the C.I.D. officers and was in custody for nearly one month on a charge of sedition.

54. The Dravidapatrika, of the 21st November, writes:—"Divide and rule" is a principle followed by our Government. According to this they created a division between the Hindus and the Muhammadans for some time. But these two communities joined hands in Lucknow last year. For some days, the Government divided the people as moderates and extremists and patted the former as their favourite ones. Now all people have become extremists. An attempt is now made by the Government to divide the people as loyalists and seditionists. All the same, we hope our people will not be duped by this. Mr. Bright once observed that the moment the Times condemned any act of his, he knew immediately that what he did was right. Similarly, every one of us should think that we become real patriots and loyalists only when the Anglo-Indians call us seditionists.

Divide and rule.

DRAVIDAPATRIKA, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

55. The Andhrapatrika, of the 14th November, reports the Mail to have stated that it has received reliable information to the effect that Mr. Montagu will arrange to see on his return to England that memorials from India are not sent to him direct but through the authorities.

Memorials from India.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

56. The Andhrapatrika, of the 14th November, gives under this heading the proceedings of the Bombay meeting held on the 11th November, which appear in New India of the 12th November 1917.

Dishonesty in Anglo-Indian agitation.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

57. The Andhrapatrika, of the 14th November, says in its leader:—Canada has entered the war because she thought it her duty to do so. But she demands rights commensurate with her duties. But who will suppose that the races which have shared in the war will agree to the present Parliament by itself, dealing, on behalf of the whole empire, with international matters and peace proposals. Mr. Bonar Law stated distinctly that he would surely consult with the Colonies on this matter. . . Sir John Flavele (?) urges that every part of the empire should enjoy complete independence and possess equal rights with the other parts in the administration of the empire. He believes that a federated empire ought to be the goal, and says that the Parliament will no more be the Parliament of the English people exclusively but a Parliament of all. England can no longer enjoy the exclusive right to conduct the affairs of the empire. That right will be shared more or less by all the parts of the empire. . . Under the new scheme, the Colonies also along with England cannot but share in the administration of India. If such a thing happens, the difficulties of India will become indescribable. To save India from such a catastrophe, self-government is asked for. It is not the object of the Home Rulers to take advantage of the critical situation of the Government due to the war and among them, English leaders like Mr. Charles Roberts have stated that English statesmen will consider Indian problems with sympathy. Under such circumstances, Rao Bahadur Tyagaraya Chetti who is putting an absurd construction on the aspirations of popular leaders, will do well to consider the matter with farsightedness. Even Sir Valentine Chirol considers the Home Rule movement just. He has stated that the failure of the Minto-Morley reforms is due to not confiding powers to the people and that it is necessary to vest the people with some powers. It is to be regretted that while Sir Valentine Chirol, who once wrote that Lord Morley's reforms were dangerous, now states that they are useless, some Indians are yet whiling away their time, with commending the state of India before the Sepoy Mutiny. The utterances of Captain Wedgewood in the Parliament will clear the doubts of the opponents. It is understood that swaraj will tend not only to the advancement of India but also to the stability of the empire. Mr. Tyagaraya Chetti and Mr. Kurma Venkatareddi Nayudu are running counter to the spirit of the times when they counteract such an end.

Self-government.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

58. The Andhrapatrika, of the 14th November, says that the following appears in the diary of Sir Charles Dilke under date 9th January 1881:—This morning I saw Sir Lewis Mallet, the permanent Under Secretary of the India Office. I have been of opinion that the India Council has been unsatisfactory from the very beginning.

The India Council.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 14th Nov. 1917.

Sir Lewis Mallet also who is competent to pronounce a decisive opinion on this point has agreed with me.

The paper observes:—Mr. Montagu also has recently confirmed this opinion. The Congress demands that the Council may be abolished, and that the Secretary of State may be placed on the same status as the Colonial Secretary.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

Home Rule and Anglo-Indians.

59. The Andhravatrika, of the 15th November, says in its leader:—Though Mr. Montagu may take a favourable view of the representation of the Indians, the result does not wholly lie in his hands. By such a representation, the opinion of liberal statesmen in England may change for the better. But there are many old Anglo-Indians in England who enjoying pensions from Indian treasury, do their best to see that the prestige of Anglo-Indians in India is in no way affected. They obstruct all attempts calculated to give liberty to the Indians. It is they that agitated when Lord Ripon wanted to introduce local self-government into India. It is they that, at the time when Minto-Morley's reforms were introduced, raised a scare that the prestige of the English would disappear. Again it is they that, at a time when attempts are being made to establish self-government in India, started a hostile agitation. Many regard their words as gospel truth, because the English people in general do not evince an interest in the Indian problems, though there has been a change in this miserable situation, many liberal English leaders are devoted to work connected with the war. The hostile old Anglo-Indians, determined to see that the aims of the Indians are not fulfilled, have established the Indo-British Association and are attempting to run counter to the spirit of the times. The object of this association is to prejudice the British public against India. . . Indians have at once to counteract such attempts. They should bring home to the minds of the people in England the aspirations of the Indians. They should go to England and ask the British public to give responsible Government to the Indians. . . The discussions in the Parliament have revealed the need for drastic changes in administration. It has been realised that such changes are necessary not only for the progress of the Indians, but also for the stability of the empire and for victory in the war. English leaders have now understood the urgency of establishing a Government in India which will be answerable to the people. The new spirit has changed the views of some conservative leaders like Lord Curzon, Mr. Bonar Law, Sir J. D. Rees, and Sir Valentine Chirol. The members of the Labour Party have expressed themselves in favour of Home Rule.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Lloyd George's speech.

60. The Andhrapatrika, of the 15th November, refers to the speech of Mr. Lloyd George and says:—The Prime Minister said that unless there was a rule binding all the war theatres together, he could not be responsible for the result of the war. It seems that if such a rule is not formulated and adopted, he may resign his office of premiership. It is not proper that such a thing should happen. Mr. Lloyd George has brought new splendour to the war operations. It is due to his wisdom that the enthusiasm in England regarding war has increased. We hope his desire will be fulfilled. . . We do not think it is his intention to insult Mr. Asquith. This is not the time for any controversy. It should be the first duty of the ministers to save Italy immediately. We hope such a thing will soon happen.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

Reddis and the Congress scheme.

61. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th November, says:—The Anglo-Indians are standing in the way of Mr. Montagu giving us reforms. They are holding out threats. It is perhaps natural for them to do so when their arbitrary power is affected. But there are some selfish men among us also who say that if swaraj is granted, the Brahmans will become all-powerful and who have therefore started the non-Brahman movement. Their attempts are now foiled. Kshatriyas, Arya Vysias and some Sudras also have disowned these men. Such is the ultimate fate of men who adopt unjust methods. . . The Reddi community has distinguished itself in the past for its administrative capacity. It is ridiculous to say that the members of that community will not now be able to manage their affairs if swaraj be given. O, Reddis! What became of your valour? Do you want to conduct yourself like women? Shame! Does not the holy blood of our heroes course through your veins? Hold a meeting and express your approval of the Congress scheme.

A Special Gōdāvari District Conference.

62. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th November, who does not wish to declare whether he is a Brahman or a non-Brahman because to do so will be a source of joy to some and of indignation to others, says:— If the Revenue authorities had not shown their sympathy for the non-Brahman Conference held at Bikkavolu, it would not have been possible in a village like Bikkavolu to get contributions and the materials required for the holding of the Conference. It is due to the influence of the authorities that the people of the villages here who had been stingy in other matters contributed liberally in respect of this Conference. The proceedings were rather irregular so much so that the former and the latter parts of the resolution regarding Legislative Councils do not agree with each other. Certain landlords have thought this resolution ridiculous and have undertaken to hold a conference of all castes this month in the Ramachandrapur taluk in order to try to adopt the Congress League scheme. It is regrettable that the organisers of the Bikkavolu non-Brahman Conference, the village munsifs and others are trying to obstruct the proposed meeting. The audacity of the village munsifs is due to want of fear in them for the authorities. There is no room to suppose that the Revenue officers may not know this, for we know that most of these village officers are the friends of the Revenue officers.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

Another correspondent to the same paper says that those who wish the welfare of the non-Brahmans have decided to hold a special District Conference, believing that by its self-contradictary resolutions regarding the powers that should be vested in the non-official members of the Legislative Councils for securing good administration, the non-Brahman Conference at Bikkavolu has done harm especially to the ryots.

The special Gōdāvari District Conference.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th November, comments on the proceedings of the special Gōdāvari District Conference, and says:— The selfishness of those who created imaginary differences and have endeavoured to retard the progress of the country, has become manifest. Non-Brahman communities like the Kshatriyas and the Vaisyas have approved of the Congress-scheme. Among others, excepting a few men in Madras and their followers are enthusiastic about self-government. The Presidency Association has given expression to the opinion of the non-Brahmans wishing the welfare of the country. The endeavours of the opponents have only helped to make the aspirations for self-government shine with great splendour. The President of the Special Gōdāvari District Conference has in his opening speech made out a case for self-government. If the Indians had been trained in self-government, their usefulness in the war would have been a thousand times what it is now. The Mesopotamia report and the matters connected with the war have brought the truth home to the minds of English statesmen. The authorities in England now see that the fulfilment of the wishes of the Indians is essential for the efficiency of the empire.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

The same paper publishes the speech of the President of the Special Gōdāvari District Conference, which contains:—It is now 150 years since the British Government was established in India. But nothing was done to uplift the country. The authorities say that under the British rule, the country has made great progress. But the view of the people is different. . . Responsible British Statesmen have stated that the present system of Government in India is arbitrary. As many of the members of the India Council are members of the Indian Civil Service receiving pensions, they approve of the acts of the bureaucracy in India. . . . In order that the Executive Councils may be bound by public opinion, they should be placed under the control of the Legislative Councils. If the country should make progress in sanitation, education, etc., the finance should be under the control of the people. Though it may be the view of some that the voice of the people should gradually gain ground over the several departments, it cannot be believed that the bureaucracy that will not give up their authority, would show sympathy at the proper time. The authorities had not till recently put into force some of the liberal provisions of the Local Boards Act. . . For some years after the time of Sir Thomas Munro the authorities treated their settlement of lands as permanent, but to the great disadvantage of thousands of ryots, they have now been resettling the lands and increasing the land assessment arbitrarily.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 16th Nov. 1917.

Indian aspirations.

63. The Andhrapatrika, of the 16th November, says in its leader:—The necessity for self-government has been recognised not today or yesterday. The Marquis of Hastings, Sir Thomas Munro and Lord Macaulay recognised it long ago. . . Under the Charter Act, Indians were not disqualified to hold offices in the service of the East India Company by reason of their religion, birth, etc. As stated by the then authorities, there should be no separate ruling caste in India. Differences of creed and colour should not stand in the way of the people getting appointments. The way to hell is, as the proverb says, paved with good intentions. Though the provisions of the Charter Act are unobjectionable, yet as they have not been put in force, they have become useless to the people. John Bright, Cameron, and Vicount Palmerston complained that the provisions of the Act were not carried out. The proclamation of Queen Victoria is maintaining the affection of the people for the British Government. Queen Victoria declared that she would treat the Indians and the rest of her subjects alike. If we examine the history of British administration, we will find the British not lacking in proclaiming righteous principles But the authorities in India have been narrow-minded in putting the proclamations into practice. It may be said that Lord Curzon was the first man to put a wrong construction on the Queen's proclamation. King Edward and His Majesty King George confirmed the proclamation. Many Englishmen have expressed their dissatisfaction now and then at the indifference with which the authorities have been treating the Government proclamations. The Hon'ble Mont Stuart Elphinstone said in 1850 that while giving the Indians education and acquainting them with liberal ideas of administration, it was impossible to rule them as ignorant people. Sir John Malcolm stated that it was impossible to maintain the empire without allowing the Indians to occupy high posts. Sir John Lawrence said 53 years ago that the administration of the country should be left, as far as possible, to the people themselves. Now there has been a spread of education, and, under such circumstances also, Rao Bahadur Tyagaraya Chetti says that the Indians are unfit for self-government. His words should be without foundation, or Indians who attained fitness for self-government fifty-three years ago, should have forfeited that fitness subsequently. The readers should judge which is the truth.

The resolutions of the Landholders' Association.

64. Referring to the resolutions passed in the meeting of the Landholders' Association, certain correspondents to the Andhraprakasika, of the 10th November, make the following remark:—Wise men who examine the resolutions now adopted will hesitate to say that they are proper or that they are the resolutions of the zamindars. We however regret to have to record them.

The ill-treatment of a railway porter.

65. The Andhraprakasika, of the 10th November, learns that the Sub-Magistrate of Saidapet belaboured a porter for refusing to open a gate at a railway-crossing which he shut for a train to pass, kicked him with his foot with the shoe on, threatened to fire at him with his pistol. The paper remarks that it is improper that the English should behave like this towards the Hindus in these times.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

Brahmans and non-Brahmans.

66. The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th November, reproduces the following from the Madras Times:—As the Brahman vilification movement which was started by some disappointed men is now assuming dangerous proportions, the Government have to put a stop to it by restraining or punishing those who promote such racial animosities. Vilification of Brahmans is increasing beyond limits. It is not possible that the Brahmans will patiently put up with abuse contained in the speech of Rao Bahadur

Tyagaraya Chetti at Bezwada. He said "In the past the Brahmans were very greedy. . . — The time has come for the Brahman authority and Brahman egoism to disappear. Even the British Government are learning that the Brahmans are not to be relied on. They have now realised that the Brahmans are mean, and ungrateful to those whose salt they eat". If the above statements are examined with an impartial mind, they will appear to be untrue and to be deliberate misrepresentations. . . Not only in giving appointments, but also in raising the pay, the Government are partial to non-Brahmans. Such things are not laid bare. If they are, the Government justify their action by giving some other reason. Such things have already created dissatisfaction among Brahman officers. Though there may be such partiality to non-Brahmans when conferring appointments, it is surely unjust, and dangerous to administrative efficiency to show such partiality in raising pay and giving promotions. . . While Sir Michael O'Dwyer who accused the Home Rulers with disloyalty and with causing annoyance to the Government had to tender an apology, Mr. Chettiyar is enjoying full freedom in promoting racial animosity.

67. Referring to the fact that Mr. Tilak could not, according to an order of the Punjab Government, go to Delhi in connection with the Home Rule Deputation that is to wait on Mr. Montagu, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th November, says:—The Home Rule Deputation without him is ridiculous. It is, as the Amritabazaar Patrika observes, like the play of Hamlet without Hamlet. Mrs. Besant may move about freely, but not Mr. Tilak and Mr. Pal. We request the Government to give them liberty immediately or room will be afforded for unnecessary agitation by the people.

Mr. Tilak.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

68. The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th November, says:—Even optimistic men feel despondent when they consider to what extent people receive medical aid from the Government. Out of 414 lakhs of people in the Madras Presidency, only 76 lakhs get medical aid. The cost of this aid at As. 6-6 per head is Rs. 31 lakhs. If the people get the help of Ayurveda, that will cost only one anna per head of the population.

Ayurvedic system.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th November, reports the President of the Ayurvedic Conference to have said:—The Medical Registration Act which lays the axe at the root of Ayurvedic medicine and discourages Ayurvedic practitioners, provides against any help being given to Ayurvedic medicine from the Government charitable funds. The Act has retarded and will retard the advancement of Ayurvedic medicine. We have to carry on a constitutional agitation till the Government encourages the Indian system of medicine. The authorities should put the Act in abeyance till they afford facilities for the spread of Ayurvedic medicine.

The Ayurvedic medicine.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

69. The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th November, reports Mr. K. Vyasa Rao to have said in the course of his lecture on "Centralization in Education" appearing on page 3 of the Hindu of the 16th, as follows:—The word centralization implies that the authorities are all-knowing and that they should have all authority in their hands. This idea makes the Government think that they themselves know what is best to be done. The evils in the present system of education are due to this idea on the part of the Government. . . To obviate this state of things, the existing methods must be changed. Centralization must be discontinued. Technical schools should be established.

Centralization in education.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

70. The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th November, reports the Commonweal to have referred to the names of several persons who are on the side of Doctor Nayar, and remarked that, though those who are on the side of Doctor Nayar are proud of the support of the Anglo-Indians, yet the people of Madras have no respect for them.

Doctor Nayar.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

71. The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th November, says:—The Madras Mail says that the British will not bear the responsibility of protecting India if their authority is reduced to any the least extent. From this it is plain that the agitation of the Mail is due to the

The Mail.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

fear that the arbitrary power of the Anglo-Indians will be reduced. The Mail will never consent to Home Rule being established now or in the near future. It says that if Home Rule is given, the English soldiers will not help to establish peace in India, and the English people will have nothing to do with India but will leave her to drift in the mid-sea. It is ridiculous to discourage the Indians with such threats. The Mail thus holds out threats as a last resort, but it will altogether fail in this. . . If the Indians are given military training and high military posts, they will soon be able to defend their own country, and English soldiers need not then be troubled. . . If as suggested by the Mail, the Anglo-Indians selfishly leave India to herself, God will come to her rescue. . . The grant of self-government to India will form the foundation of the efficiency of the empire. If India now enjoyed self-government, there could be no need to apply for help from America in order to save Italy in her critical situation. India would have curbed the prowess of Germany by sacrificing her money and her men. Realising this truth, even the opponents of India's aspirations such as Sir Valentine Chirol and Lord Curzon now show sympathy for those aspirations, having in their view the efficiency of the empire rather than the prosperity of India. . . Sir B. Fuller stated that instead of giving self-government by morsels as in Ireland and fostering discontent, it will be proper to give it with grace, and show magnanimity. Lord Carmichael says that if the unrest in India is not mildly suppressed, the empire will meet with disaster. All the English statesmen say that India should get self-government. Neglect on the part of England to grant Home Rule to Ireland at a time when the agitation for it was strongest, has made the tranquillity of Ireland, a thing difficult to establish. We pray that Mr. Montagu will not mind the words of the Mail but will consider deeply and lay the foundation of self-government in India, thus helping on the advancement of India and the British Empire.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 17th Nov. 1917.

Non-Brahman Conference.

72. In its leader under this heading, the Kistnapatrika, of the 17th November, says:—Nowhere else has the nature of the Non-Brahman Conference become evident as at Bezwada. The Kshatriyas, the Arya Vaisyas and the Viswabrahmanas have expressed their approval of the Congress scheme. It has been proved beyond doubt at Bezwada that, only in the rest of the non-Brahmans, there is difference of opinion. About 2,000 non-Brahmans assembled at the theatrical hall of the Raja of Mylavaram and expressed their strong approval of the Congress scheme. Nothing need separately be said about the Presidency Association. A non-Brahman meeting at Kurnool approved of the Congress scheme. From all these it will be plain that the three higher castes are for the Congress scheme, that the members of the fourth caste are not all against it, and that the majority of the Kammas who are landholders are in favour of the Congress scheme. Among Reddis also many are in favour of the Congress scheme. The Landholders' Association is mostly in favour of the scheme. See how few are the opponents of the Congress scheme. The Coimbatore Conference may be said to have gone beyond the Congress scheme except in the matter of control over the finances. It is a pity that the Andhra non-Brahmans that assembled at Bikkavole had not even half the liberal mindedness of the Coimbatore non-Brahmans. The Pulivendla non-Brahmans are greater advocates of freedom than our northern district opponents. Our opponents that assembled at Bezwada have approved of the Bikkavole scheme with slight changes. It will thus appear that there is difference of opinion among the opponents of the Congress scheme.

The paper concludes the leader with a refutation of the arguments advanced by the opponents of the Home Rule, in the course of which occur the following remarks:—Home Rule with separate class representation will make the Indians fit for Home Rule, while slavery without power can only turn out slaves without rights and duties. The opponents ask how the Government can go on, when the Executive Members do not approve of the orders of the Legislative Councils. They are subject to this doubt, because they have not forgotten the arbitrary authority of the Executive Councils. There can be Home Rule only when the power of the rulers is subject to that of the subjects. Members of the Executive Council cannot but carry out the orders of the Legislative Councils. The former are but the servants of the latter. Until this principle is recognised, there can be no Home Rule and the Government cannot be responsible. This is the chief reform that should be introduced in Indian administration. So long as we are kind to the Members of the Executive Council, we cannot get Home Rule.

The non-Brahman movement.

The Dharmasadhani, of the 1st November, says:—The Secretary of the Arya Vaisya Mahasabha sent a telegram to the Gōdāvari District non-Brahman Conference stating that it had nothing to do with the conference. From this it is plain that the Vaisyas in the Northern Circars will not join the non-Brahman movement. The Andhra Panchamas are away from it. Kshatriyas do not appear to join it So, the expressions "the non-Brahman movement and the non-Brahman conferences are meaningless in the Andhra country. If the organisers of the movement still use such expressions, they only betray their hatred for the Brahmans.

DHARMASADHANI, Cocanada, 1st Nov. 1917.

Political reforms.

73. The Andhrapatrika, of the 20th November, says:—The Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Gōdāvari District Conference and the President of the Conference have made it plain that the resolutions of the meeting at Bikkavole are quite opposed to the Congress scheme of reforms. Those resolutions, instead of showing the way for responsible Government, help to promote the arbitrary authority of the Government. To grant Home Rule by morsels will be a source of discontent, as stated by Sir B. Fuller. Any system in which Government is not responsible to the people is not only useless, but also dangerous, as stated by the President. Neither the scheme that the Europeans in Calcutta and the conservative Indians are joinly considering, nor that prepared by the non-Brahmans at Bezwada and Bikkavole can be of any use to the progress of India.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

Indian Chiefs.

74. Referring to the recent dinner party held at Delhi by the Indian Chiefs in honour of the Indian representatives at the Imperial War Conference in England, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 16th November, writes:—As might be expected, the speeches at the dinner had nothing unsavoury about them. They were all, including that of His Excellency the Viceroy, more or less in consonance with the spirit of self-government characteristic of the times. It is not surprising that the States should expect the right of representation in the Imperial Conferences. His Excellency the Viceroy too did not express himself altogether against it. The speeches of some of the Chiefs made reference to the sympathetic attitude of his Majesty the King expressed through Mr. Montagu, His Excellency the Viceroy's courageous attitude in regard to Indian aspirations, despite Anglo-Indian opposition, etc. Further, His Highness the Maharaja of Bikanir made it clear that the introduction of democratic principles into the Native States was not only desirable but a necessity demanded by the times. It was also found that even Sir James Meston was under the conjuring influence of democractic principles It augurs well for the future that at this opportune moment of Mr. Montagu's visit, the Chiefs' Conference gave clear expression to the just aspirations of the country.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 16th Nov. 1917.

India's services to the Empire.

75. In continuation of an article in its previous issue (vide report No. 46, article 78) the Satyavadi, of the 20th November, writes:—Even under such extreme dearth of funds, the princes and peoples of India have exceeded their means in voluntarily providing numberless varieties of articles for the conduct of the war from the outset. It is not possible to name them here. Their total value might come to several lakhs of pounds. Despite the enormous taxes wrung out of the people, and the annual expenditure of Rs. 30,00,00,000, India has, during the present war, paid in all Rs. 1,22,00,00,000 for the army. Notwithstanding this, they have burdened India with several crores of rupees of the British war loan. A Calcutta paper had the boldness to announce that India has paid another £100,000,000 for the use of the British traders and had written three leading artirles to say that South Africa has assisted with a paltry sum of only £1,000,000. Every broadminded Britisher therefore, whatever be his want of confidence in the Indians or narrow ungenerous attitude towards them, will now see clearly that, considering the enormous loads which India is already burdened with, she must not in future be burdened with fresh loads in connection with the military expenditure, which are greater than those of Canada, Australia and South Africa and which she is quite unable to bear.

SATYAVADI, Mysore, 20th Nov. 1917.

Manorama, Calicut, 16th Nov. 1917.

Smoking.

76. The Manorama, of the 16th November, advocates the passing of a measure preventing youths from using cigarettes and bidies, similar to the one that is proposed to be introduced into the Bengal Legislative Council.

Manorama, Calicut, 20th Nov. 1917.

Recruitment in this presidency.

77. Referring to the arrangements made for recruiting in this presidency, the Manorama, of the 20th November, exhorts the people of Malabar to maintain their traditions by joining the Army freely, and hopes that the leaders in various parts of the country will render every assistance to the recruiting officers in this matter. In this connexion the paper also draws attention to the vagaries of certain recruits who seem to think that they could do anything; because they have been selected as such; and hopes that the authorities will see that such things do not take place in future.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 12th & 13th Nov. 1917.

"Fakhri's appeal".

78. The Qaumi Report, of the 12th and 13th November, comments adversely on "Fakhri's appeal", condemns it as one-sided because the author is unable to see any good in either the Congress or the Muslim League, and suggests that he might at least have given the Devil his due.

III.—Legislation.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 15th Nov. 1917.

A Bill to amend the Village Courts Act.

79. Adverting to the provisions of the Bill to amend the Village Courts Act, a correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 15th November, makes the following observations:—

The conclusion arrived at in the statement of objects and reasons to the Bill, that the existing Bench Courts are not so popular, as only very few suits are tried by them, is not a correct one. The reasons why a large number of suits are not disposed of by the Bench Courts are the small number of such courts in existence, the limited jurisdiction they have and the fact that they do not sit every day. If the Courts to be established according to this Bill are given a larger jurisdiction and made to sit every day, the number of suits disposed of by them will increase. Thus if the money value of the suits to be tried by them is increased to Rs. 200, the number of small cause suits now disposed of in District Munsifs' Courts will naturally go down, and if the territorial jurisdiction is not less than about 50 square miles, they can be made to sit daily.

It is impossible to recover a fine levied in criminal cases in the same manner as the amount of a decree, as is laid down in clause 17 (3) of the Bill; for there are many in villages who have not even as much of movable property as can be destrained. As the object of punishing one is to prevent one from committing an offence again, this purpose will not be served, if the fine levied on one is not collected. So the infliction of a fine can have no effect, unless some other punishment is also provided in cases where the fine is not paid.

As the three members who form the court may not be able to remember all the evidence given in a particular case, it is very necessary that the evidence of the parties and their witnesses should be recorded.

If the members of the panchayat are elected by the people and not nominated by the Government as is laid down in the Bill, it should be laying the foundation for village panchayats. It would be better if at least others than the President of the panchayat are elected by the people.

1. The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 21st November, states:—"The Syndicate of the Madras University has after all realised its responsibility in the matter of enforcing discipline in colleges affiliated to the University. The circular which the Syndicate has just issued is very much belated and comes after half the mischief has been done. The political magicians amongst us who have contracted to create a calm atmosphere for Mr. Montagu's benefit have succeeded in creating for our young men an atmosphere disturbed and vitiated in the extreme. They first kicked up an unseemly row over the very sensible order of the Government against students' taking part in political meetings and as if that was not enough offered to mediate between the Government and the students, thus leading them to imagine that they were a helpless aggrieved party and the interference of their elders was necessary to rescue them from the machinations of a wicked Government. What could be more wicked than for a Government to issue an order which might possibly scare away some timid students from joining in Home Rule processions and swell the applause at public meetings in honour of interned persons! And if the heads of the colleges should try to enforce the order of the Government and elect to punish their boys for indiscipline and disobedience, what is more natural than that the politicians should bid the principals take back the students unconditionally while they formed themselves into a committee and instituted a searching inquiry into the conduct of the principals. That is the tragedy which the Syndicate has suffered to be enacted so long. Now that it has woke up to its responsibility we trust it will set its foot down upon indiscipline in colleges and by making a swift example of the delinquents rescue the students from the hands of self-seeking agitators."

Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, 21st Nov. 1917.

The University of Madras and College discipline.

2 New India, of the 27th November, writes:—"The tendency observable in some quarters to perpetuate the annual slaughter in the Intermediate on one or other plausible plea deserves prominent public notice. Several of the persons directly responsible for it have begun to plead that while the havoc is unfortunate, the Province has to put up with it because no sound remedy has been suggested; while others, far more unscrupulous, have asked the young men to try their best to get through in spite of the sacrifice. . . How any sensible people can ever bring themselves to put forward such a solution we do not understand. What will the redoubled efforts of our young men avail if the experts should decide, with the servile support of these reactionaries, that every year 75 per cent of the candidates shall find their future blasted? . . . It is a wonder to many how these experts and their apologists have been maintaining their peace of mind at the sight of so huge and avoidable a tragedy. They are all human beings; and some of them, we believe, are parents of children receiving education. So it must not be difficult for them to realise what enormous misery they annually cause to thousands of householders in the Province. They can no longer deny their guilt. Whether it be through previous mistaken regulations controlling the Principals or through any other mistake, the guilt is theirs. As to that, there can be no doubt. They may not have foreseen all this misery, or even intended it; but that the mistake lay with them, no sensible person can deny. . . It may be that some of them have their susceptibilities too benumbed by repeated activities of that type; but such stone-hearted people are to be only a few exceptions. The bulk of the experts have perhaps been examining this problem in a mood of supreme indifference, as if they were dealing with inanimate things, and not sensitive and poor young men, to whom a single failure may mean the blasting of a whole career. The responsibility of the experts is very great; and the continuation of the slaughter argues a negation of human, at least, parental instinct in them."

WEDNESDAY REVIEW, Trichinopoly, 21st Nov. 1917.

Sir Bamfylde Fuller and Home Rule for India.

3. The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 21st November, writes:—"The Indian situation is receiving increasing attention in England partly due to the circumstance that the Secretary of State has been deputed on a mission to study the problems of administration here. It is well for us that in spite of the war, there are British statesmen who are displaying a keen interest in our affairs and the expression of opinion by experienced administrators must be welcome to those who are bearing the responsibilities of office. Reuter wires a summary of the views of Lord Carmichael and Sir Bamfylde Fuller as expressed by them at a meeting of the Colonial Institute and in the London Times respectively. . . Sir Bamfylde Fuller's views as wired by Reuter are not clear however. At first sight they appear to be a counsel of despair. It is either absolute British control or Home Rule at once and in entirety. Sir Bamfylde has no alternative to suggest. We may assure him that there is no fear of Home Rule being wrested from the British Government if the latter do not at once grant it. His comparison of the Indian situation to the crisis in Ireland is rather far-fetched and is apt to give the British reader an altogether wrong view of the affairs here. The cry of Home Rule does not proceed from the people or from their natural and accredited leaders. But it is the slogan of a small clique headed by an Englishwoman whose knowledge of real India is almost nil. . . What India wants is not the weakening of British authority which alone can maintain peace and order among the various communities, but an increasing share for her people in the administration with all its responsibilities. That is different from Sir Bamfylde Fuller's alternatives. There is really no desire among Indians to relegate the Indian Civil Service or the European element in the administration to a back seat, and have all the powers and responsibilities of administration entrusted in the first instance to their representatives. The desire is far otherwise. And the insistent demand for communal representation is a signal proof of want of confidence of one community in another."

WEDNESDAY REVIEW, Trichinopoly, 21st Nov. 1917.

The Madras Mail.

4. The following appears in the Wednesday Review for the week ending 21st November:—"It is highly gratifying to us that some of the Honourable Members of the Madras Legislative Council are turning their attention to propriety of language in the newspapers. Only they seem to be alive to the mote in other people's eyes while blind to the beam in their own. We wonder with what face they could ask the Madras Government to take action against the Madras Mail for certain articles that appeared in that paper which evidently could not have been to their liking, while some of the Home Rule organs did not think any epithet too opprobrious to be applied to the responsible Government and to those who could not join them in their political devil-dance. Compared to the virulence of the language used by them in referring to their critics the writings of the Madras Mail are like the cooing of the dove itself. If the honourable gentlemen who are so touchy on the point had drawn the attention of the Government to the wild utterances of some of the Home Rule papers their solicitude for the language of the newspaper press would be regarded as disinterested. But if their objection is only to the language of the Madras Mail they cannot be accepted as impartial critics of press literature; and the Madras Government very properly declined to proceed against the Madras Mail at the bidding of these critics."

UNITED INDIA AND NATIVE STATES, Madras, 22nd Nov. 1917.

Europeans and self-government.

5. In an article under the heading "Maudlin Sympathy," United India and Native States, for the week ending 22nd November, states:—"The unequivocal, if mild, demands of the people of this country for over thirty years to be allowed a fuller share in the government of their own land, which had so far elicited no appreciable response from those responsible for the granting of such rights, have within the last two years assumed a character of insistence which there is no mistaking. . . A very practical, sane and statesmanlike consideration has been brought to bear upon the issues that press upon the nation for the fulfilment of their aspirations. It is therefore idle at this stage to conjure up all sorts of stupid fears and make light of the very concrete demand of the national institutions, such as the Congress and the Muslim League. Every Indian politician, we are sure, is anxious to meet such a thing that may be made out against his demands as a real case. Without it indeed he would have no right to claim anything. But surely he feels it detestable when jutebag politicians and retired Anglo-Indian worthies clamour against him and try to cry him down believing in the virtue of shouting the loudest. He feels a disgust at the outcry organised and engineered by emergency politicians who summon to their aid almost any kind of reasoning to prove that Indians are unfit for self-government and it would be good time for them to ask for it when they have made themselves fit. . . The average 'European' agitator must have been having, we are afraid, a very poor opinion indeed of the intellectual and political knowledge of Mr. Montagu and other administrators, that he has been 'bawling' out an undefined something with a view to intimidate the Secretary of State and the Government of India out of the statesmanlike line of action which they have felt they must take up. Grandiloquent expressions such as 'the interests of the population', 'British ear of a sympathy', 'Indian Maximalists' and others have been heard in addition to the old, resounding cry of 'unfit for self-government'. . . Mr. Welby's maudlin sympathy towards the masses is likely to deceive nobody and he ought to know that India recognises, as much as he, that she must appeal to the 'British ear of sympathy' and she is doing it quite constitutionally and firmly. Only she is fighting against that stolid thing of the un-British, bureaucratic ear of antipathy upon which all the fine democratic principles of freedom and liberty are woefully lost. The unquestioning subscribers to the Sydenham—cum—Welby agitation might do something more profitable than knock their heads wildly against a rock."

6. Writing under this heading, New India, of the 27th November, remarks:— "The nature of the questions and interpellations to which, according to the Hon'ble Mr. T. Ranga Achariyar, objection was taken by the President of the Legislative Council, points a very important moral to the less manly of our countryman in these momentous days. The resolution that was disallowed referred to the writings of the Madras Mail, which, under some pretence or other, was till very recently imputing systematically the worst of motives to the highest Indian officers in the empire, the Viceroy and the Secretary of State. . . It was open to the Government to take the proper action under the ordinary laws of the State; and if they did not think it necessary, they could have explained, at least why they were thus pursuing a course which, to impartial observation, was certainly inexplicable. They could have easily seen that the Honourable Member had been merely voicing the views of a large number of educated Indians; and also that their indifference to the mistakes of a journal well known to be the apologist of their doings, was open to serious misconception. . . So long as the Legislature is not supreme over the executive, the public have no guarantee that the administration would be carried on in the proper way. The executive officials, without any bad motive, will refuse the right of the Council to enquire into any scandal, however serious. . . Of course even without the instances quoted by Mr. Ranga Achariyar, no sensible man will find it difficult to perceive how the Legislative Council will be valueless if its discussions are to be controlled by an agency which it is intended to check. And even if there be some who sincerely think that executive vagaries could be controlled with a Legislature subordinate to it, the information contained in that opportune letter must open their eyes to the absurdity of their habit."

The Legislative Council farce.

New India, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

7. In commenting on a speech delivered by His Excellency Lord Ronaldshay in the Bengal Legislative Council, New India, of the 27th November, observes:—"The fault lies in the rude and arrogant ways of the Europeans in this country. Unless all thoughts of their supposed superiority vanish, co-operation with Europeans will not be possible on the part of self-respecting Indians. On the platform of perfect equality and on no other will Indians worth their salt

The co-operation of Indians with Europeans.

New India. Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

consent to meet the Europeans. Therefore Lord Ronaldshay should advise his countrymen and appeal to them. Indians have done enough; and we cannot blame them if they refuse to do anything more. Indians can pull on and progress without European patronage in this country and the earlier this is realised by high officials like Lord Ronaldshay the better it would be for them. As Indians understand this, and as times without number they have been insulted and brow-beaten, is it any wonder that they prefer to let Europeans alone and go their own way? The vast majority of Europeans come here to earn their bread or as exploiters in one walk of life or another, and we do not see the reason why Indians should tolerate their bad manners and rude ways."

JUSTICE, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

The disadvantages of Home Rule for India.

8. In a leader headed "Back to the Past", Justice, of the 27th November, says:—"The so-called Home Rule movement is the most reactionary movement of modern times in India. It is an attempt on the part of a handful of individuals to take India and its people back to the dead past. Of course, its adherents speak of it as the embodiment of the political ambitions of the people of India. The absurdity of this assumption will be patent to any thoughtful man who is able to picture to himself what would be the real condition of India under Home Rule. The wild talkers would undoubtedly occupy all the places of power, and we know where these talkers would come from . . If to live in the midst of chaos is Home Rule, the Home Rulers are right. But no one can contemplate such a situation with equanimity and without anxiety. . . In a country like India with its huge mass of custom and superstition and its debilitating and depressing social arrangements it takes time for the new spirit to pervade and permeate the people. But till the beneficent influnce of western civilisation reaches the lower strata of Indian society it would be rash for the British rulers to leave the Government of the country in the hands of a selfish oligarchy which is waiting for an opportunity to give effect to the old theories of social organisation . . India has been going forward under British rule, and the efforts of the Home Rulers to set back the tide are doomed to failure. But unless this most reactionary movement and its pretensions are thoroughly exposed, some harm may be done, and we therefore appeal to every patriotic Indian imbued with the right spirit of progress to join the forces of progress to fight the self-constituted agents of reaction in this country."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

The London Branch of the Home Rule League.

9. In an article under the heading Anglo-Indianism in the mother country, commenting on the replies to questions in the House of Commons on the police raid on the London office of the Home Rule for India League, New India, of the 28th November, says:—"Can madness go further? Lala Lajpat Rai of Punjab—the great Arya Samajist—the philanthropist who has given his all—money, trouble and time for the service of his Motherland and of the poor and down-trodden—independent, courageous—an incarnation of honesty and piety—one of the most respected of Indian leaders who refused to make common cause with the breakers of the Surat Congress—who has ever stood for politics straightforwardly and who declared on oath in the witness-box at Calcutta that no educated man out of the lunatic asylum would ever think of disloyalty to the British Crown who, times without number, has declared that such disloyalty is indistinguishable from disloyalty to India—a man who is ever known to regard material wealth which is not required as a means to serve his fellow-men as tinsel and trash—such a religious and political saint to be accused of receiving German money! German money—for what? To betray his own country; for, according to his well-known views to betray England is to betray India!! What has British statesmanship come to, if a responsible officer charged with supreme authority over a fifth of the human race could really allow himself to be persuaded by foreign spies that such a man could be guilty of such an offence. . . Knowing, as we do the great Lala's moral worth, we do not hesitate to declare at once that it will be impossible for any one to implicate him in any such plot as this even if it be proved to exist, as impossible as it has been for the Northcliffe Press to make out Lord Haldane as a traitor in German pay. . . Can it be that Lala, on touching the floor of the great western temple of Mammon, became so enamoured of that bewitching deity, as to conceive such a devotion to it as to disown his whole past life and be treacherous to England which, according to his own political creed up till then professed was treachery to his own beloved Motherland. We cannot and ought not to pursue this hopeless riddle further lest we should catch the contagion of the madness of those who formulated the charge. . . Surely this blinding mistiness is enough to cause any sane person to suspect that the information is exactly of the kind said to have been furnished to the Madras Government by a 'responsible officer' that Mrs. Besant was a subsidised agent of Germany. . . The disordered brain of a cocksure bureaucrat trusted his police spy more than his common sense, forgetting that the yarn spun by the former would exactly measure the length required by his idea of the strength of the latter's own suspicions. With this knowledge, can we easily divine for ourselves how some one in America who was feeling that he had drawn on the secret funds of the India and Home offices too long wanted to justify his existence by informing the suspicious magnate at the Downing Street, that there was 'cause to suspect'."

IV.—Native States.

10. The Karnataka, of the 24th November, has the following :—"Next to the discontinuance of the present system of recruitment to the Mysore Civil Service, the reform needed to secure real efficiency in our Public Service is the abolition of the so-called Efficiency Audit Institution. Our complaint against it is not simply that it has rendered itself abnoxious to a number of men in service or just out of it. No one, whose business it is to enquire into the conduct of others and point out their shortcomings, can afford to study their pleasure, or can escape their censure if he has decided to carry out his duty in a strict and impartial manner. The charge against the Efficiency Audit, as it now goes in our State, is not that it is stern and impartial in its scrutiny, but that it is injudicious and erratic. It is not certainly against the declared objects of the institution, but only against the procedure followed in practice by it that every right-thinking person is obliged to enter his emphatic protest. . . In its punitive department, the Efficiency Audit is known to pounce upon the unwary and the unskilled, while it has proved itself to be incapable of dealing with the really clever and consummate in malpractice. . . Its existence has only robbed the higher authorities of their sense of personal responsibility, while its detective work,—even if it be merely that of an ancillary body to Government in their own directly-conducted work of inspection—is vitiated, as already shown by its very natural desire to perpetuate and glorify its own self. . . Inefficiency was never more in evidence in our Public Service. If the field of our Government's operations has become wider within recent years, the operation itself has become shallower and less consequential. The quantity of Government's work has undoubtedly increased tenfold; but its quality has deteriorated as any one could see. . . Of pseudo-visionaries and imitative idealists, we are having rather an overabundant supply. Every one is busy at some scheme or another,—for the fact is that without an original-looking scheme, there is no prospect of rapid promotions. . . The non-scheming section of our Public Service is lost in apathy and discontent. Persistent negligence and ill-treatment have demoralized it. It has lost all interest in service as service, and it is only counting the hours of the day and the days of the month, in order that it may count the pay or the pension in proper time. . . We have very few 'public servants,' but very many wage-earners in Government's employ. Look where you will—Civil Service, Judiciary, Technical Departments, Economic Development Departments—everywhere you notice a certain want of seriousness, of resolution and of personal interest. Every one is dissatisfied with everybody else, and does things because he must."

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

Desabhimani, Cuddalore, 3rd Nov. 1917.

The war.

11. In the course of a leader reviewing the present situation, the Desabhimani, of the 3rd November, expresses the same sentiments regarding the Italian retreat and the German submarine activity as the Hindu Nesan of the same date, as abstracted in paragraph 12 of Report No. 45 of 1917.

Liva-ul-Islam, Madras, 22nd Nov. 1917.

The war.

The Liva-ul-Islam, of the 22nd November, writes in almost the same strain as the Swadesamitran, of the 20th idem, about the condition of the Italian front and the situation in Russia abstracted in paragraphs 10 and 11 of Report No. 47 of 1917.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

The war.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 20th November, says:—One reason why the Germans are acting on the offensive in Italy is to reduce the enemy force. Another is to satisfy the people with temporary successes. Italy and Russia may not be taken into account in the war. Britain, France and America will be able to overthrow the Germans. The issue of the war may be delayed on account of the weakness of Italy and Russia, but there can be no doubt about the final victory of the Allies. We cannot divine the future of Italy, but if the Italians can with the help of the French and the English, check the advance of the Germans at the Ediji, there cannot be any harm. The Maximalists are supreme in Russia. Kerensky has failed and the Maximalists will sue for separate peace. It was till now believed that Russia could cope with the war. Russia having now become less useful, only India can now unfailingly supply materials required for victory in the war. There is no need for England to depend on other provinces, leaving India, which is at hand. If Indian industries are developed, and Indians are given military training and high military offices, there can be nothing wanting for the war. If India should bear such responsibility, the people should have good sustenance and prosperity. Self-government is the only means for this. Indians, who are weak, have no scope to show their strength, and render help to the Empire. If it is desired to have a powerful India, opportunities should be afforded for the strength of the people to develop. Such opportunities can only be had under self-government. We therefore hope that the British Statesmen will at once give self-government to the Indians, and bring the war to a victorious termination.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

The war.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 27th November, says:—Without understanding the objects of the war, the Russians are anxious to sue for peace. . . Kerensky who sacrificed his whole energy for the welfare of the country has been deprived of his position. Commanders who are for the prosecution of the war have been removed and the Maximalists have taken the authority into their hands. The army in Galicia has been reduced. Trotsky has communicated with the neutral ambassadors regarding the armistice. It cannot be understood how the establishment of peace will be possible while all small States have been devoured by Germany and villages and cities have been destroyed. When the people in Russia understand the thoughtless nature of the acts of the Maximalists, we think that they will insist on war being prosecuted. It must be remembered that Russia will not, and cannot, at present render any help in the war. On account of the foolish act of the Russians, the Germans were able to march their armies from the Russian theatre against the Italians. . . The Italians have recovered from their reverses and are bravely attacking the enemy. The Germans have ceased to advance near the Plave. They may take their stand there. The Italians have occupied convenient positions. It may be supposed that with the help of the English and the French armies, the Italians may drive out the enemy. As the Germans do not score rapid successes, their movements cannot but soon be frustrated. Their Italian expedition may thus prove a source of loss to them. The Hindenberg line which was considered invulnerable has been broken through. The French also gained a victory at Verdon. The state of Turkey is miserable. The endeavours of the English in Palestine have met with success. Jerusalem cannot but fall in a few days. Though Russia does not help in the war and Italy has lost some territory, the English and the French armies are meeting with successes, which are heart-rending to the Germans. If the Americans also come out with all their war equipment, the power of the enemy will be crushed. If the British grant self-government to India, train the Indians and send them to the war front, the British can accomplish the vow they have taken to plant the banner of liberty in the world.

The war.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 24th November, says:—The war is still raging terribly in Italy. Mr. Lloyd George said in the Parliament that when the Italians were crossing the Togliomento, the Germans took a lakh of Italians prisoners, and captured 2,500 guns. It appears that the enemy is trying to take Venice.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 24th Nov. 1917.

The war.

The Desabhimani, of the 25th November, writes as follows under this heading:—. . . The Allies in Italy have at present taken a firm stand and are attacking the enemy but there is no prospect of this being maintained. They do not like to lose their armies unnecessarily. . . Our Prime Minister is contemplating to prosecute the war with greater energy than before after conferring with the military experts of the allied countries about military tactics and the strength of armies to be employed in the different theatres of the war. America also has sent a member to represent her in the conference. We wish that hereafter the war will be prosecuted with increased vigour and peace soon established in the country.

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 25th Nov. 1917.

The war.

The Desabhimani, of the 18th November, writes as follows under this heading:—. . . The Germans have captured some portion of Venice, in the north-east of Italy and are advancing. Though the Italians are attacking, they are not able to make a stand. Unless the Allies' armies come to this front in larger numbers, it is not possible to make a stand and fight. It is advisable to be quiet till then. It is no good to take the offensive till then.

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 18th Nov. 1917.

The war.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 26th November, writes:—Lord Northcliffe in a letter to Mr. Lloyd George declining the control of the Aviation Department says that there is want of unity in the British Army, that treasonous designs are increasing, that fault-finding appears to be the chief business, that the example of the United States of America should be copied and that Sir Douglas Haig is an able Commander. His praise and dispraise go to show that the British Army too has defects which can be remedied.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 26th Nov. 1917.

Referring to the same subject, the same paper in its issue of the 26th November, says:—Lord Northcliffe's criticism is being ridiculed in some quarters. Some say that his criticism is intended to create differences between the British and the Americans. Others say that he has only analysed the situation and that if the British pay no heed to his words, they will themselves have to face the consequences. Whatever the truth may be, it will be admitted that our prime duty consists in receiving suggestions from whatever quarter they may come, and give them the consideration they deserve. The British should never lose the help of the Americans. Their help is of the utmost importance at present. We should also be prepared to give them adequate return for their help. We should, at the same time, see, however, that they don't claim for themselves more than they deserve.

Submarine warfare.

12. Anent the statement recently made by Mr. Lloyd George that several means have been devised to prevent the mischief caused by the German submarines and that five submarines were sunk in a single day, the Swadesamitran, of the 24th November, observes:—It is quite natural that some people thought that the mischief of the submarines was at an end. However, eight ships of over 1,600 tons were lost two weeks ago, while only one was sunk by a submarine last week. So, some may conclude that the submarine activity has completely disappeared. But ten ships have been sunk this week. In this connexion we will refer to the telegram received today communicating the opinion expressed by an expert in naval matters that there are no grounds at present for the belief that the activity of the submarines will abate. Again, another telegram has been received that the Germans have extended the zone of their submarine activities in the Mediterranean Sea and the Atlantic Ocean. Like the proverb that the stubborn person and the crocodile cling to their hold, the Germans still cling to their faith in the utility of the submarine warfare!

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

The British success in the Western front.

13. Referring to the recent British success in the Western front, and to the retreat of the Germans in consequence, the Swadesamitran, of the 24th November, writes:—This is the first time when the British have advanced to a great depth into the enemies' defences at a single stretch. The Germans may find satisfaction at the chaos prevailing in Russia and the victory scored by them in Italy. But what are they going to say for the success of the British in the Western front and in Palestine?

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 26th Nov. 1917.

The Russian situation.

14. Dwelling on the present situation in Russia, the Hindu Nesan, of the 26th November, observes that the socialists and the extremists in that country are for immediate conclusion of peace without considering what her fate would be after such peace, and how prejudicially this would affect her friendly relations with the other allied countries, and stating that the conclusion of peace by Russia would be in direct contravention of the terms of agreement entered into by the allied countries in September 1914, remarks that the lot of Russia, in case she should take this unjust course, would indeed be deplorable.

Sampad Abhyudaya, Mysore, 24th Nov. 1917.

The supreme war council.

15. In an article referring to the unity and co-operation among the enemy allies under the guidance of Germany, and welcoming the formation of a supreme war council among the allies of Great Britain, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 24th November, writes:—It is owing to the absence of such united action that Russia came to grief and Europe was launched into a catastrophe. This is the main cause of all the numberless revolutions in the world. The allies have begun to see this point. It seems likely that this will lead to victory.

Manorama, Calicut, 27th Nov. 1917.

The population in Germany and Austria.

16. Referring to the proposal of Germany and Austria to legalise polygamy and to give pecuniary assistance to the children, born of such unions, and to those of unmarried women, the Manorama, of the 27th November, points out that, though Hindu customs allow polygamy, it is nowhere in the world customary to honour the issues of unmarried persons, and expresses surprise that the westerners, who have reached the zenith of civilization, should elect to honour them.

II.—Home Administration.

(c) Jails.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

Prisoners' accommodation in jails.

17. Adverting to the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. A. S. Krishna Rao at the last meeting of the Legislative Council about the desirability of providing separate accommodation for prisoners in jails, and to the reply of the Hon'ble Mr. Gillman that the matter would be considered by the committee to be appointed shortly to revise the laws relating to jails in India, the Hindu Nesan, of the 24th November, observes, that in these days of advanced civilisation, the necessity of providing separate accommodation in jails for prisoners will be admitted by all, and that it is therefore desirable that the committee should be appointed soon and the matter considered.

(d) Education.

Dravidan, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

Victoria College, Palghat.

18. The Dravidan, of the 20th November, observes that the conduct of students, in going on strike whenever they feel aggrieved by the discipline enforced by their masters, can never be approved by any sincere patriot and, expressing its approval of the punishment inflicted by the Syndicate of the Madras University on certain delinquent students of the Victoria College, Palghat, remarks that, though these punishments are very severe, they are quite reasonable. Considering the conduct of the students and that the support which the students have from the political agitators in the country does them more harm than good.

The Palghat Victoria College.

KERALA PATRIKA, Calicut, 24th Nov. 1917.

The Kerala Patrika, of the 24th November, points out that the University authorities have, no doubt with the best of intentions, punished rather severely the strikers among the students of the Palghat Victoria College, and that this would be felt more keenly by their innocent parents and guardians than by themselves, and thinks that inasmuch as even the grown-up among the students have been led away by the evil counsels of the so-called leaders of the people, the matter deserves reconsideration by the University, for which, however, the leaders in the district and the Principal should work together instead of condemning the actions of the University authorities, the Principal and the District officials in meetings assembled or otherwise.

The Victoria College, Palghat.

PRAPANCHAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

Adverting to the order passed by the Syndicate of the Madras University in the case of the students of this College, who were expelled by the Principal, the Prapanchamitran, of the 27th November, in echoing some of the sentiments expressed on the subject by the Swadesamitran, of the 19th idem, and abstracted in paragraph 14 of Report No. 47 of 1917, writes:—The hardship of the students has been increasing since the issue of the Government Order prohibiting them from taking part in politics. To one, who observes the spirit of freedom that now pervades the whole world, the new spirit of freedom now found among students in the Colleges of India will not appear to be strange. It is necessary that the Government and College authorities should recognise this new spirit with a certain amount of sympathy. It cannot but set the students in India thinking about the reason for several restrictions being imposed on them here, while similar restrictions are not imposed on the students in England, and it is essential that the authorities should realise this and act accordingly. Students of today are responsible for the future prosperity of India, and it is therefore necessary that they should learn the present condition of the country. Those who contend that they should refrain from attending political meetings may as well prohibit them from reading the proceedings of such meetings appearing in the newspapers. The adoption by the authorities of such a course is impracticable and, if they realise that the harm likely to be caused to students by their attending political meetings can equally be caused by their reading the proceedings of those meetings in newspapers, they cannot but come to the conclusion that their contention that the students should be prohibited from attending public meetings is not right, and will only give rise to unnecessary agitation. This is the time for the fulfilment of the aspirations of the Indians. If only the Government of India would act paying heed to these facts, there will be no room for any complaint whatever in India.

The Palghat College incident.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 23rd Nov. 1917.

Referring to the resolution of the Syndicate on the Palghat College incident, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 23rd November, says:—Those who are in power in the sanctuaries of educational institutions and those who hold responsible positions should always be cool-headed and unbiased. It is men who possess these qualities that are chosen for positions of responsibility in all civilised countries. Where the students are not guilty of neglecting their duties or of any grave offence or misconduct, but have only incurred the displeasure of the college authorities because of a particular frame of mind of the latter, it would hardly be fair to mete out such rigorous punishment as the University have done in the present case. The Syndicate has further issued a circular, for the information of all colleges, dwelling on students' strikes and their consequences, the maintenance of discipline, etc. These are points which nobody would object to, as they are wholly in the interests of the students themselves. This particular incident of Palghat, however, is most deplorable. As our contemporary the Hindu has suggested, we trust that the question will not fail to be discussed in the Legislative Council. We wish to express the hope that the Syndicate will show its true sense of responsibility in the matter by withdrawing the formidable weapon which they have hurled at those poor sparrows.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

Scale of school fees.

19. Referring to the excessively high scale of school fees now obtaining, the Swadesamitran, of the 21st November, observes:—Is it not the duty of the Government to spread education widely among the people? Though they have not been completely negligent in the performance of this duty, have they provided all the facilities required for the widespread of education? No and the high scale of school fees may be instanced as one of the obstacles to the spread of education. The resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Venkatapathi Raju at yesterday's meeting of the Legislative Council, suggesting a reduction of the school fees, was lost. Whenever a proposal was made by popular representatives, it has been usual for the officials to evince great anxiety that the adoption of the same would tell upon efficiency, and it was the same argument that was adduced by the Hon'ble Mr. Stone against this resolution. He has not evidently bestowed any thought over the point whether, on account of efficiency, a few alone should have the benefit of education, while the majority are denied it, or it is better to give the benefit of education to many, even at the risk of reducing the efficiency a little. It is because the benefit of education is available only for a few that many classes among the Indians have not had higher education, and this accounts for the disproportion of the different communities in Government appointments. If facilities are offered for all people to have education, many persons can have the benefit of it. The Government are no doubt evincing as much interest as others in elevating the backward classes. Still these cannot improve merely by the Government conferring some appointments on the educated among them. It is only by making higher education available for all classes that the Government can show their interest in such classes. For this, the scale of school fees should be reduced. It is, therefore, a matter for regret that a resolution moved on this subject was not accepted by the Government. The number of schools should be increased, and the expenditure on education should in general be very liberal. Though His Excellency says that every pie available is spent on education, we have often pointed out that as much is not spent in this country on education as is done in other countries and as is spent on other items in this country itself.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 23rd Aug. 1917.

Educational exhibitions.

20. Referring to the educational exhibition organised at Tanjore for the benefit of the elementary school teachers, the Vartakamitran,* of the 23rd August, says thatthe teachers concerned cannot derive much benefit from this exhibition as the exhibits are not arranged in proper order and as sufficient time is not given for the teachers to observe and study each exhibit.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

The Intermediate examination.

21. Adverting to the defeat of the motion brought forward by Mr. K. Ramanuja Achariyar at a recent meeting of the Senate of the Madras University to reduce the minimum number of marks required for a pass in English in the Intermediate examination and to the reply of the Local Government to an interpellation in the Legislative Council to take steps for securing a larger percentage of successful students in this examination, the Swadesamitram, of the 23rd November, observes:—How can the students get their grievances redressed? What is responsible for such a large number of failures in this examination—the inefficiency of students, the defect in the instruction imparted to them by the Professors or the severity of the examiners? Such failures will not, indeed, redound to the credit of any one.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

The Convocation Address.

22. The Hindu Nesan, of the 23rd November, characterising the Convocation Address recently delivered by His Excellency the Governor of French India as being more fit to be delivered before an Historical Association than before an assembly of new graduates, observes that the address would have given immense satisfaction to the people, had it contained information as to how the students in French Universities emerge therefrom as good citizens imbibing the qualities of liberty, fraternity and equality, how the national and educational institutions thrive in the French Dominions and how the young graduates should acquit themselves in their life.

* Received during the current week.

Referring to this address, the Prapanchamitran, of the 27th November, remarks that the address is not adapted to the students who have just come out successful in the University examinations. PRAPANCHAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

Under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd November, agrees with the President when he says:—Excepting the Moghul Kingdom, no other Muhammadan Kingdom lasted in India for more than two centuries. But some Hindu Kingdoms lasted from twelve to fifteen centuries. The Hindus of those times were peaceful and cheerful. The kings were not arbitrary and did not tease the subjects. The ministers were not given to any violent acts. The Hindus of those days obeyed the law without being compelled to do so. In those days were the Hosala and the Dravidian temples constructed. The grandeur and the architecture of those temples call forth the administration of the people even today. ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 22nd Nov. 1917.

The Convocation.

The paper proceeds to write:—M. Martinean quoted a precept of Confucius and recommended it for the adoption of all rulers. He then referred to the science of political economy written by Kontilya. The more we examine the ancient writings, the plainer it is that the administrative methods of the Indians in ancient India are in no way inferior to the modern administrative methods.

24. The Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd November, says:—For some time past, the existence of a separate University for Travancore was felt a matter of necessity. It does not appear that the Madras University is duly encouraging Malayalam. . . Education has made greater progress in Travancore than in the Madras Presidency. A university may be started in Travancore, which will be of use to the whole Kerala country. We hope that the movement to start such a university may soon meet with success. 25. The Desabhimani, of the 25th November, has the following under this heading:—We have written already about the injustice of this order. The order, not being given effect to in the Madanapalle College, the recognition of that College has been withdrawn with the result that students from that College cannot appear for the examinations of the Government and that no money aid will be received from the Government. Though the money in the Government treasury is ours, we cannot have it unless we do as they want us to. We know the interests of our children better than officers of the Government who are alien. After all, only those that want to pass examinations should study in colleges affiliated to the University. . . We wish to point out that all institutions managed by the Indians should follow example of the Masulipatam National College and the Madanapalle College and that those that are not in quest of Government service should study in those institutions and serve the country. 26. In requesting the Government to give the Taluk Board of Madanapalle the privilege of electing its non-official President, the Andhrapatrika, of the 20th November, observes:—It would appear that the non-official vice-presidents of the Chittoor and Chandragiri taluk boards had discharged their duties most creditably and had been of immense help to the taluk boards' presidents. All this is praiseworthy. This is a case in point to show that to whatever work Indians are appointed, they can discharge their duties with unsurpassed skill. ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

29. Referring to the incidents connected with this strike, the Vartakamitran, of the 23rd August, observes:—The provident fund being an amount collected from the coolies by withholding a portion of their wages together with an equal sum contributed by the company, we doubt if the railway company have the power to refuse to give the amount to the coolies. It does not seem to be compatible with reason, too, to deny the workmen a portion of their wages for work done already. If the Directors of this railway company had been in India, there would have been no occasion whatever for such troubles to crop up. The Agents and other officials of the company here make any proposals they like merely to get a good name from the Directors. It is only because railways are managed by private companies that the latter, with a view to their own profit, try to reduce the wages of their workmen. All this trouble will not ensue, if the railways are under the management of the Government.

31. The * Vartakamitran, of the 23rd August, contrasts the active interests taken by the Christian Missionaries in giving industrial education side by side with religious instruction, as is seen from the fact that every Christian religious institution has an industrial school attached to it, with the apathy of the heads of mutts here in helping the cause of education, beyond teaching a few old books, which cannot help the Indians materially in after-life and, appealing to the latter to wake up and use the enormous funds possessed by them in starting industrial schools in different places, observes:—The heads of these mutts should understand what all the foreign Missionaries do to propagate their religion and should try to follow them. After the Arya Samaj began to work in the Punjab, the Christian Missionaries have had to admit that they have no work in that province. When will South India also come up to that level?

32. In the course of an article under this heading, the * Vartakamitran, of the 23rd August, describes the various kinds of manures that are useful in agriculture and says:—Oil-cake is a very good manure. As oil is used in western countries for manufacturing soap and other articles, oil-cake is available for them free and they therefore use it liberally as manure. Why cannot arrangements be made for using it as manure in India? If this is to be possible, oil and not oil-seeds should be exported from India. Oil-seeds are now exported in large quantities from this country; because Germany and other countries levy an import duty on oil, for the import of oil into those countries means that they lose the chance of having oil-cake. This Manures.

* Received in the current week export of oil-seeds is doubly disadvantageous to India. Firstly the profits derived from the oil-extracting industry are denied to her. Secondly, oil-cake which can be used as manure for lands here is utilised by Europeans for their lands. Unless the oil-extracting industry is developed here, there is no chance of the price of oil-cake going down. To do that, a duty should be levied on oil-seeds exported and their export prevented, and the Government should render the necessary assistance for exporting oil. Saltpetre is another good manure. But this cannot be manufactured in India without a licence. Unless this restriction is removed, the manufacture of saltpetre cannot be attempted. Though there are great facilities for producing salt in India, the necessity of taking out a licence to do so affects the quantity of salt produced. In Germany, salt used as manure seems to be given free mixed with ashes. Besides this, limestones and other stones in which there is phosphorus are available here in many places. The Indians have not attempted to get them powdered to be used as manure, while the Europeans prepare manure from such stones, bones, etc., and derive large profits therefrom. All this requires scientific knowledge. The scientific education now imparted to our young men is useful only for their breaking glasses! What can be done !!

Kalyanasundara Mudaliyar, one of the secretaries of the Madras Presidency Association, under the auspices of the Dravidian Association, Kumbakōnam, on the 18th idem, in which he is reported to have refuted the arguments of the Justice, Dravidan and other papers which cry out that Home Rule means Brahman rule and Brahman predominance, and that the Indians are unfit to conduct their own affairs, and appealed to the Indians to stand united, forgetting all differences of opinion, and co-operate at this juncture when Mr. Montagu is here.

The Swadesamitran, of the 24th November, publishes, from the pen of its own correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held under the auspices of the Madras Presidency Association at Kumbakonam on the 18th idem, when Mr. T. V. Kalyanasundara Mudaliyar of Madras is reported to have delivered a lecture on this subject. In the course of the speech which is published in extenso in this paper, the lecturer exhorts the people to recognise the Congress as a body representing their interests, and, refuting the statement that the Brahmans are responsible for the low condition of the Dravidians and attributing the present disunion in the country to the work of the South Indian People's Association, calls upon the Dravidians to rally to the cause of Home Rule and communicate to the Secretary of State for India their willingness to support the Congress League scheme of reforms subject to the amendment relating to communal representation in all public institutions.

34. The Swadesabandhu, for October, reproduces in Tamil the remarks of a paper called Catholic Times and Catholic Opinion of England, which thinks that this is a favourable opportunity for granting almost complete Home Rule to India, as no one can now doubt the capacity of the Indians to manage their own affairs or their loyalty to England, and that it is such a grant that will be a grand proof of the fact that the British Empire is now waging the war for the sake of liberty and truth.

SWADESABANDHU, Madras, October 1917.

Home Rule for India.

A correspondent to the Dravidan, of the 19th November, discusses the desirability of granting Home Rule to India from various standpoints and, coming to the conclusion that it is in no way desirable, observes that, if Mr. Montagu will understand that Home Rule can be granted to India only when all the Indians, without distinction of caste or creed, demand it and intimate the same to His Majesty, he would be rendering invaluable help to the forty (?) millions of people in India. The correspondent also demands that education should be made compulsory.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

Home Rule.

In the course of "Some Notes" published in the Swadesamitran, of the 24th November, from the pen of Mr. R. S. Narayanaswami Ayyar, B.A., B.L., the latter gives detailed statistics to show that India is the most poverty-stricken country in the world, that enormous expenditure is incurred in this country by the Government in the shape of large salaries paid to the officials and that the condition of education and industries here is very low when compared with that of other countries, and, remarking that these grievances can be remedied when the country acquires Home Rule, as it will then be possible to curtail the enormous expenditure incurred by the State, to prevent the wealth of the country from being taken to foreign countries, to improve the economic condition of the country by rendering pecuniary aid liberally in the cause of education, industries, sanitation and other matters of public interest, and to secure for its people their birthright of freedom and equality, suggests that the following reforms are necessary :—

(i) The Indians should acquire self-government under the British Empire.

(ii) India should have an equal status with the other countries subject to the British Empire.

(iii) India and the several members of the British Empire should, with a fraternal feeling, act in harmony and co-operate with one another.

(iv) The Indians should be given the right to manage the political affairs of India.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

Home Rule.

A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 17th November, says :—It is strange that certain Englishmen in England have taken the silence of the masses in India in regard to the question of self-government for consent. . . It is untrue that all the higher classes have given their consent to Home Rule being granted all at once. They also are divided in their opinion. Excepting a few, the Muhammadans say that the grant of Home Rule immediately is undesirable. Indian Christians also are of that opinion.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 27th Nov. 1917.

Home Rule for India.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 27th November, in its news columns, writes :—It is understood that the Anglo-Indian opponents of Home Rule have decided to boycott the Home Rulers by abandoning all trade and other relationship with them. This is a great blunder. If the Indians should copy their example, they would be unable to remain in India even for a moment.

The Anglo-Indian officers as well as traders are trying their utmost to prevent the grant of reforms such as Home Rule. To gain this end they are trying to create dissensions in our party. Seeing all this, some people ask whether India will not become another Russia. If the Government should be wanting in firmness and show less regard for justice, it seems to us that such calamities might happen.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

Home Rule.

The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 19th November, writes :—It is a political principle that one nation cannot prosper at the expense of the power and strength of another. The community, which depends for its progress on another, ruins itself. Two different communities cannot conjointly rule over one country, just as a crow and a parrot cannot be reared in one and the same cage.

Can Indian Muhammadans depend on Hindu Rule for their existence? Can we expect the community, which keeps itself aloof from the Muhammadans because it considers them impure, to grant them the full rights when it gets the upper hand?

Should a Muhammadan drink a handful of water from a Brahman's well, the whole well is said to be consequently polluted. Will the Muhammadans be given equal rights as soon as Home Rule is granted, and will they enjoy the common privileges as they do under the British rule, of having access to every fountain, tank, lake, river, and every other source of water-supply? Emphatically no! As soon as Home Rule is granted the water-supply will be cut off from Muhammadans. They will be even prevented from their ablutions and bathing; as compared with Hindu cultivators, they will be accorded less right to utilise water for their cultivation.

Muhammadans get their daily supplies from Hindu bazaarmen. If they give corn they (the Mussalmans) will eat and if they (the Hindus) lend money they can transact their business. At present all Muhammadans depend upon Hindu merchants. If the Hindus should even now cut off the food supply, the Muhammadans will die of starvation.

This is a different question that they should make timely efforts and adopt separate means for themselves. When, at present, the Muhammadans are kept under the thumb of the Hindus, will there be any delay in their becoming slaves of the Hindus without any cost as soon as they are given Home Rule?

Hindu community is an extremely bigoted one. The religious question of contamination is responsible for their bias. The way in which the Muhammadans are treated in public offices on account of this is quite evident. The way in which the Hindu authorities recklessly sacrifice the rights of the Muhammandans is evidenced by their suggestions and decisions. Besides religious bias, they entertain political spite against Muhammadans on the ground that they had no right to enter India and disturb the comforts of the Hindus and they had no right to proclaim themselves Emperors of Delhi. The Hindus had, as a matter of course, to accept their sovereignty now from the private and public meetings, held by their leaders, it is evident that they want to take vengeance on the Muhammadans for their past success and predominency, as far as possible to usurp their rights, to endanger their life and property and to subject them to such degradation as they have not hitherto suffered.

Will the Muhammadans, along whose veins the blood of amour-propre courses and, whose nature can never tolerate a thing of this kind, like to be the slaves of a community over which they had for centuries exercised superiority? It will be better for the Muhammadans to commit the cowardly act of self-destruction than to join the Hindus in the Home Rule League so that their future life of degradation may not prove worse than the crime of suicide.

Another correspondent to the same paper complains that the signatures of himself and a number of others were taken in a petition which was reported to be a declaration that the people accepted Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar and

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

The Madras Legislative Council.

40. The Swadesamitran, of the 21st November, writes:—The proceedings of the meeting of this Council held yesterday are such as to cause not only dissatisfaction but also a feeling of surprise and pain to the people; for many important matters which the public were anxiously expecting to be brought up for discussion at the meeting have not been considered at it. The tension of feeling and excitement caused to the people by the undesirable speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor on the 24th May last is not an ordinary one. Then came the famous G.O. No. 559. Though the public wanted that the popular opinion about these two matters should be freely represented to the Government and proper remedies sought, they could not do it. That is why the Hon'ble Mr. Venkatapathi Raju gave notice of a resolution that, in order to provide for emergencies like this, a meeting of the Council should be convened on the requisition of ten members. But he did not move it and we do not know why. We hope he would publish the reasons why he did not do so, for that would dispel the unnecessary suspicions which the people may entertain about this matter. Similarly the Hon'ble Mr. V. K. Ramanuja Achariyar and others, who were to have moved some resolutions on G.O. No. 559, did not do so. This has caused great disappointment to the public and especially the students. If they had been moved, the question would have been discussed fully, and there would have been an opportunity for the attitude of the Government in the matter being ascertained and also for the Government to understand the opinion of the people about it. It is really unfortunate again that the resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. Rama Ayyangar about the incidents of the Palghat College was not moved, in spite of the excitement caused among the people by the cruel punishments inflicted on some students of the College by the Syndicate. This has been the fate of three important resolutions.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

Referring to the same meeting, the Hindu Nesan, of the 21st November, observes:—In all self-governing countries, the public have the right of questioning the executive officials if they do anything unpalatable to the people. But in the case of the Legislative Councils in India, no such right exists. Here the members have not even the right of criticising the executive officials. On the other hand, if any questions are attempted to be asked in the Council about any undesirable acts of the officials, the Executive Government have the right of disallowing any such questions. It is in exercise of this right that the Government, at times, disallow, without the least consideration, some important questions and resolutions proposed to be asked are moved by the popular representatives and the latter cannot raise their voice against it. There is no restriction that the meetings of the Legislative Council should be held at any regular intervals, nor have the members the privilege of calling for a meeting when necessary. Coming to this meeting of the Council, the President seems to have disallowed nearly ten resolutions of which notice had been given. The other Provincial Governments do not appear to be as strict and nervous in the matter of exercising this right as the Madras Government. For example, a resolution about the recommendations of the Public Services Commission was disallowed by the Local Government, while a resolution on the same subject was discussed in the Legislative Council of the United Provinces and one such resolution is to be moved in the Bengal Council. Will it not be very advantageous, if, instead of each Provincial Government acting as it likes, there are some provisions on this subject in the rules regarding the conduct of business in the Legislative Councils binding on all Provincial Governments?

In a leaderette on the same subject, this paper also observes that the replies of the Government to many of the questions asked at the meeting were not at all satisfactory and remarks that the incessant warning of the Anglo-Indian papers, ever since the release of Mrs. Besant, and the chorus sung in the same strain by an Indian paper have made the Government lose their calmness of judgment and evince no sympathy whatever in the matter of replying to the questions of the popular representatives.

The Madras Legislative Council.

Referring to the last meeting of the Madras Legislative Council, the Dravidan, of the 22nd November, writes:—Many of the questions asked at this meeting were unnecessary ones. The only question essential for the progress of the Dravidians was the one put by the Hon'ble Mr. Ahmad Tambi Marakkayar about the proportion of the different communities employed in the three important Government offices in Madras and the reply of the Government thereto. It is seen from this reply that the proportion works at 64 per cent for the Brahmans, 1·9 per cent for non-Brahman Hindus, 1·7 per cent for the Muhammadans, 10·6 per cent for the Indian Christians and 15 per cent for the other classes. If such a horrible state of affairs exists even under the British rule, how can we describe our prospective position under the Home Rule of the self-interested Brahmans. So we should take the necessary precautions before it is too late. The Hon'ble Mr. V. K. Ramanuja Achariyar asked whether the Anglo-Indian Association is a political organization and, if so, whether Government officials would be justified in being members thereof. The motive underlying this question is evidently to prevent the Government officials in the Anglo-Indian Association from expressing their opinion against Home Rule. But this question of Mr. Ramanuja Achariyar confers an indirect benefit even upon the Dravidians, for it also raises the general point whether Government officials can be members of the Theosophical Society which is conducted by political agitators like Messrs. Arundale and Wadia and Mrs. Besant. We hope the Government will bestow as much thought upon the Theosophical Society as upon the Anglo-Indian Association. Some unnecessary questions asked about the articles in the Madras Mail, the speech of Dr. T. M. Nayar at the Panchama meeting and the Secondary School-Leaving Certificates received the replies from the Government that they deserved. Coming to the resolutions moved at the meeting, the speech of Lord Pentland regarding the resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. Venkatapati Razu suggesting the desirability of reducing the high scale of fees in schools and colleges is sufficiently convincing and requires no additional arguments from us. The interest taken by His Excellency in the cause of primary education cannot but be plain to all now. In conclusion, some of the questions asked as well as the replies given therefor and some of the resolutions moved at this meeting did aim at securing public progress as much as possible. His Excellency's liberal views and acute intelligence are sufficiently indicated by his speeches at this meeting.

The Madras Legislative Council.

Adverting to the proceedings of the recent meeting of this Council and especially to the interpellation of the Hon'ble Mr. Ahmed Tambi Marakkayar regarding the proportion of the members of different communities employed in the important public offices in Madras, and the reply of the Government thereto, the Mahavikata Dutan, of the 24th November, makes observations almost in the same strain as the Dravidan of the 22nd idem.

The Prapanchamitran, of the 27th November, characterising as unsatisfactory some of the replies of the Government to the interpellations in the recent meeting of the local Legislative Council, writes in almost the same strain as the Swadesamitran, of the 21st idem, about the defeat of the motion brought in the Council by the Hon'ble Mr. Venkatapati Razu for the reduction of the scale of fees collected in schools and colleges in this Presidency, and observes:—The Provincial Legislative Councils exist for the people to bring home to the Government, through their representatives, their grievances with a view to their being redressed. It can indeed give satisfaction to the people if the administrative officers of the Government co-operate and sympathise with the representative members and give appropriate replies to their questions. These councils have been constituted with the idea of enabling the Government to conduct the administration by the joint deliberations of the officials and popular representatives. Its administration will, therefore, be very efficient, if both the authorities and the representatives of the people would act with mutual confidence.

The Swadesamitran, of the 27th November, reproduces in Tamil a communication to the press by the Hon'ble Mr. T. Ranga Achariyar about the conduct of the proceedings in the recent meeting of the local Legislative Council. The communication appears in English in the Hindu of the 26th idem.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

The Madras Legislative Council.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 21st November, says:—An examination of the procedure followed in the Legislative Council will point to the urgent necessity of a change in the present constitution of the Government. We do not see any good being done to the people by their representatives in the Legislative Councils. The Government are not bound to answer all the questions put by them. The procedure followed in yesterday's meeting is discouraging. The importance of new conditions, and the new angle of vision were not to be discernible anywhere. . . Under the Bill introduced by the Hon'ble Mr. Gillman to amend the law relating to village courts, suits admissible in such courts may be filed in the District Munsifs' Courts also. When such is the case, it can be easily understood what interest the people will have to get the suits decided in the village panchayat courts, where the authority of the village munsifs continues undiminished. The members of the panchayat will be nominated by the Government and not elected by the people. The people can have no confidence in such members. Six members sent in resolutions recommending the cancellation of the Government Order relating to students and politics. All these six heroes withdrew the resolutions and thus showed their courage. . . . On account of war needs, it was found necessary to remove certain railways. So there does not appear to be any need to collect the railway cess from the people any longer. . . In reply to the resolution regarding the reduction of school and college fees, the Hon'ble Mr. J. H. Stone said that the poverty of the people cannot be a reason why the Government should ameliorate the miserable condition of the people, and thus showed his hard-heartedness once again. . . It is strange that the Government had not noticed the articles that appeared in the dailies regarding the circular issued by the District Judge of Guntur, calling for a list of pleaders taking part in the Home Rule and swadeshi movements. This illustrates the evil consequences of being on the top of hills for a long time. It is not known why the Government have not questioned the Judge about the circular. They will do well to get an explanation from him. . . When asked if they had sent any order to the District officers about the Home Rule agitation, the Government replied in the affirmative. They will do well to cancel the order now at least. . . It will be a source of disappointment to the people that the Government have agreed to the agent of the Government of Java purchasing the best breed of cattle for sending the same out of India. . . On the whole, the procedure of the Legislative Council requires immediate change. The authority of the people will gain importance only after the grant of self-government.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 22nd Nov. 1917.

The Madras Legislative Council.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd November, says:—When the resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. Chidambaranatha Mudaliyar was put to vote and declared lost, he demanded a poll. His Excellency the President then sent for the members who were not in their seats at the time of the discussion. The Hon'ble Mr. Ranga Achariyar and the Hon'ble Mr. Ramachandra Rao asked if it was fair to take the votes of such gentlemen. His Excellency the President replied that the rules were not against it and that it was in keeping with the practice. We cannot say if it is in accordance with practice or not, but it is against common sense.

The Madras Legislative Council.

Referring to the interpellation in the Madras Legislative Council in connexion with the Panchama meeting at the Spur Tank at Egmore under the presidency of Doctor Nayar, and the reply of the Government thereto, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 26th November, writes:—It is the duty of the head of a family to prevent ill-will among its members. So also it is the duty of the Government to inquire into the cause of any ill-will among its subjects and see that they do not overstep the bounds of justice. It behoves the Government to enquire into the conduct of the Panchamas and the Brahmans concerned in the affray, obtain, if necessary, security for good behaviour from those who are guilty, give them advice and thus help to remove their mutual ill-will. If, on the other hand, the Government should allow the parties to go to the criminal courts, to employ counsel, cite witnesses and augment their mutual hatred and even attack each other, it must indeed be deemed the misfortune of the people; and eventually, it might prove the misfortune of the Government too. It behoves all Governments to consider the fate of Russia as a result of the Tsar's autocratic methods. Indifference in this respect will be sure to lead to dangerous consequences in the end. A Government knows no racial, religious and caste differences and no prejudices. The only distinction it knows of is between the good and the wicked. It ought to protect the good, and reform the wicked by means of education and discipline. Those Governments which perform these functions well will endure for all time. Others will be sure to have to face trouble. It behoves the Government of India as well as the Local Government to consider these points. We trust that they will give their best attention to the subject.

Sampad Abhyudaya, Mysore, 26th Nov. 1917.

The same paper in an other article writes:—After six months there is going to be another meeting of the Madras Legislative Council. There have been many unhappy incidents during the last six months. Mrs. Besant and others had been kept in confinement. There were many sources and consternation. Many autocratic acts were done. Constitutional principles, however, prevailed in the end. Mrs. Besant and others were released. Some of our Anglo-Indian brethren began to proclaim that there would be a political revolution in India in consequence of the release. Fortunately their words did not come true. The confidence in the British Government increased; and a popular conviction came to be established that under the British Government justice will always triumph in the end. If the council meetings should be held at least once in two months, the methods of the Government will be rendered more constitutional. It is imperative that the Government of India should carry out this suggestion.

The Madras Legislative Council.

In commenting upon the proceedings of the Madras Legislative Council, which ended on Wednesday last, the Manorama, of the 23rd November, doubts whether, at any time before, there were asked so many questions and whether the Government ever gave such unfavourable replies to useful questions and representations, and thinks that the Hon'ble Mr. Montagu can have a correct idea as to the nature of the Legislative Councils in India from a perusal of the proceedings of the last meeting of the Madras Legislative Council. It also adds that the replies of the Government to various questions, relating to the unnecessary harassing of the people by lower officials, compel the inference that their acts are even countenanced by the Government.

Manorama, Calicut, 23rd Nov. 1917.

On the same subject, the Yogakshemam, of the 23rd November, writes:—As the Legislative Council meets only at intervals of five or eight months, there is much congestion of business and it is not carried on satisfactorily. This is a serious evil. Besides, in eight or ten months, various administrative irregularities might have taken place in a large presidency like ours. As the non-officials, who represent the people, do not get timely opportunities to bring these to the notice of the Government, much dissatisfaction is produced, and the people lose their confidence, in the Government. The non official members have no powers worth the name. The Government are not bound by the opinion of the majority in the Council. This detracts much from the usefulness of the Council; and the only advantage is the advertisement it gives to the irregularities and defects in the administration. If the people be denied even this satisfaction, it is no wonder that the Legislative Council has disappointed the people. Further when, after overcoming all these difficulties, any non-official member puts a question with a view to remove a doubt, or brings forward a resolution recommending a change in the policy of the Government, the latter dismiss it without any sympathy with the answer, "we are not prepared to answer the question," or oppose it. This policy of the Government enhances the people's dissatisfaction in the administration, and it is not unlikely that the Government are aware of it. Whether it has attracted their attention or not, we see no change as a result of it.

Yogakshemam, Trichur, 23rd Nov. 1917.

At the last meeting of the Council non-official members asked several questions, half of which related to administrative irregularities the rest having for their object the removal of certain doubts. The Members have neither the consolation that these irregularities would be set right, nor the satisfaction that those doubts were cleared. When Indian Newspapers criticise the administration, they are severely punished, whereas the whitemen are allowed to say anything in their Newspapers against the Indians. To a question by an Honourable Member as to why the Government were not taking steps against a Madras Daily belonging to whitemen, which was attacking the British Prime Minister, the State Secretary, and the Viceroy in season and out of season in place and out of place, and which even went to the length of calling the last-named a "rogue", the reply of the Government was that they did not mean to take any such steps in the matter. Is it a wonder that this reply has produced an impression that the Government are partial? At a time like this when the State Secretary is carrying on enquiries on the spot as to what great administrative changes should be introduced, if things are done in this manner in our Legislative Councils, it is not also to be wondered at that the people should make their own inferences as to what might be their future condition.

LOKAPRAKASAM, Trichur, 26th Nov. 1917.

Writing on the same subject the Lokaprakasam, of the 26th November, has the following in English:—"After a long interval of six months the Madras Legislative Council met last Tuesday, and the session is memorable in more respects than one. Our readers will remember that it was towards the close of the previous session that His Excellency the President made an unhappy speech so as to create a good deal of trouble which has not, even now, altogether disappeared. Intimidation, internments, suppression of public opinion and many other disheartening expedients, which an executi e can bring to play, have taken place during this eventful period, but it was not possible to call for a meeting at the time. Unlike the countries enjoying self-government, the Legislative Councils in India are not armed with such powers as to call into question executive acts which are disliked by the public. That there should be a hiatus of six months between one session and the next is indeed to be regretted as such expressions of public opinion at long intervals deprive them of their force and freshness. Neither do the rules for summoning these Council meetings here provide for their being convened on receipt of the requisition of a certain number of members. If the facilities, said to be non-existent in the foregoing lines, were in the enjoyment of our Madras Members, they would surely have so cleverly managed, by bringing before the local Council, the grave problems that arose for solution last summer, as not to call for the recent intervention of the Government of India. The arbitrary exercise by His Excellency the President of the power to disallow certain questions and Resolutions is another regrettable feature of these meetings and the fact that as many as ten resolutions were disallowed for the meeting that was held last week throws a deal of lurid light on the unwholesome tendency to avoid public discussion of important matters. Among these resolutions was, we are told one which sought to invite the attention of the Government to a few articles in the Madras Mail and their tendency to influence public opinion. In reply to another question fortunately allowed on the self-same subject the Government replied that their attention had been called to the articles under reference, but they had not taken nor did they propose to take any action in respect of them. Why the Madras Government exhibited its signs of displeasure and resentment when its repressive policy was subjected to scathing criticism in the columns of the Indian Press alone remains a mystery, especially now, after hearing the above reply. This sort of answer lends strength to the impression current in certain quarters that the Anglo-Indian Journals are allowed a latitude which is denied to Newspapers conducted by Indians. Is it congenial or diplomatic, we ask, to allow such impression to gain volume and strength, especially in these days?

The Vartakamitran and the Government of Madras.

41. The Vartakamitran *, of the 20th September, expresses its gratitude to the Government of Madras for the latter having acceded to the request of its editor that he may be furnished with copies of the statistics issued by the Government from time to time and t heir orders on matters such as trade, industries, agriculture, etc.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 20th Sep. 1917.

Post-war trade in India.

42. The Vartakamitran, of the 20th September, has a long article under this heading in which it refers to the suggestion made by the English merchants and Trades Associations that Germany and other hostile countries should not be allowed to trade with India after the war, and observes:—The idea of the English merchants in preventing the articles of foreigners being imported into India is only to enable their own articles being imported into this country in their place and not to encourage the Indian industries by preventing foreign competition. If the suggestions of these Europeans are adopted, even the existing industries in India will be ruined and the price of the foreign articles sold in India will also increase and lead to many difficulties. All the Europeans want to make India a country yielding raw products and their suggestions are based on this principle. India has no representative in the conference which is to consider about the condition of trade after the war. England and India are considered together for the purposes of this conference which is not fair. As England is a country advanced in industries, while India is not so, the bracketing of India with England will only lead to obstacles being thrown in the way of Indian trade and industries. Protective duties are found necessary even for some existing industries in India like the cotton industry. We need not point out that protective duties have been necessary in the case of every new industry in all countries and that all the great industries that now thrive had once the help of protective duties. Such being the case, it cannot be a bona fide argument to say that, because protective duties are unnecessary for the industries of advanced England, they are unnecessary even for Indian industries. Let us cite some practical instances. A protective duty is very necessary for the cotton industry and an incessant demand for the introduction of it has been of no avail. Besides this, an excise duty is levied on cotton goods manufactured in India, so as to enable English goods to enter the Indian market freely. This by itself has been a clog upon the development of the cotton industry in India. Even when they increased the import duty on cotton goods on account of the war, they have declared the excess to be a tax on income and not a protective duty and therefore they can cancel this tax whenever necessary. Taking the oil industry, the reason why this industry has not thriven in India, though there are facilities enough in the country for its development, is the fact that, as an import duty is levied on oil in countries in Central Europe, they import only oil seeds from here and not oil. So the best course to be adopted to improve the oil industry in India will be to levy as much duty on the export of oil-seeds from here as is levied on the import of oil into those countries. This should be noted by our Government. They claim additional privileges for English goods imported into India and they are no doubt necessary. But the Government of India should, at the same time, be given the power to introduce the necessary safeguards for preventing such additional privileges from obstructing the development of Indian industries and trade. The Government have as much responsibility in the matter of improving the industries and trade of a country as the people and this view is supported by an examination of the history of Germany, Japan and other industrial countries. But the Government of India cannot do anything in this matter, even if they wish, as they are guided here by the British Parliament, the influential merchants in which get the Parliament to warn this Government often that they should not interfere in industrial matters. It is on account of the view expressed by Parliament in the time of Sir Arthur

* Received during the current week.

Lawley, that the Government should not compete with ordinary merchants in trade, that the Government weaving factory in Salem had to be abolished. Means should be devised from avoiding such difficulties hereafter.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 20th Sep. 1917.

Indian agriculture.

43. Adverting to the cry often raised about the deterioration of agriculture in India, a correspondent to the Vartakamitran, of the 20th September, observes:—Though the Government have been taking much trouble to improve agriculture in India, they are not inclined to reduce the land assessment in proportion to the deterioration of agriculture. The reforms introduced by the Government for improving agriculture have not been of much use, owing partly to their unsuitability to the conditions of this country and partly to the mutual distrust between the mirasidars and the ryots. So the following points should be noted if the condition of agriculture in India is to be improved. The matter to be first attended to is the education of the agriculturists. The measures now adopted by the Government for this purpose are based on the view that primary education is enough for them. This is wrong. Diligent boys in primary schools in villages should be given also higher education, including agricultural education. The second matter to be considered is methods of agriculture. Seeing that agriculture was going down on account of want of experience, the Government opened an agricultural department and appointed western agricultural experts as directors therein. But these have no knowledge whatever about the condition of land, irrigational facilities or the seasons here. By the time they understand these things and are in a position to adapt the modern methods to the conditions of the country, their period of office comes to an end and they are replaced by new men. Thus these Directors are of no use to any one. Now let us consider about the demonstration farms and agricultural colleges started by the Government. The youngmen trained in these colleges have no idea of the ancient methods of agriculture obtaining in this country and are not therefore in a position to compare them with the modern ones taught to them in these colleges and demonstrate to the people the superiority of the latter. Thus the education imparted to these youths does not benefit the agriculturists in any way, but only entails vain expenditure on the Government. So those educated in the agricultural colleges should be made to take up agriculture as an avocation and, applying the new methods in their own lands, teach the old and influential ryots in the villages modern methods and show their superiority to old ones. These ryots will then apply these methods in the villages and others will naturally take the cue from them. The methods of agriculture in the country will be reformed and the economic condition of the agriculturists improved, only if such a system is followed. The next point to be noted is that the co-operative societies started in the country by the Government, with the object of helping the poor agriculturists financially, do not benefit them much. We fear that, if the Co-operative department is worked as it is done now, it may take a long time for the agriculturists to be benefited by it. So the following reforms should be introduced in this matter. The system of advancing loans to agriculturists only on the security of land should be given up, as the majority of them have not land enough to offer as security or their lands are already encumbered. Therefore the Government should start banks which will advance loans on grains. Money can be advanced safely on three-fourths the value of the produce and this will be easier, as the price of grains is bound to go up some months after the harvest and a sale thereof will then bring in an amount sufficient to repay the loan with interest and to leave a margin also for improving the lands. Moreover, it is because the agriculturists do not usually have a correct idea of the prospective price of the produce in their hands that they get duped by merchants and brokers. If the produce is deposited with the grain banks, the latter can gauge the proper time for selling it and do good to the agriculturists thereby. It is necessary that the Government should adopt the measures noted above if the condition of the agriculture is to improve.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 22nd Nov. 1917.

The application of the Defence of India Act.

44. Adverting to the remark of Lord Ronaldshay, in announcing the appointment of a committee to enquire about the wide conspiracy, which has been found to exist in Bengal with the object of subverting the British Government, that those who condemned the internment of persons under the Defence of India Act without any trial had no idea of the real condition of the conspiracy in their province, the Swadesamitran, of the 22nd November, observes:—The objection of the public is not to the application of the Defence of India Act to suppress conspiracy. Such a suppression would be welcomed by all. Our main objection is to the application of this Act for the purpose of interning persons without any trial on the score that they are guilty of other ordinary political offences. Our complaint is that it is not fair to intern them without hearing both sides according to ordinary law. Can the Government be justified in acting in such a manner as to embolden even their subordinate officials to apply this Act, which was specially framed in view of the emergencies of the war, even in ordinary political matters We can never approve the procedure of the officials in issuing internment orders against political agitators, who publish books and deliver public lectures, under the impression that they are guilty of offences which cannot be punished by means of an ordinary trial. Besides this, though the Government say that, in the case of every internment, the accused is informed in writing of the offence he is guilty of and an explanation taken from him, we cannot refrain from noting here that there is a complaint that no such formality has been gone through in the case of some interned persons. Moreover, those who conduct secret inquiries about people who are suspected as being capable of committing political offences, and gather evidence in such cases are the low-paid subordinate police officials. Detection as an occupation has not improved as much here as in western countries, and those who take to it cannot be said to have a proper training and capacity. Great care should, therefore, be taken in relying upon the evidence gathered from the beginning by such people. When even persons of rank and merit are not spared from the list of these detectives, the necessity for reforming the method of enquiry now adopted will become patent. Like the English law, there should be a provision in the Indian Act that, before a person is punished under it, the evidence gathered against him should be sifted by a committee appointed by the Government and some non-official Indians should also be included in this committee.

An unconstitutional procedure.

45. The Swadesamitran, of the 22nd November, characterises, as unconstitutional, the procedure adopted by His Excellency the Governor of Madras in the last meeting of the Legislative Council in calling in certain members, who were outside the Council Chamber, when a poll was demanded on the resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. Chidambaranatha Mudaliyar regarding backyard cultivation, and observes:—When this procedure was objected to by the Hon'ble Mr. T. Ranga Achariyar and the Hon'ble Mr. M. Ramachandra Rao, His Excellency said that he was only acting in pursuance of rules and precedents. We cannot see anything in the rules to favour his view. The procedure adopted by His Excellency seems to indicate that the Government have a majority on their side and can afford to reject any resolution. Perhaps rules may hereafter permit of even absentee members being sent for.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 22nd Nov. 1917.

The deputations to Mr. Montagu.

46. Referring to the procedure adopted by Mr. Montagu in receiving the several deputations that wait on him, the Swadesamitran, of the 22nd November, remarks:—Though the principle of quietly listening to several kinds of representations may be quite compatible with bureaucratic ideals, it will not betoken an inquiry. We see from the telegrams that no questions or cross-questions have been put to any deputation. It will be hard to find out the truth by such a procedure. It may be stated that if necessary the Secretary of State may ascertain the nature of the particular deputation later through the officials. But why should there be inquiry and deputation for ascertaining a matter through official sources? Judging from what has happened till now, we have to conclude that the procedure adopted is not quite satisfactory. Several people believe that the Secretary of State will ascertain the true state of affairs by means of this inquiry and confer numerous benefits on the country and they are anxiously following the trend of the inquiry. So we hope that it will be conducted in a manner which will avoid unnecessary disappointment and which will convince the people that it is not conducted just to appease them for the nonce.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 22nd Nov. 1917.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

The deputations to Mr. Montagu.

The Swadesamitran, of the 23rd November, reiterating its observations on this subject observes that the important matter to be ascertained by the Secretary of State for India is whether or not the Indians are fit for Home Rule, and referring to his having declined the invitation of the Congress to be present at its next session, quotes the comments of the Tribune that he should set aside the restrictions imposed by officials and visit the capital of each province, especially the minor provinces under the control of Lieutenant-Governors and Chief Commissioners, a district under the charge of a European Collector and that under an Indian Collector and a municipality, a district board and a taluk board, as it is only then he will find it possible to ascertain personally the fitness of the Indians for Home Rule and their capability to discuss questions calmly and thoroughly.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

The deputations to Mr. Montagu.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 24th November, publishes in Tamil the views on this subject of the Tribune and the Delhi correspondent of the Bombay Chronicle as they appear in these papers. These are reproduced in English in the Hindu of the 22nd idem.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 26th Nov. 1917.

The deputations to Mr. Montagu.

Adverting to the large number of addresses presented to the Secretary of State and in particular to that presented by the Congress and the Muslim League and a lengthy commentary thereon submitted by the Bombay Congress Committee, wherein they are said to have laid stress on the disadvantages resulting in his relying on "the men on the spot", the Hindu Nesan, of the 26th November, observes:—It is but right that this matter has been brought to the notice of the Secretary of State; for, the present local authorities neither closely move with the people nor evince any interest in their welfare. The term "men on the spot" refers to the Viceroy, the Governors, the Lieutenant-Governors, the Chief Commissioners and the members of the Indian Civil Service, and many of them have no interest whatever in India and her people and mainly care for the efficient working of the administrative machinery. They do not lend their ears to other matters, nor do they pay heed to popular opinion. When the people suggest anything, they assert that they are creating an unnecessary agitation. That is why the public have been incessantly demanding a government which will be responsible to the people. At present we can do nothing but expect the Secretary of State to realise the great responsibility resting on his shoulders, carefully examine the various schemes presented to him and introduce such reforms as would give satisfaction to the Indians.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 26th Nov. 1917.

Adverting to the various addresses presented to Mr. Montagu by different deputations, the Swadesamitran, of the 26th November, in the course of a long leader, says that, from a perusal of the addresses presented, the Secretary of State can find out for himself that the only scheme of constructive reform applicable to the whole of India is the one presented to him by the Congress and the Muslim League which has been drafted with a liberal outlook without giving room to any shortsighted views, and that all the other deputations have cared for the advancement of their own interests and demanded special representation of their communities without stating how the ideal of the British Government to improve the self-governing institutions in such a way as to secure in course of time a government which will be responsible to the people, can be realised, and observes that, if it is deemed necessary that the existing administration in India should be reformed and Indians should acquire the status enjoyed by the people in other countries, the recommendations made by the Congress-League cannot but be accepted.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

Indo-European scheme of reforms.

47. Adverting to the statement said to have been made in memorandum of reforms jointly published by certain Indians and Europeans in Calcutta that the schemes of reforms till now proposed are not compatible with the policy of His Majesty's Government regarding the Indian Administration as announced in Parliament by the Secretary of State for India on the 20th August last, the Swadesamitran, the 23rd November, writes:—It will not do simply to say that the scheme of reforms suggested by the Congress and the Muslim League is not compatible with the object of the British Government, without specifying in what respects it is so. Though these Indians and Europeans abruptly dispense with this scheme, they admit that the necessity has come, as announced in the communiqué issued by His Majesty's Government, for the appointment of administrative officers who would be responsible to the voters and could be removed by them at any time they pleased. The Congress League scheme of reforms does not demand adequate powers for the people, according to the interpretation made by these Indians and Europeans of the pronouncement of the Secretary of State. It is true that this scheme does not require that the people should, in the very beginning, be given power to remove administrative officers, for it is the intention of the Congress and the Muslim League to ask for such a power and acquire it gradually. Their object is, indeed, to see that necessary reforms are now introduced for making the Government responsible to the people in course of time. The further suggestions made by these Indians and Europeans and the arguments adduced in support thereof are quite inconsistent with each other. While they demand a Government responsible to the people, they say, at the same time, that no change should be made to affect the powers of the Central Government. Why? It is this Government that conducts the administration of the whole of India and the object of our scheme will be defeated when it is said that no change should be introduced in it and that people should not be given any powers in its administration. We demand the right and responsibility in all political matters, whereas what the Indians and Europeans referred to above require is only absolute right in certain matters and a small increase of influence in certain others. We will not be carried away by their proposal to leave certain powers completely in our hands. It is said that matters such as the laying of roads, the construction of bridges, the control of elementary education and agriculture should be completely left in our hands. Thus the important powers will continue to be vested in the Central Government as at present. The object of the pronouncement made by the Secretary of State is the gradual increase of our responsibility in the administration of each department. Our complaint is that the bureaucracy, now carrying on the administration of the country, is not suited to the times, however capable it might be; and any reforms now proposed should therefore aim at remedying this defect.

Indo-European scheme of reforms.

The Swadesamitran, of the 24th November, continuing its comments on this subject, writes:—The advocates of the new scheme of reforms allege that they base their proposals on the statement made in Parliament on the 20th August last by the Secretary of State for India. As every reform proposed by them should, therefore, be consistent with the true interpretation of this statement, let us now examine if their interpretation of it is correct. His Excellency the Viceroy referred to this very statement in his speech in the Imperial Legislative Council on the 5th September last. He said that the ideal of the British Government was the grant of Home Rule to India and that India should simultaneously advance in three ways to attain this ideal and detailed them to be local self-government, administrative experience and legislative councils. It must be noted here that the Viceroy insisted on the progress being simultaneous, whatever might be the ways. He never said that progress should be made in a particular direction at first and on reaching the end of it, it should be begun in another. Though the advocates of the new reforms seem to base their recommendations on this statement of the Secretary of State, those recommendations are not compatible with the true interpretation of the statement. According to these, the Indians should gain complete responsibility in respect of certain departments of administration, whereas their voice will not prevail in the other departments. Can this be called simultaneous progress? Their recommendations indicate that the Indians have full capacity to manage only certain departments and no capacity whatever to manage certain other departments. But in the Congress Muslim League scheme of reforms, we demand that we should have influence over every department of administration at the same time and that the Government should gradually be made responsible to the people. Our reforms will admit that our demands are the reforms quite compatible with the purport of the Secretary of State's statement as interpreted by the Viceroy.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

The legislative councils as constituted under the new reforms cannot have the powers of such councils. It is these councils that are all-powerful in any country. According to the suggestions made by these reformers, Provincial Legislative Councils will have only certain specified duties and powers. These councils will, when compared with the Imperial Legislative Council, appear to be like municipal councils. It is doubtful how far the Executive Government will respect such councils and give effect to the laws passed by them. In such a predicament, they will be held responsible for any mistakes committed by the departments under their control and blamed by the central Government which will have the power to criticise the work of those departments. Again, according to these new reformers, the central Government will be conducted as now by the bureaucracy, who may attach great importance to capacity alone and remove the Provincial Government on the ground of inefficiency. Hence after a few years, it may give room for the complaint that the Indians have not the capacity to manage the departments left under their control. They would then remain as they are today without any experience or training in the matter of managing certain departments of administration. We cannot believe that this is the trend of the announcement made by His Majesty's Government.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

The South Indian Islamiah League.

48. The Swadesamitran, of the 23rd November, publishes in Tamil an abstract of the proceedings of a meeting of the Muhammadans held at Muthiyalpet on the 22nd idem, when it was resolved to organize a new association under this name to oppose any scheme of political re-construction, which tends to undermine the authority of the British Government in India, and favour the introduction of progressive political reforms here. These proceedings appear in English in the Hindu of the same date.

The spirit of freedom.

49. The Swadesamitran, of the 23rd November, reproduces in Tamil the substance of an address delivered by Mr. G. S. Arundale at the Gokhale Hall, Madras, on the same date, to the new graduates of the University of Madras, under the auspices of the Madras students' convention, extracts from which appear in the Hindu of the same date under this heading.

A Home Rule meeting at Pannaipuram.

50. The Swadesamitran, of the 23rd November, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held at Pannaipuram on the 14th idem, when a number of speakers, including the president of the meeting are said to have addressed the meeting on the necessity for Home Rule in India, the benefits accruing therefrom, how India is now governed and how she will be governed when she acquires Home Rule, the aims and the present needs of India, and the necessity for co-operation among the people in working for the acquisition of Home Rule. Resolutions are also said to have been passed at this meeting condemning the Anglo-Indian agitation as well as the attitude of Mr. Tyagaraya Chettiyar and his party and the efforts made by them against the grant of Home Rule for India.

MAHAVIKATA DUTAN, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

Retrenchment of expenditure in public offices.

51. Adverting to the appointment of Mr. Tottenham on special duty in connexion with the retrenchment of expenditure in certain public offices, the Mahavikata Dutan, of the 24th November, writes:—Mr. Tottenham will perhaps recommend that the establishments may be reduced and economy practised as far as possible, and the Government may approve them and issue orders accordingly. It is, of course, the duty of the people to help the Government in times of trouble. When we observe the distress of the people in the western countries which are directly affected by the war, our condition is indeed a thousand times better than theirs. But should the retrenchment of expenditure be effected only by reducing the number of petty officers and menial servants? It is doubtful if the retrenchment will affect the pockets of persons who are earning large salaries. If only 5 per cent of the salaries of persons drawing Rs. 100 and above be withheld, a large amount can easily be collected thereby.

Moreover, retrenchment may be effected in the exchange compensation allowance, war allowance, travelling allowance and other special allowances drawn by European officers, the touring expenses incurred by His Excellency the Governor and others and the expenditure incurred on account of the exodus of the Government to the hills. Perhaps nobody dare lay his fingers on these and it is only the beggars' bowl that has to be affected!

52. The Dravidan, of the 23rd November, in the course of a long leader, says:—Some impatient Brahman politicians accuse the British officers of adopting the policy of "divide and rule" and making all possible endeavours to create divisions among the people of this country. But any one who pries deep into the social life in India cannot but come to the conclusion that it is only British Government that has established a central authority, introduced a common language and maintained the equality of all its subjects besides granting the freedom for the member of any community to progress, and adopting measures leading to the unification and advancement of the Indians. It is indeed the Brahmans, that, in olden days, introduced the caste system, and dividing the Dravadians into a number of sections, created factions among them. This is how they divided and ruled the Dravidians to eke out their livelihood.

Divide and rule.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

53. The Dravidan, of the 23rd November, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held at Sattur on the 18th idem, when Mr. G. M. Sundaram Pillai of Kovilpatti is reported to have delivered a lecture on the present condition of the Dravadians in which he laid stress on the necessity of social reform before the introduction of political reform in the country and observed that without social reform the people were not fit for Home Rule, that the grant of Home Rule or the reforms demanded by the Congress would only lead to the supremacy of the Brahmans and that communal representation was necessary in public offices and institutions. Another speaker who addressed the meeting is said to have dealt with the Congress-League scheme of reforms and remarking that these reforms would not be beneficial to non-Brahmans, also urged on the necessity for securing communal representation.

A public meeting at Sattur.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

54. In publishing in Tamil a very short account of the proceedings of this conference which was held on the 25th November 1917 at Kalahasti and the resolutions passed therein as appearing in the Hindu of the 26th idem, the Swadesamitran, of the 26th November, remarks that, though some may say that big mirasidars and zamindars do not evince much interest in the matter of reforms to be introduced in the administration of the country, such of them as are gifted with mature deliberation, liberal views and intense patriotism do encourage and support the aspirations of the people, and quotes, in support of this remark, extracts from the speech delivered by the President of this conference.

Special Conference at Kalahasti.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 26th Nov. 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 26th November, refers to the special Conference held at Kalahasti and says:—From the fact that the Rajas of Rāmnād, Bobbili and Vizianagar have expressed their desire for self-government, it is plain that the movement of the opponents has completely failed. The zamindars of Bengal demand larger reforms than those contained in the Congress scheme. The special Kalahasti Conference expressed itself in favour of the Congress scheme. The president criticised the policy of allowing reforms piecemeal. The compartmental system will involve two governments opposed to each other. . . If the people do not have control over the purse, government by the people will certainly fail.

The Kalahasti meeting.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 26th Nov. 1917.

55. In expressing its satisfaction at the nomination of Sir Rajendra Mukerjea as the President of this Commission in the place of Sir Thomas Holland, the present President, the Swadesamitran, of the 26th November, writes:—Some may feel anxious that Sir Thomas Holland is taking leave of the Commission. But it should be noted that he is rejoining the Munition Board which can in a way contribute to the promotion of Indian industries. It is a matter of special importance that an Indian has been nominated for the first time to the presidentship of a commission. But questions arise, whether he has been nominated to this office permanently and whether he would continue in this office when the reports of the commission is published.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

Industries.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd November, says:—The Madras Government have accepted a resolution recommending the appointment of a Committee to give advice regarding the advancement of industries. But they now stated that this is not the proper time for constituting the Committee. We do not know when there can be a greater opportunity than this for developing the industries.

LIVA-UL-ISLAM, Madras, 22nd Nov. 1917.

The interned Muslims.

56. The Liva-ul-Islam, of the 22nd November, publishes the proceedings of the public meeting held on the 15th idem at the Gokhale Hall, Madras, to express disappointment at the continued internment of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali and to adopt necessary measures for their release, referred to in paragraph 27 of Report No. 47 of 1917.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 23rd Nov 1917.

The interned Muslims.

Referring to the meetings held in various parts of the country in connection with the internment of Muhammad Ali and his brother, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 23rd November, remarks:—It will doubtless be admitted in all quarters that the Government have acted in an unstatesmanlike manner in going to this length in wounding the feelings of our Muslim brethren.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

Special Conference.

57. The Swadesamitran, of the 27th November, publishes in Tamil, as reported by correspondents, abstracts of the proceedings of the special conferences held in the districts of South Arcot and Madura on the 25th idem to accord welcome to Mr. Montagu and support the Congress League scheme of reforms. These proceedings appear in English in the Hindu of the same date.

58. The Swadesamitran, of the 27th November, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held at Dindigul under the joint auspices of the local Home Rule, Muslim and Sourashtra Leagues and the Madras Presidency Association, at which Mr. T. V. K. Kalyanasundara Mudaliyar is said to have delivered a lecture on this subject, a report of which appears in New India of the same date.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

Probationary deputy tahsildars.

59. Adverting to the order of the Government, inviting applications for appointment as probationary deputy tahsildars, so as to reach them before the 15th November 1917, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th November, observes that this order, though dated 30th September 1917, was received by it only on the 27th November 1917, and, questioning the delay in the publication of this order, asks whether any nominations will be made this year seeing that the date for submitting applications has already expired, or whether applications have been submitted in time by a few who somehow came to know of it.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 27th November, in commenting upon this subject trusts that, in view of the delay in the publication of this order, the period during which applications should be submitted will be extended.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

The non-Brahmans and Home Rule.

60. In the course of an article complaining of the obstacles thrown by the Brahmans in the way of non-Brahmans holding conferences of their own in different parts of the Presidency, the Dravidan, of the 24th November, writes:—In a leaflet published in Salem by the Vande Mataram party, they have said that the British Government do not give powers to the Brahman representatives in the Legislative Council, that they reject the bills brought by these representatives and do not pass them into Acts, that they act with partiality in several matters and that they have their own nominees in the Legislative Councils to strengthen their side. Thus several fallacious and false statements have been published. It is also stated that the Government have rejected the proposal of the representatives to introduce a system of compulsory education and thus educate all the children in the country. What a preposterous statement is this? Our readers are well aware of the fact that the Government did organise a small conference a couple of weeks ago, and concerted measures for introducing compulsory education in this Presidency. It is the habit with these Brahman Home Rulers to raise a loud cry only about matters which are already engaging the attention of the Government. If only every Brahman representative is permitted to speak at length in the Legislative Council and the Government grant every request of the Brahmans, perhaps then they will praise the authorities as good administrators. But if they are not allowed to speak as they like, then the Government is a bad one.

O Dravidians, lend not your ears to the words of these false Brahmans. They are born only to dupe us in the guise of friendship. Our indispensable requirement at present is communal representation. Brahman rule is what we do not require at any time. The affliction caused to us by the deception practised by these Brahmans will suffice. At present, Home Rule can only be Brahman rule. All their efforts are for nothing but to keep us still in a state of subjection. Those who demand Home Rule are traitors to the country and to the cause of the non-Brahmans, and it will be therefore stupidity on our part to play to the tune of the Home Rulers.

61. The Swadesamitran, of the 26th November, reproduces in Tamil the gist of an address on this subject by Mr. B. P. Wadia delivered at the first anniversary of the Gokhale Literary Union, Srirangam, on the 25th idem, under the presidency of Rao Bahadur N. Krishnaswami Ayyangar of Kumbakōnam. Extracts from the address are published in New India of the 26th idem.

"Some aspects of national life."

62. Adverting to the interpellation of the Honourable the Raja of Rāmnād in the local Legislative Council about the danger to the public health likely to be caused by the location of this institute in Madras and the reply of the Government thereto, the Swadesamitran, of the 26th November, writes:—Why should not the Government take steps in this matter? If, even though Doctor Nanjunda Rao says that the location of this institute in Madras is likely to cause danger to public health, the Government should say that they will pay no heed to his words, does it indicate that the Government evince no interest in public health? Or is it their opinion that what Doctor Nanjunda Rao says is wrong? If it is the latter, a reply to that effect would dispel the fears of the people. We hope that the Government will bestow their attention on the further communication to the press by Doctor Nanjunda Rao on this subject.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 26th Nov. 1917.

The Tuberculosis Institute.

This paper also reproduces in Tamil the above communication of Doctor Nanjunda Rao as appearing in the Hindu of the 26th idem.

63. The Swadesamitran, of the 27th November, publishes, as reported by a correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held at Trichinopoly on the 24th idem under the auspices of the local District Congress Committee, when Diwan Bahadur Desika Achariyar, the president of the meeting, is stated to have remarked that the Government did not pay heed to the legitimate demands of the people during the last 35 years. Resolutions are reported to have been passed at this meeting welcoming Mr. Montagu, supporting the Congress-League scheme of reforms and condemning the agitation of the Anglo-Indians against the Home Rule movement.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

Home Rule meetings.

A correspondent from Arni in the North Arcot district, writing to the same paper, gives an abstract of the proceedings of a public meeting held at the place on the 20th November 1917 under the auspices of the local branch of the Madras Presidency Association, when Mr. A. Subrahmanya Nayakar, the editor of the Vannikulamitran, is said to have dwelt at length on the benefits accruing from Home Rule. Another speaker is stated to have addressed the meeting on trade and industries and the means for their advancement, and remarked in the course of his speech that Home Rule was indispensable for any kind of progress in this country.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

64. In the course of a long leader on this subject, the Hindu Nesan, of the 27th November, says:—When we note the way in which the several deputations are being received by the Secretary of State for India, as described by the Delhi correspondent of the Bombay Chronicle, we cannot but feel anxious as to how the noble object of the Secretary of State can be accomplished. We are at a loss to understand why Mr. Montagu and his party should have been prevented from more freely moving with the leaders of the people and ascertaining their views on important matters. Mr. Montagu and Mr. Charles Roberts are well acquainted with Indian affairs. Why then should the Indian leaders be made to meet them formally? Probably the bureaucrats do not allow the Indian leaders to approach them lest, by consulting these leaders, the views of the Secretary of State and his party might be changed. We do not know whether this perhaps is the reason why Mr. Montagu had to decline the invitation of the Congress to attend its session at Calcutta. We were considering ourselves fortunate on account of his visit to our country at a time when the Indian leaders from all parts would meet together to consider matters relating to the welfare of the country and the interests of the public. Had the tour-programme of Mr. Montagu been so arranged that he could witness the proceedings of the ensuing session of the Congress and the Muslim League, it would have given immense satisfaction to the people. If he would but attend the Congress and see how, without any difference of caste or creed, the Indians discuss questions in the subjects committee with a common ideal in view, he will surely be convinced that they are in every way fit for parliamentary government. Our only regret is that such a rare opportunity is lost without being availed of. Even now it is not too late, and if Mr. Montagu would only reconsider his decision and alter his programme so that he may grace the Congress with his presence, he would not only be doing honour to that national assembly but also give immense pleasure to the Indian public.

Mr. Montagu's responsibility.

The addresses presented to the Secretary of State by the Congress and the Muslim-League deputations contain in detail the reforms proposed to be introduced in the administration and we trust that Mr. Montagu will do all that lies in his power to afford facilities for these reforms being carried out.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

65. The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd November, says in its leader:—Those who desire to have self-government can never give their assent to the principles underlying the scheme published by some Europeans and Indians jointly in Calcutta. Under that scheme, there will be two systems of Government, one responsible to the people and the other to the Secretary. The reader will well conceive how efficient an administration will be if its machinery is worked by a Government that is responsible to the people on the one side and by another that is not so responsible. The departments which require great expenditure are to be given over to the people for being administered by them. The other Government will administer the other departments. The control over finance will be in the hands of the Government not responsible to the people. The people will be given authority over education, sanitation, etc., and they will be vested with power to levy taxes for these purposes. . . We can now divine what the results of the new scheme will be seven years hence if it is put into force now. . . The bureaucracy will not render any pecuniary help. It is not possible that the people's government will have due powers to collect taxes. There will therefore be immediate commotion among the people. When the people are annoyed by their own government, they will raise a hue and cry, so much so that the people's government will not bother themselves about the new reforms. When affairs go on like this for seven years, any Committee appointed to enquire into the capacity of the Indians for self-government will report that they are incompetent. The Committee will moreover try to show, by the evidence they get, that the people themselves are against the grant of self-government. The bureaucracy will greatly aid to bring about this end. There can then be no hope of the Indians getting self-government within reasonable time. . . The views of Mr. Curtis are visible in the scheme. The framers of the scheme want to test the capacity of the Indians for self-government. In no country is the necessity of self-government made to depend on the capacity or incapacity of the people. When self-government was granted to England, to the Colonies and to the Philiphine Islands, no such experiments were made regarding the capacity of the people. It is not known why there should be this want of confidence in the case of India. Hindu kingdoms lasted for fifteen centuries, and established peace. The people obeyed the laws and were uplifted, and the sciences and arts flourished. Buildings were constructed which called forth admiration. It is an anomaly to say that the descendants of such people who have been trained under the British rule for so many years, are still unfit for self-government. Nothing can be better calculated than this scheme to frustrate the desires of the Indians. It has its parallel in the Bikkavole and the Bezwada schemes. As stated by Mr. Gandhi, to get swaraj is to be at liberty to commit mistakes. Indians are trying to get such liberty. There is no need to fear that mistakes may occur. Indians are able to find out the mistakes and remedy them. May the Indians therefore do their utmost to secure responsible Government.

The Calcutta agreement.

The Calcutta agreement.

Referring to the Calcutta agreement, the Desamata, of the 21st November, says:—The scheme prepared jointly by the Europeans and some Indians in Calcutta has nothing in common with the Congress League scheme, but resembles the scheme of the Madras Mail. If such a scheme is adopted it will take an indefinitely long time for us to get self-government. The Madras leaders have protested against it in time. This is praiseworthy and this example should be followed by the Home Rule Leagues in India and other bodies. It is heartrending to learn that Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu has changed his old opinions, and has not only approved of the compartmental government proposed by the Madras Mail, but has also required his friends to accept it. It is most horrible that one who has been reckoned as a patriot should hold such opinions. Our country does not want such patriots. We want sincere patriots who would work for the welfare of India without expecting any reward. It is by the help of such men that India should rise to eminence.

The Special Gōdāvari District Conference.

69. The Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd November, gives the proceedings of the Special Gōdāvari District Conference and reports a speaker to have said:—We doubt if the Government will have to spend such a large amount on the administration of the country. if they should employ Indians in Government service. If swaraj is granted, the Vaisyas and the ryots will profit to a large extent. Our country is in a very low condition. The country should be raised to eminence by any means.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 22nd Nov. 1917.

The paper reports another speaker to have said:—The poverty of the people will be plain from the records of the Government. A high officer has stated that four crores of men starve without food even in years with good harvests. An Englishman has said that half the ryots of India live on one meal a day.

Mr. Montagu.

70. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd November, writes:—Ever since Mr. Montagu came to India, all the Indians have been glad that he will attend the Congress, and that thus an opportunity will be afforded for him to understand from its proceedings that the Indians are fit for swaraj. But the reply of the Home Member has damped our enthusiasm. But we should not be discouraged. On the other hand we should by all means endeavour to see that Mr. Montagu attends the Congress. If we do not succeed in our endeavours, it will be well for us to hold the session of the Congress just where Mr. Montagu is.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 22nd Nov. 1917.

Reforms.

71. The Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd November, reproduces in Telugu from the Daily News an article contributed by Mr Ratcliff, in which appear the following remarks:—Mr. Morley's reforms are very small. . . It is natural that the Government who have been all-powerful heretofore will not like to forego their authority. . . As stated by Mr. Asquith, India enjoying responsible self-government should be given an honourable place in the empire that is to be reconstituted. . . . It needs no saying that there are some opponents as are found in the Anglo-Indian papers. They endeavoured to prevent Mr. Montagu landing in India and are criticising progressive methods of the Government They will fail in their attempt; for democratic England approves of the new ideals of the Government. But Mr. Montagu and His Excellency the Viceroy should be prepared to encounter the opponents.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

Reforms.

Referring to the many conferences held in the Telugu country. the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th November, remarks:—All these conferences have expressed their joy at the arrival of Mr. Montagu, and demanded the reforms contained in the Congress scheme. They also urged the necessity of a separate Andhra Province. We hear that in four days the Bander and the Divi taluks also will hold a conference. Conferences are not wanting in the south also. Meetings should be held in every village and town in the Andhra country to send resolutions to Mr. Montagu demanding the reforms contained in the Congress scheme and a separate province for the Andhras. Some people who are anxious to get appointments are throwing blocks in the way. They also held one or two meetings. But those non-Brahmans who wish the welfare of the country are then and there laying bare the secret motives of such people. Those who do not want reforms are fortunately like a drop of water in the ocean. Now they are dejected. While they want to convene a meeting in Madras, those who wish the welfare of the country have undertaken to get up another meeting. We pray that God will bring them to the right course. . . The grant of self-government will not only be advantageous to India but to England also. The country will become prosperous and the people will not hesitate to go to the war. Germany will then surrender.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

The non-Brahman Leaders' Conference.

72. The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd November, publishes certain correspondence from which it would appear that certain notices were pasted at the non-Brahman Leaders' Conference to the effect that Home Rule was not wanted. The special correspondent says:— Mr. (Gopalakrishnayya) Choudari points out that this is a dishonest act of the opponents (the Home Rulers). It is inconceivable why the Home Rulers would paste notices to the effect that they do not want Home Rule and thus bring themselves to ridicule. Is it the intention of Mr. Gopalakrishnayya to make the world suppose that there were in the Leaders' Conference persons like C.I.D. Officers?

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

The constitution of the Empire.

73. The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd November, says:—Though we do not approve of the principles of self-government contained in the new scheme, we approve of the principles contained in the new scheme regarding the reconstruction of the provinces. . . It has been pointed out in the scheme that artificial arrangements, such as the grouping together of the Mahrattas and the Kanarese people in Bombay and adding Orissa to Behar, are obstacles to any system of responsible Government. The attempt made in Canada to bring Cubec and Antario under one province, failed. Only after the French and English were placed under different provincial Governments, has self-government in Canada become efficient. The new scheme therefore urges the necessity of dividing this country on a language basis. . . . The Andhras should not only show their approval of the Congress scheme, but should also declare that it is necessary to divide the country on a language basis. They should declare that such a division of the country, and self-government are their ideals, and attain them.

74. The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd November, refers to the tribute paid by General Murray to the Indian troops fighting at Gaza, and remarks:—If the Indians are given proper training, they may help to win the victory in the present war without the aid of others. Self-government is the only means for attaining this end Indian troops.

The Congress scheme.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

76. The Andhrapatrika, of the 24th November, reports the President at a meeting of the Andhra Union held on the 23rd November, to have remarked that he could state from his experience that the present officers of the Indian Civil Service lacked the patience, the understanding, the memory and the perseverence of members of the Civil Service of old.

The Indian Civil Service.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

77. The Andhrapatrika, of the 24th November, says:—The age limit for Civil Service is a chief bar against the Indians getting higher appointments. Writing confidentially to the Government in England, Lord Lytton has stated:—"We are confronted with the question whether we should exclude the Indians or deceive them. Of these two courses, we have followed the insincere one. As I am writing confidentially, I venture to state the following facts. It appears to me that a satisfactory explanation has not been given in the matter of the charge that the English Government and the Government of India have acted in opposition to their pledges." Speaking in the House of Lords in 1869, the Duke of Argyle said:—"I say that in the matter of conferring Government appointments on the Indians, we have neither done our duty nor carried out our pledges." The proclamation of Queen Victoria has been thus set at naught. When the people were dissatisfied with this, Lord Lytton began to adopt a repressive policy. . . In the time of Lord Dufferin, the misunderstanding between the Indians and the Anglo-Indians increased. The Indians believed that the Anglo-Indians would not allow them to progress. The repressive policy initiated in the time of Lord Lytton reached its culmination in the time of Lord Curzon. The fall of Port Arthur into the hands of Japan in the Russo-Japanese war stimulated the self-respect of the inhabitants of the east. The old theory that self-governing institutions could not flourish in the east received a check. There was an awakening in the east and India also shared in it. Lord Curzon stood in the way of the advancement of the country at this time. A perverse interpretation was put on the proclamation of Queen Victoria. The agitation of the people to get the partition of Bengal cancelled proved useless. The disappointment thus caused among the people engendered a new spirit. The desires of the people were no more restricted to small reforms. Mr. Dadabhoi Nowroji inspired into the minds of the Indians the ideal of swaraj which he said was the panacea for all evils. The Indians are now trying to realise that ideal. There is nothing absurd or revolutionary in this.

The goal of the Indians.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

78. The Andhrapatrika, of the 24th November says:—India began to reverberate with the sound of swaraj. This was an eyesore to the authorities. They resorted to the policy of punishing and imprisoning the people. Indians had been eagerly awaiting the arrival of Mr. Montagu. The Europeans were upset by the thought of his arrival. The people had been waiting to see what grand reception would be accorded to Mr. Montagu. . . The arrival of Mr. Montagu was announced in the papers. There was no firing of guns in honour of him. This engendered suspicion in the minds of the people. What was this secrecy for? Some fools said that this secrecy was observed in order that the Anglo-Indians might not do any mischief. Some others gave ridiculous explanations. Mr. Montagu went to Delhi and commenced enquiries. A deputation comes. One member thereof reads the address from top to bottom. His Excellency the Viceroy says that the contents will be considered. The deputation then returns home. When the enquirers do not move their lips, why is all this enquiry? All the expenditure will be saved if the addresses are all sent to England. The people desire various things. On the whole many are on the side of the Congress. . . Nobody knew that Mr. Montagu's drama would be so insipid. We doubt if there will be any advantage in such an enquiry. But we, laymen, do not know the ways of the authorities.

ANDHRAPATRIKA Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 25th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

Under this heading, the Desabhimani, of the 25th November, publishes in Telugu an article contributed by Mrs. Besant to the Commonweal, which contains:—. . . Why should the Secretary of State for India who has come over here to announce to the people that the goal of the British administration is to grant swaraj to India, be protected like a gosha lady without being seen by any one?. . . We hope that the Provincial Governors will have the goodness to afford facilities for Mr. Montagu moving closely with the people, to ascertain whose opinions he has come to India.

VRITTANTA PATRIKE, Mysore, 29th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

In a leading article referring to Mr. Montagu's visit, the Vritt nta Patrike, of the 29th November, remarks:—The addresses presented by the representatives of the various bodies and interests have given the most divers opinions and proposals. Some urge a complete change in the present system of administration; others recommend only slight changes for the present. It is to be doubted whether the changes that are the outcome of all these different representations will at all satisfy anybody. The task of arriving at these changes is a most arduous one. It is certain however that some changes will be effected. But, should we be consulted on the subject as to what those changes are to be, we should say that in the first place the municipalities and the taluk and district boards should be placed on a wider basis. For, it is here that the people can turn their knowledge of local conditions to account; and it is therefore necessary that here the official control should be reduced to a minimum. It is true that in some places the people have not the capacity to undertake even these responsibilities. Yet in many places there is room for entrusting the people with larger powers. There is of late a tendency to urge communal representation; and many reasons have also been given as to why such representation is necessary. To our mind, this principle has a great drawback, namely, that the people will remain permanently divided into so many parties. If India is to rise to eminence as a great nation, there should be no caste and party differences among the people as these differences will hamper the country's progress. Therefore some other lines should be devised for choosing popular representatives. But so long as the masses are steeped in their present ignorance it is difficult to find any exact means of meeting their wants and wishes. If the representatives can forget their own individual interests and work with a wholehearted desire to uplift the masses, there should be no need for communal representatives.

The scheme of the Madras Mail.

79. Referring to the scheme of reforms proposed by the Madras Mail, the Desamata, of the 21st November, remarks that that scheme is calculated to frustrate the grant of the reforms that the Indians are now demanding and to make it impossible for them to get responsible Government.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 21st Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu and the Congress.

80. With reference to the reply of Mr. Montagu to the invitation of the Congress that he could not attend it, the Desamata, of the 21st November, says:—The rumour is afloat that Mr. Montagu's programme has been so prepared by the Government of India that he cannot be at Calcutta at the time of the Congress sittings. Whether this rumour is true or false, Mr. Montagu can change his programme and go to Calcutta to attend the Congress. If he does so, he will be able to know how eager the Indians are about political reforms, what respect they pay to the Congress League scheme, and how much they wish its realization. Discussions in the Congress are a better means of feeling the pulse of the country in political matters than deputations and memorials. We pray that Mr. Montagu will reconsider his decision and attend the Congress.

81. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd November, says that the Andhra Ayurvedic Conference has adopted resolutions "requesting the Government to repeal or amend the Medical Registration Act, which is fraught with evil to the country, expressing its disapproval of the discouraging remarks made by His Excellency the Governor on the occasion of opening the Ayurvedic medical schools in the Cochin State, requesting the municipalities and local boards to patronise the Ayurvedic system of medicine equally with the allopatic system, exhorting the municipalities and local boards in the Andhra country to specially set apart some land for growing medicinal herbs, and praying that the authorities may repeal the Poisons Act which prevents the Ayurvedic practitioners from freely getting the ingredients they require for compounding their medicines, or so amend it as to exempt those practitioners from its operation.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Nov. 1917.

82. The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd November, contains the following in English:—Information has been received that the S.S. Crezeth Hall struck a mine on the 17th November in Indian waters and sank. One Indian passenger and eight members of the crew were lost.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 26th November, gives a Telugu version of the above.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 26th Nov. 1917.

83. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 26th November, says:—We should arrange to send some of our leaders to Mr. Montagu to bring home to him the difference of treatment accorded to Europeans and the Indians in India. It is particularly necessary to inform him of the inconveniences we suffer in our railway journeys. Though it has been decided in some law Courts that it is unlawful to set apart certain compartments for the exclusive use of any one class of people, we see even today compartments set apart for Europeans only. We have seen Indians with first or second class tickets being refused admission into the first and second class compartments by whitemen occupying them, who think themselves heaven-born and with blood-shot eyes say to the Indian passengers "you cannot sit in this compartment. You are not fit to be by our side." We have also heard and read in papers about such things. But they had refrained from threatening to shoot the helpless Indians with a pistol or push them out of the train while the train was in motion, till recently. Such a threat was held out in the case of Mr. Hanumunta Rao. Though such things were reported in the columns of newspapers, nobody has taken any action about them. To allow such acts of violence to pass unchecked is to encourage our Anglo-Indian brethren in such acts. We must ask Mr. Montagu to see that such things do not recur and that separate compartments are no more reserved for any class of people. . . We have to convince him of the injustice done to us in Government service and in the other departments. . . Only the District Magistrates, and not the Indian officers, can try the European accused. The Europeans enjoy special privileges in every way. Our leaders must prepare statistics to prove these facts and place them before Mr. Montagu.

Mr. Montagu and the Anglo-Indians.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 26th Nov. 1917.

84. In commenting on the special Ganjām Conference, the Andhrapatrika, of the 26th November, says:—The president's opening speech explained the basis of the Congress scheme. . . We do not see anything strange in demanding at present a responsible government, which responsible English statesmen and Indian leaders have been asking for the last thirty years. The President of the Ganjām Conference said that the new scheme published in Calcutta was quite opposed to the ideal of self-government entertained by the Indians so long and to progress.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

The Special Ganjām Conference.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th November, reports the Chairman to the Reception Committee of the Special Ganjām Conference to have said:—It is very regrettable that English people pretend not to have seen that the war has shattered the theories of the bureaucrats and that the atmosphere is filled with new ideas of individual and national freedom. The Anglo Indian Associations fear that Mr. Montagu may grant such reforms to India as may raise that country to eminence, and are agitating. In the interests not only of India, but also of the empire, it is necessary that the Indians should be trained for the army. Self-government within the empire should be granted to India. The individual interests of Anglo-Indians should be subordinated to problems which affect India and the empire. We have to show that the Anglo-Indians lack vision and are acting with an un-British spirit. The party of the Madras Mail should consider the straightforwardness, the generosity, and the love of freedom, that are British characteristics, and refrain from throwing obstacles in the way of the Indians getting self-government. The way in which India is now governed is really not the right way. What has now been demanded is not a sudden and dangerous change in the administration. The Morley-Minto reforms have proved useless. There is no use of patching up the bureaucratic system here and there. The Parliament are carrying on the administration through the Secretary of State for India. But the people in England cannot carry on the administration properly through the Parliament. This incapacity is betrayed by the discussions in the Parliament on Indian questions. Under such circumstances, the Government of India should be responsible to the people of India. The Decentralization Commission has declared that when the fiscal powers of provincial Legislative Councils are increased, the provincial Governments should be vested with greater independence. From this it follows that the Executive Council should be responsible to the Legislative Council. This is what the Congress League wants. As for compartmental autonomy, the tender sapling of separate popular authority cannot thrive under the overshadowing bureaucratic authority now spreading its branches all over the country. . . As the Congress-League scheme has been drawn up on deep consideration, you have to demand its being carried out.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

Schemes of political reforms.

85. The Andhraprakasika, of the 17th November, says:—Many schemes of political reforms such as the Congress League scheme the memorandum of the nineteen and the Home Rule League scheme, have cropped up. The educated men impose on the innocent and untutored minds of non-Brahmans and not only obtain their signatures to their schemes but also convert them into so many puppets in their hands.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

The Bezwada Taluk Conference.

86. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th November, reports the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the special Bezwada Taluk Conference to have said:—The people are overburdened with taxation. The expenditure has increased and it is difficult for the agriculturist to have hay left for his share of agricultural produce, when cultivation expenses are taken into account. Eighty per cent of the population of our country are agriculturists. When that is the state of agriculturists, you can infer for yourself in what a poor state India is. In every village there are many people who are starving without food. It is improper that some of our own countrymen have opposed the Congress scheme reforms. If we cannot get self-government now, we can never get it. This is not the time for us to quarrel. Will the British who are fighting for maintaining liberty, hesitate to give us responsible Government? We are only asking the British to carry out their pledges. We have to give our approval to the Congress scheme. . . We have to show that we have no differences among ourselves and that the decision of the Congress is the decision of the people.

87. The Andhrapatrika, of the 27th November, reports the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Guntūr District Conference to have said:—The argument that it is too early to give self-government to India, will be found groundless when we consider the history of self-government in Servia, Japan, the Philippines, Canada and South Africa. Some of the Native States in India appear to enjoy greater privileges than British India. In them not only have industries and education been developed, but the executive and judicial functions have been separated. India under the British rule has not been fortunate in that direction. . . Self-government is the only means of putting an end to the horrible race prejudices. May the authorities reject all unnecessary objections, give India self-government like that which is obtaining in the Colonies, and uplift the Indian nation.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

The Special Guntūr District Conference.

The paper reports the President to have said:—When the people's representatives voice forth the grievances of the people, the Government do not believe them but rely on the words of their subordinates, so much so that justice is not got at the hands of the bureaucracy. When under such a policy unjust persons become officers, they generally turn out to be bribe-takers. For the last seven or eight years, we in our district have been complaining of penal assessment, but the Government have relied on the words of the authorities so much so that the people have been put to great loss on account of the penal assessment not having been abolished. Many such examples may be given, but who will enquire into them? The Government, on being satisfied, may remedy one out of a hundred of such wrongs, but until the irresponsible bureaucratic government is replaced by a government in which the people exercise independence, the country cannot be happy. . .

88. The Andhrapatrika, of the 27th November, reports the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Special Gudivada Taluk Conference to have said:—On the very day on which the Indian soldiers encountered the enemy in the battle-field and Indian money was devoted to purposes of the war and to protection of England, the jealous hearts of some Anglo-Indians who are opposed to the independence of the Indian nation have burst, and their contentions have fallen to the ground.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

The Special Gudivada Taluk Conference.

89. The Kistnapatrika, of the 24th November, says:—So long as the people have no control over the purse there can be no real self-government. Without such control, all other privileges are useless. It is because the Legislative Councils have no such authority, that all our suggestions go to the waste paper basket. Our representatives have been asking for long for free elementary education. But did the rulers heed our prayers? They only pleaded want of funds. If duties had been imposed on some articles imported from foreign countries, our industries would not have declined and the country would not have been reduced to poverty. Had the Government spent on irrigation works half of what they spent on Railways, the country would not have been the abode of famines. Why has excise duty been imposed on goods manufactured in the Indian cotton mills? Why are high salaries given to high officers and why is the cost of administration made so unbearable? Why are not industrial schools established on a large scale? If our representatives had had control over the income and expenditure of the country, they would have carried these reforms long ago. Without spending money on education adequately, is it reasonable to say that self-government should not be granted to the people, because they are not educated? Mr. Nair's scheme, the Coimbatore scheme, the Pulivendla scheme, the Bikkavole scheme, etc., have all ignored the question of control over the finances and demand only nominal reforms. Only the Congress scheme demands this control. To ignore it is to obstruct our progress. . . It may be said that to give such control to our representatives tantamounts to giving complete self-government. True. But the Congress does not require complete control over the purse. In the matter of the army, arbitrary power has been given to the British. Without the control over the purse, what is the meaning of self-government? Will we become prosperous if more appointments are given us and will such prosperity

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 24th Nov. 1917.

Control over the purse.

last? What is the use of admitting a greater number of our elders into the Legislative Councils? They will have some tails attached to their names and be looked upon by the people as leaders, and nothing more will be gained. Will our difficulties be over even if our countrymen get a few seats in the Parliament? Only when we get real power and real responsibility, can we have training in self-government. We may make mistakes. But is there anywhere in the world a government that does not commit mistakes? Have not our English rulers who have reached the height of civilization and who are distinguished for their love of freedom committed mistakes and rectified them? Their whole history bears testimony to this. The Dardenelles and the Mesopotamian affairs will confirm this. So Mr. Gandhi said that self-government is the right to commit mistakes and rectify them.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 24th Nov. 1917.

Self-government.

90. The Kistnapatrika, of the 24th November, says:—The people cannot be quiet till they get real self-government. They will not rest satisfied with mere shadows of self-government. It behooves every Indian to lay bear the machinations of the Anglo-Indians and of those who have fallen into their snares, and to promote the future welfare of the motherland.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 24th Nov. 1917.

Self-government and social reforms.

91. The Kistnapatrika, of the 24th November, says:—We could have had many social reforms through the help of the Government, but as the administration is carried on by foreign officers, many of the social reformers themselves will not agree to the Government interfering with our social affairs. If administration were carried on mainly by the people's representatives, there could then be no room for any objection. The people in the Native States such as Mysore and Baroda do not hesitate to reform the society by the help of the Government. When the Legislative Councils come under the control of the people, and exercise real authority, the society will undoubtedly gain a fresh life.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 24th Nov. 1917.

The situation in Ireland.

92. The Kistnapatrika, of the 24th November, says:—In the course of his speech regarding the situation in Ireland, Lord Winborne said: "Though the Irish in some places have begun to drill themselves, yet it has not assumed dangerous proportions. Thinkers say that if the convention fixes proper terms, the Irish Sin Feiners will not reject them!" Lord Curzon said that 80 per cent of the advocates of freedom are against anarchical acts.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 24th Nov. 1917.

His Excellency the Governor's Executive Council.

93. The Kistnapatrika, of the 24th November, reports the Chairman of the Reception Committee of Gōdāvari District Conference to have said:—Including His Excellency the Governor, there are now four members in the Executive Council. The number is to be increased to five. The leaders in the Bikkavole Conference want that these members should have our destiny in their hands. That is, they want that the bureaucracy in the Madras Presidency should be perpetuated, and that the Government should consist of one ruler, three European officers and two Indians appointed by them. I doubt if wise non-Brahmans will agree to the establishment of such a government.

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 18th Nov. 1917.

Military appointments.

94. Referring to the conferring of commissioned appointments in the army to the Indians, the Desabhimani, of the 18th November, quotes from Sir Charles Napier's work:—"The knowledge of the Westerners (sic) is great. They are people with character. They have courage, intelligence and enterprise which are traits of character peculiar to the Westerners. To improve these, they must be placed on an equal rank with the European officers. Subadars and Jamadars of long experience must not be made to work under men, just come from Europe. They can train the Indian soldiers with as much tact as these raw men. When these raw men are appointed over Indians of thirty, forty and fifty years' of ripe experience, the latter will put up with the insult secretly and patiently."

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 11th Nov. 1917.

An emigrant to Trinidad in distress.

95. The Desabhimani, of the 11th November, reproduces with regret from the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th idem, a portion of the letter of an Indian emigrant, written from Trinidad, abstracted under this heading on page 2673 of the Weekly Report.

96. The Desabhimani, of the 11th November, writes as follows under this heading:—We welcome Mr. Montagu who is for the liberty of the people. We welcome that broad-minded personage, Mr. Montagu, who is ardently bent upon uplifting the sacred land of India by fulfilling her aspirations, though some selfish men of his own race, are trying their utmost to discourage him, and thus keep down the Indian people. . . We wish that the English people who are the champions of popular liberty will consider well the grievances of the people of India and fulfil their desires.

Welcome.

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 11th Nov. 1917.

97. Referring to the proceedings of the Vaisya Conference held at Cocanada, the Desabhimani, of the 11th November, observes:—Leaving the Brahmans aside, the Kshatriyas and the Vaisyas are in full sympathy with the Congress-league scheme. The Adi Andhra (Panchama) Conference held at Bezwada on the 4th instant has also approved of the scheme. Of the rest, only a section has not given its approval to it. We can say that more than 75 per cent are in favour of the scheme.

The Vaisya Conference.

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 11th Nov. 1917.

98. The Andhraprakasika, of the 20th November, has the following under this heading:—Recently a Home Ruler at Gudivada proclaimed by beat of tom-tom, that His Majesty the King Emperor has arrived with the Secretary of State and that therefore all the people should assemble near the tank to sign the Gandhi's petition. A petition which has been signed by innocent people upon false representation is going to be presented in their name to the Secretary.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

99. Referring to the drains in Madras, the Andhraprakasika, of the 21st November, writes as follows:—In reply to Mr. Madely's lecture delivered at the Victoria Public Hall, the day before yesterday under the presidentship of His Excellency the Governor, a Muhammadan gentleman, on His Excellency's permission, said that the drainage operations in Bell's Road have proved a source of annoyance from mosquitoes, that, as a remedy for this, the drains must be exposed to sun as before, and that, in addition to this, a good water-supply must be provided. The Commissioners have held the same opinion from the beginning. It is regrettable that it should have been a cry in the wilderness.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

100. In a lengthy leading article on the subject of "caste differences and national advancement," the Swadeshabhimani, of the 23rd November, observes:—Although castes may not form a welcome institution by themselves, it would still be possible to turn them to good account. The various castes as separate units can promote their own communal interests, without detriment to those of others, more easily than when they are all fused into one caste. From this standpoint we must say that the caste system conduces to national advancement. The various castes in a nation are something like the numerous departments which constitute the huge machinery of administration. The caste system is thus not a great evil after all. Because the Western people—only a few of them—unable to understand the advantages of the system, call it an evil, some of the people among us too are trying to abolish caste altogether. We can only say that they have not understood the truth of the principle that there is hardly anything in the world which human wisdom cannot turn to advantage and that the caste system is a good or an evil according to the use we make of it. The reason why we dwelt on this subject today is that we see in the press that in connection with the present agitation for self-government, some selfish beings, in cities as well as in villages, contend that our caste system is an obstacle to the grant of self-government. We therefore wish to tell our readers that these are specious arguments which are not in our interests.

Caste differences and national advancement.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 23rd Nov. 1917.

101. Referring to the press summary of Sir Bampfylde Fuller's recent article in the London Times on the subject of Indian reforms, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 23rd November, says:—Our readers might guess Sir Fuller's views on the question of self-government for India; for, they will be sure to remember

Sir Bampfylde Fuller on Indian reforms.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 23rd Nov. 1917.

Sir Fuller. As soon as the famous partition of Bengal was effected, Sir Fuller was made the first Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal. Sir Fuller of those days was, to describe him in one word, the chosen disciple of Lord Curzon. But his views now are different. He says that India should no longer be governed under the old system, but should be granted Home Rule, and that not in instalments but wholly, immediately and graciously. Thus, when the Hon'ble Mr. Basu has changed his views here, Sir Fuller has likewise changed his views there. Sir Fuller deserves our hearty congratulations for the time being.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 23rd Nov. 1917.

One-rupee notes.

102. A correspondent of the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 23rd November, writes:—It is understood that one-rupee and two-and-a-half rupees notes will be brought into circulation in India. Some of the Bombay and Calcutta papers are not in favour of the one-rupee notes. This is what they say: One chief object of these one-rupee notes is to draw out the silver hoarded by the ryots. It may have been thought that these notes will induce the ryot to hoard these notes in place of their present silver. This is hardly to be expected. For the ryots do not know the value of notes. Rupee coins, on the other hand, they can know to be genuine or counterfeit. They are little acquainted with currency notes. They will, therefore, look upon one-rupee notes with suspicion. Even if these one-rupee notes are compulsorily brought into currency, the silver coins in the possession of the ryots will only be concealed deeper in the ground. Another point to be considered is that the ryots are apt to lose these bits of paper. That is why they demand receipts in their receipt books and refuse to accept a receipt on a separate piece of paper. When that is the case, the ryots, who have frequently petty sundry expenses, will not consent to have rupee notes with them. Those newspapers are therefore of opinion that it is difficult to bring rupee notes into currency among the ignorant ryots.

"How then have 5—10—20—50 and 100 rupees notes, etc, come into circulation?" it might be asked. Those papers have anticipated this question and answered it as follows: These have come into circulation to some extent; because they are of higher value. But the ryot cannot see any particular advantage in the rupee notes. If, therefore, they are brought into currency under these circumstances, the ryots will distrust and feel alarmed. Further, they might wrongly think that the coins are taken from them for the war loan and they are given paper instead. The Post Office certificates have to some extent caused a decrease in the hoarding of coin. The issue of rupee notes however will tend to encourage the revival of that wicked practice. Small notes mean less convenience and no advantage. Further, treasuries and banks will have great difficulty on account of these rupee-notes; for, it is troublesome to count these notes every day and ascertain the balance in stock. Even ten lakhs of rupees in coin can be counted in an hour or two with the help of a good balance. How difficult it would be to count the same ten lakhs in rupee-notes! and what a lot of time it would take! With all this trouble, it is difficult to be sure that the counting is correct.

SATYAVADI, Mysore, 27th Nov. 1917.

The Brahmans and non-Brahmans.

103. In an article dwelling on the Brahman-non-Brahman controversy, the Satyavadi, of the 27th November, writes:—"We do not write with any party feeling. A person to our mind is a Brahman or otherwise according to the life he lives. What was the late Doctor Dadabhai? Why do orthodox Brahman leaders like Srijut Tilak call him a "Maharshi" (a great sage)? Why does an orthodox Brahman like Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar worship Mrs. Besant, a foreign woman, as "Mother Besant"? If space permitted, we could cite many more instances of this kind. Then, what shall we call those who are unable to understand this fact and say: "If India should be granted self-government, the higher administrative posts will all go to the Brahmans. They are very few in number. We form the majority. Therefore we do not want self-government." What patriotism can we credit such people with? Their argument is akin to a person insisting upon an invalid diet for all the inmates of his house, because he himself happens to be unwell. Who was the first to establish a school for the Panchamas? Who was it that moved heaven and earth to make primary education free and compulsory in order to help the progress of the backward classes? Whoever failed to welcome luminaries of the type of Sir Sankaran Nayar, Mehta, Ibrahim Rahimtulla, Wacha and Tata? How can we expect more than what we deserve? Even now, we say, let them all come forward and progress as others have progressed: Is it reasonable to say that others shall stand still until they themselves have come to their level?

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 29th Nov. 1917.

The Congress deputation.

104. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 29th November, in a leading article publishing the text of the address presented to His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State by the National Congress and the Muslim League, comments as follows:—The following is the address of the National Congress and All-India Muslim League presented on the 26th instant to the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India. It comprises in a nutshell all the needs of India. It amply repays perusal. While commending it to our readers, we beg of them to ponder over every prayer contained therein and see whether the assimilation of it is not very essential for our existence and advancement.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 24th Nov. 1917.

The Anglo-Indians and Home Rule.

105. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 24th November, says:—The Madras Mail writes that in case India is granted Home Rule, the Anglo-Indians will have to quit this country. Home Rule means Government by a representative parliament. In the western countries the parliaments have all powers, civil as well as military. The Madras Mail seems to think that in the event of Home Rule for India the Indians will have also all military control, that the Anglo-Indians will have to quit the country, that the Brahmans will predominate in these (Indian) parliaments, that by setting on the non-Brahmans against the Brahmans, they would fight against each other and ruin themselves and the Mail would somehow profit by it. It would be a great mistake to think so. The Indians have derived great good from the British. They are ever true to their salt. The Indian Home Rule parliament may contain members of all parties including the Anglo-Indians. This parliament will not contain many Brahmans. The Mail says that the Brahman vakils will preponderate. They too will be very few. There will be a good number of Anglo-Indian vakils and traders in it. The Viceroy will be the president of the parliament. All military authority will remain in the hands of the British. It will not be difficult to arrange matters in this way; and yet, these Anglo Indian journalists and a few of their Anglo-Indian friends hold wrong views on the subject and lose the good will and affection of the Indians. This should not be. It would not be difficult for the British to mix with the Indians and have brotherly feelings towards them. The Madras Mail swaggers that British troops will not be sent to India to put an end to the mutual quarrels that would arise from the grant of Home Rule. The British are a generous race. The Mail is ungenerous. We must affirm that it has no right to talk on behalf of the British people.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 23rd Nov. 1917.

The joint scheme of reforms.

106. Referring to the joint scheme of reforms drawn up by Indians and Anglo-Indians for presentation to the Secretary of State, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 23rd November, calls it a "muddle" and comments as follows:—The main feature of these reforms is that they propose certain changes useless from the national point of view and ensure that the commercial and industrial policy of the administration should not pass into the hands of the Indians. One redeeming circumstance touching this muddle is that none of the prominent members of the National Congress has joined this so-called joint scheme of reforms. It is said, however, that this joint scheme partakes of the tactics of the Hon'ble Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu who was once an ardent member of the National Congress and now graces the Council of the Secretary of State. If this be true, it is indeed most deplorable!

LOKAPRAKASAM, Trichur, 26th Nov. 1917.

Appointment of Industrial Commissioners.

107. Referring to the appointment of two Industrial Commissioners in India, as in other parts of the empire—one in Calcutta and the other in Bombay—the Lokaprakasam, of the 26th November, thinks that there should be such an one in Madras also, as the other two commissioners cannot be expected to devote much attention to Madras affairs.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 28th Nov. 1917.

Reduction of appointments in certain departments.

108. In commenting favourably on the proposal to reduce the number of appointments in certain departments, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 28th November, questions the advisability of abolishing or reducing the number of the newly-created Stationary Magistrates' Courts, thinks that expenditure can be easily curtailed by making Taluk Head Accountants, Sarishtadar-Magistrates, which will enable the difficulties, arising from the abolition of the said Courts, to be easily met and that in this connexion the number of Bench Courts and their powers should be increased, and hopes that these suggestions will receive Government's attention when the question of the reduction of appointments is taken up for consideration.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 17th Nov. 1917.

Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali.

109. The Qaumi Report, of the 17th November, has the following from its correspondent regarding the proceedings of the Gokhale Hall meeting :—On the evening of Thursday last there was a Hindu Mussalman meeting. Among the Mussalmans present there were Khan Bahadur Kuddus Badsha Sahib, the Hon'ble Mr. Y'aqūb Hasan, C. Abdul Hakim Sahib, Moulana Abdus Subhan Sahib, Khan Bahadur Safdar Husain Sahib Mehkri, Saiyid Yūsuf Sahib, Muhammad Nathar Sahib, Abdul Majid Sahib, Muhammad Sadulla Badsha Sahib, Abdul Jalil Pasha Sahib, Khatib, Abdur Rashid Sahib. Doctor Sir Subrahmanya Ayyar was voted to the chair, and his speech was read by Mr. Wadia. In this speech the matter of the release of Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali was urged, and it was moved that a case should be instituted in the court with a view to getting the Defence of India Act rescinded, and that Government should appoint a committee of lawyers to express an opinion on the case of the detenus.

Referring to the events at Arrah it remarked that some Mussalmans were of opinion that the Hindus were at fault. If that was the fact, as a Hindu I offer my sincere apologies. I am a theosophist and a lover of peace. I am as much a Muhammadan as a Hindu, because I have as much reverence for the Prophet and Al Kôrān as I have for Sri Krishna, the Vedas, etc.

The Hon'ble Mr. Y'aqūb Hasan moved the following resolution "that this meeting of the citizens of Madras expresses its sorrow and regret at the continued internment of Mr. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali, and earnestly urges the Government of India to release them." The meeting is confident that by such a procedure the bonds of loyalty between the Indian Mussalmans and the crown will be strengthened and general satisfaction will be produced throughout the country. The proposition was carried unanimously. The editor publishes without comment a translation of the speech of Mr. Y'aqūb Hasan as it appeared in New India of the 16th instant.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 19th Nov. 1917.

A glance of the previous meeting (from a correspondent).

110. The Qaumi Report, of the 19th November, has the following criticisms from a correspondent on the speeches made by Mrs. Besant and the Hon'ble Y'aqūb Hasan Sahib at the meeting held at the Gokhale Hall :—Those who have carefully observed the proceedings of the meeting must have thoroughly understood that Mrs. Besant made the meeting appear, from one aspect, a Muhammadan gathering, and from another, a Hindu meeting, and she has acted with such astuteness that she may not lose her reputation and her religious toleration.

The correspondent invites attention to the Hon'ble Y'aqūb Hasan Sahib's speech in which he stated that "no mention is made either in the Kôrān or in the Traditions of the order of Khalifas." And then he contradicted it by stating that such a mention is made in the Kôrān and the Traditions.

He asserts that the Hon'ble Y'aqūb Hasan Sahib has committed an egregious blunder wherein he has made two contradictory statements: (1) The commandments given in the Kôrān and the Traditions should be given preference to the commands of the Khalifa; (2) according to the Kôrān and the Traditions obedience to their king is compulsory on Muhammadans even if he be an infidel. It asks whether he wants Muhammadans to understand that the commandments in the Kôrān and the Traditions cannot be given preference to the commands of the king. If so why does he not speak plainly and why does he fear to speak the truth? The fact is that in Islam neither the Khalifa nor the king has the right of making religious laws.

Then he committed a third blunder in stating that when the Khalifa declares a religious war whether the Muhammadans will join the Khalifa or submit to the commandments of God and the Prophet. We are anxious to know how and whence he has drawn the difference between God, the Prophet, and Khalifa, and how he has arrived at the conclusion that their orders are conflicting.

The correspondent next invites the attention of the people to the suggestions made by Mrs. Besant regarding the release of Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali and observes:—Her valuable suggestion is that we should first of all launch a suit in any High Court for the rescinding of the "Defence of India Act", and if it proves to be of no avail, we may appeal to the Privy Council. Her suggestion is, essentially though not logically, to pacify the minds and gives every satisfaction to weak minds. But we want to know whether she adopted the same course during the period of her internment, and suggested it to her followers, and whether her friends acted accordingly.

She has very kindly suggested to us to make a reference to a High Court, failing which, to appeal to the Privy Council. But we do not know what guarantee there is that our appeal will not be rejected by the latter.

The fact is that she simply wants to please the Muhammadans, and her object is whether the Muhammadans succeed in their attempt or not everything should be done through her so that the Muhammadans may not gain the power of standing on their own legs and using their own brains.

The correspondent advises the Muhammadans by saying "you have thoroughly tested friends and foes. Now is time for you to test yourselves, for God is testing you" (Kôrān XXII, 11).

Then if you do not pass through this ordeal satisfactorily that will be a manifest loss.

111. The Qaumi Report, of the 20th November, gives the following written by a statesman:—There is no doubt that reforms are necessary in the administration of India. The Hindus and the Muhammadans have for a long time been urging the Government to grant it, and on some occasions representations have also been made that immediate and essential reforms should be made after the war. We do not deny the fact that the ultimate goal of India is self-government, and that the Muhammadans, also being inhabitants of India, will enjoy like privileges and progress of the future self-government as other communities will do—

Qaumi Report, Madras, 20th Nov. 1917.

A memorandum from the Muhammadans on Indian reforms written by a statesman.

(1) Now (Mr. Montagu) the Secretary of State for India on the 20th August announced in Parliament and the Viceroy, in the Imperial Council "that self-government will be established in India when the proper time comes." But we consider that, unless every scope and facility are afforded to us in education and preferment, we cannot become competent for self-government, and we fear that the time will be far away from us on account of our backwardness and unfitness.

(2) In order that India may gain self-government at an early date and that its progress and prosperity may go on to perfection, we desire that our status may be recognised in realms of education, service, and commerce and that we may be given, as far as possible, a separate representation in every political department.

(3) We frankly and freely declare that we deeply regret that it is not enough simply to call ourselves Indians in the practical progress of political life. It is an open secret that our national, as well as political, existence in general, will be concealed under this name, and other communities, that are numerically and educationally strong, will prevail over us.

(4) We desire that regard should be had to our real existence under the name "Indian", and we may be given the right of separate representation.

(5) Its detailed explanation is that there are two kinds of representation in the country—

(i) Such departments where more than one person is appointed.

(ii) Such departments where there can only be one representation.

We demand that in the first case a definite number may be fixed for us, so that we may have a fixed number of appointments. In the second case this course may be adopted that the Hindus and the Muhammadans may be appointed alternately, and this practice may continue on this principle.

In both cases it will be insufficient to hold, and will be against the rights of the community to appoint "Indians", for on this principle our representation cannot be secure and certain.

(6) We agree to a great extent with the proposed reforms of the National Congress and Muslim League, but they include some suggestions, which, when given effect to, cannot preserve the principle of status and separate representation of the Muhammadans. Hence we approve of the scheme published by the Qaumi Report.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu and India.

112. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 21st November, writes:—When Mr. Montagu goes to Southern India, he will find that difference exists not only in temperaments, but also in feelings throughout India and that to what extent the claim of the people, who say that Home Rule is demanded by all the people of India conjointly, is erroneous and astounding. He might have understood that difference of opinion exists between different classes of people in one and the same country, and one has to suffer for the sake of the other.

There is no doubt the country is in need of reforms, but it is not yet able to bear the burden of any extraordinary responsibility. We have seen and are seeing that the countries that have effected premature reforms are still in the state of a fowl with its throat cut. Here the editor refers to the forming of constitutional Government in Persia. Yet her present state is worse than that of a sick person. It also refers to China and Russia. As to China it says after the declaration of a republican form of Government, it has been, and still is, involved in bloodshed. As to Russia it asserts that the change of the form of Government has resulted in the country becoming a refuge for traitors.

Speaking of India it goes on to say, a few foolish friends are endeavouring to crown it with the diadem of self-government, but they have not taken into consideration the fact that the country will have to bear the burden. It adds that the present condition of India is that of a convalescent patient. But those unwise friends desire to see it regarded as one that is perfectly healthy.

The people who desire to get self-government or Home Rule for India prematurely are in fact desirous of making it a mine of disorder, a house of misfortune, and a magazine of ill-luck. They desire that the little concord, left between the different nationalities, should be buried and civil war should ensue. Quarrels between Hindus and Mussalmans always occur, but the present quarrel caused owing to sacrifices, Muharram and Dasara, have proved that the Hindus have no relationship with Mussalmans on account of compatriotism. The cases that have arisen on account of Shahabad, Arrah and Bihar occurrences are now in the court, and reliable evidence proves that the Hindus laid a regular plot of intrigue, and made the Mussalmans a target of their oppressive acts. Not only this, Hindus are now mutually quarrelling. The friction, hatred and antagonism between Brahmans and non-Brahmans are daily on the increase, and the non-Brahmans openly declare in clarion voice that during the rule of the Brahmans there would be no security of life and property. While this is the state, which insane will say that we are fit for Home Rule? Grant of Home Rule to India would convert it into a centre of civil war.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, 21st Nov. 1917.

Fakhri's appeal.

113. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 21st November, has a letter from Muhammad Sulaiman Sahib, Qaderi, Chisti of Phulwar, addressed to Fakhri Sahib in which the writer expresses his concurrence in "the appeal of Fakhri", and says that he regards the treaty concluded between the Congress and the Muslim League as a delusion. Speaking of his own state of affairs he says:—For a month we could not sleep soundly. Government troops re-established peace and order. In the Patna district the village Imam Gunj was plundered, one Saiyid Abid was murdered and Doctor Saiyed Majid was wounded and is still in hospital. One hundred and fifty villages, mosques, tombs and buildings in Arrah and Gaya were demolished. Many people were killed and many wounded. A correct estimate of this is known to God alone. But infidels appear to have suffered a greater loss in killed. At present the Mussalman sufferers are quite destitute and homeless. The relief from Calcutta and Cawnpore is insufficient. With these remarks the writer asks Fakhri Sahib to assist the sufferers.

III.—Legislation.

114. A correspondent to the Vartakamitran, of the 20th September, takes exception to this Bill and observes:—It is an impossible task to try to reduce the interest charged in a country by means of legislation. Those who advance loans to low class menials like scavengers do charge half an anna and one anna per rupee, and that is because they advance money upon practically no security and run the risk of losing the principal. Of course this interest works at between 37½ and 75 per cent and appears on the face of it to be usurious. But if the charging of such interest is prohibited by legislation, no one will advance money to these poor people and what is to be their lot? Then again a high rate of interest is charged at certain trade centres. For example, in places like Tindivanam, Salem, etc., if one purchases grains for Rs. 100 on the 'fair' day and sells them two days hence, one can make a profit of Rs. 10 and one would therefore ungrudingly pay an interest of one rupee on this for two or three days. If high rates of interest are prohibited, where can these people obtain money? In Tanjore and other districts, agriculturists prefer to borrow money for paying the kist to selling their produce, as by putting off such sale the value of the produce may rise and yield them larger profits. If they cannot get loans easily, what is to be the lot of the mirasidars? If, instead of punishing those who charge high rates of interest, the Government increase the amount of money in circulation among the people, no one would borrow at usurious rates. What about the work of the Co-operative Credit Societies, which were brought into existence for helping the poor pecuniarily? Have the Government tried to ascertain the reason why a large number of such societies have not sprung up in Southern India and, if they have, what have they done to remedy the situation? Why cannot the Government render pecuniary aid to Co-operative Credit Societies? Why cannot they utilize in this direction the money collected from the people by way of taxes, instead of depositing it in the Madras Bank for no interest? It is because the Government deposit their money in the Madras Bank that other people also follow suit. If the Government would begin to invest their money in Co-operative Credit Societies, the public also would deposit money in such societies. There are other amounts also with the Government of India. For example, the Government are deriving a good profit by coining rupees with silver of the value of ten annas. The profits derived under this head up to 31st October 1914 came to £25,837,000. This large amount is accumulated in England and advanced to merchants there at 2 to 2½ per cent per annum. All this is Indian money. Is it fair to utilise Indian money for giving loans in England at low rates of interest at a time when Indians are suffering hardships owing to their inability to obtain money even at high rates of interest? Why cannot this money be retained in India alone and lent to Indian banks? Will not the rate of interest in India go down, if all this money circulates in India? So there is no use of legislating for reducing the rate of interest. This will only mean robbing Peter and paying Paul.

The paper itself invites the attention of its readers to the introduction of the Usury bill in the Imperial Legislative Council and remarks:—Though a law like this is necessary for India, our Government should also consider about increasing the wealth of the country, so that the rate of interest will go down of its own accord. Such a law exists in Germany and other countries and is also found to be very useful there. The efforts made by the Government in those countries for the benefit of the people are really surprising. It will be compatible with reason and experience if the Government would make similar efforts in India and, increasing the amount of money in circulation among the people, introduce a law of this nature.

The liberty of the press.

115. The Vokkaligara Patrike, of the 28th November, writes :—We understand that a measure similar to the Indian Press law is about to be enacted in England. Those papers which confine themselves to just and unbiased writings have nothing to fear from this Press law. Only those who go to extremes have to feel afraid of it. We must observe that the papers of the latter class do need a weapon of this kind to keep them in check.

1. New India, of the 7th December, observes:—"From accounts published in the Calcutta papers received yesterday, it appears that the hunger strike resorted to by the detenus in the Alipore Central Gaol is not, as the Associated Press message would lead one to believe, merely 'a protest against their detention' under Bengal Regulation III of 1818, the strikers themselves asserting 'that they have no ground for complaint, regarding their treatment by prison authorities or in respect of food and clothing with which they have been provided'. A letter containing some details of this sensational incident has fallen into the hands of the Amrita Bazar Patriku and is signed by twenty strikers, eighteen of whom are State prisoners under Regulation III of 1818 and two detenus under the Defence Act (Foreigners Ordinance). . . They make serious charges against the authorities and call for an immediate and thorough enquiry by an independent commission. If the allegations are false, a Press Communiqué should at once be published denying the allegations and giving a faithful account of the treatment that is given to these unfortunate persons. If, on the other hand, all or even some of the allegations are true, this inhuman and shameful practice, which no civilised Government can resort to, should at once be put an end to and the officers responsible for the same should be relieved of their duties without the least compunction".

2. The following appears in Everyman's Review for December:—"Quite in keeping with the traditions of the University of Madras was the Convocation Address of His Excellency the Governor of French India. It was translated for him by some one else, and read by Mr. J. H. Stone in an inaudible voice to an exhausted gathering of graduates. The ceremonials which the organisers took care to make as gorgeous as possible were from the beginning to end a farcical series of meaningless rites. It was a long and weary function and the Governor of Madras must have gone home with a bad sprain of his neck, for he had to bow in response to the bows of the thousand graduates as they were presented to him—a tiresome and useless item of the Convocation programme. . . The Madras University is the very worst in the whole world, and its learning and ideals are symbolised by the Cooum on which it stands. It holds forth not a single ideal worthy of an Aryan youth. It does not even educate in any but an ignoble sense of the term. Its education is in cramming and pedantry, and its world is one of strikes and outbreaks, of absence of discipline and lack of trust. It has demoralised those whom it has passed, ruined the careers of those whom it has failed. It has none of the greatness and dignity which ought to attend the Seminaries of Learning."

The University Convocation —a farce.

3. Eneryman's Review, for December writes:—"We thought that the answer of Sir William Vincent some time ago in the Imperial Legislative Council would apply to Mr. Krishnaswami Sarma also. In this we were perfectly justified, for Mr. S. M. Peranjpye upon whom an identical order was served by the Government of Bombay was released soon after from its clutches. Mr. Sarma has been carrying on some silent work among the masses and has visited hundreds of villages in his lecturing tours and published various leaflets in the vernacular. He is the first man to whom the Defence of India Act was applied at Madras, and he is prohibited by it from speaking and writing except with the previous permission of some notified authorities. . . 'Public security' has by this time become a ridiculous piece of cant, and when the Defence of India Act is applied in such cases as Mr. Sarma's, it is conclusive that the Government cannot face the consequences of taking action in the more open light of the undoubted and permanent laws of the realm. We know Mr. Sarma, and are perfectly prepared to say that there is nothing disloyal in him and that he is a thoroughly constitutional worker. We confess we have not the ears of the Criminal Investigation Department or their methods, but we have our own ears which we trust better and our own methods on which we rely with greater confidence. And we find nothing in Mr. Sarma which should conjure up the Defence Act. The Government make a questionable use of a questionable act and escape judicial examination, and when questioned in the Council, either disallow the question or give an answer which profits nobody."

West Coast Spectator. Calicut, 27th Nov. 1917.

The Madras Legislative Council.

4. The West Coast Spectator, of the 27th November, states:—"Some non-official member would do well to move a resolution in the Local Legislative Council, recommending that the official members should be a little more courteous in their replies to interpellations. Some of the official replies, we notice, are positively ungracious if not absolutely discourteous calculated to excite ire in the member putting the question. No Secretary of State would have dared give such replies to Members' —even a Labour Member's—questions in the House of Commons. In reply to one interpellation, a puissant Member of Council condescended to say that the 'Government are not prepared to give further particulars'.

"Nothing would have been lost by casting the reply in the following manner:— 'The Government regret that they are unable to give further particulars for reasons of State.' The fact is, constantly fawned upon, worshipped and flattered, high officers of Government cultivate a habit of thought and speech which looks imperious, if not impertinent, of course unconsciously and without the least intention to annoy or insult, we admit. A certain Honourable Member told us some time ago that he felt such rebuffs keenly which made him look very small. . . Some of the official replies leave in one's mind the impression that the official making them consider the non-official member a nuisance that has to be put up with, and his questions mere waste of time".

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

5. The Vartakamitran, of the 1st November, refers to the natural facilities that exist for carrying on a good many industries in the northern portion of Australia and observes:— The Europeans have not been able to colonize it and reap the benefit of all such facilities as the climate of the place does not suit them. They would be glad if the Japanese, Chinese and Indians go there and work for wages. But the Japanese want to settle there. What we would contend is that as Australia is subject to the British Empire, the right to colonize this portion should be given only to those subject to its rule and as Indians can well settle there, it is only they that should be given this privilege. Instead of proceeding to the Fiji Islands and South Africa to do coolie work like slaves, the Indians can well settle in this portion of Australia and progress in a free atmosphere. It has been calculated that there are facilities for nearly ten crores of people to live there happily. The British Government would doubtless be strengthened by affording the facilities to the Indians, and we hope that they would bestow their attention on this matter.

6. The Nagai Nilalochani, of the 5th November, reproduces from the Swadesamitran of the 17th October, the Tamil version of a war forecast made by Mr. M. Bhatta Achari referred to in paragraph 8 of Report No. 43 of 1917.

A war forecast.

Nagai Nilalochani, Negapatam, 5th Nov. 1917.

7. The Dravida Patrika, of the 28th November, takes exception to the alleged peace overtures between Russia and Germany on the ground that, though the conclusion of peace between these two countries may be advantageous to Germany, it cannot be conducive to the establishment of world-peace, unless and until the German militarism is crushed, and observes:—Need we say that the present action of the Russians directly affects the English situation? The English had all along believed that none of the allied powers would approach the enemy for a separate peace. But ever since the days Lenin brought about a political revolution in Russia, we had indeed thought that, in order to strengthen his position, he would go in for a separate peace with the enemy. The Germans do not seem to have accepted to allow a truce, and yet it seems Lenin has issued orders to disband the army in East Galicia. He has allowed the soldiers mobilized in 1899 to return to their homes, on the ground that there was no necessity for a large army. He seems to be prepared to issue orders for also disbanding other portions of the army. It is this that is a most dangerous act; for it will almost set free the German army in the eastern front, which will, doubtless, be sent to the Italian front immediately.

The war.

Dravida Patrika, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

The Sarvavyapi, of the 14th November, publishes an article contributed by a correspondent about the present difficult situation in Italy, in the course of which the following observations occur:—There is no doubt that the great victory now won by the Austrians and Germans against Italy would infuse them with fresh vigour and confidence. We should not make light of this success of the enemy. It is really a great victory. What a pitiable hardship it is for the Italians that they had to give up within four or five days all the positions they had gained with great difficulty during the last two years and a half! The commanders who were responsible for this great victory do, although they may be our enemies, merit our praise. The Germans have begun this compaign against Italy with the grand idea that they can be done with her as easily as they managed it in the case of Russia, Servia, Montenegro and Roumania. But it may be asserted that they cannot be as fortunate in Italy as they were in those countries. We shall however patiently wait and see how the matter ends. Very probably the present Austro-German activity in Italy is more a losing than a scoring game.

DESABHIMANI, Cuddalore, 10th Nov. 1917.

The Desabhimani, of the 10th November, reproduces the above.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 1st Dec. 1917.

The war.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 1st December, says:—The Germans are advancing in Italy with large forces and with strong cannon in order to take Venice. But the enemy's forces are falling victims to the opposition of the Italians. The Germans have not yet given up their hope. They have perhaps forgotten their struggle at Verdun. . . The ministers of the Allies have assembled in London and are conferring on different things. We learn from the telegrams that they are considering matters such as the Germans marching their army to another theatre from Italy, the rumour that fresh German forces are being sent to France, the uncertainty as to what the Germans who are mustering their forces about Switzerland may do, and the wicked endeavours of the Russians to make a separate peace with the enemy.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 28th Nov. 1917

The war.

The Desamata, of the 28th November, says:—If the German army cross the mountains and enter the plains, the Italians will be put to great loss. The Italian army cannot but retreat still further. If they do not, the enemy will subjugate them soon. To avoid the evil consequences of this German expedition, the British Field Marshall in France is strongly attacking the enemy's forces and defeating them. In the western theatre the Germans were defeated with great loss. Without being frightened by this defeat, the Germans are still attacking the Italians. It is to be surmised from this that they are determined to put up with their defeats in the west in order to vanquish the Italians, and derive them to the necessity of suing for peace, and then to concentrate all their forces in the western theatre. But we see from the telegrams that the Italians are not now so helpless as they were in the beginning. The Italians have given up retreating and are wonderfully opposing the Germans with the help of the British and French forces. Cities and mountains are every day changing hands. It is now plain that the Germans find it hard to advance. If they are to be defeated, they will not flee, but on the other hand it appears they are fortifying their positions in the rear in order to continue the war as in the west. It cannot be said that the Italians are altogether free from danger from the enemy. But the successes of General Haig in the western theatre cannot but make the Germans shudder. . . From an examination of the methods of the Germans, it appears that instead of fleeing by reason of such defeats they may take up another position and it may be surmised that new trenches may have been made ready in the rear. The situation in Russia is not encouraging to the Allies. The Maximalists in Russia have removed the existing Government and are taking the authority into their hands. They are endeavouring to establish a new Government and sue for peace with the enemy. It appears that they have already ordered some of their armies to discontinue the war and negotiate with the enemy for peace. From an examination of the present state of things, it would appear that the Allies cannot hope for any help from Russia. But from the preparations that America is making for the war, it appears that there is no fear even if the Allies should lose all hope of Russia and Italy. Mr. Lloyd George is working for victory with greater perseverance now than before. . . The Allies are meeting with great successes in Asia also. . . . Though the loss to the Allies on account of the submarines is not very heavy, yet it cannot be said that they are free from their fear.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 7th Dec. 1917.

The war.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 7th December, writes:—The opinions of Mr. Lloyd George and Lord Lansdowne go to show that the European situation is in a critical condition. Lord Lansdowne was for peace arrangements. All Military and Civil authorities denounced him for taking this view. He then expressed his regret and explained that it was his own personal view. Mr. Lloyd George said there was no unity among the Allies, and that grave consequences might result unless they acted in perfect co-operation. The words of these two personages go to show that the enemy is still very powerful. We hope that it will be possible to vanquish him before long.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

Lord Lansdowne on the war.

8. The Swadesamitran, of the 1st December, describes how, in spite of some victories which the Germans were able to have in the beginning on account of special precautions adopted by them and the long military training they had given to their soldiers, they have now come to realise the necessity for peace and, referring to the difference of opinion among statesmen regarding the desirability of peace being concluded in the present stage of the war and to the letter addressed by Lord Lansdowne to the press on this subject, observes:—The observations of this nobleman are well worth being considered by all. If it is possible to conclude peace now on terms which will be favourable to the Allies, there is no necessity for continuing the war. But one point has to be noted here. America, which held aloof for thirty months, entered the arena only under the impression that an imperfect peace with the enemy would serve no useful purpose. Though, since the entry of America into the war, the internal trouble in Russia and the Italian retreat have given some breathing time for the Germans, there is no room to think either the general position of the war has changed or that the British superiority has been affected. In the western front, the victory is surely theirs. We may expect an important advance next year with the aid of the Americans. It is therefore a matter to be seriously considered whether the conclusion of peace now will help the accomplishment of our objects. The Germans have shown that no promise binds them. Can peace be concluded relying on their words again?

The same paper reproduces in Tamil the opinion of the London Times on the letter of Lord Landsdowne referred to above as published in the Hindu of the 1st December 1917.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 1st December, thinks that some weight should be attached to the opinion of Lord Lansdowne and says:—It is now three years since the war began and the effects of it have already proved to be disastrous. It has brought about a financial crisis. The Government have issued even one-rupee currency notes. If this war is to be continued still without any certainty about its ending, we cannot say what the results will be. The war in the European continent is affecting all other continents, and if it is to continue at this rate, the major portion of Europe is bound to become desolate. So when one in the position of Lord Lansdowne says that it is desirable to conclude peace, no one can refute it. And again being in England he knows the trend of war very well. So, whatever may be the opinion of the London papers about his view, the present members of the British Cabinet are expected to bestow some thoughts on his letter.

This paper also reproduces in Tamil the opinion of the English press on this letter, as appearing in the Hindu of the 30th November 1917.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

Lord Lansdowne.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 1st December, says:—Lord Lansdowne has betrayed his unwisdom regarding the war, so much so that his opinions took his own party by surprise. . . We do not know what truth there is in the opinion of the Daily Mail that the fact that Russia has refused to pay the debt it owes to England made Lord Lansdowne to write the letter he addressed to the Daily Telegraph. . . It is easy to guess the reason of this lack of enthusiasm on the part of Lord Lansdowne and others. It cannot but be admitted that the Allies excepting America and Japan are tired. It is true that the endeavour on the part of Russia to enter into a separate peace had made the situation of the Allies critical. But they have all forgotten India, in which there is man-power enough to vanquish twenty Germanies, which, if used, will bring the war to a successful termination. Short-sighted people like Lord Lansdowne have not yet given up their want of confidence in the Indians. The authorities should grant self-government to India, in order to avail themselves of India's resources. When that is granted, Indians will enter the war with great enthusiasm. But the authorities do not like to grant it. Persons like Lord Lansdowne would rather agree to discontinue the war before victory is gained than grant self-government to loyal India in order that they may gain the victory. They have not as much sympathy for the Indians as they have for the enemy. We pray that responsible statesmen will not heed their words, but will gain the victory with the help of the Indians. By so doing they will not only secure the honour of establishing the banner of independence in the world, but will also win the fame of granting liberty to India. Thus will the efficiency of the Empire be secured. The world will then attain peace. May the English statesmen do their best to gain the victory in the war, in view of such a glorious prospect.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

Lord Lansdowne's letter.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd December, refers to the letter of Lord Lansdowne recommending peace and says:—The war has taken a critical turn. The military arrangements of the Allies have become confused. This is due to Russia having fallen back. Though Russia has not stood to the last, the British Empire has not become barren. India has vowed to carry the war through to a successful issue. But in the helpless situation in which she is, it is impossible for her to render any adequate help. There should be in the country more self-confidence and the country should afford funds for the manufacture of war materials. The country should be industrially prosperous. An enthusiasm to win the war should enter the national heart. Only when India is completely equipped, can all this be possible. The grant of self-government to India is the only means to attain these results. India will help the Allies to win the victory in the war only when it is given the ability to do so. So the question of self-government cannot be separated from that of the war. When we view this matter with far-sightedness, we cannot help stating that the few Indians and Anglo-Indians obstructing the swaraj movement are enemies to the Empire. It is necessary that responsible Indian leaders and English statesmen should not heed their words, but should help to raise India to eminence and carry out the object of the war. Victory in the war is the victory of the cause of freedom. Which country will fight with greater enthusiasm to establish the banner of freedom than India with freedom newly granted to her.

The Russian situation.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

Indian coolies in Natal.

10. The Swadesamitran, of the 3rd December, regrets to learn that an attempt is being made by European artisans in Natal to prevent Indian artisans being employed by the contractors there, on the ground that the latter accept lower remuneration and, remarking that, if the European artisans are zealous of the Indians working for lower wages, they can very well take in Indians in their associations and enable them to derive the benefits enjoyed by them, observes that it is the duty of the authorities in Natal to prevent the Indians there being injured in any way, as an indication of the fraternal relations that now exist among all the subjects of the Empire, on account of the war.

TUMKUR VARTAMAN, Tumkur (Mysore Province), 3rd Dec. 1917.

Lord Northcliffe and the war.

11. Referring to Lord Northcliffe's criticism regarding the shortcomings of the Military administration, the Tumkur Vartaman, of the 3rd, December, writes:—If there should be anything to affect the Military discipline, it will doubtless lead to a repetition of the state of things in Russia. Every patriot of the Empire should be grateful to Lord Northcliffe for pointing out the shortcomings. As soon as he criticised in this manner Lord Cowdrey resigned the Chairmanship of the Aviation Board. It behoves the authorities to enquire whether the shortcomings indicated by Lord Northcliffe do really exist, and if they do, to take vigorous steps to remove them. In matters like this, no incapable persons should be employed. If in this war time responsible dutiesshould be entrusted to persons unfit to execute them, it might bring the empire itself to grief. Not only does the past history of empires such as that of Rome illustrate this point clearly, but we have a recent instance in the state of things in Russia and elsewhere in Europe whose calamities are mainly due to the employment of incapable men in responsible positions. Lord Northcliffe's criticism is very timely and we ought to be deeply grateful to him.

II.—Home Administration.

(d) Education.

12. In the course of a long article on this subject, the Vidya Bhanu, for October 1917, makes the following observations :— Students will be able to discharge their duties as citizens in after-life satisfactorily only if they imbibe a spirit of patriotism even in the school. In inculcating this spirit of patriotism, all that is desirable and necessary in these modern systems should be adopted without, at the same time, ignoring the ancient customs. But the training that our students are now having is not suitable to this country, and if they continue like this, they will only be too ready to serve under others either in this country or elsewhere, thereby perpetuating others' description of us as slaves. If the India of the future should stand on her own legs without depending much on others, it is very necessary that our students should imbibe a sense of patriotism and a love of national customs. Though having been accustomed for a long time to subjection our students were in former days nervous in this matter, the new spirit that is abroad has helped them to shake off this nervousness gradually and so this is the most suitable opportunity to open the eyes of our students. Even our Government are affording the necessary facilities for the coming changes, and if we do not train our students now in suitable ways, we will have to search for qualified men when the time comes for undertaking the responsibilities implied in the reforms for which our patriots are working. History proves that every country has progressed only through the efforts of its own people and not by those of others. Nevertheless even foreigners are now showing us the way to advance and therefore we should take this to be the best opportunity. Instruction on national lines should be imparted in schools to students along with their class lessons about the natural position of this country, the condition of the Native States, the ancient history of this land and its customs, etc. They should also be told now and again of the difference between the old and new order of things, the reason why there is such a difference and how it can be removed. The Universities in England are sending their students to enlist in the army and making them serve their country in the war now going on. Is it not because these students had been made to have an idea of the greatness of their country and their ancestors that they are zealously fighting in this war with feelings of patriotism and loyalty? but, on the other hand, our Indian students have been trained only to discard their national dress, customs and habits and try to eke their livelihood by any means forgetting completely the interests of their country. If the idea of sending our students to render adequate help to the Empire in this great war has not struck any one, it is because they have not been trained in such a way as to evince an interest in the matter. Moreover, if our Empire is to continue prosperous, the well-being of India has to be considered; for it is a matter known to all that, without India, the Empire cannot have any greatness. So it can be boldly asserted that, unless India acquires freedom, the Empire cannot enjoy the same.

Patriotism and education.

Vidya Bhanu, Konapet, October 1917.

13. The Thozhil, for October 1917, quotes statistics to show that there is only one primary school for every three villages in the rural parts of this Presidency, and, remarking that this indicates the paucity of educational facilities in this country, observes that, if a country should progress like other countries which have advanced in civilisation, wealth and commerce, all people in it, both men and women, should have compulsory education.

Education.

Thozhil, Madras, October 1917.

14. The Swadesabandhu, for November 1917, refers to the statement of Mr. Munshi Ram, the Principal of the Gurukula Academy, Hardwar, at a lecture delivered by him recently that His Excellency Lord Chelmsford once informed him that it was his desire and intention to make education free and compulsory, to introduce the vernacular as the medium of instruction in secondary schools and to make the study of vernaculars an important factor of higher education during his Viceroyalty, and observes that, if these facts are true and they are also given effect to, the action of His Excellency would be hailed with satisfaction by all the Indians.

Free education and vernaculars.

Swadesabandhu, Madras, November 1917.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

The present system of education.

15. Adverting to the interpellation of the Hon'ble Mr. Suryanarayana Rao at the last meeting of the Local Legislative Council whether the Government had granted any technical scholarships, and if so, to whom and for what purpose, and the reply of the Government that no scholarships were granted as proper candidates with the required educational qualifications were not available, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th November, observes:—This reply of the Government cannot but cause pain and surprise to many. If the Government themselves admit that candidates with the required qualifications were not available, who is responsible for it—the Government, the system of instruction followed by them or the students of this Presidency? Who can daresay that the students of this Presidency are behind those of other countries either in the matter of intelligence or perseverance? That they are as capable and intelligent as the students in western countries was admitted by Mr. Statham of the Kumbakōnam College at a recent lecture. So, the blame cannot be laid at the doors of the students. Who is not aware of the constant warning of the bureaucracy to the popular representatives not to make any proposals to reduce the efficiency of the present system of education, when, as a matter of fact, this very system is condemned as being ill-suited to the needs of the people and over-rigorous? So it cannot be denied that the blame for the non-availability of suitable candidates rests on the present system of education and the Government who will not try to improve it. Apart from the low percentage of passes in the University examinations here as compared with that in western countries, the education imparted under the existing system avails those that have it only to secure a clerk's post under the Government or elsewhere. Does it help the majority to take to an industrial or commercial avocation? It is because the people have not the necessary knowledge and experience to manufacture the articles required by them that they are not in a position to judge the value of raw products available here, but rely for everything upon foreigners. Thus the majority of the youths in the country have no means of livelihood, which turns their brain and leads to unrest and discontent in the land, giving trouble to the administrators. Though the people have been for a long time demanding an improvement of the present system of education, it has come to be no more than a cry in the wilderness. Leaving alone the system of education, there are not even sufficient facilities for having education It is only the obstacles and inconveniences that abound. In these circumstances, how can the country progress? Would the Indians like to continue in their poverty, when the people in all other countries are, by dint of their trade and industries, rolling in wealth? Much against their will, these have to blink for want of means and support. In the course of a letter to the Madras Mail Doctor Sapru, the Principal of the Madura College, says that the Government of India have all along been negligent in the matter of industrial education, and that the whole system of education in the country requires thorough overhauling in the light of modern conditions and what obtains in other countries. Unless the system is so overhauled, we will say that the people can never be expected to lead contented and happy lives.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 30th Nov. 1917.

The defects in the system of education.

16. The Swadesamitran, of the 30th November, refers to the five defects alleged by Doctor Fisher, to exist in the system of education in England and observes:—In England the defects in the educational system are only five; but in India they are innumerable. We shall mention a few important ones—(1) primary education is not free and compulsory here; (2) the great majority of the people are illiterate; (3) innumerable children have no facilities for having education; (4) when the authorities in England are voluntarily making efforts to spread primary education further, the authorities here do not move in the matter, though the popular leaders have been demanding it for a long time; (5) in conclusion, the authorities here do not evince much interest in the educational needs of the country and spend much money thereon.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 22nd Nov. 1917.

Development of education in India.

17. The Vartakamitran, of the 22nd November, refers to the active efforts made in England for reforming the system of education even during this period of war and the plea of the Government in India that this period of war is not the time for improving the education of the people and there is not sufficient money for it, and observes:—Whatever proposal may be made either in the Imperial or Provincial Legislative Council for the improvement of the country, it is put off for being considered after the end of the war. When there is time for introducing several reforms in education even in England, which is directly affected by the war. is it a just plea to say that there is no time for it in India, which is thousands of miles away from the war zone? Even those who obstruct the introduction of compulsory education cannot deny that education is now at a low ebb among the Indians and that the present methods of instruction should be reformed. By educational advancement we mean such education as will be useful in industrial pursuits. In India by education the people mean only learning to read and write the English language. Can the education imparted in our schools be deemed to be education in the strict sense of the word? The people are blaming the Government for not taking sufficient interest in the matter, while the Government, on the other hand, are accusing the people of not being over-eager to acquire education. If both the Government and the people are going to be blaming each other for ever, where, then, is the possibility of the situation being remedied? As long as the people of this country have not sufficient education, any number of privileges or reforms granted to them can hardly result in any good. So it is the duty of the Government to bestow their foremost attention on the improvement of the education of the country. The plea of want of time or want of funds cannot hold water. In the Phillipine Islands, a barbarous and uneducated set of people have been reformed within ten years and have also been given Home Rule by the Americans. Japan has attained the progress only within the last fifty years and even the progress of Germany, which was mainly an agricultural country, dates only from 1850. In all other countries such as Germany, America, Japan and England, primary importance is attached, when considering the budget for the next year, to the advancement of the general, technical and scientific education of the country. But here in India, attention is first paid to the amount of money to be sent to England and the amount of salary to be paid to the English officials. For every reform, we have to rely upon others. It is foreigners that decide how much food we require. It is England and English educationists that have to be consulted with regard to any change in the educational system or any increase in the expenditure. As for increase in taxes, the Government can do it themselves. The Defence of India Act, the Press Act and such measures, the Government can pass on their own responsibility. Thus the Government take the responsibility for creating all impediments, but the responsibility of removing such impediments is thrust upon England. The principle that compulsory education should be introduced in the country is accepted both by the Government and the people. But neither would take active steps to give effect to it. Even in Native States such as Baroda and Kolhapur free and compulsory education has been introduced. But it has not been done in British India on the score of want of funds. If it is suggested that a special tax may be levied for this purpose, we are told that the people are already feeling the burden of taxation to be heavy and it should not be increased further. Is there no way out of this difficulty? Why not a portion of our contribution towards the expenses of the India Office be held back for a time? Why cannot the new buildings put up for the English officials and the unnecessary repairs executed thereto be stopped? Why cannot the enormous sum spent for giving a bonus to English officials to compensate them against the loss they are said to sustain on account of their not having grade promotions as in times of peace, be utilized to the cause of education? Questions like these provoke the Englishmen greatly. So we hope the Government, who are responsible for the welfare and progress of the people, will consider the above facts and bring about the introduction of free and compulsory education in this country. It also behoves every one having the advancement of the country at heart to din the Government often in this matter and get this done.

18. A correspondent to the Dravidan, of the 28th November, in dwelling upon the present deplorable condition of the Tamil language, makes the following observations:—Day by day the dignity and excellence of this language are gradually declining. It was formerly patronized by the Tamil Kings and similar patronage by the Government at present may also improve its condition soon. Elementary education and improvement of the Tamil language are quite different things. Elementary education, without grammar, cannot enable one to learn the classic Tamil works, and the study of elementary grammar alone cannot lead to an improvement of the Tamil language. Students do not think of Tamil even in their dreams, as a study of it is not made compulsory in schools and colleges. Will all those who occupy high positions in the Educational Department condescend to come forward to prevent the once glorious Tamil language from disappearing altogether and help its attaining an eminent position? How great will be the benefit that will be derived if, in Madras, Tamil colleges should also spring up like Sanskrit colleges! Cannot even Mr. Montagu, who is soon to visit Madras, render some help in this direction?

The condition of the Tamil language.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917; ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 26th Nov. 1917.

The Government Girls' School, Triplicane.

19. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 28th November, and the Andhraprakasika, of the 26th November, learns that the buildings for the Government Girls' school, Triplicane, will be erected near the Ice House and prays that the hostels connected with the school may be erected within the compound of the proposed buildings, and that until then, the police may be stationed on the road from the present hostels to the school buildings to guard the girls from the molestation of mischief makers. He also urges that pensioned sepoys should be appointed to guard the hostels during nights.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

The vernacular.

20. The Andhrapatrika, of the 29th November, says:—It has become the practice with the English people to say that the English language having spread so far in India, it is not proper to go back, and that it is not now possible to impart education through the vernaculars. The percentage of the English-educated persons is not yet more than one. How are the remaining ninety-nine to advance? It is clear that the endeavours to impart education through English has failed and that it is necessary to tread a new path. We cannot forget the benefits which the country has derived from English education. But the reasons for which English education has been introduced into India at the beginning are not commendable. The Parliamentary Committtee that enquired into the affairs of the East India Company asked the witnesses how foreign manufactures could be introduced into Hindu homes. Most of the witnesses said that that would be possible if western civilization were introduced into the country and the people made to adopt western customs. Foreign articles have spread all over the country. The daily wants of the English-educated people have increased, and they are obliged to follow western methods in dress, etc., whether they are pleaders or Government officials Besides, their ways of thinking also approach the western ideals. The result is that the educated classes look neither as Indians nor as Europeans. On account of English education, the educated classes have taken a retrograde step in worldly matters. Trade has declined. Industries have disappeared to a large extent. Agriculture does not flourish. The education of the English-educated classes does not act as an incentive to their revival. As time goes on, the English-educated classes are estranging themselves more and more from the masses. They are therefore unable to guide the people in general. If education is imparted through the medium of the vernaculars, the differences between the educated and the rest will disappear. The student wastes all his time in receiving education through English which is a foreign language. Though the talented Ramanujam has not been very conversant with the English language, he spent all his time in Mathematics and earned distinction. It is only through the vernaculars that the east and the west can be bound close together in harmony.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 30th Nov. 1917.

The Bombay Students' Conference.

21. The Andhrapatrika, of the 30th November, reports the President of the Bombay Students' Conference to have said:—Under the present system of education, foreigners exercise arbitrary authority in determining the educational methods for the Indians. If a foreigner is one of the teachers, he is looked upon as superior to an Indian teacher of equal attainments. He is treated with special honour. He prevents the youth from cherishing patriotism which is required to direct their youthful enthusiasm into the right channels. Indian history has been given up. The old Indian leaders are not taken into account. The protection of India is in the hands of foreigners. The desire to uplift her is deemed seditious. . . The only remedy for all this is self-government and national education.

(e) Local and Municipal.

22. The Desabhimani, of the 10th November, writes as follows in English :— "We heartily welcome Mr. V. Srinivasa Achariyar to the presidential chair of the Taluk Board and wish him a brilliant record of successful administration. Knowing as we do the richness of the qualities of the head and the heart he possesses, we have no doubt that the public will have reasons to feel grateful to the members who were responsible for his choice by finding in him an officer who combines tact with energy, efficiency with popularity and discipline with broad-minded sympathy, . . We cannot, however, pass over this topic without noticing the unusual delay that has occurred in giving effect to the election of Mr. V. Srinivasa Achariyar. From the 10th October, the date of the election, to the 6th November the date of its publication, is a far cry and one wonders how such a long period happened to intervene. We learn that the responsibility for the delay chiefly rests with the District Board President, who did not promptly send up the result of the election to the Government. One is unable to understand the reason especially in the face of the fact that no objection was preferred within the period allotted, viz., seven days from the date of election. The curiosity is augmented when it is remembered that, during this interval, a vacancy in the District Board has been filled up by election held on the 23rd October and that the same gazette, viz., of the 6th instant, announced the result of this latter election also. It is worthy of note that Mr. Muttukumaraswami Chettiyar's election to the latter office was objected to by his rival candidate Mr. R. Srinivasa Desika Achariyar and two other members of the Taluk Board by means of a formal petition presented on the 30th October, which however was rejected by the President, District Board, as out of time. These facts are too eloquent to require any comments at our hands and we leave the public to decide whether such a state of things really conduces to healthy administration."

23. Referring to the news that the municipal authorities in Lahore have opened bazaars to sell salt, wheat and fuel to the people, as the prices of these articles have risen very high, the Swadesamitran, of the 29th November, says :—In western countries, it is usual for municipalities to trade for profit. But this is not in vogue here. Still, we hope the results of the action taken by the Lahore Municipality will be watched and suitable arrangements made in the other Provinces also.

The rise of prices and local bodies.

(h) Railways.

24. In the course of an article on this subject contributed by one Mr. N. R. Kedari Rao to the Janopakari, of the September and October, the writer comments as follows upon the recommendations of the Public Services Commission on the position of Indians in Railways :—In reply to an interpellation by the Hon'ble Sir D. E. Wacha in the Imperial Legislative Council, it was stated by the Government that as the companies now managing the Great Indian Peninsular and the East Indian Railways had expressed their willingness to appoint Indians to the higher posts under them, the management of these railways might be continued in their hands. But we should not stop with this assurance. The company might have made this statement to get their leases renewed. It is our duty to compel them to make a law that all Railway Companies should confer all the higher appointments under them on Indians. Our view is that at least one of the high posts in the Management Branch, viz., the Agent, the Deputy Agent and the Assistant Agent, should be given to the Indians. It was stated by the Government in 1879 that Indians could be appointed to all high posts. Though 33 years have passed by, there is not one Indian occupying any of the higher posts in the Traffic Department carrying a salary of Rs. 1,000 to Rs. 2,000.

Indians and the Railway services.

JANOPAKARI, Vellore, Sep. & Oct. 1917.

Unless we urge upon the Government to give effect to their promise, they will not care even for the recommendations of the Public Services Commission that not less than 50 per cent. of the employees on Railways should be Indians. At present, officers for the Waggon Department are recruited from England direct on the ground that persons with the requisite experience and training are not available here. This is not fair. When Europeans and Anglo-Indians are trained in the several railway workshops in India, why should the Indians alone be denied that training? The commission has recommended that this should be done. As this may take some time, the Government would do well to adopt the suggestion of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim that some intelligent young men among the Indians may be given scholarships and sent to England to have the necessary training and on their return, appointed to high posts in this department. The Commission has also recommended that a committee consisting of five members, of whom not less than two should be Indians, should be appointed by the Government of India to choose competent candidates for all appointments. Though this may lead to some good results, we think the best system will be to select candidates by means of a competitive examination among qualified men without any distinction whatever. The Commission is for retaining the existing scale of pay for the higher appointments. We are, however, of opinion that this scale is excessive as the salaries paid to the higher officials in India are far greater than those paid to similar officials in any other country. This is unfair for poor India. Is this just and is there none to question this? Again the pay of the lowest railway official is over Rs. 47 in the western countries, while it is only Rs. 7 in this land. It is only God that should relieve the poor of this country.

If the recommendations of the Hon'ble Sir M. B. Chaubal and the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim in this matter are given effect to, it would curtail the total expenditure of the railway administration and lead to efficient work also.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

A Christian meeting at Trichinopoly.

25. The Dravidan, of the 28th November, also publishes from the pen of a correspondent the proceedings of a meeting of the Christians of Trichinopoly held on the 25th November 1917, at which a resolution is said to have been passed that there was no need for Home Rule for India.

SATYA DUTAN, Madras, November 1917.

The Government exodus.

26. The Satya Dutan, for November 1917, refers to the strong objections raised in England to the exodus of the Governments in India to the hills during the summer and to the opinion alleged to have been expressed by Lord Carmichael against the inexpediency of this exodus, and observes that it is the opinion of many that the absence of the Government from the capital of a province for a period of seven months in the year tells prejudicially upon the administration.

NAGAI NILALOCHANI, Negapatam, 14th May 1917.

Home Rule.

27. Adverting to the agitation for Home Rule carried on in the country, the Nagai Nilalochani, of the 14th May, writes:—It is a known fact that Civil Servants and some other European officials, comprising the bureaucracy in India, are obstructing the acquisition of Home Rule for fear that it would lead to their losing the power and influence they have been enjoying till now. Though the Congress has been urging for over thirty years that, with a view to the ultimate acquisition of Home Rule, the work of the local bodies managing the internal affairs of the country should be carried on by the Indians and that they should have an effective voice in the administration of the country by their members preponderating in the Legislative Council and the public service, its prayer has not been granted. It is an admitted fact that this country, whose ancient civilisation began to wane a little in the interim, has begun to progress in civilisation, education and public spirit. So, even foreigners will admit the capacity of Indians to govern their country and there is, therefore, nothing strange in the British Government admitting the same. We can, therefore, eagerly expect the grant of Home Rule to this country. It is now nearly two hundred years since the British Government was established in India and within this time many countries have acquired Home Rule. No one can daresay that these countries were fit for Home Rule at the time when they acquired it. Some among the British and a few Indians say in self-interest that Indians are not yet fit for Home Rule. Are the Russians who have acquired a democratic Government within last two months fit for it? When the Russians who were steeped in ignorance and revelling in drink are fit to administer their country, should there be any question about the capacity of the Indians in this matter? Though the benign Government may not venture to grant Home Rule immediately to India, we hope that they will first confer the necessary privileges upon the local bodies and establish village panchayats and then grant Home Rule after examining how these work.

Satya Dutan, Madras, November 1917.

Home Rule.

The Satya Dutan, for November 1917, observes that Home Rule means not the complete severance of the British connection with India but that the entrusting of greater powers to Indian Members in the Councils of India, as at present it is found not only difficult but even impossible to get any useful measure passed in these Councils on account of the official members being in the majority therein.

United Church Herald, Nagercoil, November 1917.

Home Rule.

In welcoming the announcement made by the Secretary of State that the ideal before the British Government is to lead India forward until she occupies her rightful position in the Empire as a self-govering entity, the United Church Herald, for November 1917, observes as follows in its English columns:—. . . "We are sure that all Indian Christians will welcome this announcement and will be ready to play their part in this development. It has to be recognised that such a development means not only the granting of greater responsibility to Indians in connection with the government of this country, but also the education of the people and the fitting of them to occupy that position. . . We would urge our readers to do all in their power to lessen the racial bitterness which is unfortunately growing in so many places here in India. We would also urge the Christian community never to forget that the task of social amelioration must go hand in hand with that of political progress."

The same paper reproduces these sentiments in its Tamil columns and in appealing to the Indian Christians to accept Home Rule as the goal of India subject to their having their own representatives in the Councils of the Empire, says:—It is quite natural that the Indians should aspire for Home Rule and it is quite reasonable too. It is but natural that the Indians who have moved with the westerns and have imbibed their culture and civilisation should have the same love of freedom that characterises the westerns. That is also our goal, but we should make ourselves fit for such a rule.

Dravidabhimani, Salem, 16th Nov. 1917.

Home Rule.

The Dravidabhimani, of the 16th November, reports that, at the All-India Missionary Conference recently held at Coonoor, resolutions were passed that India was completely unfit for Home Rule at present, and that the authorities should be given greater powers to maintain order in the country.

Mahavikata Dutan, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

Home Rule.

The Mahavikata Dutan, of the 1st December, reproduces an article on this subject contributed by Mr. R. S. Narayanaswami Ayyar, B.A., B.L., to the Swadesamitran, of the 24th November, and abstracted in paragraph 34 of Report No. 48 of 1917.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

What is meant by public interest?.

28. Referring to the action of the Governor of Madras in disallowing a resolution of which notice was given by the Hon'ble Mr. T. Ranga Achariyar regarding the attacks of the Madras Mail against Mr. Montagu on the ground that it was against public interest and of another resolution of the same gentleman about the conduct of Mr. Wells, the Divisional officer of Chicacole, on the ground that the responsibility for the accuracy of the information regarding Mr. Wells would not be taken by the Honourable Member, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th November, writes:—How can Mr. Ranga Achariyar be expected to take the responsibility for a statement which appeared in the Hindu? The Government should either have enquired into what actually happened and replied that Mr. Wells did not act as was reported, or stated that they would consider about his conduct. Without doing either, why should they ask Mr. Ranga Achariyar to take the responsibility for the truth of the statement about

Mr. Wells? Is there any rule that Members of the Legislative Councils should interpellate only about matters which they have actually seen with their eyes? It appears the Hon'ble Mr. Ranga Achariyar was asked by the Government whether he took up the responsibility even for the statement which formed the basis of his interpellation about the District Board Engineership of Bellary and when he said that he did, the Government came out with the reply that the facts stated by the member were true. The procedure adopted by the members of the Government is most unsatisfactory and renders the right of the members to ask questions and move resolutions in the Council practically ineffective. When the Hon'ble Mr. V. K. Ramanuja Achariyar asked why an official should be nominated as the Chairman of the Nidamangalam Union, the Hon'ble Mr. Rajagopala Achariyar replied that the question would be answered if put by the people of Nidamangalam. But when the former pointed out that he represented the people of Nidamangalam, the latter stated that previous notice of the question should have been given. Will Mr. Montagu notice these facts? If this be the attitude of the Executive officials, what privileges can the people have? These facts add weight to the plea that the Executive Officials should be subject to the Legislative Council.

NAGAI NILALOCHANI, Negapatam, 19th Nov. 1917.

Post-war conditions.

29. The Nagai Nilalochani has the following short paragraph in its issue of the 19th November:—Most probably there may be a world-conference to consider about many things to be done after the end of the war. But before it meets, the Central Powers should openly declare how they would behave after the war. They should give up the system of terrorising small States and conducting a rule of might and accept the spirit of liberty, which is spreading throughout the world day by day. Our main motive for the war is to secure permanent peace. Some mischievous persons are creating a fear in the mind of the people that loans given in aid of the war would not be paid back. None should believe this. Will the Government do harm to the people, who help them in times of great trouble? There is not a safer investment in this country than the Indian War Loan.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

Probationary Deputy Tahsildars.

30. Adverting to the order of the Government of Madras announcing that six persons will be appointed as Probationary Deputy Tahsildars every year, the Hindu Nesan, of the 28th November, observes:—The Local Government do not seem to be tired of making experiments. Though the view of the Government that "those who have risen from the subordinate ranks in the Revenue Department can well be appointed to the higher posts in that department, even if they are not graduates, is now undergoing a change, the Government continue to be disinclined to select competent candidates for responsible posts by means of a competitive examination. We do not think much good can come out of adopting a system of selecting persons for posts like Deputy Tahsildarships from among graduates highly connected with a personality which impresses the committee of selection. In 1911 it was expected that it would be advantageous to introduce a system of selecting Probationary Revenue Inspectors on Rs. 35 per mensem. Seeing that the system, which has been working for the last six years, has not proved very beneficial, the Government are now trying an experiment of appointing Probationary Deputy Tahsildars on a higher pay. The Government Order says that twelve candidates will be selected by a committee and that six of these would be chosen by Government and appointed as Deputy Tahsildars. How can the committee making the selection in the first instance or the Government making the subsequent appointment have a definite idea of the merit and capacity of the applicants? If the Government would hold a competitive examination among the twelve applicants selected by the committee, on the basis of educational qualifications, physical strength, high connections, and caste distinctions, and appoint the first six among the successful ones, it would be an excellent system. According to the system now proposed by the Government it would be possible for men of ordinary capabilities to get nominated by dint of fortune and influence. We do not know why the Government persist in preferring the method of nomination by selection to that as a result of a competitive examination. Leaving this alone, we are at a loss to understand the necessity for all the three members of the committee of selection being civilian officials. Why should not a non-official Indian be on this committee?

Referring to the same subject, the Swadesamitran, of the 29th November, observes that it has been usual to consider educational qualifications to be the only criterion for perferment to appointments, and hopes that even in this case educational qualifications and capacity and not caste distinctions will be the standard of selection.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

New appointments of deputy tahsildars.

Referring to the new appointments of deputy tahsildars, the Manorama, of the 30th November, points out that these deputy tahsildars, instead of being nominated, should be selected after a competitive examination, and takes exception to the constitution of the committee in which no Indian is included.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 30th Nov. 1917.

Political reforms and caste distinctions.

31. A correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 28th November, regrets that, when the opportunity has arrived for the agitation long carried on in the country for political reforms by the Congress and its workers to bear fruit, several proposals should be made here, either through ignorance or want of forethought, or through narrow self-interest, by different institutions about the reforms to be introduced, and quoting the authority of men like Romesh Chander Dutt about the evil results that may follow from allowing class or caste representation in the administration of the country and referring to the fact that when the Government called for the popular opinion on this very point in 1908, many leading non-Brahmans, including Diwan Bahadur P. Rajaratna Mudaliyar, the Raja of Kollengode and the Raja of Kurupam, were against caste representation in the Councils of the State, remarks that which imply an electorate formed on the basis of caste distinctions will be no reforms at all.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

The reform proposals.

32. The Swadesamitran, of the 29th November, writes:—The new associations and parties which have been springing up for the last few months in the political atmosphere of India may cause surprise and dismay to those who judge the situation with a pure heart intent only upon the advancement of the country. Each association or party has come out with its own proposal of reforms. Some say that reforms tending to Home Rule are not at all necessary and that it is sedition to ask for such. It is very few that have made suggestions having only the progress of the country at heart, and the Congress-League proposals, framed after careful consideration by experienced men of capacity and status, come under this class. We have already dwelt upon the main features of the Indo-European proposals and upon how they have not satisfied either party. So, sifting all the proposals now before the Secretary of State, what remain are the Congress-League scheme and the several criticisms of it. In this Presidency, the Madras Mail leads these criticisms. The discussion in the Legislative Council has brought out its all powerful influence and the Government by their reply, that they do not intend to take any action in connection with this paper, have not only granted in effect a good conduct certificate for its past writings but also encouraged it to continue the same policy unabated. Writing on the subject of Home Rule the day before yesterday, this paper observes that it will be a great mistake on the part of educated people or the British to fix Home Rule as the true ideal of the Indians, for who knows how their rare qualities will develop in the future. The editor of the Madras Mail is really very anxious about the future of India and his views seem to be growing more and more liberal day by day! Our readers can come only to one conclusion from the statement of this paper that no thought should be spent over the future political condition of the country until all the Indians become educated and are able to take an interest in public affairs, which may be several centuries hence. As time advances, these lose their balance and the truth is out. The more they agitate, the more patent becomes the necessity for the reforms demanded by us. So we are bound to be thankful to these, who are unwillingly working out only our propaganda.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

The Muslim interned.

33. The Hindu Nesan, of the 29th November, reproduces in Tamil an extract from the New Era about the waning health of the Muslim interned and the desirability of their being released on this score at least, which is published in the Hindu of the 28th idem.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

The Indian Industries Commission.

34. Adverting to the enquiry of this Commission in Bombay, the Hindu Nesan, of the 29th November, refers approvingly to the suggestion made by Mr. Desapande, one of the Directors of the Deccan Match Manufacturing Company of Satara, that, if the industry of match and pencil manufacturing should thrive in India, the Government should raise trees fit for preparing matches and the wood for pencils, allow the capitalists working these industries to utilise these trees for their purposes, and observes:—If the Government would order the staff of the Forest department to raise that special type of pine tree which is useful for matches and pencils and supply them to the pencil and match manufacturers, it will not only bring in a good amount of revenue to the Government, but will also help the development of these industries materially. If the Government would begin to raise these trees even now, they will in course of time enable India to manufacture the matches and pencils required by her, without relying for them upon foreigners.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

The enquiry of the Indian Industries Commission.

Referring to the evidence of Mr. Kharimbhoy Adamjee Peerbhoy before the Commission at Bombay that the authorities are ignoring Indian capitalists and helping European capitalists, the Swadesamitran, of the 3rd December, writes:—The authorities may, perhaps, now repent for having invited this witness to give evidence before the Commission. Of course, we are aware of the policy of the officials; but it is indeed a matter for regret that Sir Thomas Holland, who is the President of a Commission instituted for the purpose of making impartial suggestions to improve the condition of the Indians industrially, should have, within one year of his stay in this country, imbibed the official spirit. The promotion of industries cannot benefit India, unless these are carried on by the Indians. So when the same industry can be worked both by Indians and Europeans, the Government should support the former. When a witness says that this has not been done and accuses the officials of having been partial to a European company, it is the duty of the Commission to ascertain facts completely and prevent the recurrence of the same. Considering the attitude of Sir Thomas Holland, as indicated by his questions to this witness, we have to be seriously afraid about the extent to which India will be benefited by the enquiry of this Commission.

Dravidan, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

Stray notes.

35. The Dravidan, of the 29th November, writes:—We thought our Brahman brethren wanted that the system of self-government obtaining in the colonies should be granted to India step by step. But now we are surprised to learn that they want the system to be transplanted here immediately.

We received a communication from the Government on the 27th instant that they had called for applications for the post of Deputy Tahsildars newly created by them before the 16th idem. Though this notification was already published in the Fort St. George Gazette, we do not think many people could have read it. So such notifications should be published only in the newspapers.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

The hardships of the salt manufacturers.

36. A correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 29th November, gives facts and figures to show that the salt manufacturers are not now making as much profit from their avocation as in days of old when the Government purchased salt direct from these manufacturers at fixed rates and that the present system, introduced in 1886, under which the manufacturers are asked to sell their salt outside after paying certain amount towards its price and another sum towards the expenses of keeping it stored in the factories, leaves them hardly the sum required for their maintenance and implores the Government to bestow some attention on this matter and remove the hardships suffered by these poor people, who have no other means of livelihood than this.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 30th Nov. 1917.

The Madras Agricultural Department.

37. The Swadesamitran, of the 30th November, comments, as follows, upon the report of this department for last year:—The head of this department is usually a member of the Indian Civil Service. Though the civilians may be very capable as administrators, they cannot be taken to be experts in every matter. The head of this department should always be one who has a knowledge and experience of agriculture either here or in other countries. We do not mean any reflection upon Mr. Stuart, the present Director of Agriculture, or his predecessor in office.

Besides the Agricultural College at Coimbatore, there should be started agricultural schools in every district and those who have taken agriculture as an avocation should be admitted as students therein, whether they may have had English education or not. It is only then that a scientific knowledge of agriculture will spread among the masses. The work of the Agricultural department for the last so many years has not resulted in any great improvement in the methods of agriculture. The agriculturists have not yet learnt well even the advantages of sowing a good seed. No doubt those around places where Government farms are located may have this knowledge. But no good results can be expected unless all the agriculturists have it. The question is, what attempts have been made to acquaint the people with the results of the experiments in Government farms. It is true that small pamphlets in English, Tamil and Telugu are distributed among the people. But our opinion is that they are not written in a style which can be easily understood by the masses. What is again the guarantee that these pamphlets reach the hands of each agriculturist? Even if it reaches him, will he give up his old methods the moment he reads it? So the best way is to improve the knowledge of the agriculturists by means of education. For this purpose, there should be one official for each group of villages and there should also be funds for spreading education among the masses and for training several persons in the science of agriculture. Any amount of expenditure on these items will be well worth spending. This department cannot be said to have done any satisfactory work till now. Still there is no room for discouragement. If the suggestion of the Government of India, that this department should be handed over to Indians, be adopted, it may prove to be more beneficial.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 30th Nov. 1917.

38. A correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 30th November, says that the Non-Brahman Conference held in Tinnevelly under this title cannot be said to be a true non-Brahman Conference, as 75 delegates who were elected at a meeting here to explain the Congress-League scheme in the conference were refused admission to it, as 21 of them who offered to purchase tickets could not get them and as even those who wanted to speak on communal representation could not get tickets.

The Tinnevelly-Madura-Ramnad Conference.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 30th Nov. 1917.

The Dravidan, of the 30th November, reproduces in Tamil the presidential address delivered by the Zamindar of Telaprole at this conference as it appears in the Justice of the same date and writing a leader on it, in which it approvingly quotes extracts therefrom, observes :—It is a wrong impression on the part of many that the Englishmen are robbing the wealth of India and that the English merchants are reaping all the profits themselves, without giving us any share of it. This has been clearly proved by the Zamindar in his speech. It will not be fair for the English Government to leave the majority of the people in this country, against their will, in the hands of the avaricious Brahmans. The administration of India belongs, as of right, to the Englishmen. Though they may, in their magnaminity, be willing to grant Home Rule to India, they should realise that they are in the position of trustees for the welfare of the Indians. So they will not be justified in handing over the majority of the people into the hands of a few.

The Tinnevelly, Ramnad and Madura districts non-Brahman Conference.

VARTAGAMITRAN, Tanjore, 1st Nov. 1917.

39. The Vartagamitran, of the 1st November, takes exception to the lack of interest evinced by the Indian merchant community in matters of public interest and referring to the fact that the European merchants have special representatives in the Legislative Council, while Indian merchants have none, appeals to the latter in the following strain, to shake off their usual lethargy and take an interest in the affairs of their community :—How are European merchants entitled to greater privileges in this country than yourselves? They claim special privileges on the score of having invested enormous sums of money in India. Are you not also affected by the conveniences or inconveniences of the Government? Why, then should, you not ask for the privileges enjoyed by others in political matters? You are suffering in several ways on account of your not having sufficient political privileges. So do not sleep over your position. Lord Curzon once remarked that India was governed not only by the bureaucrats but also by the European merchants. This is indeed true. The European merchants have their own representatives to guard their interests. So it is essential that you should also have your representatives in the administration of the country. The present is the opportune moment for you to move in this matter. So unite and take steps to guard your interests even now, or else you will prove traitors to your posterity.

An appeal to the Indians.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

Lala Lajpat Rai.

40. Adverting to the telegram received that the object of the search said to have been made recently in the premises of the Home Rule League office in London was to seize the copies of "Young India" written by Lala Lajpat Rai, the Swadesamitran, of the 28th November, observes:—As this book has not to this day come into India on account of an order of prohibition against its having been brought here, we are not in a position to say what portions of it are objectionable. Still we learn that it has a preface written by Commander Wedgwood, a member of the House of Commons, sympathising with the aspirations of the Indians, whose loyalty and patriotism have been suspected by none till now. In his letter to Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar some months back, he has advised Indians not to think of assassination even in their dreams. So we have to conclude that, if this work contained passages inciting to murder, he would not have written a preface to it. And again it is stated that there is room for suspecting that Lala Lajpat Rai is receiving money from the Germans. All Indians will be surprised to hear this.

Lokopakari and Prapanchamitran, Madras, 3rd and 4th December 1917.

Lala Lajpat Rai.

Referring to the search that was recently made in the premises of the Home Rule League office in London, for finding a copy of the "Young India" published by Lala Lajpat Kai, which has been prohibited from being brought into India, the Lokopakari and the Prapanchamitran, of the 3rd and the 4th December, respectively say that neither Lala Lajpat Rai nor Commander Wedgwood, who seems to have written the preface for the book, could have introduced or allowed any seditious matter in it and add:—It is stated that Lala Lajpat Rai is suspected by the authorities of having received bribes from the Germans. Some selfish persons have of late been bent upon proving that the Indians are seditionists. It is surprising indeed that they are unaware of the fact that the Indians deem the king to be an incarnation of God. It is an undeniable fact that they want to acquire self-government under the British rule.

Lokaprakasam, Trichur, 3rd Dec. 1917.

Lala Lajpat Rai.

The Lokaprakasam, of the 3rd December, writes:—If anybody were to say that Lala Lajpat Rai committed or tried to commit a treasonable act hoping to obtain German money, who would believe it? He is one who sacrificed all his wealth for the good of his native land, and of the poor people. Independent, courageous, loyal and truthful, and foremost among the Indian leaders, he once said in his deposition in a court of law that none but a lunatic would be disloyal to the British King. Will anybody accuse such a great man of the abovementioned crime?

Special conferences.

41. The Swadesamitran, of the 28th November, reproduces in Tamil, as reported by a correspondent, the proceedings of the Special Tinnevelly District Conference held on the 24th idem at Kallidaikurichi to support the Congress-League scheme of reforms. These proceedings appear in English in the Hindu of the 28th idem.

The same paper also publishes in Tamil, from the pen of a correspondent, the resolutions passed at the Madura-Ramnad Districts Special Conference, which appear in the Hindu of the 28th November 1917.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

A Home Rule meeting at Dēsur.

42. The Swadesamitran, of the 28th November, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held at Dēsur in the North Arcot district on the 22nd idem, when Mr. Ardhanarisa Varma, the Secretary of the Salem Vannikulakshatriya District Association, is said to have lectured on Home Rule and Mr. R. Subrahmanya Nayakar, the editor of the Vannikulamitran of Madras, is stated to have addressed the audience on the deplorable condition of the trade and industries in India, on account of her raw products like cotton and iron being purchased by the westerns for a cheap price and sold back to India as manufactured articles at heavy rates, and exhorted them to make more strenuous efforts hereafter to revive their industries and relieve the poverty of India. Mr. Ekambara Nayakar is reported to have delivered a long address advocating the release of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali.

The rich and the poor.

43. In the course of an article on "wealth" contributed to the Swadesamitran, of the 28th November by a correspondent, the following observations occur:—The reason why a socialist party has not sprung up in India is that there are not the same differences in the constitution of the Hindu society as those which exist in Europe. SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

The cleavage and animosity found in Europe between the capitalists and the labourers and between the rich and the poor do not exist in this country. The rich in our country do not slight the poor as their compeers in Europe do. The custom of giving alms to the poor is not found in Europe to the same extent that it is found here. Even here, after the advent of the English civilization, some foolish people deem it to be a sign of intelligence to chase the beggars. The sufferings of the poor have only increased and not decreased from the establishment of European factories.

The work of Christian Missions in India.

44. The Dravida Patrika, of the 28th November, contrasts the zeal evinced by the Christian Missionaries in propagating their religion in this country with the apathy of the richer classes and the heads of mutts here in the matter of spreading the Hindu religion and observes:—Our Government would not evince any anxiety about the propagation of our religion. But they are affording all facilities for the propagation in this country of Christianity, which is their religion. It is their duty to afford the same facilities for the propagation of the Hindu religion. They are spending enormous sums of money for the propagation of Christianity. They should render the same pecuniary aid to the propagation of Hinduism. It is only then that they will be doing their duty. DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

The Madras Legislative Council.

45. The Hindu Nesan, of the 29th November, reproduces the comments of the Prapanchmitran of the 27th idem on the proceedings of the last meeting of the local Legislative Council, as abstracted on page 2761 of report No. 48 of 1917. HINDU NESAN, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

The Madras Legislative Council.

The Swadeshabhimani, of the 30th November, writes:—Since the May session of the Council we had the next session only in November. At the former, His Excellency Lord Pentland gave expression to certain extreme views and urged that we should put our thoughts of Home Rule out of our minds. The Madras Government took a step forward accordingly. It could not then be foreseen how all that would end. We are glad, however, that, before the next session came off, things have ended well. Not only did we not put our thoughts of Home Rule out of our minds, but the authorities themselves have now to come to a decision on the question. Mr. Montagu had to travel a distance of some 5,000 miles for the express purpose. Although the political situation has thus undergone a great change during the last six months, the ways of the Legislative Council are just the same as ever. In the first place, it has become evident that it is extremely difficult to get the consent of the official members to any resolution which is in the interests of the public. The resolution to lower the scale of fees in the High Schools and Colleges in this presidency, which was pointed out as being higher than in the other provinces, was opposed by a Missionary member and the Hon'ble Mr. Stone. There were no satisfactory grounds for their opposition. All that they said was that the lowering of the fees would affect the finances of the institutions and that, since secondary institutions in all countries were self-supporting, it was not desirable to lower the rate of fees. Finally, His Excellency Lord Pentland, as President of SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 30th Nov. 1917.

the Council, added a curious reason. What His Excellency remarked was that since the number of students in secondary schools was increasing day by day, and the people were asking for an increase in the number of schools, it was difficult to see how it could be urged that the existing rate of fees could be complained of as heavy. Nobody will fail to be surprised at this argument which is analogous to that of a trader who might raise the price of rice in famine time and answer that since his customers were increasing and his profits alse were higher, the raising of the price was desirable and welcomed by the people. The resolution failed to secure the votes of the majority. The resolutions regarding "Students and Politics" were withdrawn in view of the satisfaction afforded to the members by His Excellency in this connection at a private interview. We regret to learn that the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Bhat in regard to the system of rent recovery was also lost. The Hon'ble Sir Alexander Cardew said that there was no complaint from the tenants against the repeal of the Act and that unless there was a large demand for legislation on the part of the people, the Government would not interfere. The Government appears to champion the interests of the tenants. We must observe that in truth however the provisions of the Rent Recovery Act ought to be revived in order to guard the interests of the tenants themselves. Owing to the absence of an effective and speedy means of recovering rent, the tenants are not prompt in paying the landlord's dues, and thereby bring themselves into trouble. This is indicated by the steady increase in the number of civil suits; and yet the Government believe that the existing procedure is in the interests of the tenants! As regards the interpellation relating to the destruction of wild beasts in South Kanara, it was stated that the efforts of the Forest department to render aid were made ineffective owing to the indifference of the villagers concerned. It is hardly necessary to remark how carelessly this answer has been given. How keen the Government are in matters in which they are themselves interested! Where they are not concerned, however, they lay the blame at the door of the people!! Might we not ask whether they don't get other things done by the people? It is natural to give an excuse when they have no direct interest in the matter. Further, the reply of the Government goes to show that they do not even now think it necessary to issue fresh instructions in the matter. In the matter also of transferring police officers to South Kanara who do not know the vernacular of the district, the Government are not aware of the practice, nor are they prepared to prevent such transfers! Our district is, indeed, most unfortunate in this respect.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 30th Nov. 1917.

The Moslems and reforms.

46. A correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 30th November, refers to a representation said to have been sent to the Secretary of State by the Hon'ble Mr. Ahmed Thambi Marakkayar about the reforms to be introduced after the war and observes:—I cannot but express my surprise at the Honourable Member, who took no interest for the last two years in any public meeting at which politics were discussed, having suddenly ventured to come out at this critical juncture. The representation sent by this gentleman, which is said to be different from the scheme adopted by the All-India Moslem League and the Madras Presidency Moslem League, has not the approval of his community. We wish to know what necessity there was for this gentleman to make a secret representation unauthorised by his community.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 8th Nov. 1917.

The duties of municipalities.

47. The Vartakamitran, of the 8th November, writes:—It is the municipality in a town that can help or mar the development of an industry; for it will be hard for an industry to thrive unless a municipality affords all facilities for its improvement, such as giving accommodation for nominal prices or rents, refraining from levying taxes on industries just begun, providing easy water-supply, etc. But the municipalities of our country may deem the above to be novel things. These are, without knowing that they do so, obstructing the starting of industries. So those who wish to start new industries prefer to do so outside the limits of the municipality to starting within it. If, on the other hand, the municipalities provide the necessary facilities for the starting of industries, they will not only be benefiting the people but will also be helping the industrial advancement.

Production from land in India.

48. In the course of an article under this heading, the Vartakamitran, of the 8th November, observes:—Sir Henry Cotton was of opinion that irrigation works were essential for improving agriculture in India, and he suggested the digging of a canal from the Ganges up to the region of the Gōdāvari and the Kistna. If this suggestion had been adopted, there would have been no famine in India. Instead of this, railways were laid for the purpose of preventing famines and these have not proved to be very useful in this direction. If, with the money spent for these railways, canals had been dug up in the country. it would have been benefited tenfold. Besides the fact that traffic through canals will be cheaper, the amount spent for their digging would have remained mostly in India. When the railways were laid, the major portion of the expenditure went into the hands of foreigners and the profits derived therefrom are also going only to the foreigners. The next point to be considered about agriculture is that the land assessment is being increased often. This is the reason why the agriculturists are disinclined to improve their lands. They are afraid that the assessment may be increased the moment the land is improved. How can agriculture improve in this country under these conditions? Moreover, the agriculturists are not given good education. The efforts made by the Government in this direction are not sufficient and suitable. The landholders themselves are against the agriculturists having education, on the ground that they would lose their services if they get educated. Every one should understand that unless the capitalists and labourers join together in India, agriculture and industry in the country cannot be improved.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 8th Nov. 1917.

Bioscope.

49. The Vartakamitran, of the 8th November, regrets that the Bioscope is not being used in India as a means of improving knowledge, as it is used in other countries, and observes:—The methods of education adopted in India are those that have been tried and given up as useless in western countries. There is nothing in common between the educational methods that obtained in the west at the time when the educationists in India came here and those that exist there now. As only antique methods, unsuitable to the present times, are being followed in this country, the industrial knowledge of the westerns is nearly 50 years in advance of ours. This fact is known to many of our popular leaders, but though they know that the knowledge of the community is diseased, they have not the power to apply any remedy to cure it. Those that have this power do not realise the existence of the disease.

If the Bioscope is to be usefully applied in this country for the purpose of improving knowledge, the films used therein should be manufactured here alone, so that they can depict our habits, histories and industrial conditions. We would invite the attention of our readers to the fact that an Indian has already begun to move in this matter. He is Mr. D. G. Phalke, who has been manufacturing films for Bioscope under the name of "The Hindustan Cinema Films." He has been depicting only Indian scenes. If the richer classes in this country would help this gentleman to improve this industry and start factories in different places for manufacturing these films, the Indians can surely hope to wipe out the charge of ignorance that is levelled against them by the foreigners and to lead happy lives like them.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 8th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu and the Congress.

50. The Hindu Nesan, of the 30th November, expresses its regret at Mr. Montagu having declined the invitation to be present at the Congress this year and thereby lost a valuable opportunity of understanding the nature of those that have been opposing the Congress League scheme of reforms, and, remarking that the action of Mr. Montagu is an insult to the leaders who invited him to be present at their National Assembly, dilates upon the necessity of his complying with their request. It adds that, as the arrangement of the tour programme of Mr. Montagu lay in the hands of the Viceroy, the Indian leaders should have, perhaps, addressed the latter on the subject, and observes that it is not too late for them even now to make a representation to the Viceroy to so adjust the programme of the Secretary of State as to enable him to be present in the Congress for at least a few minutes.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 30th Nov. 1917.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 30th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Montagu and the Indian National Congress.

In expressing regret at the rejection by Mr. Montagu of the Congress invitation, a correspondent in the Manorama, of the 30th November, takes exception to Mr. Montagu's being treated as a parrot in a cage; thinks that if he really wishes to do good to India, he should shake himself off the present shackles, accept people's invitations, see and hear their leaders, and attend the Congress; calls upon the people not to let slip this opportunity by remaining quiet, as advised by our Viceroy; asks what has become of the pledge to release those that were interned under the Defence of India Act, whether the answers given regarding the two Muhammadan brothers were not sufficiently grave, and what the objects underlying the answers to the questions in the Madras Legislative Council, regarding Krishnaswami Sarma of Chingleput, could be; and hopes that Mr. Montagu will make himself familiar with these facts.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

A forest grievance in the North Arcot district.

51. A correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 1st December, reports that orders have been recently issued closing the forest of Paravamalai in the Vellore taluk for purposes of pasture and, dwelling upon the facilities which the agriculturists in the neighbourhood of this forest enjoyed in not only allowing their cattle to graze in it but also utilising the leaves therefrom for purposes of manure, implores the Government to cancel this order immediately, as it is bound to affect the prospects of cultivation in this region. He adds that, for aught the people in the neighbourhood know, there have been no big teak trees in the forest for the last 30 years, as is alleged by the Forest officials, who are frequently changing and who visit the forest only occasionally, perhaps once a year according to their convenience.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 8th Nov. 1917.

Indian trade after the war.

52. The Vartakamitran, of the 8th November, welcomes the export duty levied on jute, which was strenuously opposed by the European merchants with selfish motives and says:—As a result of the levy of this duty, many jute mills may be started in India, for Indian mill-owners can obtain jute, which forms one of the important mercantile products of India, at a cheaper rate than foreigners and thus compete with the latter in the jute trade. Moreover, this duty will enable the Indians to pay the foreigners, who levy an import duty on articles made of jute so as to combat the competition of the Indian mills in their own coin. It is the duty of the Government to levy export and import duties, as the case may be, for other articles also, so as to help the development of Indian industries.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 15th Nov. 1917.

Tata's Industrial Bank.

53. The Vartakamitran, of the 15th November, heartily approves of the proposal of Mr. Tata to open an Industrial Bank in India with the sole object of helping the industrial advancement of the country and observes:—This bank will remove a great want that has been felt in India. If similar banks are started in every Province, they will prove very beneficial. It is to be seen how far the Government will help these banks.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

The Moslem deputation and Mr. Montagu.

54. The Swadesamitran, of the 1st December, is of opinion that the decision of the All-India Moslem deputation not to present their address to Mr. Montagu, on account of their having been told that their deputation could not be received by him, unless the reference in their address to the internment of Messrs. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali was deleted therefrom, will be received with regret by the whole Indian community and adds:—Evidently, the authorities have not properly realised the feeling of the Indians generally and the Moslem community especially about the internment of the Muhammadan patriots. When every one was anxiously expecting that these would be released, at least in consideration of their failing health and the fact of Mr. Muhammad Ali having been elected as the President of the Moslem League this year, there comes the disappointing news that the Moslem deputation could not even wait upon Mr. Montagu. Though he is here to have a personal knowledge of the reforms, is he not the ultimate responsible authority in matters connected with Indian administration? If, as was suggested by Mr. Prakasam at the Chittoor conference,

Mr. Montagu would have a personal talk with Mr. Muhammad Alli, he can easily understand the real attitude of this patriot. We have to note with regret that the Government of India do not evidently seem to have gauged well the probable effects of their action in this matter.

55. The Vartakamitran, of the 22nd November, says:—It is on account of the immense help rendered by the Government in France, Germany and other countries that the merchants there trading in beet-root sugar are able to export the same for a very low price. If our Government will render at least a portion of this assistance to those manufacturing sugar from sugarcane here, no other sugar can hope to compete with Indian sugar. Modern methods of manufacturing sugar should be demonstrated to the people and they should be made to adopt them. An import duty should first be levied on sugar, so that there may be no competition from outside. Pecuniary assistance should also be given to those cultivating sugar and especially that type of it which yields the largest quantity of sugar.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 22nd Nov. 1917.

The sugar industry in India.

56. The Dravidan, of the 28th November, refers to the innumerable schemes of reforms embodied in the various proposals submitted to him and the difficulty that may be naturally experienced by him in sifting all these proposals and arriving at a definite conclusion about the reforms needed for this country, and observes:—Judging of the address of the All-India Home Rule League, many statements in it are open to question. First of all the Home Rulers say that they are more than 52,000 in number. But who are comprised in this figure? How many of them are Brahmans and how many Theosophists? Have they any knowledge of the condition and views of the Indian people and do they know what harm would result if, as they pray, Home Rule is granted to India? And again what right have they to represent the Indian people generally? The statement in their address that the democratic system of government is purely an Aryan system is a wrong one; for the very idea of democracy was unknown to India in ancient times. True, panchayats existed in olden days. But these concerned themselves with matters connected with caste and not administrative affairs. The Home Rulers say that the existence of different creeds in India will not have any effect upon the introduction of reforms in this country and make much of the union between the Hindu and the Muhammadan community. Though the educated among these two communities cooperate in the matter of demanding political reforms for the country, strifes do occur even now among the ordinary people belonging to both the communities. The address says that the argument that the ordinary people are devoid of culture is not a just one. But our contention is that this country will be fit for Home Rule only when the ordinary people acquire culture and are in a position to understand administrative matters. If Home Rule is granted before this, it will be only the rule of the educated classes as has often been observed by us. We hope Mr. Montagu will understand the real aspirations of the people from these various representations and introduce, in consultation with the British public, reforms that will be useful to all the people.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

A non-Brahman meeting at Uraiyur.

61. A correspondent to the Dravidan, of the 27th November, reports the proceedings of a public meeting held at Uraiyur, in the Trichinopoly district, on the 24th idem under the auspices of the local Dravida Sangam, when one of the speakers is said to have remarked that the Indians would become fit for Home Rule only when they had done away with the caste system and, improving their education, acquired a capacity in administrative matters.

Another speaker at the same meeting is stated to have observed that, though the mania for Home Rule had cropped up in Ireland many years back, she has not yet acquired that rule, that Mrs. Besant, an Irish lady, had set on foot a similar agitation here and created disunion among a united people, that it was foolish on the part of the Indians to listen to the words of a woman and clamour for Home Rule, that those Dravidians, who now demand Home Rule, would not think of it even in their dreams if they should only serve in an office almost filled with Brahmans and that the signatures obtained for the monster petition to be presented to Mr. Montagu from ordinary people on false pleas could have no value whatever.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

A meeting of Catholic Christians at Coimbatore.

62. The Dravidan, of the 27th November, publishes, as reported by a correspondent, the proceedings of a meeting of Catholic Christians held at Coimbatore on the 18th idem, when resolutions are said to have been passed that India was not fit for Home Rule either at present or immediately after the war on account of the unequal progress of the different communities here, that the Catholic Christians should be granted communal representation in the reforms to be introduced hereafter and that the scheme of reforms prepared by the Secretary of the South Indian Catholic Association in the name of the Indian Catholics should be discarded, as they were dangerous and contrary to law.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

The address of the All-India Home Rule League.

63. Adverting to the address presented by the All-India Home Rule League to Mr. Montagu, the Dravidan, of the 27th November, argues from the statement in the address, that the Home Rulers number 52,000, that all the others are against the grant of Home Rule and, referring to the question as to why, when England was able to govern herself admirably at a time when there was no union among her people, India should not be granted Home Rule now, says:—Whatever differences may be found elsewhere, the caste distinction existing here cannot be found in any place and the like of the injustice committed by the Brahmans here cannot be seen anywhere. It is only those that have an experience of the conditions here that can know this. Others cannot understand it easily.

VAIDYAKALANIDHI, Madras, August 1917.

Uplift of Ayurveda.

64. The Vaidyakalanidhi for August 1917 characterises the speech made by His Excellency the Governor of Madras on the occasion of the opening ceremony of a free Ayurvedic dispensary at Cheruttirutti in Malabar, as one which, though apparently quite logical, would really affect the progress of the Ayurvedic system of treatment prejudicially, and observes:—All of us are aware that several resolutions moved and interpellations asked in the local Legislative Council with a view to promote the Ayurvedic system have been of no avail. The reason for this is only want of sympathy on the part of the authorities in this matter. This is also due to the absence of representatives who can resolutely fight for their cause till they achieve their object even in the face of strong opposition. Though the Ayurvedic system receives slight support in Travancore and Cochin, it has not received any support from the Government like the western medical treatment, and it is clear from His Excellency the Governor's speech that such a support cannot even be expected. It is openly said that the Government are not in a position to help even efforts to improve the present condition of the Ayurvedic system. His Excellency stated that the Surgeon-General was the proper authority to examine and systematise the Ayurvedic medicines and that in consultation with him and with the aid of doctors, who are also good chemists, recommended by him, the Ayurvedic Vaidyasala to be started at Cheruttirutti might be utilised as a research institute. We do not think that this by itself will facilitate the promotion of the Ayurvedic system. Of course, it is necessary to afford facilities for research in an Ayurvedic Vaidyasala; but it is not necessary therefor that the Surgeon-General should suggest a scheme for it and that doctors recommended by him should be appointed as chemical experts. Non-official gentlemen will not be found wanting among the Indians, who are capable scientists like the Surgeon-General. Therefore we would urge that the best thing to do will be to select, on the recommendation of such Indian gentlemen or the members of the Keraliya Ayurveda Samajam, the founders of the Vaidyasala, competent scientists who will suit our requirements and conveniences and carry on the work without expecting any support from the Government. Further, we have to conclude from various reasons that the present Surgeon-General, Mr. Campbell-Bamerman, has no sympathy whatever for the Ayurvedic system, and again when the Government have openly declared that they can render no pecuniary aid to the institution, we need not seek for recommendation of officials like the Surgeon-General.

JANOPAKARI, Nellore, September October 1917.

The industrial development of India.

65. The Janopakari for September and October 1917 writes:—Now that Japan, which has come up only recently, is flooding the Indian market with her goods, it is quite natural that the Indian artisans should like to improve their condition also and it is then necessary that proper means should be devised for improving the ancient industries of the country. The development of these industries is now impeded by many obstacles, one of which is foreign competition. The indigo cultivation suffered much on account of the import of foreign chemical dyes. But it is now improving on account of the stoppage of the foreign dyes in consequence of the war. But it is believed that this industry will suffer again after the close of the war by the import of foreign chemical dyes. Industries newly started in India are not in a position to compete with foreign articles. This is because the foreigners have the advantage of greater capacity, adequate funds and the experience of trade. But there are many impediments in the way of improving the industries in this country. First of all it is found difficult to get the capital required to start an industry. Though a large number of workmen are available, they have not much of industrial experience. The statistics about the export and import trade show that raw products are exported from here in large quantities and received back as manufactured articles as there are not the required facilities in India to convert them into manufactured articles. So industries should be promoted here only with the help of the Government. The co-operation of the Government is necessary to create confidence in the minds of the richer classes in India for investing their money in industrial concerns. As the articles turned out by the Indian industrial concerns cannot have in the beginning the same finish as the foreign ones, the people naturally go in for the latter. So the Government themselves should, in the beginning, purchase the Indian articles and enable the Indian capitalists to make a profit and this should be done until the Indian manufactured articles are in a position to compete with foreign ones. The Government, in countries like India, which have made no progress industrially should establish model factories for every industry and teach it to the people and also give them clear information about the probable cost of articles, the price at which they can be sold and the profit likely to be realised thereby. It is only when the Government take the initiative that the people will have confidence in these concerns and take to them. Such a system has borne good fruit in Japan and the adoption of a similar procedure in India would doubtless lead to much benefit. There is no doubt that, if Indian coolies are given good industrial training, they would turn out to be good mechanics. For the promotion of industries in India a sufficient number of industrial schools should also be established in each province and there should be representatives in foreign lands to watch the interest of Indian trade.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

"Kaliyuga Dharmam."

66. The Hindu Nesan, of the 28th November, has a contribution from a correspondent under this heading, in which the writer dwells upon the various ways in which society has degenerated in this age and observes:—The price of metals like gold and silver has now gone up too high to be purchased easily, and the Government have also prohibited the melting of gold. We have read in history that Muhammad Bin Toghlak issued paper money and, in the same manner, the Government have themselves announced that 1 rupee currency notes will be issued from the 1st December 1917, as all the silver available here is required in the theatres of war. Further, if copper coins are not available, coins made of iron, feather or hair may be introduced as is the case in some countries. It is a matter known to the merchants that the customs duties are gradually increasing and thereby they are put to much expense. It is in this way that all the wealth of India has been taken away to other countries, and she has been reduced to this poor condition. In his Convocation Address delivered to the new graduates of the Madras University, His Excellency the Governor of French India observed that it is on account of the internal strife among the ancient kings in India that other nations such as the French, the English, the Portuguese and the Dutch were able to get into this country. All those were no doubt stupid enough to impoverish the whole of India. A repetition of this may be avoided and the country made to prosper if, at least now, the Congress League scheme of reforms is adopted and India ruled as she was in olden days.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

Adi Dravida Conference.

67. The Dravidan, of the 3rd December, reproduces in Tamil the proceedings of a conference held at Madras on the 2nd idem under the auspices of the Adi Dravida Jana Sabha (Kolar branch) which are published in the Justice of the same date, and comments on them in the following strain:—The fact that the resolution moved at this meeting protesting against Home Rule was passed with unanimous acclamation, indicates that the large number of persons who had assembled there in thousands were not in favour of the immediate grant of Home Rule. The existing caste system impedes our progress and the development of a fraternal feeling among us. There is no doubt whatever that one cannot speak of an Indian nation until the people completely root out this unjust system of caste distinctions. Again, one of the resolutions passed at this meeting protested against some who, saying that they have come forward to uplift the depressed classes, have begun to make others believe that these classes are not against Home Rule. If such an attempt had been made, it is a gross mistake, for it is an open fact that the Adi Dravidas, who have all along been kept under subjection and crushed by the Brahmans would never like the grant of Home Rule as demanded by these Brahmans. So it is a very desirable thing that a separate resolution was moved on this subject.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

Trichinopoly District Conference

68. A correspondent, writing from Trichinopoly to the Dravidan, of the 28th November, reports that at the Trichinopoly District Conference which was held at the place on the 23rd idem, resolutions were passed supporting the Congress League scheme of reforms and condemning the attitude of the Madras Mail towards the Indian aspirations.

Mr. K. C. Roy's scheme of reform.

70. The Hindu Nesan, of the 3rd December, quotes from the scheme of reform published in the East and West by Mr. K. C. Roy, and adds:—We understand this gentleman is in Delhi and his proposals may be applauded by the officials. But the Indian public will never approve of them, in spite of the clever wording of the scheme in such a manner as to make it appear that the non-official majority is maintained in the administration.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

Student citizenship.

71. In the course of a leaderette under this heading, the Hindu Nesan, of the 1st December, gives the substance of the address delivered by Mr. G. S. Arundale at the Students' Convention, Bombay, which appears in extenso in New India of the 30th November, and observes:—Students reading in schools and taking degrees with the object of widening their knowledge and becoming good citizens cannot always remain as students. They will have to be a citizen at least one day of their lives. So the main features of citizenship should be present in a student and this is possible only if he acquires them from his youth. It is only if a student has good training and moves in a good association from his youth that he can one day make a name as a good citizen.

72. A correspondent to the Hindu Nesan, of the 1st December, attributes the many thefts that have been committed in Mylapore within the last one week to the numerous sluggards who abound in the city, having no settled avocation, and, observing that these turn out only to be hardened criminals after they are once booked and sent to prison, suggests that, both in their own interests and in those of the public, the Government should direct the Police to catch hold of any sluggard, having no avocation, and give him hard work of some kind or other, demonstrating to him thereby the value of manual labour. The correspondent adds that he wants this work to be entrusted to the Police, as they can easily identify these sluggards and as, again, the sluggard may not easily obey the orders of a private individual.

The Madras sluggards.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

73. The Dravidan, of the 1st December, writes: —It is only when a country has attained great progress industrially that it can be said to be advanced. What, then, are we to say of those who, ignoring the condition of industries in this country, dabble in politics? What benefit can they confer on this country? India has, for centuries, been a ground of spoliation for many countries. Even now, when India is alleged to have progressed, she is robbed by many. The present situation can be compared to many robbers carrying away the wealth of a man before his very eyes when he is immersed in the pleasure of intoxication. Why it can be compared even to their depriving him of what he had kept safe in his cloth. It is the present time, when European articles are not coming here, that is the best opportunity for us to develop our industries. Finding that we are not moving in this matter, Japan is stuffing our market with their half finished goods and rob us of our money. If we continue in this condition, it will only help Japan to prosper at our cost. So we hope the people of this country should lose no time in taking active steps to improve their industries.

Japan and her teachings to India.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

76. The Swadesamitran, of the 3rd December, refers to the numerous deputations that have till now presented addresses to Mr. Montagu and observes:—We can confidently assert that the Secretary of State and the Viceroy have understood the aspirations of the Indians well from these addresses and the interviews they have had with a number of leaders. No doubt the self-imposed silence of both the gentlemen conducting the enquiry is a matter for regret, as also their inability to move with the people freely and understand from personal experience their attitude and the political condition of the country. But, in spite of all these disadvantages, they are making all possible endeavours to ascertain matters and we will therefore point out that the stronger our efforts to acquire Home Rule the greater will be the benefit we will derive. There are sufficient indications for us to presume that not only Mr. Montagu, but even the British Cabinet and the Parliament want to introduce some substantial reforms and it therefore behoves us to put forward in unhesitating terms our prayer for the adoption of the Congress league scheme of reforms.

Mr. Montagu and Home Rule for India.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

77. The Lokopakari, of the 3rd December, traces the political progress of India from the beginning of the Congress to the announcement by the British Ministers, that the policy of the British Government is to grant Home Rule to India and, referring to the various parties that have sprung up among the Indians now, as an outcome of the evil advice of some Anglo-Indians, and that claim independent privileges for each, hopes that Mr. Montagu, who is fully aware of the loyalty of the Indians as well as the attitude of the Anglo-Indians, will recommend to the Parliament that only such reforms should be introduced in India as will enable India to have Home Rule.

The condition of India.

PRAPANCHAMITRAN, Madras, 4th Dec. 1917.

The Prapanchamitran, of the 4th December, also publishes the above article.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

78. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 28th November, contains a refutation full of satire of the suggestions of the Madras Mail regarding the administration of India. The leader concludes as follows:—If the present system of administration should continue for ever the authority of the followers of the Madras Mail will be perpetuated. The Mail and its party wish neither the welfare of the country nor that of the Empire. Their main object is to look to their own interest. We exhort the Indians to do the duty they owe to England and to their motherland till they reach their goal.

The Mail and the dumb masses.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

79. The Andhrapatrika, of the 28th November, says:—Our opponents say that if self-government be granted to India, mistakes will be committed. Mr. Gandhi says that the main principle of self-government is the possession of the privilege to commit mistakes and rectify them. . . The Mail has admitted that even England made such mistakes before the war. But the Mail will not apply to England the test which it applies to India and say that England is unfit for self-government.

Fitness for self-government.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

80. The Calcutta correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 29th November, says:—Though the endeavours of Mr. Curtis succeeded with some innocent gentlemen, it may, on the whole, be said that he failed. Strong rumours are current that Mr. Surendranath Banerji also has fallen into the snares of Mr. Curtis. It appears that he wrote to Mr. Anandachandra Rao of Dacca asking him to approve of the scheme of Mr. Curtis. It is here stated that Mr. Bhupendranath Basu is at the bottom of that scheme. Alas? To what a flight our leaders have reduced themseles! Sir Rabindranath Tagore and some others have to be commended for telling Mr. Curtis that they could not approve of the scheme. The remark of the Indian Daily News that, while the words of Mrs. Besant are easily understood, only demoniac brains can understand Mr. Curtis, shows that even Anglo-Indian papers do not commend his methods.

The reform scheme of Mr. Curtis.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

81. In reviewing in its leader the work of the Hon'ble Mr. Ramchandra Rao's work on the development of Indian polity, the Andhrapatrika, of the 29th November, makes the following remarks:—England alone bears the whole burden of the Empire. The English Parliament holds itself responsible for the affairs of the whole Empire. So the Empire is growing less efficient every day. Mr. O'Conner said:—"The affairs of Scotland are not decided by the people of that country who know the conditions of the country well. They are decided by the ignorant people of England, Ireland and Wales. This applies to all parts. In the same way are Irish affairs settled by the ignorant English people. The affairs of Wales are settled by the ignorant people of England and Scotland." As stated by Mr. Ramachandra Rao there is only one safeguard to good Government. The Government should be responsible to the people. After the Parliament washes its hands of local affairs, it will have time enough to consider Imperial questions carefully. The administration of India should be taken from the control of the Parliament and the Indians should be made to bear the responsibility of the administrntion. Only then will India progress rapidly and the Empire become efficient. What the Congress scheme of reforms wants is the establishment of responsible government. Those who reproach the Home Rulers without understanding this are devoid of the power of deep thinking. The leader then quotes the opinions of statesmen on self-government for India and concludes with a prayer that the Congress reforms may be granted as a first step towards it.

Indian polity.

Indian polity.

In reviewing, in its leader, the Hon'ble Rao Bahadur Ramachandra Rao's Book on the development of Indian Polity, the Andhrapatrika, of the 30th November, says:— It is necessary to increase the powers of the people in order that responsible Government may be established. The authority of the bureaucracy should be reduced. Till now, the members of the Indian Civil Service are not responsible to the people for their administration. Though they are responsible to the Parliament, that responsibility is only nominal. The bureaucracy has been ruling India arbitrarily for a hundred and fifty years. Sir John Shore said that so long as the Government was outside the country, there would necessarily be the rule by the bureaucracy. There is much truth in his words. A responsible Government should always have its seat within the country. . . The people thought they could obtain their salvation by their own endeavours. The members of the bureaucracy did not agree to this. They have brought up the Indians and yet deem them to be children. The people say that their childhood passed away long ago. This is the reason of the clash between the bureaucracy and the people. The bureaucracy is not inclined to hand over its authority to the people. It is this disinclination that is the cause of the vehement speech of Sir Michael O'Dwyer in the Imperial Legislative Council. The two chief defects of Indian administration are the absence of authority in the people and the centralization of all authority at one place. It should therefore be understood that the main points at issue in the present contention is the decentralisation of power, and the change of a bureaucratic government into a self-government. The Legislative Councils have turned out to be debating societies. What the people want is real self-governing authority and not mere influence as stated by Sir S. P. Sinha. The Government should be responsible to self-governing institutions. . . Lord Palmerston said long ago that the Parliament did not take any interest in the affairs of India. . . It is supremely necessary that the India Council, which has been acting arbitrarily, should be abolished, and the salary of the Secretary of State, should be made a charge to be borne by the Parliament.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 30th Nov. 1917.

Indian polity.

Reviewing in its editorial columns, the Hon'ble Mr. Ramachandra Rao's book on the development of Indian polity, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st December, says:—As soon as the Parliament relinquishes its control over India, the Government of India should be made responsible to the people. From Mr. Curtis's scheme it appears that the Government of India is not in need of reform. If the India Council is not abolished and the Government of India changed into a responsible Government, the bureaucracy in India will grow stronger and be an obstacle to progress. The centralised system of Government that was found necessary in the days of the Sepoy Mutiny is not now needed. . . The Hon'ble Mr. Ramachandra Rao has in his book fully sympathised with the question of the reconstitution of provinces. In order that the Provincial Governments may be responsible to the people, the Executive Councils should be placed under the control of the Legislative Councils and the representatives of the people should be given the power to administer the finances. . . From a perusal of the book under review, it will be plain that there is nothing revolutionary in the Congress scheme. The reforms therein demanded have been from time to time proposed by English and Indian politicians. While the Americans have deemed the people of the Philippines, who were man-killers and were backward in civilization, fit for complete self-government, it does not mean wishing well of the country to say that the Indians who have an ancient civilization, and who have been trained under the British rule for a hundred and fifty years, are unfit to bear even the preliminary responsibilities in self-government.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

Self-government.

82. In commenting on the address presented by the Zamindar Association, Muzaffarnagar, to Mr. Montagu, the Andhrapatrika, of the 29th November, writes:—The Zamindars are in full agreement with the Congress reforms. When even the zamindars are expressing a desire for self-government, is it possible to delay the granting of it?

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

Self-government.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 24th November, says:—Only a few who had fallen into the snares of Mrs Besant, want swaraj immediately. Thousands of schemes are now set on foot, which differ largely from one another. It remains to be seen how Mr. Montagu is going to view them.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

Self-government.

The Andhrapatrika, of 3rd December, says:—It may be stated that self-government and the division of the country on a language basis are the political ideals of the Andhras. . . As stated by Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao, the grant of self-government to India is required not only to allay the agitating public but also to make the Empire stable. . . In the opinion of Mr. Madhava Rao, the policy now followed by Mr. Montagu is not very useful. He thinks that Mr. Montagu will do well to proclaim that he has decided to grant Home Rule to this country, and to ask the people to let him know what kind of Home Rule they require, which will be suited to the conditions of this country. Under the present policy, occasion is afforded for useless schemes being brought forward and for some people behaving in violation of the national aims. Mr. Madhava Rao writes that at least now Mr. Montagu will do well to declare his intention to give the people control over the finances and place the Executive Councils under the Legislative Councils. . . If this scheme be adopted, Mr. Madhava Rao thinks it will be possible to give complete self-government to India in the course of fifteen years. Mr. Madhava Rao is a responsible leader and his words cannot be discarded. . . Mr. Madhava Rao plainly suggests that the country should be divided into provinces on a language basis.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 24th Nov. 1917.

Sudras.

83. The Andhraprakasika, of the 24th November, says:—Certain Brahman name bearers venture to say in their lectures that if Sudras hear vedas, molten lead should be poured into their ears, that if they retain them in their hearts, their hearts should be torn, that, if they recite, their tongues should be removed, that Sudras should be treated as cremation grounds, that the face of a Sudra should not be seen, and so on. Though such mean expressions are not to be found in the vedas, they rely on the latter day puranas. Do not such lectures, which incite race hatred, come under section 151-A of the Criminal Procedure Code? We pray that some non-Brahman member of the Legislative Council will ask the Government if they intend taking any action in regard to the speeches, exciting race hatred, made by certain Brahmans at the Kollur village, on the 5th, 6th and 7th of this month.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 26th Nov. 1917.

The message of Mr. Prithwisa Chandra Rai.

84. Referring with approval to the message of Mr. Prithwisa Chandra Rai, the Andhraprakasika, of the 26th November, exhorts the non-Brahmans and the Muhammadans who are advocates of the Congress League scheme to bestow their attention on the aforesaid message.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 30th Nov. 1917.

The Bezwada non-Brahman conference.

85. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 30th November, writes with reference to the non-Brahman Leaders' conference at Bezwada:—Is this conference really a conference of the leaders of the people? Why did officials attend it? Why did the Sub-Magistrate of Ellore, the District Munsif of Gudivada, etc, go to it? What doubt can there be to call it an "official conference." The world knows how far it is proper to call a conference of the officials a conference of the leaders of the people.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 30th Nov. 1917.

Old coins.

86. Referring to the order of the Government as to how the old coins discovered in the Nellore district should be disposed off, the Andhrapatrika, of the 30th November, remarks:—The decision of the Government is a source of pain to us. To melt these uncommon coins will destroy many sources of history. The Andhras should request the Government to preserve the coins in the Madras Museum.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 30th Nov. 1917.

The Bezwada Home Rule League.

87. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 30th November, reports the President of the first anniversary meeting of the Bezwada Home Rule League to have said:—. . . We have not subjected the Panchamas to greater suffering than that to which the Americans and the Europeans subjected the Congoese and the Negros. Our Aryans did not wipe out of existence any race. Receiving education at the hands of the Missionaries is the root cause of our abject condition. If we resort to national education, the Missionaries will lose their influence.

The correspondent reports another speaker to have said :—Germany is waging this war to bring India's trade under her control. If we are given self-government and the Arms Act is repealed, we will become valiant and be a source of help to the British Empire. It will be in the interests of the British Empire to grant self-government to India. Without that we are helpless and Japan will one day devour us. This question has been engaging the attention of the British Ministers. The schemes of Doctor Nayar and Mr. Chettiyar and those of Bikkavolu, Pulivendla and Bezwada are useless. If one department is to be entrusted to us and our ability tested, it will not be easy for us to show any progress.

88. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st December, says that at the Nowpada Junction Railway station in the Ganjām district, a Salt Assistant Inspector fell foul with two Muhammadans for not standing and salaaming him, and remarks :—We are at a loss to know how the failure of the Muhammadans to salaam him is a violation of the self-respect of gentlemen who come to India like birds of passage, make money, go back to their country and live like nabobs.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

Anglo-Indian mischief.

In an article under this heading, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 4th December, writes :—This community has extraordinary energy. There is also extraordinary unity among them. Sir Michael O'Dwyer made an irresponsible speech in the Imperial Legislative Council and was severely reprehended for the same. Notwithstanding the censure, he is still continuing his high-handed ways. The whole Anglo-Indian world is supporting him. If only our people had the same measure of unity in fighting for constitutional rights as the Anglo-Indians display in their autocratic methods, much good is sure to result. But we lack this quality. We are adepts in picking quarrels among ourselves by cultivating caste and religious hatred and trying to cut one another's throats. This is the main cause of our degraded condition. Although we are thirty crores in number, various nations invaded our country with only some few thousands of troops and set the people against one another, conquered our territories and deprived us of our women, gold and lands. Our people have yet to realise that all this is due to our internal feuds. This is most deplorable. We should do well to take a lesson from Anglo-Indian unity at least and give up our feuds. We ought to acquire an impartial frame of mind. We ought also to weigh the words of those who are seeking to make us quarrel against each other. This is what we pray of our compatriots in this connection.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 4th Dec. 1917.

The Anglo-Indians.

89. The Andhrapatrika, of the 1st December, says under this heading :—The Government have rejected the address of the All-India Moslem League prepared for presentation to the Secretary of State for the reason that the League has refused to remove the portion about internments. The action of the Government does not appear to be proper. Our Muhammadan brethren have done well in maintaining their self-respect. It is not in keeping with the new angle of vision that the Secretary of State should refuse to hear the grievances which are agitating the people.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

Self-respect.

90. The Kistnapatrika, of the 1st December, says :—The British Parliament will surely grant some independent powers to the Provincial Governments, for even the Anglo-Indians have expressed their approval of them and are agitating for their grant. But the people fear that the reforms that are to be granted may almost end with these. They will never agree to the giving of larger powers to Provincial Governments without giving the people independence. If, unfortunately, such a thing takes place, the provincial authorities will grow more arbitrary and the administration will become more unbearable. Under the present system there is at least the hope that the wrongs done by the provincial authorities will be rectified by KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 1st Dec. 1917.

Reforms.

the Government of India. If arbitrary authority should be prevented from becoming intolerable, the officers should fear the people under them or the Government of India above them. If, without arranging for fear from below, the fear from above is removed, the Government will surely tend to be a source of annoyance to the people. So also the Government of India has no real independence It is under the Secretary of State. If, without giving independence to the people, the Government of India is removed from the control of the British Parliament, that Government would grow more arbitrary, annoying and unendurable. Either the British Parliament or the people of India should be responsible for the Government of India. If the bureaucracy is made responsible to none, there can be no worse Government than that. The abatement of the authority of the Parliament over this country should be in proportion to the independent authority given to the people of this country. Mr. Montagu himself has given expression to this principle in regard to Mesopotamian affair. . . It is an illusion to suppose that the Indians will be given complete independent authority immediately. The British will not agree to give it. Our countrymen also will not agree to such a grant. But some independence cannot but be given at once. If that is not granted, it will not be possible to guess the extent of the calamity that will overtake India. The rulers as well as the people know it. . . Is there room for both the bureaucracy and the people to bear equal responsibility for the administration of the country. Lord Minto once said that two swords cannot enter into one sheath. . . Full independence to the people is out of question. Quasi-independence is meaningless. At least the Governments of the Provinces may be handed over to the people immediately. After some time, the Government of India also may be completely made over to the people. We do not see more than two steps to complete self-government. It is unfair not to give the people full authority in internal matters at least in the advanced provinces. . . The members of the Legislative Councils must be all elected. The Governor alone should be an officer sent from England. He should appoint as his Prime Minister one who has been elected by the members of the Legislative Council. That Prime Minister should be empowered to choose seven other ministers to assist him. The British Governor and the eight Indian ministers should, subject to the authority of the Legislative Council, administer the Province. The Bengal Zamindars' Association have indicated this system plainly. The system of making the people responsible for some departments and the bureaucracy for the rest, which is found in the scheme of Mr. Curtis, is most undesirable. It is like putting two swords in one sheath. The Coimbatore and the Pulivendla schemes contemplate such an unwelcome change. . . The Indians have lost the virtue of bold thinking and are feeble-hearted in asking for reforms. They should, with candour and with heart and soul, ask for a complete transfer of the Provincial Governments to them. There should be no compromise in the matter of Provincial Governments. As a sign of British suzerainty, only the Governors should be British. The ministers should be the representatives of the people. They must be subject to the members of the Legislative Councils. All classes should have equal powers of election. This scheme alone is reasonable, auspicious, desirable, possible and necessary, and it should be carried out.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 1st Dec. 1917.

The Ceded Districts non-Brahman Conference.

91. The Kistnapatrika, of the 1st December, says.—The Pulivendla non-Brahman Conference has been a discredit to the Cuddapah district that should be removed. Being influenced by the intrigues of some Anglo-Indians who say that the country does not require swaraj, some of our countrymen are obstructing the progress of the country. It should be proclaimed aloud that the country is very anxious to get swaraj. We have no doubt that the meeting that is to be held under the presidentship of Diwan Bahadur Kesava Pillai will be crowned with success.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 1st Dec. 1917.

The hardships of the zamindari ryots.

92. A correspondent to the Kistnapatriha, of the 1st December, says under this heading:—It is not possible to describe the difficulties of the ryots in zamin villages. Three-fourths of the inhabitants of these villages are starving without food. But the zamindars every day feed their dogs with milk, bread and flesh. From this it is plain how humane the zamindars are. Is it to fill their coffers that the zamindars collect taxes from the ryots? Are these taxes intended to enable them to enjoy pleasures? . . . Is the peshkash increased whenever our taxes are increased? When it is not, why should the taxes be raised? Unless we request the Government to fix the assessment for ever and to see that a part of the revenue is spent on education, sanitation, and the improvement of agriculture, we cannot have any salvation. If we keep quiet for fear that the zamindars may grow angry, we and our posterity will have to fall victims to their arbitrary rule. I urge the zamin ryots to awake, agitate and make representations to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Tilak and the Punjab.

93. The Hitakarini, of the 25th November, says:—How can peace be maintained in the country without the Muhammadans interned being released and the orders against Mr. Tilak, etc., being revoked? We, therefore, pray that the Government will cancel their repressive orders and thus carry out their intention to establish peace in the country.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 25th Nov. 1917.

Lord Ronaldshay and public opinion.

94. The Desamata, of the 28th November, refers to the utterances of Lord Ronaldshay about the reasons that led the Government to put the Defence of India Act into force in Bengal and remarks:—It is to be regretted that the Government in this country do not see the existence of the opinion of the people which is more important than the opinions of their subordinates and of the Police, on which they solely depend, and that where they see its existence, they do not try to know what it is.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 28th Nov. 1917.

The Gōdāvari District Conference.

95. The Andhraprakasika, of the 28th November, contains some correspondence to the effect that the organisers of the Gōdāvari District Conference invited delegates from all classes, but that they intimated at the last moment by notices that only those who approved of the Congress League scheme could attend the conference as delegates and not others. Many non-Brahmans who came to attend the conference as delegates had to return home without doing so. The correspondents refer to this as being due to a clique among the Brahmans, and one of them doubts if the country will be better off under self-government than under the British rule.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

The Guntūr District Conference.

96. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 28th November, reports the President of the Guntūr District Conference to have said thus in his preliminary speech:— All the communities have a share in the administration of the country. The number of arbitrary officers who place faith in their subordinates has increased. Curruption has prevailed. No one hears the grievances of the people. The bureaucracy should go and the people should have freedom. It is essential to have a responsible Government. The Congress League reforms are the only means to this.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

New India and the Dravidian Association.

97. Referring to the remarks of New India, attributing motives to the Dravidian Association which invited Sir Alexander Cardew to preside at the entertainment given to the new non-Brahman graduates, the Andhraprakasika, of the 28th November, remarks:—It is not in keeping with journalistic propriety to praise those who fall in with its views and vilify others, and to indulge in for groundless surmises and improper interpretations.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

The Tinnevelly non-Brahman Conference.

98. The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th December, gives in Telugu the purport of Mr. Eardley Norton's speech at the Tinnevelly non-Brahman Conference which appears on page 5 of New India of the 3rd December 1917.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Dec. 1917.

Vilifying Brahmans.

99. The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th December, says under this heading:— As stated by Sir Alexander Cardew at the meeting of the Dravidian Association, the British Government have given equal opportunities to all classes of people. In the matter of conferring appointments, even partiality has been shown to non-Brahmans. We are at a loss to know why the Brahmans are to blame when the wealthy non-Brahmans fail to use such an opportunity.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Dec. 1917.

Sadhvi, Mysore, 30th Nov. 1917.

A Kannada Province.

100. The Sadhvi, of the 30th November, writes:—There is a movement in Dharwar (Bombay Presidency) touching the formation of a separate Kannada Province for the Kanarese-speaking population of India. If all the Kanarese districts in British territory should be made over to Mysore and the task of improving them entrusted to His Highness the Maharaja, not only will the Kanarese language develop greatly, but Mysore will then find it possible also to create a Kannada University.

Mysore Star, Mysore, 2nd Dec. 1917.

Referring to the same subject, the Mysore Star, of the 2nd December, observes:—We learn that a resolution passed at a meeting under the presidency of Rao Bahadur V. B. Joshi at Dharwar to the effect that the Kanarese districts of Bombay, Madras and Coorg should be formed into a separate Province with a Legislative and an Executive Council, etc., of its own, has been submitted to the Secretary of State. The formation of Provinces on the language basis is among the important political questions of the day. In the event of the question being considered in relation to the other parts of the country, it should, by no means, be overlooked in regard to the Kanarese-speaking population. The proposal is alike advantageous to the people concerned and to the administrators.

Vokalikara Patrike, Bangalore City, 5th Dec. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

101. In an article under the heading "The Dawn of India's Fortune", the Vokalikara Patrike, of the 5th December, refers to the addresses presented to Mr. Montagu, and remarks that it is to be hoped that any scheme of reforms which Mr. Montagu might decide upon will tend to sink the class differences which are such a prominent feature of the political situation at present.

Mahavikatadutan, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

The deputations to Mr. Montagu.

The Mahavikatadutan, of the 1st December, has a comic leader in which it makes fun of a number of big men waiting in deputation upon Mr. Montagu and demanding larger powers, while the majority of the Indians are leading most unhappy lives, on account of their poverty and the pressure of the numerous taxes imposed from time to time.

Sampad Abhyudaya, Mysore, 6th Dec. 1917.

The Brahmans and non-Brahmans.

102. In a lengthy leading article referring to Home Rule activities and the Non-Brahman opposition thereto, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 6th December, writes:—The Brahmans live a holy life of renunciation. They never deserve to be victims at the sacrifices undertaken by the non-Brahmans. If any among the non-Brahmans should seek to victimise them, they will be sure to reap the fruit of their deeds. It is not possible that all non-Brahmans will listen to these (anti-Brahman) advocates and join in the work of sacrificing the Brahmans. We are under the British Government. If any such attempts are made, they will be sure to be checked. If, perchance, the British Government and non-Brahmans should combine to victimise the Brahmans, then the latter will consider what they should do. It is surprising to see some of the non-Brahmans, unable to realise the situation, are trying to fordo the Brahmans. It is still more surprising to see the Brahmans quite indifferent in the matter. These storms of Brahman hatred do arise from time to time. Some of the personages, like those referred to above, think themselves all-powerful and take upon themselves the task of wiping out the Brahmans. Two hands must meet for a clap. Let them do what they like. Let us remain indifferent. Many Brahmans are thus indifferent, because they think the other party will give up its campaign of its own accord in disgust. Let all the appointments in the public service go to the non Brahmans. Let us eke out our livelihood by means of agriculture, trade and industries. Hitherto we had only one string to our bow, namely, the public service. If that should be difficult to obtain in future, let us have three more strings to it, namely, agriculture, trade and industries. Let us try to live wherever we can without being subject to hatred by the non-Brahmans. The resolution of the Brahmans to be content to please the non-Brahmans and to live a life of calmness and renunciation goes to show that their extraordinary patience will bring its reward and prevent their coming to grief. It is hardly becoming to the non-Brahmans to indulge in caste and religious hatred. The Brahman is a pauper, a mendicant. He is content to have less than he deserves. It therefore behoves all those who hate the Brahmans to consider whether they are right to do so. If they refuse to consider this point, the Brahmans will be content to think that as men sow so will they reap. The Brahmans have nothing to fear. Let Mr. Basavayya and others do what they like. Let us try to do a good turn to those who would do us harm, or at least refrain from doing them harm in return.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, in its issue, of the 7th December, in another article, says:—A big English gentleman writing to the Evening Standard, a European paper, stating that he has lived in India for sixteen years, proceeds to observe that the Brahmans are predominant in this country, and that their power will not diminish, unless all other communities also become educated. It is writings of this kind that are chiefly responsible for the class differences in India. The writer's argument is akin to saying that the British are the wealthiest in the world and therefore their power will not diminish, unless the others also become likewise wealthy. Is there anything to prevent the other nations from perservering likewise and becoming as affluent as the British? So it is with the Brahmans too, in regard to their intellectual advancement.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 7th Dec. 1917.

Reduction of appointments in various departments.

103. Referring to the proposed reduction of appointments in the various departments, the Kerala Patrika, of the 1st December, points out that, though the Government are compelled to curtail expenditure, it would be a great pity if the services of the low-paid officers be suddenly dispensed with, and thinks that, instead of doing so, it would be more reasonable on the part of the Government to cut short the pay of high officials till the end of the war.

KERALA PATRIKA, Calicut, 1st Dec. 1917.

Official cataract.

104. After stating that the eyes of the European officials become literally jaundiced when they land in India, the Manorama, of the 30th November, refers to the treatment accorded to a "Baniyan" by Mr. G. S. Wells of Chicago, takes exception to the disallowance of an interpellation on the subject at the last meeting of the Legislative Council, and observes that, if there was any truth in the newspaper report, the Government should, even without such an interpellation, have taken necessary action in the matter.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 30th Nov. 1917.

An improper reply.

105. The Manorama, of the 30th November, thinks that the reply of the Government to the question, whether their attention had been drawn to Doctor Nanjunda Rao's letters regarding the Tuberculosis Institute in Madras, was an improper one, inasmuch as any matters of public interest could be dealt with in a daily paper, and that it was regrettable that, instead of taking necessary action, as all benign Governments would do, the Madras Government should have refused to do so in this matter, because of the offence that the subject was discussed in a daily newspaper, and observes that it is answers like these that make the people lose their confidence in the Legislative Council.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 30th Nov. 1917.

Establishment of a League called the Islamia League.

106. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 28th November, writes:—The general meeting of Mussalmans recently held at the Mukhbir-i-Dakhan Press is a powerful proof that the generality of Mussalmans are not in accord with the views and ideas of the Muslim League which, in its enthusiastic and unreasonable support of the Hindus, is leading the Mussalmans astray and thereby jeopardising national and religious advancement. It has been an accepted principle with Mussalmans, from the time of the late Sir Saiyid up to the present day, that any loss or harm done to the rule of the British Government, or any weakening of its administrative power would mean a corresponding weakening—not to say eradicating—of India in general, and of the Mussalmans of India in particular.

It was on this account that when the Muslim League was found to be devoid of foresight and threw behind its back aspirations and ideas of the Mussalmans in general, disaffection and antagonism spread from one end of the country to the other.

It was hoped that the Muslim League would not repeat its mistake, but would frankly recognise the principle that in the strength of the Government lies the strength of Mussalmans, and that no reform should be introduced in India which would place one community ruling over another. It is regrettable that the Madras Muslim League followed the same wrong course, and in its stubbornness and persistence transgressed all bounds, and in spite of the fact that the All-India Muslim League had consented to amend the address, it declined to act similarly with regard to its own address.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

The result of this was disaffection among the Mussalmans. His Highness the Prince of Arcot, the permanent President of the League, on ascertaining public aspirations, has declared his intention to resign. In these circumstances the establishment of the Islamia League causes no surprise.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, 28th Nov. 1917.

The Chief Presidency Magistrate.

107. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 28th November, writes:—Mr. Pelly, the Chief Presidency Magistrate, is shortly to leave Madras to take charge of the duties of the Deputy Inspector-General at Trichinopoly. In this connexion it suggests the advisability of appointing an Indian to the post, and expresses a hope that His Excellency Lord Pentland will, as a matter of fairness, kindly issue an order to give the suggestion a practical shape. It recommends Khan Bahadur Muhammad Bazlullah Sahib Bahadur, B A., for the place, and says "he has twice acted and shown forensic and legal ability. He is a just man and popular with all classes. Over the Mussalmans he exercises still greater influence. The community will not be pleased to see any other Mussalman get the place. At present there is an unreasonable agitation going on in Madras, and his appointment will afford much satisfaction to the community, for he will try to remove the misunderstandings created among the Mussalmans by the Home Rulers.

QUAMI REPORT, Madras, 27th Nov. 1917.

A new hope.

108. The Quami Report, of the 27th November, referring to the announcement made by His Excellency Lord Pentland, the Governor of Madras, regarding the selection of six Deputy Tahsildars annually, writes:—The agreeable announcement of the 30th September 1917 by the popular Governor of Madras was, for some reason or other, given publicity to, only yesterday. It has been pointed out therein that applications should be submitted on or before the 16th November. But today the 27th day of November, i.e., the appointed date. This wonderful blandishment appears to cause disappointment. But this is a Government promise, hence we are sure that whether the date changes, or the period terminates, the promise of the Government cannot be broken.

Although the time has changed, and apparently there is no likelihood of Muhammadans attaining their legitimate rights. In these circumstances, we admit that time has not yet arrived for the Government itself to declare the division and classification of such appointments. But the time is fast approaching, and the right-producing effects are spreading in the country which cannot but produce their effects.

In this connexion the editor recalls the question of the vacancy that is likely to be caused by the transfer on promotion of Mr. Pelly, the Chief Presidency Magistrate, and suggests the advisability of appointing an Indian to the vacancy, against whom the doors have been closed for a long time. It is possible that Lord Pentland's Government may act upon that suggestion.

We address Lord Pentland and other authorities who hold independent views and love justice. They are aware that no one but Mr. Bazlullah Sahib has a better claim to that office. It adds that Mussalmans are getting weaker, and discontent is being created amongst them. In these circumstances the appoint ment of Mr. Bazlullah Sahib to that post will tend to pacify the Muhammadans.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 29th Nov. 1917.

"A chance opportunity."

109. The Qaumi Report, of 29th November, referring to the vacancy that is likely to be caused by the transfer of Mr. Pelly, the Chief Presidency Magistrate, Egmore, Madras, writes:—We are exceedingly glad to learn that both of our Royapettah contemporaries concur in our views as to the advisability of appointing Mr. Buzl-ul-lah Sahib to that place. We invite the attention of the Government to the matter in order that it may not disappoint Muhammadan aspirants.

There is no doubt that the office of the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Madras is an important and distinguished one, and that the appointment of the Khan Bahadur will create special feelings of appreciation among Muhammadans and they will thus be strengthened in their belief that those who trust in Government do not do so in vain.

Khan Bahadur Moulavi Buzl-ul-lah Sahib's powerful personality and respectability, in addition to his personal gift, have assured the Muhammadans that revolt, insane agitation, or unreal reconciliation can never lead to progress. The first consequence of such a belief naturally led the Muhammadans to express the hope that the Moulavi Sahib will be given that influential and distinguished position which he has already twice held with marked legal ability and judicial fairness.

Perhaps it may be said that Mr. Buzl-ul-lah is at present a Revenue officer and that it will be difficult to transfer him from his permanent post. But considering the importance of the occasion and the nature of the case, we do not regard this as a real difficulty. Besides we have before us an excellent example in the case of Mr. Ragava Achariyar who was transferred from the same post because occasion demanded it.

In the light of this event is it not possible to meet the wishes of the Muhammadans for once? Perhaps, Muhammadans, in general, may not understand the reason for the expediency as to why the treatment that has been extended to a Brahman should not be extended to a Muhammadan also.

In case the post is given to any other Muhammadan, the community will neither be pleased nor gratified.

We are sure that the Government will concur in the views of the Muhammadans and grant their demand which is based on right and hope; and will give the place to a Muhammadan who is the trusted friend of the community. Any disregard, by the Government of these aspirations of the community, will cause very great disappointment and make it difficult for us to improve public opinion.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

The release of the Muhammadan detenus: The establishment of a central bureau at Delhi.

110. The Qaumi Report, of the 1st December, refers to the circular published in its contemporary the New Era by Doctor Ansari and Doctor Abdur Rahim Sahib, in which they state that "all constitutional methods and means have been adopted to induce the Government of India to release the Muslim leaders in general and Mr. Muhammad Ali and Mr. Shaukat Ali in particular, but to no purpose. We have now only one course left and that is to start an agitation for which no parallel can be found in the political annals of India."

They further write that "it is vain to discuss reforms and political progress so long as we fail to secure the release of the Muhammadan detenus."

The editor criticises these views as follows:—"We are astounded at such correspondence and information, and are unable to understand how such an important bureau has been established by only two persons, and what its constituent elements are. If this be the method adopted by the bureau for the release of the Muhammadan internees, we confidently assert that it is wrong. It is suggested to us that 'we should start an agitation unparalleled in the political history of India.' But the question is, has such an agitation ever been brought about by deliberations and suggestions, or if it is possible so to do. Our leaders lost their chance in the sleep of negligence and whisperings. They relied more than necessary on their foresight, and after all their arrows have missed the target, they want to inaugurate a general uproar."

III.—Legislation.

Indian Law Gazette, Madras, October 1917.

The condition of tenants in shrotriyam villages.

111. The Indian Law Gazette for October writes:—Shrotriyamdars lease out their lands to ryots and when the former fail to pay their jodi or kist for the shrotriyam village, the produce on any land in the village is liable, under the Revenue Recovery Act of 1864, to be distrained and sold in auction. Thus the produce on a land leased out to the ryot is auctioned for the arrears due by the shrotriyamdar, which is really a grave injustice to the innocent ryot. It is the duty of the Government to remove this hardship. Properly speaking, only such portion of the produce as belongs to the shrotriyamdar should be distrained; but the Revenue officials, without giving any notice of attachment to these ryots, often distrain the whole produce on the leased lands. Whenever, in ignorance of an attachment, the ryot removes the produce from his land, he is charged for committing theft of property that had been distrained and even if he proves his innocence, the Sub-Magistrates trying the case do not believe him and usually convict him. Further, those of the village servants who bear enmity towards a ryot, without bringing the fact of attachment to his notice, make a false report to the Tahsildar that he was aware of the attachment, and when the case of theft against the ryot is tried, they also give false evidence to the same effect. In these cases also the Magistrates rely upon the testimony of the village servants and convict these innocent ryots. It is the present law that is responsible for all these sufferings of the ryot. It is, therefore, imperative that section 8 of the Act should be amended to the effect that notice of attachment of the crops in a land cultivated by the ryot should always be given to him when the crops are distrained. Will the Government of Madras move in this matter?

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

A State University for Travancore.

112. Adverting to the formation of a committee in Travancore to consider and report upon certain points connected with the proposed University of Travancore, the Hindu Nesan, of the 3rd December, says that there can be no two opinions about the necessity of a separate University for Travancore and that there are, as a matter of fact, greater facilities for establishing a University in Travancore than in Mysore, which has already established one.

The Moslem interned.

1. The following appears in New India of the 8th December:— New India, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

"A Refused Interview.

"The news, published elsewhere, that Mr. Muhammad Ali's request for an interview with the Secretary of State for India has been refused, will cause a feeling of intense resentment in the minds of entire Indian community in general and of the Muslims in particular. It is certain that it is not Mr. Montagu himself but the Government of India that is responsible for this act of supreme unwisdom. Muslim sentiment has been twice outraged during the last few days by the Government of India which has constituted itself the guide, friend and philosopher of the Secretary of State during his visit to this country. We feel sure that the British Empire will not have collapsed if Mr. Muhammad Ali had been granted the interview. If anything, it would have resulted in Mr. Montagu knowing many things which have been purposely screened from him. The Government of India could not have chosen a surer method of eliminating Muslim sympathy and co-operation than the one they have adopted in this case. . . A community, whose sentiments are so thoughtlessly trifled with, cannot be expected to repose much confidence in the Government, or very anxious to maintain the much-talked of 'calm atmosphere'."

Madras deputations to the Secretary of State.

2. The Hindu, of the 11th December, writes:—"In the list of deputations of public bodies to wait upon the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India with addresses upon Indian political reforms which was published yesterday, we find several important omissions. The Madras Presidency Association is not to be found in the list. It is an association consisting of more than 2,000 members, having a central body in Madras with branches in the districts affiliated to it. . . An association formed under such auspices ought, we should think, to have an unquestioned right to be heard by the Secretary of State and the Viceroy on the subject of Indian constitutional reform. Its demerit in the eyes of some people lies in the fact that it supports the Congress League Reform Scheme subject to communal representation. It is well known that the Madras Government does not view with favour the said scheme, and in admitting deputations the Viceroy and the Secretary of State have doubtless acted on the recommendations of the Local Government. It is difficult to see how the Local Government felt justified in rejecting the request of so important and so influential an association to present its views to the Secretary of State and the Viceroy. We find in the list that institutions of mushroom growth and far less weighty than this association are allowed the honour of waiting upon deputation to the Viceroy and the Secretary of State. The association called the Madras Islamia League which was formed on the 21st November last is included in the list of deputations, although the time for sending applications for deputations and interviews had been fixed for the 12th November. The Islamia League came into existence by way of revolt on the part of some of the members of the Moslem League, and its political tenets are no doubt fashioned after the heart of some high European officials who are reported to have accelerated its birth. . . We learn that the Madras Vysia Association, the Visvakarma Association, the South India Skin and Hide Merchants' Association have all been denied the right of presenting addresses to the Secretary of State. . . We need hardly say that whatever views it may hold on the subject of constitutional reform the Local Government is bound to allow full and equal latitude for the expression of all sections of responsible opinion in the country before the Secretary of Hindu, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

State. While the Madras Government has felt so squeamish about including the names of the above associations in the list of deputations, it has offered, we are informed, to recommend without being asked for it, for a private interview to an Indian gentleman who has been actively agitating against the Congress League scheme and also to another gentleman who is not in favour of the said scheme."

INDIAN PATRIOT, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

Writing on this subject, the Indian Patriot, of the 11th December, says:—"We understand that the Government have not allowed the Southern India Skin and Hide Merchants' Association to wait in deputation on Mr Montagu. It is an important body, made up of very influential merchants with Moulvi Zia-ud-din Sahib Bahadur as President—a gentleman who commands the universal respect of Moslem community and of the commercial public. No one has been called upon to make more heavy sacrifices for the war than the skin merchants, and the association was formed at a critical hour with a view to safeguard the interests of a large section of the trading classes. Unless an explanation is forthcoming, the public would take it that the association has been treated shabbily."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

New India, of the 13th December, remarks:—"We have been surprised to find how deep and how widely spread is the anger aroused in Madras by the extraordinary policy of the Local Government in their selection of deputations. The treatment of the non-Brahmana deputations who are in favour of political reform is that which has caused the strongest feeling, since the vast majority of the non-Brahmana communities find themselves represented by the Nayarites. . . The feeling of sympathy with all these important communities is so strong, that a suggestion has been put forward, warmly supported and to be decided to-night, that the Provincial Congress Committee and the Mahajana Sabha should withdraw from the half hour granted to them. . . The bazaars are very excited over the rejections, for it is their inhabitants who are most strongly affected by them.

The Local Government have certainly destroyed the calm and friendly atmosphere which existed, outside the small Nayar faction, before the publication of the unfortunate list, and they have raised the kind of difficulty with which the local leaders find it very difficult to deal."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

3. New India, of the 13th December, has the following:—"A very sensible request is made to the Government by a correspondent on behalf of Arabindo Babu being given a few days' amnesty (?), that he may be enabled to go over to Madras to submit his views on the Reform Scheme. Arabindo Babu was not a convict; though he had been twice put under trial, he got an honourable acquittal. His visit to Madras under a safe conduct is not going to set the Cooum on fire; but the concession to a leader, idolised in the hearts of the many, cannot fail to strike the public imagination and revive public confidence in the Government for its sense of consideration towards the so-called political suspects. But it is doubtful to expect such political sagacity from Lord Pentland's Government which through political bias disallowed influential non-Brahmana communities to wait on the Right Hon'ble E. S. Montagu and His Excellency the Viceroy.

Srijut Arabindo Ghose.

JUSTICE, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

4. Justice, of the 13th December, observes:—"Before our next issue is out His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State will be in our midst, and they will be received in this city by all classes of people with the respect due to their exalted position. They are coming on business of the gravest moment and certainly no efforts will be spared to put them in possession of all the facts and every shade of enlightened and responsible opinion bearing on their mission. . . Madras is the birth place of the Home Rule movement. Not a few of the wild antics of the Home Rulers were displayed in this Presidency, much to the embarrassment of the Local Government. Lord Chelmsford and Mr. Montagu will have an opportunity of ascertaining whether there is anything behind the sound and fury of the Home Rule agitators and whether the agitation carried on against the Madras Government for what was described as their repressive policy was justified or not. We have no doubt that they will find that of all Provincial Governments the Madras Government have been the mildest and the most tolerant and lenient. One fault could easily be brought home to them. So far as we know no other Provincial

The Secretary of State's visit.

Government have encouraged and pampered the Brahman caste—the castes from which most of the shining Home Rule lights are drawn, so much to the serious detriment of the best interests of the other castes and communities in this Presidency than the Madras Government. Let His Excellency the Viceroy and the Right Hon'ble the Secretary of State call for the Civil List of every department of the Government of Madras and see for themselves whether real power, political and official, is not in the hands of the Brahmans. . . It is absurd and wholly against the truth to contend that there are not competent men among the non-Brahmans to hold high or subordinate offices under the Government, though it is true that as producers and lords of the soil they came to take advantage of English education only after the priestly caste had begun to avail itself of it. It is, however, a fact that in this Presidency, wherever you turn, the Brahman is really powerful, and, the Brahman is essentially clannish. The appetite grows by what it feeds on, and no wonder that he now wants Home Rule. . . We hope that His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State will look into these things, for in India perhaps more than any other equally enlightened country the political question is essentially a social question. Whatever may be the scheme that may be evolved out of the present discussions, it must be based fundamentally on social justice, and no Government, Provincial or Imperial, should be allowed to overlook this necessity and crying need of Indian politics."

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 4th Dec. 1917.

Indian coolies in Ceylon.

5. Referring to the decision of the Governor of Ceylon to appoint a committee to inquire into and report upon the condition of Indian coolies in the plantations in Ceylon, the Swadesamitran, of the 4th December, says:—This decision will doubtless create an impression on the mind of the people that the Ceylon Government are not much satisfied with the report of the commissioners appointed by the Madras Government to go into the same question and that they want to have a correct idea of the real situation. A perusal of the Ceylon papers clearly shows that the hardships and restrictions to which the Indian coolies in Ceylon have long been subject have not been curtailed as yet.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

The conquest of the German East Africa.

8. In commenting on the news of the conquest of the German East Africa by the British, the Swadesamitran, of the 6th December, says:—It is indeed surprising that this colony, cut off from Germany by the naval blockade caused by the allies, was able to hold out boldly for such a long time. It was once stated that a supply of ammunition and other materials had clandestinely reached this colony from Germany on one or two occasions. It is a fact to be noted by all that somehow the German troops there had managed to keep their position till now resolutely.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

The present situation in England.

9. The Swadesamitran, of the 6th December, gives a Tamil rendering of an article on this subject contributed by Saint Nihal Singh to the Indian Review of Madras.

Dravida Patrika, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

Lord Lansdowne on the war.

10. The Dravida Patrika, of the 5th December, quotes a portion of the letter said to have been addressed by Lord Lansdowne to the press suggesting the desirability of concluding peace at this stage and writes:—We are really surprised at this nobleman, being the leader of the Unionist party, which insists upon carrying on the war till Germany is defeated, suggesting the conclusion of peace at this stage. This by itself creates an impression in the minds of some that there have been some changes in the trend of the war. Proposals of peace have been in the air ever since the Lenin party began to gain the upper hand in Russia. Every one believes that Russia will conclude a separate peace. Many are of opinion that if the war is not ended now, it will continue for another two years. It is stated that it will take at least a year more for the whole American Army to join the Allies in attacking the enemy. After the conclusion of peace between Russia and Germany all the troops in the eastern front will be sent only to the western and Italian fronts, and therefore it will be hard to meet them, and even the combined armies of the Americans, the Englishmen and the French may take a year more to defeat the Germans. So this war may drag on for two more years. Can our civilized countries stand this misery? This is what some people consider about, and it is such opinions that have made Lord Lansdowne view like this. Considering the havoc committed by this war, it will be foolish on our part to say that it should continue. Nevertheless we think that it is not desirable to make arrangements for peace at this stage and we will state our reasons for it. The conclusion of peace now will surely be favourable to Germany and not to the Allies. Further, the object with which the Allies began the war has not, for aught we know, been accomplished yet. Therefore, acting upon Lord Lansdowne's advice now will only mean imploring the German people for peace. It is not even certain whether the people in Germany, who are for peace, wield sufficient political influence there. Under these circumstances, we regret very much at Lord Lansdowne, who has held many responsible appointments till now, having come out with this suggestion at this hour. The mature opinion of the majority of the people is that proposals of peace can benefit the world only when the German militarism, which is directly antagonistic to the progress of civilization, is rooted out.

11. The Swadesamitran, of the 7th December, refers to the opposition offered by the Anglo-Ceylonese newspapers in Ceylon to the demand for political reforms made by the Ceylonese, and remarks :—It is indeed surprising that the attitude of one section of Englishmen going to other countries in search of livelihood should be the same in all parts of the world. These Englishmen forget the lofty principles of their motherland, the moment the people of the country in which they have settled seek to obtain any ordinary reform, and begin unhesitatingly to find fault with the very people who are maintaining them. This attitude of the Anglo-Indians has been quite apparent to the people in India, and we now see that the same spirit prevails in Ceylon.

Political agitation in Ceylon.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

The Lokopakari, of the 10th December, refers, on the other hand, to the favourable comment of the Ceylon Times regarding this agitation, and observes :—If the Anglo-Indian papers in India note these comments of the Ceylon Times, they would not come out against the Home Rule agitation of the Indians here. Whether the Indians demand reforms conducive to Home Rule in the existing administration or not, whether some short-sighted people object to this demand or not, the British Government have decided to reform the Indian administration.

12. The Kistnapatrika, of the 8th December, says :—The question of peace has come into prominence since Russia was reduced to a miserable plight. . . The Germans are solicitous to enter into a treaty before they are completely vanquished. . . The allies are not averse to peace which saves needless carnage. But the sword has been unsheathed. The Rubicon has been crossed. It is not political wisdom to do things by halves and retire from the field prematurely. Nor is it to the good of the world. Is it that she thinks that the allies are exhausted that Germany frequently sends peace proposals? She is in utter delusion. It is true that Russia has been reduced to an insupportable plight. How can she fight her external foes while she has to attend to her internal dissensions? . . . There are some German partisans even in Italy. It is true that these raised the cry of peace when the banks of the Plade shook under the tread of the German regiments. But that cry was silenced the moment England and France came to the timely rescue of Italy and there is no doubt that the help of the allies dispelled the fears of Italy. . . What is the reply of America to the German overtures for peace? It is her declaration of war against Austria. . . The deliberations of the ministers of the allies that assembled at Paris are hostile to the German attempts for peace. The war trumpet of allies should sound till Germany shall have been crushed on the battlefield. There can be no peace nor treaty until then.

against the introduction of Parliamentary methods, while the southern declares that it would not submit to the Government, unless parliamentary methods are forthwith established. . . This conflict affords a pretext for those that declare that parliamentary methods are unsuited to the Asiatics, and is indeed deplorable. But it is doubtful if the southern section will be prepared to give up their cause, and we can assert that a republican Government will be re-established in China.

14. The Kistnapatrika, of the 8th December, says:—Lord Northcliff has declared after his return from America that, unless America builds ships with a tonnage of six million tons a year, she cannot render adequate help to the allies in the war. . . Imagine how many ships America requires for the transport of her one million of troops, with their equipments across a distance of three thousand miles over the sea. . . America cannot accomplish this unless she builds ships of a tonnage of at least six million tons. Military experts say that at least five million workmen are required for accomplishing this work.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 7th Dec. 1917.

The peace question.

15. Referring to Lord Lansdowne's letter regarding the peace question, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 7th December says:—Lord Lansdowne expressed his views solely in the interests of humanity. It does not seem from press reports that public opinion in Europe is favourable towards the peace question at present. Nevertheless since the enemy has now exhausted his strength, the time seems opportune for thinking of peace. The internal situation in Russia is growing deplorably worse day by day. However that may be, all pacifists will be sure to hail peace so that the world may be restored to its tranquility.

Russia and the war.

16. Referring to the internal troubles in Russia, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 13th December, says:—Russia is suffering untold distress owing to want of money. Unable to stand the harassment by the creditors, and not knowing how to meet the situation, they have issued a proclamation stating that they are not liable to pay the heavy debts incurred by the previous government. That is to say, the Russian Government is practically insolvent. The result is that not only the Rulers of Europe but many of the Rulers in the other parts of the world are likely to become insolvent.

II.—HOME ADMINISTRATION.

(b) Courts.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 4th Dec. 1917.

Criminal administration of justice in this Presidency.

17. The Swadesamitran, of the 4th December, comments as follows on the report of the criminal administration of justice in this Presidency for the last year:—This report contains some curious opinions of certain Judges about the jury system. The District Judge of North Arcot says that the money spent upon jurors is in vain and that unnecessary time is being wasted in the address of the Council and the Judge to the jury. But statistics about the cases tried by this Judge with the help of the jury go to show that in the majority of them he agreed with the jurors or the assessors as the case may be. So the charge brought by the Judge against the jurors generally seems to be a baseless one. Perhaps his opinion is that he can administer justice himself without the help of jurors or assessors. Of course every one wishes to exercise power freely, but the times are not suited for it. The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim has observed that, as Sessions Judges are, before their appointment, only Sub-Collectors, they have not a sufficient knowledge or experience of law, and therefore lack a judicial temperament. So instead of abolishing the system of jury, if barristers are appointed as Judges, they would appreciate the value of the system.

We find from the report the higher the status of the Court, the longer is the delay in the disposal of cases before it. In the case of Deputy Magistrates and Joint Magistrates, the number of cases on their file cannot be large, as it is only offences punishable with more than six months' imprisonment that are taken before them. So the delay in the disposal of these cases is due to the Magistrates having other work to do. This is one of the reasons why the Executive functions should be separated from the judicial. The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim has clearly proved in the report of the Public Services Commission that such a separation will not increase the expenditure of the Government. We do not know when the Government will realise the truth of this.

The District Magistrate of Guntur has stated that the majority of the youths punished last year were guilty of having grazed their cattle clandestinely in reserve forests. This shows that the agriculturists have not sufficient pasture grounds. The Revenue Board should bestow some attention on this subject and devise means to relieve the hardships of the agriculturists.

Report on the working of criminal courts in this Presidency for 1916.

In reviewing the report on the working of the Criminal Courts in this Presidency for the year 1916, the Manorama, of the 7th December, draws attention to the necessity of persons of some education being selected as village magistrates and of their being given increased salaries, and to the inadvisability of putting together in the same jail prisoners for short periods and habitual criminals.

The jury system.

18. Adverting to the opinions stated to have been expressed by the Sessions Judges of Madura, Tinnevelly and Kurnool about the capacity of the jury to understand the evidence before them and give their definite verdict, the Dravidan, of the 6th December, says that the powers now exercised by the jury are insufficient and that if those who are empanelled as jurors are given opportunities to acquire greater experience of the procedure relating to the conduct of the cases they will try to discharge their duties properly. It adds that the main object for which the aid of the jury is sought becomes defeated as the persons, who are now empanelled as jurors, are afraid of the court in which they sit.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

Honorary Magistrates. Presidency

19. Adverting to the powers exercised by these Magistrates, the Dravidan, of the 6th December, writes:—Whatever may be the powers exercised by the Honorary Magistrates in the mufassal, it is regrettable that those in the city have power to hear only nuisance cases and that no cases which require the use of the brains are sent up before them. That is why they get disgusted with their work. We would, therefore, request the Government to increase the powers of these Magistrates a little.

IDEAL TEACHER OR PERASIRIYAN, Madras, August 1917.

Technical education.

24. The Ideal Teacher or Pērāsiriyan, for August, makes a general observation that industrial education, which is considered to be an essential basis of progress by every country, is neglected in this country alone and adds:—The statistics regarding industrial schools show that there are not sufficient number of technical schools in India. Is it not a matter to be regretted, indeed, that there are only 250 schools to impart technical education for the whole of India? It would be beneficial to the people if at least these are managed properly; but from the review of their work by the Government, it is seen that only a few are being conducted well. It is on account of the absence of a good institution giving industrial training here that our students have to proceed to other countries to have the same. Though the Government also are giving scholarships to students going to foreign countries to learn industries, yet the number of students who have availed themselves of the concession from 1904 to March 1912 is only 66, and again, this course of study being very expensive, it prevents many good students from taking to it. So it would be benefiting us much if our benign Government or the richer classes would establish industrial schools in this country.

IDEAL TEACHER OR PERASIRIYAN, Madras, August 1917.

Teachers of Elementary Board schools.

25. A correspondent of the Ideal Teacher or Pērāsiriyan, for August, complains that, while before the Government had issued orders in the best interests of the teachers in Board schools requiring them to send their pay bills direct to the Taluk Board, the pay for the month was received by the teachers within the second or the third week of the next month, they are not able to have it under the new system even in the second or third week of the second month after that for which the pay is due and charging the clerks of the Taluk Board office causing this delay and otherwise teasing the poor teachers much by delaying the tapals received from schools for months together, appeals to the Departmental officials to relieve the hardships of the teachers as the education imparted by them cannot be sound unless they are happy.

Failures in the University examinations.

26. Adverting to a communication said to have been sent by the Rev. Mr. Zumbro, the Principal of the American Mission College at Madura, to the Madras Mail wherein he dwells at length upon the failures in the Madras University examinations every year, the Dravidan, of the 6th December, observes that, if the Government would spend some thought over the fact that many students fail in the annual examinations held by the Madras University, while a large number come out successful in the examinations held by the Calcutta University, they cannot fail to grasp the reason for it, and remarks that the lot of these unsuccessful candidates is pitiable indeed.

Compulsory free education.

27. Adverting to Mr. Patel's Compulsory Education Bill having been passed into an Act in Bombay, the Swadesamitran, of the 8th December, thinks that the efforts of the Municipal Councils to make education free and compulsory cannot succeed, unless the Provincial Governments and the Government of India give a helping hand and adds:—We cannot be satisfied with incomplete measures adopted by the authorities, without themselves moving in the matter of providing free and compulsory education to all children throughout India. Nevertheless, we welcome the Act passed in Bombay, on the principle that we should be content with what we get.

DRAVIDAN, Madras. 8th Dec. 1917.

Professors on strike.

28. The Dravidan, of the 8th December, expresses its regret at Mr. Mark Hunter of the Madras Presidency College having stopped away from his class, and, referring to a similar strike on the part of a Professor in the Trivandrum College and another in a college in Northern India, in both of which cases the matter seems to have been settled amicably, observes:—It is a matter for enquiry hereafter what offences on the part of students have tended to provoke the Professors and wound their feelings to such an extent as to prevent them from taking their classes. We will not be guilty of an exaggeration when we say that it is the Home Rulers that are responsible for the insubordinate attitude of the students.

29. Adverting to the order of the Government modifying G.O. No. 559, the Hindu Nesan, of the 7th December, writes :—We are at a loss to know how the present order is an improvement upon the previous one, except in the fact that in the matter of attending political meetings the students have now to be responsible both to the Government and the Principals of the Colleges. Though the present order is issued in modification of the previous order and to remedy some evils resulting from the latter, the general principle underlying the first order has not in the least been changed.

Students and politics.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

Referring to the same subject, the Lokopakari, of the 10th December, remarks :—The several resolutions that were on the agenda of the last meeting of the local Legislative Council about this Government order were withdrawn by the Members concerned only on the assurance of the Government that the matter was under their consideration. It was expected that the Government order would be cancelled altogether. But the revised order only transfers the power of enforcing the Government order to the Principals of Colleges. We can only describe this as a move from the frying pan into the fire, as far as the students are concerned.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 10th Dec. 1917.

The Prapanchamitran, of the 11th December, reproduces the above.

PRAPANCHAMITRAN, Madras. 11th Dec. 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 7th December, quotes the order recently passed by the Local Government modifying G.O. No. 559 prohibiting students from attending political meetings and says : —This revised order, of course shows, that the Government have now realised the fact that their original order was capable of doing more than good. It is stated in the new order that it is based upon a representation made by the Principals of Colleges. In reply to a question at the last meeting of the Legislative Council as to whether it was a fact that the majority of the Principals of Colleges and Headmasters of schools whom the Government had consulted expressed their inability to give effect to G.O. No 559, it was stated that the opinion implied in the question was wrong. But the revised order shows that, though the Principals did not express themselves against the original Government order, they criticised it. In response to a question on the same subject in the Imperial Legislative Council in September last, it was stated on behalf of the Government of India that a circular was sent round to Provincial Governments on the 4th May 1907 about students and that the Government did not think it necessary to issue any fresh instructions in the matter. The circular issued in 1907 is the famous Risley circular, which is by itself unnecessarily severe. So the people would be anxious to know whether the revision by the Local Government of G.O. No. 559 is due to their having opened their eyes, after the above statement of the Government of India, to the fact that they had exercised their power more severely than the other Government, or to their having been reminded by the Government of India of having exceeded their powers, without the latter's approval, or to their having been moved by the representation of the students and the public. If the other Provincial Government also should revise their orders on this subject, we can take it that the Government of India have interfered a little in this matter. Even the revised order is capable of producing mischievous results. The Government say that they rely upon the Principals of Colleges to give effect to their order. Some Principals may evince special interest in giving effect to it, with a view to gain the favour of or any ulterior benefits from, the Government and thereby mar the amity of feeling between them and the students. We pray this may not happen.

Students and politics.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

Referring to the G.O. No. 1531, Educational, issued in supersession of G.O. No. 559, a leader in the Manorama, of 11th December, says that a perusal of the former will clearly convince anybody that it only enforces more rigorously the latter. The discretion given to the Principals of Colleges in enforcing G.O. No. 559 is almost a proof to show that Government are not convinced of the rigorous nature of G.O. No. 559.

Students and politics.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 11th Dec. 1917.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 5th Dec. 1917

30. The Desamata, of the 5th December, reproduces the following in Telugu from the Amrita Bazar Patrika:—

The educational problem.

A report of the Government published recently says that in the five years 1909—1914 there has been an increase of 1,330,000 students in India, which is an encouraging progress. When we read these words we, like our Anglo-Indian critics, were under the false impression that education was fast spreading. But when we examined the figures critically we were disappointed. In India, out of a school-going population of three crores and eighty lakhs, only seventy-five lakhs of boys receive education. If we go on at the present rate, it will take 110 years for all the boys of the school-going age to receive education. So those who are satisfied with this rate—which is the rate in the time of Lord Hardinge—may say in the year 2026 that the whole population has received elementary education. But this rate is not likely to last for ever. . . From a report of the Director of Education in the Philippines, it would appear that the American rulers have shown an advancement in education such as no European nation has shown in the Colonies. When the work of the Americans in the matter of education in the Philippines is contrasted with that of the English in India, the latter will appear to be very unsatisfactory. . . To every two children receiving education in India, there are five in the Philippines. The period of British rule in India is now ten times longer than the period of American rule in the Philippines. The Americans are giving the people of the Philippine Islands such education as will be of use to them in their daily life, and not literary education like that given to us by the English. It is the chief aim of the Education Department in Manila to train pupils so that they may be wise and honourable citizens, that they may attain proficiency in agriculture, industries, etc., and that they may administer the country for themselves.

IDEAL TEACHER OR PERASIRIYAN, Madras, August 1917.

The Ideal Teacher or Perasiriyan, for August, reproduces from the Dravidan, of the 1st November, an article on this subject abstracted in paragraph 19 of Report No. 45 of 1917.

Educational progress.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

31. The Andhrapatrika, of the 7th December, says:—From the order of the Government now issued, and from the answer given by the Governor of Bombay, it appears that the authorities fear danger from students attending political meetings. But it is not known how dangers that are not to be met with in the civilised world would occur here. Not only do students in England attend political meetings, but they also take part in politics. In the matter of parliamentary elections, students deliver political speeches in various places. In 1907 when expressing his disapproval of the partition of Bengal, Doctor Nayar said in the Victoria Public Hall that he and the brother of Sir B. Fuller took active part in politics in England while they were students. Mr. Ramalinga Reddi said on his return from England that students in England took part in politics, and that he also did so. It is under such circumstances strange that in India even the attendance of students at political meetings is deemed an evil. . . We cannot say that students will be spoiled if they lend their ears to the words of advice of leaders ike Mr. Malaviya and Mr. Gandhi. . . If the students' opportunities to acquire a knowledge of the world be limited his progress will be stunted. It will not be possible for him to have a broad outlook. He cannot be enthusiastic about service to the country. The student may not take an active part in politics. But what objection can there be for him to acquire a knowledge of politics? It may be imagined what future progress a student can make who is prohibited from attending a meeting of the Congress, at which the leaders of the country assemble to discuss political questions affecting the country. . . When a Hindu student attends a lecture about Christianity and becomes a convert, great confusion will be caused in the Hindu society. The readers may surmise how an order prohibiting students from attending social and religious meetings, for that reason will be looked upon. We are at a loss to know why the issue of special rules was found necessary only in the case of political meetings. . . We are grateful to the rulers for cancelling G.O. No. 559, which agitated the whole of the Madras Presidency, and for leaving the responsibility to the college authorities. This betokens

Students and political meetings.

the beginning of a new era in the policy of the Government. We pray that the Government will remove all restrictions as time goes on.

Students in Tinnevelly.

32. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 8th December, has the following in its news columns :—Students of the non-Brahman party in Tinnevelly in the third and fourth standards have written to the College Principal that the Brahman students in the sixth Form should not be promoted to the College classes until they themselves are promoted to the fifth form. This is doubtless a most extraordinary prayer. It seems to us that the students are not themselves the authors of it.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 8th Dec. 1917.

Education.

33. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 6th December, has a leader on the education of Muhammadans in which the editor makes, among others, the following observations :—The community needs no more graduates now, any addition to thier number would prove fatal. The existing Mussalman graduates have nothing to look to but Government service. The Hindus are already in possession of all Government appointments, and by their long service are qualifying for new places. Besides their religious prejudice makes it difficult for Mussalmans to gain admission into the circle of the public service. How long can the Government continue creating places for them ? When many graduates apply for a few vacant posts, the Government itself is at loss what to do.

JARID H-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

It would be better, if the leaders of the community were to exert themselves in, to promote elementary education so that the dark ignorance might be dispelled, and the mind of every individual be illumined by the brilliant rays of enlightenment. Along with this they should establish and support technical institutions.

Water-scarcity in Trichinopoly.

34. A correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 7th December, attributes the prevalence of cholera in Trichinopoly now to the inability of the people especially the masses to have an adequate supply of drinking water ever since the metres were introduced in this town and, observing that, if the money spent upon purchasing about 80 metres had been utilised in digging another well or getting another engine, the quantity of water supplied to the town could be increased, expresses the fear that the introduction of the metres will share the same fate as the scheme which was promulgated by one engineer of building a reservoir on the rock in the centre of the town for which more than Rs. 50,000 have been spent and which was subsequently condemned by another engineer.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

Muhammadans on Municipal Councils.

35. The Qaumi Report, of the 6th December, writes :—Lord Morley's scheme certainly placed the Muhammadans under a debt of gratitude, inasmuch as it gave the right to a few selected individuals to representing their community on the Legislative Councils. Although the number is very limited, and the existence or non-existence of the privilege amounts to the same thing, it does afford a little comfort. It is, however, deplorable to find that the number of Muhammadans on Municipal Councils is infinitesimal though they possess houses in the city, carry on their business in them, and pay taxes. The existing example of Madras is before our eyes. On the great Corporation of the City Council there is only one elected Muhammadan. We have already stated that unless the Government grant Muhammadans the right of separate election to Municipalities as is already the case with the Legislative Councils, we cannot obtain our civic rights, and Muhammadan representation will always depend on the mercy and generosity of other communities. There are several qualified Muhammadans in Madras, but the ordinary method of election has kept them in the back ground, and they can never succeed at the elections. The Government sees the result, but on its own initiative does nothing to remedy matters. Nor does it take any petitions from Muhammadans. We hear that the Municipal Act is being amended, but God knows whether the necessary amendment has been made in it or no.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

Recently our contemporary the Daily Gazette published an article regarding the Sindh Municipality, from which it appears that the Government of Bombay has turned its attention to the reasonable complaints of the Muhammadans, and has ordered that the Muhammadans of Sindh may, in future, be given the right of separate election.

His Excellency Lord Willingdon's appreciation of right and justice deserves thanks, and we are sure that the Government of Madras will also secure similar reasonable right for Muhammadans, and will not allow their national representation to suffer. If we compare the list of elected Muhammadan members at Karachi and Hyderabad, etc., published in the Daily Gazette, with that of Madras and other districts, we shall find that the state of Madras, Trichinopoly, Tanjore, and Malabar is much worse ; and in our province the number of Muhammadans is nil. Is not this fact sufficient for consideration and reflection that the City of Madras, which consists of a large Muhammadan population, has only one elected member, who was able to get a seat after ten years' endeavour? And again the districts of Malabar and Tanjore, which contain the largest proportion of Muhammadans, have such a small number of our members on their Municipal Councils that one does not need even one's fingers to count them on. We do not know how long the Government of Madras is going to put patience and silence to the test, how long we have to bear the injury caused by the loss of our rights. The Muhammadans of the United Provinces have gained the right of separate election, and the Government of Sindh has also rectified the mistake. But our benighted Madras even now lulls us to sleep, and our leaders, like Mr. Asquith, are teaching us the lesson of "wait and see" now the time for maintaining silence is gone, and we now cry in the market place that our national right should be granted to us at an early date.

36. The Swadesamitran, of the 10th December, is surprised at the Tanjore District Board having refused permission to the Madras Provincial Railway Company to run trains on the Tiruturaipūndi-Vēdāranniyam line and adds: If the request of this company had been granted it would be helping an Indian concern and, besides relieving the existing pressure in the railway traffic, bring in interest for the amount invested by the Tanjore District Board on this line. We hope, therefore, that if the matter comes up before the board again, they would view the request of the company sympathetically and grant the same.

Rise in the price of salt.

37. In expressing its satisfaction at the steps taken by the Municipal Council, Lahore, for selling articles of daily consumption to the people at reasonable rates in order to relieve the hardships caused to them by the inordinate rise in the price of foodstuffs there, the Swadesamitran, of the 1st December, refers to the recent rise in the price of salt in Madras and observes that the authorities should consider the trouble and loss to which the poor are put by this rise in the price of salt and suggests the desirability of opening Government depots in important parts of the city for selling salt to the people at reasonable rates.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 6th December, is glad to understand that the Government intend opening shops in different places for selling salt and adds that all people may expect the poor to be benefited by this arrangement.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

Referring to the same subject, the Desabhaktan, of the 8th December, writes:—What is the reason for the present scarcity of salt and rise in its price? We expect a supply of salt from Manchester, Liverpool and other countries instead of manufacturing the salt required for us from the waters of the sea around us. On account of the present European war, the import of foreign salt has ceased and we are not in a position to manufacture an adequate quantity of salt here. The merchants, knowing this, have increased the price of salt. A prolongation of the war may also bring about a famine of salt in the country. Therefore, strenuous efforts should be made to manufacture salt here sufficient to meet the demand of the 35 crores of people, and we hope that the Government will render great assistance to this matter. Further, Indians should try to give up their habit of depending on the western countries for their necessaries of life and let our readers know that Home Rule alone will pave the way for this.

Rise in the price of salt.

Referring to the abnormal rise in the price of salt, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 12th December points out that, as it affects both the poor and the middle classes very much, the authorities should take steps to remedy this hardship.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 12th Dec. 1917.

Location of taverns.

38. The Yadartavachani, of the 24th November, refers to the suggestion made at the meeting of the Tanjore Excise Advisory Committee on the 21st idem, that the decision of the Salem Advisory Committee to locate the taverns outside the town limits might be adopted in the Tanjore district, not having been carried out, and observes:—We are of opinion that the consumption of liquor can be reduced if the taverns are located outside the town limits, the number of such shops and the period during which they are open are reduced and they are also closed on festival days. It will not do merely to see that the revenue derived from these shops is not curtailed and that their location is convenient for purposes of police surveillance. The important thing is to try to reduce the consumption of liquor. Several laws and regulations appear to have been introduced in England, Russia and other countries to curtail the drink evil; and we urge that it is necessary to pass such laws and regulations in India also.

Responsible Government.

40. The Swadesamitran, of the 4th December, refers to the assurance given by the Secretary of State for India in the British Parliament on the 20th August last about the policy of the Government with regard to the Indian administration and, construing this to mean that the Indians would be granted step by step a system of government based on the principle of Home Rule, observes:—Considering the various proposals that are now in the air about the reforms to be introduced in India, we think it necessary that our readers should have a clear idea of the meaning of the assurance given by the Secretary of State. We will construe it only in one way. The executive officials should be completely subject to the Legislative Councils. The privilege of electing representatives to the Councils can be extended gradually. Any other decentralization than this will not give the people a responsible government, and if we accept any other alternative it will prove to be a vain disappointment to us. It is very necessary that we should realise this and agitate for having it. The results of our agitation will depend upon the extent of our co-operation. We cannot have a more convenient opportunity than this. We hope our readers will realise the attitude of Mr. Montagu, who, attaching a greater importance to his duty even in this stress of war, has crossed the seas ignoring the risk he was running and is conducting an inquiry in this country putting up with the several restrictions that are placed upon him. Any sign of disunion or nervousness on our part will only weaken our position. So our readers should note that we would be helping him by framing a scheme of reforms in accordance with the principle laid down by him in Parliament and stand by it unitedly.

Indians and higher appointments.

41. The Hindu Nesan, of the 4th December, takes exception to the Advocate-Generalship of Bengal having been conferred upon an English Barrister, ignoring the claims of Mr. B. C. Mitter, who was acting in this place, and remarks that it does not reflect credit upon the Government that they should, while making a show of conferring higher appointments on Indians, fail to confirm Indians even in posts in which they can do justice very easily.

Anglo-Indians.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 5th December, says:—The weakness of India is an obstacle to the efficiency of the empire. English statesmen are endeavouring to remove it. But shortsighted people are satisfied with present gains. The Anglo-Indians are afraid that they may sustain commercial loss and lose their influence and arbitrary power. As the Anglo-Indians are the advisers of the liberal Englishmen, progress is retarded. Broad-minded Englishmen know nothing about India. All their knowledge is based on administrative reports. They do not well know the elements required for a new creation, but the truth has been slowly revealing itself to them. They have, therefore, removed repression. The Anglo-Indians having been moving heaven and earth on account of this.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 4th Dec. 1917.

The Anglo-Indian Association and the officials.

43. The Swadesamitran, of the 4th December, contrasts the reply of the Madras Government to a question at the last meeting of the Legislative Council about the fact of officials being members of the Anglo-Indian Association, that the matter was under the consideration of the Government, with the reply of the Bombay Government to a question on the same subject that steps were being taken to see that officials are not members of that association, and adds:—Every one will, doubtless, see the difference between the replies of these two Provincial Governments on this subject. There is a rumour that the Local Government are not liberally disposed in the matter of the reforms we should have in the future. Are we to take their reply in respect of the Anglo-Indian Association as an indication of this illiberal attitude of theirs?

44. The Hindu Nesan, of the 4th December, is surprised at the proposed legislation in Bombay to prevent people resorting to beggary as a profession and suggests the desirability of separate work-houses being started for the Indians on the lines of the Friend-in-Need Society in Madras, so as to enable poor people to avoid beggary and have a means of livelihood.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

The Committee to enquire about the interned under the Defence of India Act.

45. The Desabhaktan, of the 7th December, hails with satisfaction the nomination of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice C. V. Kumaraswami Sastriyar as a member of this committee and observes that, as his liberal views, strength of mind and legal acumen are appreciated by both the Government and the people, he can be expected to be quite fair in his decision.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 10th Dec. 1917.

The Internment Committee.

The Swadesamitran, of the 10th December, is glad to learn from the Bombay Chronicle that the British Cabinet have suggested to the Government of India that Messrs. Tilak and Gandhi might be nominated as members of this committee, and remarks:—The very mention of the possibility of these two gentlemen being nominated to the committee may strike terror into the minds of the Anglo-Indians and the bureaucrats. Nevertheless, if these two eminent patriots are, in fact, included in this important committee, it will doubtless lead to the people to have complete confidence in it. We are, therefore, anxious to hear of this nomination.

46. A correspondent contributes the following stray observations on different subjects, to the Dravidan, of the 4th December:—The local Legislative Council has met and dissolved. Various questions were asked and a number of resolutions moved. But many of the Brahman members were not satisfied with this. Why? G.O. No. 559 was not cancelled! Many may wish to know why the popular leaders, working for the cause of the country, should be so anxious about this Government Order and take so much trouble about it? There is a reason for it. The Tiruppur Nayudu will be taken in a procession and a crowd will have to go before the carriage. Who else but students can do this? Evidently this cannot be done hereafter.

Stray notes.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 4th Dec. 1917.

The meeting of the Senate is over. One member proposed that the scale of school fees should be reduced and another member that the standard of marks should be lowered. Both are very good suggestions indeed! Brahman B.A.'s will increase immensely. These members did not spend any thought over what value can be attached to these cheap graduates! The existing B A.'s cannot find a means of living. If their number goes on increasing, how can they get a means of livelihood?

The Swadesamitran condemns the Indo-European agreement at Calcutta. It wants the Government to be responsible to the people. True. We too approve of it. But if complete Home Rule is granted immediately, will the Government become responsible to the people? We doubt it. It is only six per cent of the people that are literate and even among these, the Brahmans are in the majority. Under these circumstances, will Home Rule be a government responsible to the people or to publishers of books and journals such as Mrs. Annie Besant and Messrs. Rangaswami Ayyangar and G. A. Natesan?

Mr. Eardley Norton at Tinnevelly.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

The Dravidan, of the 4th December, characterises the views expressed by Mr. Norton at this Conference as being mostly inaccurate and, observing that, as he was associating much with Brahman vakils when he was in Madras, he has not perhaps been able to realise the hardships suffered by the non-Brahmans adds:—He says that, if the non-Brahmans have not come up to the level of the Brahmans, they should blame their own lethargy in the matter and not be jealous of the Brahmans and abuse them. Though we admit that the absence of progress among us is due to our own negligence, Mr. Norton is not right in accusing us of being jealous of the Brahmans and abusing them. We never abuse any one unnecessarily, nor are we jealous of any one. But, as it is a world-known fact that the Brahmans have long been obstructing by various devices the progress of our community, we have, in dealing with the impediments to our advancement, to dwell a little on the nature of the Brahmans and the necessity of our being careful with them. Otherwise, we are quite fraternal with the Brahmans and we do not hate them. Is it fair on the part of Mr. Norton to find fault with us without realising this?

Mr. Norton at the Tinnevelly Conference.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 4th Dec. 1917.

The Dravidan, of the 10th December, contrasts the recent speech of Mr. Norton at Tinnevelly with one said to have been delivered by him at Coimbatore in August last warning Indians against aspiring for Home Rule, and observes that Mr. Norton has no settled views and that his knowledge is confined only to law and not politics.

An appeal to the non-Brahmans.

49. A correspondent of the Dravidan, of the 4th December, appeals in the following strain to the non-Brahmans to stand by Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar and Dr. T. M. Nayar:—The Brahmans may try to allure us in many ways. They will wait for a favourable opportunity and encourage us. They will give us hopes and dupe us. Do not trust them hereafter.

On every side you see the Brahman authority preponderating and their committing excesses. They have learnt to rob us of our money and abuse us. They have now ungratefully set up a big agitation against the Government unmindful of the fact that the latter are now engaged in a serious war and are doing everything possible to help us at this juncture. It is we that go to the front and shed our blood. It is we that establish temples, choultries, etc. But it is the Brahmans that are ready to wring money from us on occasions of marriage or death and other ceremonies. Not content with the profit and influence they gain by this, they are treating us in the worst manner possible.

ST. ANTHONY'S MESSENGER, Trichinopoly, December 1917.

Home Rule.

51. In the course of an article contributed by a correspondent to the St. Anthony's Messenger, for December, where the writer appeals to the Indian Catholic Chritians to stand firm in their loyalty to their King, the following observations occur:—A few people in India have, for some time past, been blindly crying for Home Rule. However good Home Rule may be, there is a time for demanding it and it should also be done in a particular manner. But it is a very difficult task to unify the people in India and establish Home Rule among them on account of their being divided by caste, creed and languages. In these circumstances Home Rule will give room to a play for self-interest and prejudice the public interest, as certain castes will then gain power to increase their dignity and wealth and think of lowering others. What will the Indian Catholics, who form a microscopic minority in the Indian population, do then to safeguard their interests? The British are ruling India in the interests of the public and Home Rule will affect the Indian Catholics prejudicially. When it is admitted that the British Government is necessary for India, it is especially so for the Catholics. Therefore, O Catholic brethren, be not duped by high hopes. You are bound to be loyal to the Government, who are ruling the country now.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 12th Dec. 1917.

Home Rule.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 12th December, writes:—The Europeans in India are bent on preventing the grant of reforms such as Home Rule. They number only 3 lakhs in our country, while we are more than 3 crores. We have not the unity among us which they have. Their unity makes it impossible for us to gain our wishes: to obtain Home Rule and derive the power to ensure that the taxes paid by us shall be spent in our own interests. We are unable to prevent their autocratic methods. It is no use regretting this circumstance. Why should folk who are so stupid as to create feuds among themselves on account of caste and religion think of Home Rule? The press law has laid down that those who create hatred between class and class should be punished. They are worse than idiots who think that justice is administered in this world to the rich and the poor alike. Although the law might seem to be the same for all, the way in which it is applied is different in the case of different people. As our elders have said, there is no salvation without knowledge. Communal representation can do no good to any community. The people can promote their advancement only when they understand their rights and responsibilities and gain the power to see that their representatives carry out their wishes. What does it matter to what community a coolie belongs? We have only to see that he is able to do his work. If once we grasp this point, there can be no room for quarrels over communal representation.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 14th Dec. 1917.

Home Rule.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 14th December, writes:—The Anglo-Indians say that the Indians are a most stupid lot, that they are incapable of protecting their own interests, that they (Anglo-Indians) would promote their well being and advancement and that, instead of granting Home Rule, it would be enough to continue all power in their own hands and effect some changes to see that the petty officers do not harass the people. The Indians find it difficult even to obtain interviews with these big personages. How are they to represent their grievances and obtain redress? It was reported in the Madras press that an Anglo-Indian got angry because a patient coughed and made him kiss his shoes and salaam. If people of this type should possess unrestrained power, it cannot be said that the people can get the benefit of a constitutional administration. The people pay the taxes and provide the money for paying big salaries to the officers of Government. The people should have the right to see that those who get their money do not prove treacherous to the employers themselves. This is what we mean by Home Rule. No right-minded person would say that we do not want this right.

The same paper in another article observes:—The Moslems of Calcutta communicated a resolution to Mr. Montagu urging the release of the interned patriots. Mr. Mahomed Ali asked the Government of India for an interview with Mr. Montagu. Their prayers were rejected. The opponents of Home Rule say that the unrestrained powers of the authorities are a source of harassment to the people, and that if the officers of Government are kept in proper check there is no need for Home Rule. What the people desire is that they should have the power to keep the officers within constitutional bounds when they are apt to be autocratic. Where the authorities are at fault others of their own class try to save them. Then, when the people are harassed, why should they not have the power to prevent such harassment?

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

Home Rule.

The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 8th December, writes:—At present Home Rule is talked of at every meeting. Articles for, and against, Home Rule are being published in all the newspapers whose pages are full of the proceedings of big meetings held for a similar purpose.

Nevertheless this result can easily be deduced even today that no community, except the Brahmans, is favourably disposed to Home Rule. In the Presidency of Madras and the Province of Mysore influential meetings of non-Brahmans are being held, at which reasonable opposition to Home Rule is being offered.

Though it may be very easy to get Home Rule it requires skill to use it. India is a land of divergences. It is not possible for the Hindus and the Muhammadans to conjointly manage things to their mutual advantage, and non-Brahmans will willingly accept the administration of Brahmans. At present the English papers are full of the reports of the agitation caused by non-Brahmans against the Brahmans' demand and the detailed description of the Brahman cruelty. Should the British grant Home Rule, quarrels will ensue among the Hindus and Mussalmans, Brahmans and non-Brahmans. Each community in defending its own rights will be destroying the rights of another.

Although the population of India consists of one per cent of Brahmans, yet their element dominates the administration. It will not be improper to call Indian Home Rule Brahman rule, for they will be the real rulers as non-Brahmans are comparatively uneducated and less powerful. All the qualifications for ruling have departed from the Muhammadans. They possess neither knowledge, wealth, sympathy nor fraternity. They neither adhere to their old customs nor accustom themselves to walk in new ways.

When the Brahmans alone are the active elements in the Indian Government, the grant of Home Rule to India, under such circumstances, will be like the granting of rule to Brahmans which will necessarily result in bloodshed and civil war among 99 per cent of the population, and will jeopardise the safety of the Brahmans themselves.

Mr. A. Subrahmanya Nayakar, the editor of the Vannikulamitran of Madras, is said to have explained to the audience what is meant by Home Rule, impressed on them the progress that can be had in education and industries by the acquisition of Home Rule and condemned the attitude of the Dravidians in this matter. One Mr. Ekambara Nayakar is reported to have dwelt upon the condition of agriculture, the difficulty experienced in the matter of cattle required therefor, the restrictions imposed by the Forest Department and the hardships resulting from the absence of village panchayats and observed that Home Rule was the only panacea for all these evils.

Adverting to a circular said to have been issued by an Assistant Collector in Bombay that it will savour of extreme ingratitude and disloyalty if the temple and Masjid committees failed to contribute their mite to the war loan, the Swadesamitran, of the 5th December, writes :—Though it will be admitted by all that everyone should help the war loan as much as possible, can it be ingratitude or disloyalty on the part of any, if he should fail to subscribe to it? Is there any rule under which the authorities can coerce the people to subscribe to the war-loan in this manner?

The authorities and the war loan.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

56. In the course of an article under this heading, the Desabhaktan, of the 8th December, says :—If the Government of any country are to command respect, they should attend to two things, viz., the adoption of such methods of administration as befit the nature and attitude of the people and the improvement of education among the subjects on national lines so as to be suitable to their customs and habits. But the majority of the people in India have no idea as to what system of education will be conducive to the progress of the country and the reason for this is the fact that the Government have given us no training in this matter. Some people are of opinion that Home Rule should not be demanded for this country now, when the majority of the people are illiterate, and that it should be acquired only when the country can boast of having not even one illiterate soul. This resembles the argument that one should wait to bathe in the sea till the beating of the waves ceases. How many educated people were there in great Britain in 1832, when the people were granted the right of expressing their opinions freely? Considering the condition of the British 80 years back, India, which wishes to have Home Rule now, can be said to be ten times better. The number of the literate in England was at that time very small, nor had the country any previous experience in the art of democratic Government. But India had, from time immemorial, enjoyed the reputation of having had an excellent system of Government, with laws sufficient to safeguard the interests of the people. The people of other countries may be said to have copied their political principles from our ancient methods of administration. So the British will only be enhancing their glory by granting Home Rule to India.

Home Rule and education.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

57. The Desabhaktan, of the 8th December, has a leader on the non-Brahman movement in which it traces the origin of the movement started by Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya

The non-Brahman movement.

Chettiyar and Dr. T. M. Nayar to a long pent-up hatred of the non-Brahmans against the Brahmans on account of the latter having come up in every line and treated the former with scant respect and, dwelling upon how it made the Brahmans change their attitude towards the non-Brahmans, takes exception to the leaders of this movement indulging in an abuse of the Brahmans and eminent leaders like Messrs. Tilak and Gandhi and Mrs. Annie Besant, opposing the Congress League scheme of reforms, assisting the Anglo-Indians in their mischievous acts against this country and preaching to the people that Home Rule means Brahman rule. It adds that it is this later phase of the efforts of this non-Brahman movement that necessitated the starting of the Madras Presidency Association and appeals to the non-Brahmans to join it in large numbers.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

The non-Brahman movement

The Andhrapatrika, of the 5th December, says:—Certain people, who do not wish the welfare of the country, have set about opposing the work of our leaders just at a time when that work is about to yield fruit. Why is this? The public could not know the reason. It is confidential. If it is disclosed, the secret will be out. Only a few of the old leaders know that great secret. They will not disclose it. They have to hide it and publish other reasons. As Anglo-Indians like Mr. Welby appear to be confidential advisers to these old leaders, it is to be inferred that they are at the bottom of this counter-movement. Though the other causes that do not bear mention cannot be disclosed, this may be mentioned as a true cause of this movement. Seeing that the Home Rule propaganda is spreading all over the country, and fearing that their gains and comforts may be affected, these Anglo-Indians, it may be stated with certainty, have prevailed upon certain Indians whose minds are confused and have begun to play the part of opponents. . . Thus the Anglo-Indians, who are our opponents have been able to set on foot temporarily a movement tending to obstruct the progress of the country. Since the beginning of the rule of the East India Company, they have not only been enjoying comforts which do not fall to the share of Maharajas and Padushaws, but they are also wont to take large sums of money with them. They have sent Indian articles to foreign lands and have become millionaires. Like the milkman of Madras, who muzzles the calf, starves it, milks the cow and sells the milk, these people have become accustomed to impoverish the Indians and use every thing for their own gain. In short, they have begun to look upon India as their heritage. So they have been devising ever so many expedients to oppose all the demands of the Indians for freedom. The first is to condemn all those who desire reforms for the good of the country as sedition-mongers. Another trick is to create enmity between one class and another. Another strange device is to send false news to the people of England. To represent to those who are prone to believe them, that the Indians are like brutes and are unfit for self-government is another. . . In the past the Anglo-Indians created enmity between the Hindus and the Muhammadans. But they now gave up that attempt and have caught some non-Brahmans in their trap.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakottai, 19th Nov. 1917.

Communal representation.

58. The Vaisyamitran, of the 19th November, refers to the demand now made by the several communities in India for separate representation for each of them in the Legislative Councils, and remarks:—If the numerous communities in India seek to send their representatives to these councils, the existing councils will become as crowded as a big congress. When the question of communal representation was referred to some leading non-Brahmans for opinion in 1907, men like the Maharaja of Bobbili, the Raja of Kollengode and Mr. Rajaratna Mudaliyar were against it, and the local Government as well as the Revenue Board also approved of this view then. Even now the number of non-Brahmans in the local bodies is sufficiently large and there is no necessity for us to demand separate representation. Our enemies are only awaiting such a demand from us to demonstrate to the authorities that we have no union among as. And again, if communal representation is granted, each community will look only to its own interests. So we implore our countrymen to avoid creating factions among us at this juncture, when our enemies, for fear that our object may be gained, are setting up several pleas, such as that the time has not yet come for us to have Home Rule and that all of us should become educated before we can have it, and to stand united in laying before the Secretary of State for India the scheme of reforms drafted by the Congress and the Muslim League.

DRAVIDABHIMANI, Salem, 30th Nov. 1917.

The Brahmans and non-Brahmans.

59. The Dravidabhimani, of the 30th November, accuses the Brahmans and a few non-Brahmans of Salem of actively trying to thwart the holding of the proposed non-Brahman Conference there on the 8th and the 9th December 1917, and appeals to the non-Brahmans to make united efforts to successfully hold the conference whatever the impediments and obstacles may be in the way, without being allured by the deceitful tactics of the Brahmans whom this paper charges with having divided the people by the institution of the caste system, based on false legends about the superiority of one class over another by birth.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

The Brahmans and non-Brahmans.

The Dravidan, of the 5th December, writes:—Our readers would have clearly understood that the hatred of the Brahmans is the cause of this movement. It is a matter known to all that the Brahmans in olden days lived upon the alms given by us, and are doing the same even now. When the Brahmans of those days grew degenerate, they began to think meanly of their profession and, growing jealous of us, learnt the English language and progressed therein. They gave up their Brahmanic principles altogether and began to wander about mad after money. What else could they do who had never seen money? But even now when they have amassed money and are in a prosperous condition, the old jealousy for the non-Brahman has not left them.

Weaving industry.

61. In the course of a long leader dwelling upon the causes which contributed to the decay of this industry in India and the present pitiable condition of the weavers in this country, the Dravidan, of the 5th December, refers to the evidence given by Mr. R. B. Eubank, I C.S., the Registrar of Co-operative Societies, Bombay, before the Indian Industries Commission, that most of the weavers in that Presidency are ignorant people addicted to drink and involved in debt, and observing that these remarks apply as well to the weavers of this Presidency, says:—It is quite certain that the weavers can by themselves do nothing to improve this industry without any help from the Government. In addition to adopting the suggestion of Mr. Eubank that a Director with a knowledge of the local vernaculars should be appointed by the Government to look after the several village industries, the Government should also introduce compulsory education and impart instruction in industries. If this is not done first, the appointment by Government of any number of Directors will be of no avail.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 4th & 6th Nov. 1917.

The Indian Industries Commission.

62. The Swadesamitran publishes in Tamil, in its issues of the 4th and 6th December, the written evidence of Mr. Kharimbhoy Adamji Pirbhoy before the Indian Industries Commission complaining that the Government have been showing an undue partiality to the European firms dealing in leather in India over the Indian firms.

SWADESAMITRAN & HINDU NESAN, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 6th December, as well as the Hindu Nesan, of the same date, also publish the oral examination of Mr. Kharimbhoy before the Commission.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

In commenting upon the above evidence, the Swadesamitran, of the 6th December, observes:—The Indian Industries Commission was brought into existence only to inquire how the industries in India can be improved. The Members of the Commission also have realised that this is their work and they have been conducting the inquiry till now only on this basis. Therefore the Commission should have given a sympathetic hearing to the allegations made by

Mr. Kharimbhoy and tried to ascertain the truth of the same. If they are proved to be true, it is for the Commission to suggest the method of preventing a repetition of what is alleged to have occurred, and, if they are proved to be false, Mr. Kharimbhoy is bound to take upon himself the responsibility for the false allegations made by him before the Commission In expressing grievances some officials will have to be found fault with. In such a case the proper course is only to send for such officials and ask them to have their say in the matter. So no one could approve of the attitude of Sir Thomas in declining to hear what Mr. Kharimbhoy had to say without giving an opportunity to the officials concerned to reply to the allegations made against them. The attempt of Sir Thomas to fight shy of Mr. Kharimbhoy, when the latter offers to prove every statement of his by means of records, does not form part of the duties of the President of the Commission. If either the objects of the Commission are to be accomplished or the innocence of the officials concerned has to be established, the allegations of Mr. Kharimbhoy should be heard first and then the officials sent for and asked to reply to the same. Or if Sir Thomas wishes to make the people understand that he represents the Government, as he has tried to do in assuring Mr. Kharimbhoy that the Government will not be partial to any one, it is his duty to send for the officials and after examining them orally prove that the allegations of Mr. Kharimbhoy are unfounded. Sir Thomas agreed to hear Mr. Kharimbhoy in camera. Where is the necessity for this secrecy? Perhaps Sir Thomas was afraid that, if officials were found fault with openly, their prestige would be curtailed. Considering the importance of the allegations made by Mr. Kharimbhoy, we would say that the British Government themselves should undertake an inquiry about them; for the present war in Mesopotamia is being carried on under the directions of the War Cabinet in London, and the question of an adequate supply of the materials required for the army operating in this region is connected with the work of this Cabinet. The Bombay Chronicle points to a letter in the Bombay Times which raises a suspicion that adequate materials are not sent to this front. It appears when the late General Maud was sitting in a tent unable to bear the heat of the sun, an officer suggested to him that he might move into a superior tent, and he seems to have replied that, unless he was in a position to provide superior tents for all the wounded soldiers, he would not care for his own comforts. If the Government had given orders for tents to all the Indian firms in India dealing therein, there would have been no necessity for the wounded troops in Mesopotamia suffering from the heat of the sun. It seems when an order was not given for more than 75 tents to the company of Mr. Kharimbhoy, which is reported to have made a name in this line and won the appreciation of Military officials for the excellence of its tents, an order was given for 1,000 or 1,500 tents to a European firm in Cawnpore. The latter company, it appears, did not know what tent-making was before the war, and it is also stated that the cost of taking a tent from this company to Bombay comes to Rs. 10, while the tents supplied by the company of Mr. Kharimbhoy can be conveyed to the harbour directly. We do not know how many thousands of tents have been purchased in Cawnpore and how many lakhs of our money have been wasted for this. It appears that a higher price has been given to the tents supplied by the Cawnpore Company than is given to those of Mr. Kharimbhoy's Company and this when the quality of the former is not superior to that of the latter and there is no difficulty in obtaining good tents, in that the Indian companies are sleeping for want of work. If these facts are true, the needs of the army have not been sufficiently attended to, the revenue of the country collected by means of taxes has been spent unnecessarily in excess and the industries of the country have not been patronised. We anxiously wait to see what the Government have to say and what they are going to do in this matter.

The Indian Industries Commission.

The Lokopakari, of the 10th December, also refers to the evidence of Mr. Kharimbhoy Adamjee Peerbhoy before this Commission and the discussion between him and Sir Thomas Holland, and observes:—This Commission was brought into existence by the Government with the best of intentions and if it does not conduct its inquiries impartially India cannot benefit thereby.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 10th Dec. 1917.

The evidence of Mr. Adamji Peerbhoy makes it clear that it is due to the devices of the bureaucrats that Indian industrial concerns have not improved. While the object of this commission is to remove all obstacles to the industrial advancement in this country, it is really surprising to see the members of this Commission forget this object and, instead of thankfully admitting witnesses who come forward to speak of such obstacles and encouraging them, try to browbeat them. This proves the justice of the demand of the Indians that they should be in the majority in the Commissions appointed to secure the advancement of India. It is quite natural that the bureaucracy should try to safeguard the interests of the Anglo-Indians. This is the reason why the Indians have been requesting the British Government to reform the Indian administrative machinery so as to help India to improve her condition.

The Prapanchamitran, of the 11th December, reproduces the above.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakottai, 26th Nov. 1917.

63. The Vaisyamitran, of the 26th November, welcomes the Right Hon'ble Mr. E. S. Montagu to India and observes:—Our ancient shastras bear sufficient testimony to the facts that India once enjoyed complete freedom and that her people had been esteemed by all as being civilized when those of other continents had not even known what the meaning of the word civilization was. If we consider the world to be a family consisting of different communities, India should be said to be the eldest member thereof and she has been a guiding star for her sister countries, as a senior member of a family ought to be. Why should we go to the past and why should we complain when we are being ruled for the last 200 years by the English who are the most civilized and mighty power on earth? The reply to this question is quite plain. Though it is now 99 years since the Marquis of Hastings, who was the Governor-General of India in the days of the East India Company, wrote in his confidential diary in 1818 that it was the desire of England to hand over the administration of India in tact to her people and though this view is shared even now by broad-minded statesmen, it is not approved by the short-sighted non-official Anglo-Indian merchants. This is because they are afraid that their business will be affected by the grant of Home Rule to India. They are not only agitating in the press that India is not fit for Home Rule but are also trying to poison the mind of the British statesmen in this matter. After keeping quiet for 200 years, without giving the Indians responsible appointments under the Government and teaching them the methods of administration, to say that they should learn everything only hereafter cannot be a sound argument. Indians could not render assistance in the present great war, because the bureaucrats had not till now appointed them to responsible posts and given them military training. Further, if sufficient facilities had been provided in India for converting her raw products into manufactured articles, she could have rendered, like other countries, great assistance at this time. It is because the Indians were not allowed to improve their condition, they have become incapacitated to render any help to England at this time of trouble. Moreover, in no other country in the world have the people been prevented from carrying arms as is done in India, and again innumerable are the repressive laws and measures that are introduced here from time to time not to speak of the famines in the country and the consequent poverty of the people. In her present condition India is more a burden on England than a help to her and this in spite of her vast population and the immensity of her raw products and mineral wealth. All this is due to the short-sighted policy of the bureaucrats. This has been realised by the British public only now, and it is for this Mr. Montagu has come here. We trust that he will consult our leaders and merit the esteem of both India and the Empire by granting Home Rule to the former

Mr. Montagu's visit to India.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 11th December, expresses its surprise at the list of deputations to wait on Mr. Montagu here and writes:—We can easily presume not only from the official powers they have, but also from the retrograde policy they have recently been adopting that the responsibility for this list rests with the local Government. Our readers are aware of the numerous associations that have recently been started which vaunt about the support they have from the Government and which express themselves against Home Rule, unless it befits them materially, and it is curious to see that these associations, whose views are against those of the Madras Mahajana Sabha, the Madras Congress Committee and the local branch of the Muslim League, have been allowed to present the addresses to Mr. Montagu. Associations like the Arya Vaisya Mahasabha and the Viswakarma Sabha, which have been working for the betterment of their communities, have been denied the opportunity to meet Mr. Montagu, and we do not know if this is due to the necessity to give undue importance to the new institutions abovementioned or to other causes. The South India Liberal Federation, which was stated to have been started recently when its name came to light in October last, the Triplicane Dravidan Association, which was originally started only to work for the educational advancement of non-Brahman youths, a group of representatives nominated by the South Indian Peoples' Association, which is a company incorporated for running newspapers, and the two associations noted above in the conferences held in different places by their combined efforts—these three have been given the opportunity to wait on Mr. Montagu and to present their addresses to him. But the Madras Presidency Association started by illustrious non-Brahman leaders enjoying the full confidence of the public to seek the welfare and advancement of the country, under the impression that the spirit of disunion created in the country by the associations noted above would be productive of harmful results, has not been permitted to present its address to the Secretary of State. What impression will the people have when this association with eminent non-Brahman leaders on its board is denied the right which is given to other associations which hold contrary views? We do not know on the strenuous efforts of which official rests the credit of having given to the new Islamiah League the honour of a deputation. The Newington Old Boys' Association and some individual zamindars have been given the opportunity to present their views to Mr. Montagu as against the address which was to have been presented by the Landholders' Association and which has been dropped on account of some internal dissension. Many may doubt whether the members of the Newington Old Boys' Association will after all be "New boys" in the field of politics which they are just now entering. We need not say that it is necessary on the part of Mr. Montagu to set right these irregularities as soon as he comes to this city. If this is not done, the disappointment caused thereby to the people of this presidency may curtail the confidence they have that proper reforms would be introduced.

Mr. Montagu's visit to Madras.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 7th Dec. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

The Swadeshabhimani, of the 7th December, writes:— Although Mr. Montagu and his party have commenced their work, their methods are reported to be very curious. Mr. Montagu will not speak personally. Like the orthodox Hindu bride who remains profoundly silent in the presence of her husband, father-in-law and others as a mark of respect, if Mr. Montagu too is silent on account of the bureaucracy here, it is certainly most regrettable. If the bride remains silent in the presence of her elders, it shows her deference. Is Mr. Montagu come here to show his deference to the bureaucracy? No. He travelled a distance of some 5,000 miles in order to ascertain the political aspirations of the people and to draw up a scheme of reforms accordingly. But like the priest who does all the ritual at the marriage, His Excellency the Viceroy introduces the visitors and acknowledges their homage and Mr. Montagu only shakes hands with them. Will this help the Secretary of State to know the true aspirations of the people? If he is only to hear, why should he not have received the swaraj petitions in England itself through a big P & O steamer. He would at least have saved himself the trouble of coming all this distance. Everybody now sees the defect of the present arrangement, and the Press and popular leaders are alike urging that Mr. Montagu should freely and unreservedly ask questions to the representatives and ascertain true public opinion.

The same paper in another article on the subject says:—Mr. Montagu's party at Calcutta is the same as at Delhi. It is therefore needless to point out that the glorious presence of His Excellency the Viceroy is also there. Though Mr. Montagu has chosen to be profoundly silent during his stay in India, the Reception Committee of the Congress had invited him to its forthcoming session so that he may have the opportunity of knowing the true trend of public opinion in India. The invitation was declined with the excuse that the programme could not be altered. The enterprising leaders of the Madras Provincial Congress Committee have decided to hold a Provincial Conference on the occasion of Mr. Montagu's visit to Madras and invite him to the same. It is to be hoped that there will be nothing to prevent the acceptance of this invitation at least.

The Swadesamitran, of the 8th December, also publishes in Tamil the gist of of the above address, and comments upon it in the following strain:— Mr. Durai Raja says that we are not fit for Home Rule now. He speaks as if he is unaware of the fact that what we demand now is not Home Rule but only reforms which would lead to it. He observes that those who exercise the right of voting should be educated men having a knowledge of worldly affairs. Let him read the histories of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and other countries, and see if the people of those countries had the qualifications described by him when they were granted the right of voting. He regrets that Brahmans predominate in Government service. Did the Brahmans prevent the non-Brahmans from getting appointments? He admits that the Government plead want of funds for spreading education. If the control of the purse is in the hands of the popular representatives, will it not be possible to spread education widely? Eventually, he approves of the Congress scheme with slight modifications. The majority of the nineteen members of the Imperial Legislative Council, who first drafted this scheme, are non-Brahmans. They treated all Indians alike and demanded that the Indians as a class should have a larger number of seats in the Councils of the Empire. As Mr. Durai Raja and others are imbued with a feeling of caste hatred, they create numerous divisions among Indians.

The Desabhaktan, of the 10th December, also refers to the speech of Mr. Durai Raja and quoting extracts from the past utterances of Messrs. Dadhabai Naoroji and Gokhale to disprove the statement of Mr. Durai Raja that these two eminent patriots were against the scheme of reforms embodied in the memorandum of the nineteen, expresses its regret at one, who was born in a royal family, forgetting his magnanimity as a Kshatriya and declaring that India is not fit for swaraj.

The Kurnool District Conference.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th December, reports the President of the Kurnool District Conference to have said:—Our opponents say that the masses will be ruined if the protection of the bureaucracy is removed. Did the Civilians ever try to know the disabilities of the people? How many of them are acquainted with the vernaculars? How many of those acquainted with the vernaculars move with the people and try to know their hardships? Do they know to what expense the village officers are put when they tour through the villages, and how much the things supplied to them are undervalued? Do they know to what devices the village officers resort to make up the deficiency? Have they done anything to put a stop to this? Have they taken any steps to see that in levying income tax, the poor are not heavily taxed and the rich, lightly? Have they made any impartial enquiry in imposing this tax? Are they aware of the mischiefs done by the police and do they know how the police annoy the poor and the ignorant? How are the security sections of the Criminal Procedure Code put into force? Do they know that povert y is proving to be an offence? The ryots labour under many forest restrictions. Do the officers know how difficult it is to prevent cattle from going into the forest in villages where the forests are situated in close proximity to the villages? In some parts, mountains without grass or trees, have been reserved. These mountains serve the purpose of causing the cattle trespassing on them to be impounded. Do these officers know how the forest subordinate officers take bribes? How many of the ryots' petitions reach the higher officer and how many are disposed of in their favour? There is no use dwelling on these things at great length. Nothing can be more untrue than to say that the bureaucratic authorities love the masses more than the leaders of the people. . . The non-Brahman movement only betrays the hatred of the non-Brahmans, who think that the Brahmans make a monopoly of the Government appointments. The unwisdom of this supposition will become plain from an examination of the facts. Who gives the appointments? In whose hands does the confirmation or cancellation of the appointments lie. It is the Civilian officers that possess this authority. Do the non-Brahmans say that the Brahmans have influenced them? If so, is it not plain that the Civilians are not discharging their duties as creditably as they are represented to be? If the District Officer does not on representation made to him rectify the mistakes of his subordinates, is that not his fault? We have now to struggle with the Brahmans and with the members of the bureaucracy who are solicitous to retain their authority. Even supposing that the Brahmans will weild the whole authority under self-government, I can truly assert that there will then be no necessity for such a struggle with the bureaucracy.

The Nellore District Conference.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 8th December, reports the President of the Nellore District Conference to have said:—Promises to grant reforms cannot please us. We can no longer be slaves to the Anglo-Indians and be at their mercy. It is not statesmanlike to cause despair to any nation. We are British citizens and as such we want all the rights that they possess. We demand that we should be afforded an opportunity for self-government.

For a century past, the Indians have been suffering the evils of bureaucratic power. The authorities raise the usual objection that the people cannot take any part in the administration so long as they are not educated. They say that the country is being well administered. This argument will satisfy only the foreigners who reside in this country temporarily, but not the millions of Indians. We wish that the Government will grant us the reforms of the Congress League as a first step in self-government. The selfishness of the Anglo-Indians who decry justice and the welfare of the mankind should no longer be allowed to continue. As India is overgoverned, the faculties of the people are decaying. Indians should take a great share in the administration. We cannot, with self-respect, quietly agree to the superiority and contempt shown by the Anglo-Indians. We should make them understand that they are not our lords, that they came to this country to seek their livelihood, that they should behave in a friendly way towards the Indians, and that the rulers would treat the Indians and the Anglo-Indians alike. George Yule said:—" . . . We have no citizens' rights in India and are traitors in India." India and England cannot be united by any bonds of arbitrary authority! . . . The average annual income of an Indian is Rs. 30. When we contrast this with Rs. 40 spent on each prisoner, the difference will be evident. Under these circumstances, the poor cannot afford to give education to their children. They live in insanitary surroundings and are unhealthy.

77. A correspondent to the Hindu Nesan, of the 8th December, disproves in the course of a long article the plea now set up by some that the Indians are unfit for Home Rule and observing that there is no doubt whatever about the fitness of Indians for Home Rule, remarks:—Let us suppose a capitalist carrying on a good trade dies leaving four sons, too young to manage their business, and a stranger offers to manage it for them. The business brings in good profits and the new manager spends them as he likes and helps all his relations. When the boys come of age, they understand how much profit has been made in the business and how much has been spent away by the manager. If they then ask the manager to hand over the business to them, on the ground that his management has reduced them almost to poverty, and if he refuses to do so, saying that the business is his, having been sold to him by word of mouth by their father, how will the boys take it and how much pain will it cause them? Importation of coffee.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 10th Dec. 1917.

80. Adverting to the address presented by the European Association at Calcutta to Mr. Montagu, the Swadesamitran, of the 8th December, observes:—It appears that several Englishmen in this country were originally under the impression that the announcement, made on the 20th August last by the British Cabinet and the Government of India, that the conferment of Home Rule on India was the aim of the English rule, would share the same fate of many pledges made on paper till now. That is why they did not attach much importance to this announcement in the beginning. Many among this community, who had come to India, with the arrogance of belonging to the ruling race, to seize the wealth of this country by trade and other means, were not able till now to speak disparagingly, without any shyness or fear, of the condition of the original inhabitants of this country, on whose bounty they are living. Though cases have often come before courts against rude British subjects for having insulted or teased Indians, their community have condemned such acts and laid stress on the fact that the Indians had an equal status with the Englishmen as the subjects of the same Emperor. Though they did not admit that this equality of status settled the share the Indians had in political privileges and though they considered that the facilities and advantages enjoyed by their community in the administration should not be curtailed in the least, they did not venture to assert that there was no hope whatever for the Indians in these matters. They were content with trying to delay, as much as possible, the accomplishment of the object of the Indians, whenever the latter were about to have some reforms for which they have been pressing the authorities and to make such reforms ineffective in practice.

The European Association and Home Rule for India.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

But they never denied completely that the ideal of the Indians was Home Rule. But seeing that we have passed these stages and that the British Parliament have decided to introduce such reforms in India as will lead to Home Rule, the Anglo-Indians in this country, excepting the wise and far-sighted among them, have openly expressed in their address to Mr. Montagu that the Indians cannot even dream of Home Rule. The supporters of the European Association in India, who are not personally affected by the hardships of the war and who care more for their own comforts, have not spent any thought over the fact that their colleagues in England, who are sacrificing themselves and their Indian brethren in the field of war in order to protect liberty, have decided to grant the same liberty to the Indians and have sent the Secretary of State for India here with that object. The opinion of the European Association is that even reforms which approach Home Rule will prove to be dangerous to India. If these words are not taken to have been uttered in fun, they should be deemed to be only meaningless blabbing. When there is on one side the assurance of the King-Emperor and his Cabinet that Home Rule is their ideal and that it will be reached as soon as possible and there is on the other side the encouraging speech of our Viceroy in this matter, this association has not attached any weight to these things. But in the midst of all this agitation, they have made one thing clear. Some among us, who thought it was a mistake not to take them into our confidence in demanding Home Rule for India, need not have any more doubts. It is also necessary that some others who were till now supporting the setting of caste against caste and other mischievous acts, should cease to do so. We hope that these would, hereafter at least, give up their diffidence and jealousy and come forward to unite with other people and strive for Home Rule.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 10th Dec. 1917.

False titles.

81. The Desabhaktan, of the 10th December, invites the attention of the Government to some local papers, which are against Home Rule, conferring titles such as Raja and Zamindar upon their adherents as they like, thus lowering the value of such titles.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

The ship-building industry in India.

82. The Hindu Nesan, of the 8th December, is glad to learn that the Indian Munitions Board have decided to start the ship-building industry in India on a grand scale at Calcutta and that an expert in this industry is on his way to India, and remarks:—If this industry had been started here already, it would have proved immensely useful in this time of war. When sufficient wood is available in the Indian forests and enough of iron from the mines belonging to Messrs. Tata and Sons, there is no reason why this industry should not flourish here. There is sure to be a great demand for ships after the war. The trade of the world, which is now at a standstill, will begin to revive after the war, and, if there are not a sufficient number of ships then, trade will suffer and freight will go up. So, India will do well to build at least as many ships as may be required for her own needs, so as to meet the situation after the war. We hope, therefore, that the efforts now made by the Indian Munitions Board in this direction will prove successful.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 10th Dec. 1917

PRAPANCHAMITRAN, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

The Lokopakari, of the 10th December, as well as the Prapanchamitran of the 11th idem also observe that, if the Government had started this industry already, India could have rendered material assistance during this stressful period of war.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 10th Dec. 1917.

Liberty.

83. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Desabhaktan, of the 10th December, dwells upon how liberty has been the watchword of England, how she has been ready to grant liberty to every country ruled by her and how she has entered into this great war, only to preserve the liberty of Belgium, and, tracing the history of the present demand for Home Rule from the establishment of the Congress, observes: The English statesmen have understood that we have had sufficient training in administrative matters. But it is only some of our brethren here that are not able to catch it. One, who declared ten years back that the Indians were fit to have liberty, is now preaching that they are unfit for it. How else can we describe his conduct than by saying that his mind has been poisoned by his association with Anglo-Indians? However much this gentleman and the traitors who follow him as well as some selfish Anglo-Indians may try, the will of God cannot be prevented. Mr. Lloyd George has inspired the Indians with a hope of liberty by sending Mr. Montagu here and we take it that this liberty will always continue in India and help the Indians to lead free lives as English subjects, getting rid of the false Ango-Indians who arrest India's progress.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakottai, 19th Nov. 1917.

84. The Vaisyamitran, of the 19th November, publishes in Tamil an article apparently from the Amrita Bazar Patrika in which Mr. Gandhi is reported to have made the following observations about Home Rule:—Though Great Britain has been enjoying Home Rule for the last one thousand years, its Kings have committed mistakes and have even punished therefor; nor have the British administrators been free from the commission of serious mistakes. Improvement from a lower to a higher level is only possible by experiments. All progress is the result only of the lessons learnt by mistakes.

Mr. Gandhi and Home Rule.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

85. Adverting to the resignation of the Prince of Arcot of his presidentship of this league, the Swadesamitran, of the 7th December, observes:—In the present political situation, it is not the position and experience of the leader that lend weight to any movement, but it is the movement that adds to the esteem of one who leads it. This is especially so in the case of members of Royal families, zamindars and retired Government servants. If these get out of the several restrictions placed on them and come forward to work for the cause of the country, the people will appreciate their conduct, as they are bound to. But if they allow themselves to be influenced by those who surround them and back out with retrograde views, the people will only pity them but will not hesitate to continue their service to the country. Our readers cannot be unaware of the fact that the Anglo-Indians in this and other Provinces have been, without realising this truth, patting some Indian gentlemen on their back and praising them as being moderates and true loyalists. After the All-India Moslem League became united with the Congress in views, there was no work for those who feathered their own nest by preventing these two associations from uniting. But they were not discouraged by this. They soon started some new associations against the Congress party, and it is in the manner that the South India Islamia League suddenly came into existence. When three of the brothers of the Prince of Arcot joined the new league, it was expected that the Prince too would not continue long in the old league, and so it happened. The reason assigned by the Prince for his resignation is that he does not approve of some portions of the address to be presented to Mr. Montagu by the Moslem League. But it will be clear from the details published by Mr. Yakub Hassan that this address was already approved by the Prince. Perhaps the latter might have changed his opinion subsequently on the advice of the officials or others surrounding him. Anyhow all people would doubtless be surprised at his having resigned for a petty cause a position which he held for many years and consented within two days to be the president of the new league, which holds retrograde views.

The Madras Moslem League.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

86. The Swadesamitran, of the 3rd December, reproduces in Tamil the gist of an article said to have contributed to a Bengalee paper on this subject by Sir Rabindranath Tagore, in which the following observations find a place:—Our political life is not conducive to a national feeling and the main reasons for this are the facts that we are ruled by a foreign nation and that we are unable to work out our lot ourselves. The Anglo-Indians refer to the Behar riots and gloat over the opinion that the Indo-Muhammadan amity exists only in words and that the Indians are unfit for Home Rule, and we have often had to pocket this. What else can we do, when the responsibility of administration does not rest with us? If, after the English rule for years together, the lakhs of Indians have no confidence in themselves and being devoid of facilities for self-protection, are unable to do anything themselves, who is responsible for this? A country adjacent to India has, within this period, become highly educated and acquired great capacity. If the policy of the British rule in India is not to change, when the very history of the world is undergoing constant changes, when can a national spirit arise in India? In the existing system of administration, the Indians have no responsibility. The country may seem united for all outward appearances. If the authorities begin to suppress the ideals of the people, riots naturally ensue. The authorities are averse even to movements started on purely humanitarian motives. The present system of administration is suitable only to those who care only for self-interest and not for the welfare of others. Repressive measures are handled by the authorities even against the wishes of the people. It is officials, who cannot foresee the future that act like this, listening to the words of others. What we expect of British statesmen is that they should realise even now what the future of India will be and that is why we urge for the introduction of some reforms in the administrative machinery. In India it is the officials and the British merchants that exercise all powers. It is on account of these pretending to know more of India than the sons of the soil that the voice of the thirty crores of Indians is not heard. All the existing defects in India are chiefly due to the absence of Home Rule. When all over the world, it is a system of Government responsible to the people that obtains, what doubt is there that discontent is bound to grow in a system in which the people have no concern? How long can such a system last? It is clear that the British have come to India with the highest ideal. If the Empire is to be stable, the Indians should of course be given equal status therein.

The present situation.

Dravida Patrika, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

The non-Brahman Conference, Biccavole.

87. Referring to the proceedings of the non-Brahman Conference recently held at Biccavole under the presidency of the Kumara Raja of Chellapalli, the Dravida Patrika, of the 5th December, observes:—This president has declared that we are unfit for Home Rule. What we now demand is not complete Home Rule, but a change of the existing system of administration by a bureaucracy into one in which the Government will be under the control of the popular representatives. When every country in the world is preferring a democratic system of government, it is quite natural that India also should like to be ruled by her own representatives, and this is the ideal of the Home Rulers. In the face of this fact, some people like the Kumara Raja of Chellapalli are trying to defeat the object of the Home Rulers by misrepresentations. This zamindar should understand that it is not fitness for Home Rule that is now the point. We learn he is a graduate and we would like to know whether he has properly studied the history of England or Japan. We think not; for if the confirment of the franchise upon the people and the powers of administration upon their representatives had been postponed till after they had become fit for it, England and Japan would still be ruled by an oligarchy. History has it that, when representative government was first introduced in England, the representatives chosen used to run away to other countries deeming their new position to be derogatory to them and that when a similar government was introduced in Japan the people did not know what was meant by "government". But all the same the representative form of government has made England and Japan come to the lofty position they have attained now. As has been observed by an eminent western politician, the best sign of the fitness of the people of a country for Home Rule is their demanding it and the whole world knows that we are demanding it. But a few like the Kumara Raja of Chellapalli cry that the ordinary people are only for the continuance of the present administration. True the ordinary people do not clamour for Home Rule. But even this Kumara Raja would understand, if he would go round the villages, that they do not like the present system of administration which is not responsible to the public. No doubt they do not cry "Down with the bureaucracy", but they do wish for the exit of Tahsildars who ignore their opinions and Revenue Inspectors who extort bribes from them. That is why they have signed the monster petition to Mr. Montagu after understanding the object of it. We feel thankful to the Kumara Raja of Chellapalli for one thing and that is that this minor zamindar has shown us how ready some people are to push back their country into oblivion to any extent. It is quite natural that the zamindars should be against representative government, but at the same time it is quite novel that they should protest against it in the name of the people.

88. The Swadesamitran, of the 7th December, publishes from the pen of a correspondent an abstract of the proceedings of a public meeting held at Ambasamudram on the 3rd idem in which Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu is stated to have explained in the course of an address on industry and trade, how Home Rule was necessary for the industrial advancement of this country, and observed that economic condition could improve only when the people begin to use none but swadeshi goods.

89. The Swadesamitran, of the 10th December, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an abstract of the proceedings of a non-Brahman meeting held at Periyakulam on the 3rd instant, at which one Hanumanta Rao appears to have addressed the audience on the necessity of each community among the Indians of having national education, the hardships to which the people are subject on account of their not being able to advance for want of education, the present political situation and the advantages of Home Rule.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

91. The Andhrapatrika, of the 5th December, says:—The Madras Mail states that the bureaucracy is not connected with any race in India, and that as the members of the bureaucracy do not settle in this country, they do not wish for any special interests in it. The Indian Civil Servants have been reputed for long to form one caste. Even after they return to their native land, they live like a separate caste and do not move with the common people. As they do not take up their permanent residence in India, they do not attend to the promotion of the interests of India and their chief concern is to take money to their native land. So they have no love for India. They wish to secure the benefits of appointments to their own race. A Government that stays in the country can alone have permanent love for India.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

92. Referring to the conversion into Christianity of certain persons in Revendrapadu, a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th December, writes:—Is there any remedy for this? Are we to keep quiet when robbers commit house-breaking by day and carry away our property? Christian Missionaries, on the one hand, and Census Commissioners on the other are doing their best to decrease the number of the Hindus. In the name of Criminal Settlements the Salvation Army is converting the Erukala and Enadi people by force. By establishing hospitals and schools, the Missionaries are cutting the throat of Hinduism. There is the only remedy of tit for tat for all this. Members of other religions should be converted into Hinduism as is done in the Punjab by the Arya Samajists Indifference surely leads to death.

Conversion into Christianity.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

93. The Andhrapatrika, of the 6th December, says:—While in British India useless objections are being raised against the grant of swaraj, the new Portuguese Governor promised to grant complete self-government to Portuguese India within his term of office. We wish to hear what the opponents who always say that the Indians are not fit for self-government have to say to this. Everybody knows that Portuguese India has not advanced like British India. The Amrita Buzaar Patrika says—To say that the people of British India are yet unfit for self-government is improper in the face of the fact that Portugal is going to give self-government to the people of Goa.

Self-government.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 8th December, says:—Even according to the view of Lord Curzon, the average annual income of an Indian is Rs. 30. In England the average income is Rs. 555. Rupees 40 are spent on every man in the jail. It is impossible for an Indian to live comfortably on Rs. 30 and pay for the schooling of his children. . . The cause of famine in India is not the want of crops but is the want of money. If the country should raise its head again in the civilised world,

Self-government.

industries should flourish, and if industries should flourish, the system of government should change as Rabindro has said. . . The Bengal leaders and landholders are not satisfied with the Congress reforms, but demand full responsible government for Bengal. We pray that the rulers will without delay grant self-government and gratify the people, as the aspirations of the people grow with the lapse of time.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

Political reforms.

94. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 7th December, says:—Mr. Moti Lal Ghose means to put a new scheme of reforms before His Excellency the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu. Complete provincial autonomy is demanded in this scheme. It requires among other things that all the members of the Provincial Legislative Councils should be elected members, that the Provincial Executive Councils should be constituted on the same lines as those on which the Cabinet in England is constituted, and that in order to get complete representation by the people, the Bengal Legislative Council should contain 500 members.

The death of an Irish Home Ruler.

95. Referring to the voluntary starvation in jail of the Irish Home Ruler Mr. Ashey, the Kistnapatrika, of the 8th December, says:—This news fanned the flame of indignation of the Irish Home Rulers. It is reported that the crowd that followed the corpse of Mr. Ashey to the burial-ground was countless. It is said that there was not such a gathering even at the funeral of Mr. Parnel. It is reported that the volunteers of the Home Rulers marched in public procession to the burial-ground clad in black and wearing arms. Mr. Ashey and his friends had to go to jail for having gone in such a procession through the streets The Government did not obstruct the procession of these volunteers, but allowed them to have their way. The New Statesman writes that this is the first instance of death from voluntary starvation in jail in the British Isles.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 8th Dec. 1917.

Local self-government

96. The Kistnapatrika, of the 8th December, says:—The Anglo-Indians adduce it as an argument against Home Rule for India that the non-official members of the District Board of Lahore, in the meeting of the 20th November, voted against the increase in strength and powers of the non-official element of the District Board. But who are these non-official members of this District Board? They are not persons who are elected by the people, and who enjoy their confidence. They are such as hang on the Tahsildars and Deputy Commissioners, and depend on their favour. Can they be expected to be independent? It is ridiculous that the Anglo-Indians should rely upon the views of such persons and criticise the Home Rule movement.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 8th Dec. 1917.

German plots in England.

97. The Kistnapatrika, of the 8th December, says:—It is learnt that there are some persons who carry on an agitation for the termination of the war. These advocates of peace discourage people from joining the army, and hold occasional meetings to urge for immediate peace. There is a strong report that these persons are carrying on all this in the pay of the Germans. A London paper writes that the Government are arranging for an enquiry into the connexion of the Germans with this movement.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 7th Dec 1917.

The constitution of Provinces.

98. The Andhrapatrika, of the 7th December, says:—The Lingayats, the Reddis, the Jains, the Mahrattas, etc., have all assembled at Dharwar and have passed a resolution demanding a separate Kannada Province. From this it is plain that all classes cherish a desire for a separate Kannada province. An Act was passed in the Bombay Province providing for the introduction of free and compulsory elementary education in the municipal areas. There are indications that the Government will agree to introduce compulsory education in the whole country. But without the provinces being constituted on a language basis, the spread of education will be impossible.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

The regret of the Mail.

99. The Andhrapatrika, of the 7th December, says:—The Mail points to differences of opinion among the Indians as a sign of the unfitness of the Indians for self-government. Now the Europeans themselves are not agreed on political questions. . . The Mail regrets that the pains that it has taken to bring about unanimity among the Europeans have all proved vain. It is a pity that the Mail which intended to create animosities among other classes has lost its hold on the class to which it belongs.

100. Referring to the fact that the President of the Madras Landholders' Association sent its scheme with unauthorised omissions to the Government, and wrote to the Government requesting them not to place its scheme before Mr. Montagu, the Andhrapatrika, of the 7th December, remarks under this heading :—We are at a loss to know that while the zamindars in other Provinces are demanding reforms greater than those proposed by the Congress, the zamindars in the Madras Presidency cherish so much fear.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

A stange act.

101. The correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th December, gives, under this heading, details of a conversation between himself and a non-Brahman friend of his, in which the latter attributes the present friendship of the Muhammadans with the Hindus to an intention on the part of the Muhammadans to re-establish Muhammadan rule in India with the help of the Amir of Kabul or the Sultan of Turkey when the British weaken their rule in India by granting political reforms. This non-Brahman friend further states that when such a thing happens, the Brahmans who already enjoy a large share in the administration, will, with the aid of the Japanese or the Chinese, defeat the Muhammadans and become rulers themselves.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

"A fabrication of the anti-Home Rulers."

102. The Andhrapatrika, of the 8th December, reports the President of the Tanjore District Conference to have said :—Russia appears to prove treacherous to the allies. So the armies of England, France and Italy cannot outnumber those of the Central Powers. An Indian army and Indian officers should be made ready as soon as possible to vanquish the enemy. This will conduce to the benefit of not only India but also the Empire. . . When the whole of Europe is ready for right and when Asia is imitating Europe, why should there be any delay in making ready an Indian army for the defence of the country and the Empire? So long as there is want of confidence, there can be no Indian army. . . If the British repose no confidence in us and fail to give us military reforms, they will not grant us responsible self-government. . . No greater untruth has ever been spoken than that if self-government be given to India, the whole authority would become vested in the Brahmans.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

The Tanjore District Association

103. The Andhrapatrika, of the 8th December, says in its leader :—In England there were twenty lakhs of students going to school in 1840. While there are on the whole one crore and sixty lakhs of educated men in India, it is an anomaly to say that the time has not come to begin self-government in India. In 1835, there were only three per cent of the population in England qualified to vote for members of the Parliament. In our presidency there are more than thirty lakhs of people qualified to vote This is three times the number of voters that existed in England at the time when the Reform Bill was passed. This number cannot be said to be small. The English educated among them is only very few. So if self-government prevails, it cannot go into the hands of the educated. Under such circumstances, it is untrue to say that the Brahmans will usurp all the authority of Government themselves. The bureaucratic party have been attempting to spread this falsehood not only in India, but also in England. Taking the present numbers into consideration, the non-Brahmans enjoy more extensive rights of election and hold a greater number of offices than the Brahmans. So the surmise that after the grant of self-government, the Brahmans will wield all authority is groundless. Under self-government, the authority of the non-Brahmans will increase and as the number of those qualified to vote among them is greater, the whole authority will devolve on them. . . From the speech of the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma, it is plain that it is meaningless to say that if self-government is granted, the authority of the Brahmans will prevail and that the educated will act against the interests of the masses.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

Brahmans.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

Fitness for self-government.

104. The Andhrapatrika, of the 8th December, says:—The second letter of Mr. Curtis, will furnish a reply to those who say that India does not need self-government. He says that it is false to say that the present Legislative Councils are representative assemblies. There is nothing untrue in this. The people do not elect the members of the Legislative Councils directly. So the members are not responsible to the people. The people do not know how the votes of local bodies are taken. When Lord Morely framed the new reforms, he had not in his mind any idea of the grant of a responsible government and so he did not see these defects. As the Government in England have proclaimed that the grant of responsible government is their ideal, it is necessary that the whole system should be reformed. With reference to the argument that it is dangerous to give to the people the responsibility of government, when education has not spread among them, Mr. Curtis says that there is no use of spreading education to any extent unless the people are granted political rights. . . He says that unless the rights of self-government are given side by side with education, the only result will be an increase of unrest. Fitness for self-government can only be acquired by actually wielding the responsibility of self-government. Mistakes may occur, but it is only through mistakes that proper training will be possible. . . So long as the Legislative Councils are debating societies, the people's representatives can have no separate responsibilities. So long as they have no responsibities the people can have none. So only after the grant of self-government, the people can show their fitness. . . The Europeans who say that it is dangerous to grant self-government to India will do well to read the letter of Mr. Curtis, and know the truth. The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma said that there is an inevitable connection between responsible government and the protection of the Empire. Those who see that self-government is necessary also for the stability of the Empire, will not raise useless objections.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 5th Dec. 1917.

The condition of India.

105. The Desamata, of the 5th December, reports Mr. B. Houton, a correspondent to the Spectator, to have said:—Your correspondent who wrote the articles about Mrs. Besant has not noted the change that has come over India during the past few years and especially during the past few months. In fact the whole of India is unanimously demanding the grant of real self-government. . . The action taken by Lord Pentland against Mrs. Besant has been the only cause of the spread of the Home Rule movement and of her fame for great self-sacrifice. To fail to note such things is a great mistake. It is not only a mistake but an act of treachery to both India and England. Your contemporary appears to rely on the Justice for his statements. But is Justice to be relied on when the other Indian papers are all unanimous in their opinion. Without political reforms there can be no social reforms. A foreign Government like ours cannot reform society. Until the Indians get self-government and effect social reforms, caste distinction will not disappear, and the people cannot bring their real civilization into prominence.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 5th Dec. 1917.

Mr. Lajput Rai.

106. Referring to the reply of Sir G. Cave to Captain Wedgewood concerning Mr. Lajput Rai, the Desamata, of the 5th December, says:—So far as Mr. Lajput Rai is known in this country, no body can believe that he is disloyal. So long as he was here, he was noted for his profound patriotism. . . Neither seditionists nor the Police had mentioned his name in connection with the Gather revolution in the Punjab or the anarchical conspiracies in Bengal. It is the opinion of the public that he is God-fearing. Every Indian is surprised to hear that Sir G. Cave suspects him. Different persons may take different views about his book. But to say that out of a desire for German money, he is working against the interests of the British Empire, will pain the heart of every Indian, until the particulars are published that go to establish the truth of such a statement. . . We hope that our British Government will consider this matter and do justice to Mr. Lajput Rai or establish his offence and win over public opinion to their side.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 5th Dec. 1917.

A disappointment.

107. The Desamata, of the 5th December, refers under this heading to the fact that the Government of India refused to permit an address of the Muhammadan leaders to be presented to the Secretary of State, because it made mention of the internments, and regrets that the Government have shown the Mahammadan leaders scant courtesy, which greatly disappointed them.

Desamata, Rajahmundry, 5th Dec. 1917.

Mr. Tilak and swaraj.

108. The Desamata, of the 5th December, reports Mr. Tilak to have said in reply to an address presented to him by the people of the Athani taluk:—On account of the existence of repressive Acts like the Arms Act, the Indians are living like foreigners in their own country. When the Congress leaders have been moving heaven and earth for thirty years for reforms, the toy of Morley-Minto reforms has been placed in their hands. As the authorities have not placed any confidence in India, she has become a heavy burden weighing down upon their necks If this country is continued in this state, not only will this country be ruined, but the ruin of England also will be brought about. English statesmen have understood this truth and intend to uplift the Indians by granting them self-government. It cannot be said that the present war is the last one. If another war is to be waged and India is required to sacrifice her all for defending the British Empire in that war, India should first have self-government. The Government are aware of the necessity of the grant of self-government.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 10th Dec. 1917.

The Ceded Districts Non-Brahman Conference.

109. The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th December, reports the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Ceded Districts Non-Brahman Conference to have said:—In the Legislative Councils as at present constituted, the discussion of a resolution is no better than a cry in the wilderness. If the resolution is not to the taste of the Government, they will not approve of it, however reasonable and necessary it may be. The words of the representatives of the people are ordinarily treated as the prattle of children. Only very rarely will a reply be given to the effect that a particular resolution is worthy of consideration and will be considered. This the Government does as if to please the people for the time being. . . The Congress and the Moslem League are agreed in their demand that the Legislative Council should no longer be like a monkey in the hands of the Government, but should wield an influence suitable to the experience and education of the members and should have the power to accomplish what it thinks beneficial to the country. This is the most important point in the well-known Congress League Scheme . . Political differences in the country are to be traced to the fear that the rulers will realise that it is natural for others also to desire the freedom that they themselves enjoy, and will grant the Indians their request for freedom.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 10th Dec. 1917.

Complete Provincial autonomy.

110. The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th December, says:—Since the publication of the Congress Scheme, there has been a change for the better in the opinions both of the people and of the rulers. His Imperial Majesty himself has stated that responsible Government is his ideal. Under such circumstances, the people should vary their scheme according to the ideal of the rulers. Though under the Congress scheme, the Executive Council should be subject to the Legislative Council, the Executive Council need not break up, when it is in conflict with the Legislative Council. Thus, there will then be room for the Executive Council to become arbitrary. The Bengal leaders wish that there should be no such room. The Bengal landholders also have given expression to such ideals. They said that there is close connection between self-government and the rendering of aid in the war Unless the people take up the responsibility of Government, they cannot sacrifice their men and money for the Government. It is encouraging that they (the Landholders' association) have understood that self-government will not only conduce to the advancement of India, but is also necessary for the stability of the British Empire. They have also passed a resolution to the effect that the division of the country into provinces on a language basis will form the foundation of self-government. As the whole country is recognising this truth, the constitution of the Andhra Province can longer be delayed. The landholders are in agreement with the Congress in the matter of the political reforms to be effected in the Government of India. . . They advocate complete self-government for the Provinces, and state that Bengal is fit for such autonomy. For carrying out the reforms, the official members should be altogether removed from the Legislative Councils, and all the members should be elected. . . It is a bad argument to say that the Congress scheme is revolutionary. The only defect of the scheme is its hesitancy in the matter of the establishment of self-government. That defect should be made good now and the wishes of the people should be placed before Mr. Montagu. In this matter, the Madras Presidency should follow the example of the Province of Bengal.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 10th Dec. 1917.

The Muhammadan interned.

111. The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th December, prays with reference to the movement set on foot at Calcutta by the Muhammadans of all parts to request the Government to release the interned, that the Government will respect the opinion of the Muhammadans and release the interned.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 7th Dec. 1917.

The revival of the swadeshi movement.

112. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 7th December, in a leading serial article dwelling on the swadeshi movement, says:—The swadeshi movement has again taken a prominent place among the present leading political problems such as swaraj, primary education, and business enterprise. At the time of the Bengal partition during Lord Curzon's regime some ten years ago, the movement was mixed up with the movements of self-government, national education and boycott. An earlier trace of the movement was to be found in Poona some thirty years ago when, its importance was recognised in the Mahratta country from a political standpoint, and a few minor industries came into being. But it came to be spread all over India only after the partition. Some of the waves of the movement at that time had rolled even as far as our Mangalore. Subsequently owing to the hostile attitude of the Government towards this purely economic movement it began to dwindle. The authorities began a new kind of distinction between true and false swadeshi and caused the movement to suffer. For some time some of the authorities relying on police reports began to regard the movement as identical with sedition with a different name. The budding movement thus began to fade away under the ire of the authorities. It is a mark of the vitality in a nation, however, that everything that is indispensable to national life will resuscitate from time to time until it takes firm root. Even the Maharishi (great sage) Dadhabhai's supreme incantation of swaraj was smothered by the wrath of the authorities. Just as the chant of self-government is being sung again all over India during the past one or two years, the chant of swadeshi too is being renewed with fresh vigour. During the glorious dawn of swadeshi in 1903–1904 at the time of the Bengal partition, a few industrial concerns came into being in the different parts of the country. The attention of the bigger merchants and the richer citizens was drawn towards the movement. A large number among the educated as well as the uneducated in the country took the swadeshi vow and decided to use only Indian sugar and cloth. But this was only a wave. The enthusiasm of the people gradually waned. Nevertheless, some of the swadeshi factories are still going on with their work and the vow is still observed by many. The meaning and nature of the swadeshi movement are already well known. We wish to emphasize the point, however, that the swadeshi movement is, unlike the Home Rule or swaraj movement, non-political. The moment the Home Rule question is raised some persons of a delicate constitution get headache or stomach-ache. Those whose brain is too torpid to be moved by political questions will of course amuse themselves with the fifteenth and sixteenth century comedies. Then there are the Government servants who, whatever, their views at heart may be, for the sake of promotion at least have to seem antipathetic to political movements. Not only we, but all Vernacular as well as English papers, however, ignore these persons, and discuss the national cause for the benefit of the masses. But the swadeshi movement being solely concerned with economic matters, we trust that no one will feel upset by any signs of its spread.

SATYAVADI, Mysore, 11th Dec. 1917.

The swadeshi vow.

113. The Satyavadi, of the 11th December, writes:—One cannot be too grateful to Lord Curzon for the service he has rendered India as Viceroy. He could not have even dreamt that, as a result of his own pet resolution touching the partition measure, the Bengalis would come to have new courage, new firmness and a new kind of triumph.

As a result of the force employed in trying to divide the Bengalis, they became better united than before and started the swadeshi movement which led to the boycott of foreign goods and the production of a larger quantity of indigenous articles. The popular love of the movement was by no means new. It only received a fresh impetus in trying to compel Lord Curzon to retrace his step. When His Majesty the King with true far-sightedness earned the undying gratitude of the people by modifying the partition, the tranquility caused in the situation led to a lull in the swadeshi movement. We must thank His Excellency Lord Pentland for the sleight of hand he displayed recently and the feeling he revived among the people in regard to their swadeshi vow which they had almost forgotten. His bugle sound bidding the people to put their thoughts of self-government out of their mind is among his most glorious deeds. What excellent advice! How regrettable it is that India has not the goodness to accept it gratefully?

The present war has raised many problems. The spread of the democratic movement is one of the most important among them. India shares the new ideas and new aspirations which it has created. She has earned unreserved and hearty applause from British statesmen by sacrificing her all, by shedding blood and emptying her treasure for the sake of the empire. At the same time the people are trying their best to obtain their rights and responsibilities in the task of administration. When even the great world empires are undergoing a process of purification, is it too much that India should seek to escape her intolerable dependence and find a place appropriate to her capacity and self-respect among the nations of the world? At a time when the terrific war is being fought for freedom, is it inapt that India should insist on the liberty which is indispenable to the happiness and contentment of mankind?

War and rise in prices.

114. Referring to the tremendous rise in prices due to the war, the Manorama, of the 7th December, points out that a measure, similar to that which has been passed by the Bombay Government, enjoining that the prices of articles of food and clothing should not go beyond certain limits, should be passed in this Presidency and also in others.

Manorama, Calicut, 7th Dec. 1917.

Rumoured marriage of the Prince of Wales.

115. Referring to the report current in certain quarters regarding the marriage of the Prince of Wales with an American bride, the Desabhimani, of the 8th December, says that this marriage of the Prince with one of the people would, instead of lowering the prestige of royalty, better the relations between the two great English-speaking countries and be conducive to the peace and prosperity of the whole world.

Desabhimani, Quilon, 8th Dec. 1917.

An address that was not presented.

116. The Qaumi Report, of the 2nd December, writes:—At a very large meeting of the Muhammadans held at Kaiser Bagh, Lucknow, on the 14th October, it was unanimously resolved that an address on behalf of All-Indian Muhammadans should be presented to the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India, and a draft was prepared with great care and deliberation. The important subject among others was that all Muhammadans expected that the national deputation would be able to convince His Excellency Lord Chelmsford, the Right Hon'ble Mr. Montagu and his colleagues that the question of the Muhammadan detenus was of a special importance, and required breadth of view. But Muhammadans will regret to learn that the Government objected to that clause and advised them to delete it from the address.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 2nd Dec. 1917.

Though we do not know why the Government has expressed such an opinion, it is satisfactory to find that the address committee refused to be governed by it. The rusult was the deputation was refused an interview, and the address was not presented. This is the first incident (of its kind) which will be recorded in the annals of modern politics and Mr. Montagu's procedure, and Muhammadans will have to remember their failure with much regret.

We can understand, and perhaps this is the basis of the Government's objection, that the question of internment does not come under the head of discussion of political reforms, and that Mr. Montagu has come to improve the political future of India and not to remedy internal maladies. We admit this logical argument, but may we not enquire when this principle was observed in other addresses, how many had transgressed the limit of real discussion, yet the Government did not demur to their transgression, and irregular procedure, nor was any deputation interrupted in the midst of its address. There was no reason why the Government should not have overlooked the Muhammadans' mistake if it really was a mistake. The power of enforcing obedience lies with the Government. The Muhammadans simply wanted to express their real feelings in their address, and it was not their intention to exact a definite promise from the Government, or to make the Government of India, or the British Government, to enter into an agreement with reference to the release of the Muhammadan internees. The Government could have listened to this voice also as it had already listened to hundreds of thousands of such voices. But as it has strictly adhered to this principle, it leads us to apprehend that the Government does not desire to reconsider the matter. If it has really arrived at that conclusion it will be better for the Government to publish a detailed statement regarding all the internees showing the period of their internment and the conditions that will be imposed on them when they are released before or after the war. We are sure that the Muhammadans, on learning the nature of the conditions, will not be much upset about them, but will leave their proposals to the Great Disposer.

From the very outset we observed the irregularity in the address, and warned our community that our address should not deal with anything but political reforms. When, however, we found that the deputation on social reforms was cordially received and patiently listened to, the deputation of Moulavis also waited upon the Government, that the question of marriage, divorce and the appointment of the Shaikh-ul-Islam were listened to, and assurance was given that the matter would receive consideration, we thought that our previous impression was wrong. On the other hand, we ought to have suggested that Unani Doctors, Indian tradesmen, press, and workmen's deputations might wait on the Government. We were under this impression but the failure of the Muhammadan deputation has convinced us that our original idea was correct, and that the Government, having first allowed an irregularity, had next proceeded to prevent any further recurrence. If we take it that the Government is right in adhering to its principle, we should admit that the committee is also right in its decision to abandon the deputation. However, the Muhammadans need not worry about the non-presentation of their address, inasmuch as the draft was not prepared by common consent and the objects in view were also, to a certain extent, capable of revision.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

The Khalifate and Mussalmans.

117. The Qaumi Report, of the 3rd December, in a leader on the marginally-noted subject, writes:—Lord Robert Cecil stated in the House of Commons that after the war started, Russia suggested that henceforth the British Government should not recognise the Sultan of Turkey as the Khalifa of Islam. But Great Britain has not ignored any such procedure as the question of the Khalifate is one for the Mussalmans alone to decide. It is, on the face of it, surprising as to why the question of the Khalifate has now been introduced in Parliament, and why His Lordship, who is a member of the Government, has thought it necessary to express an opinion on the subject. Our astonishment is increased by the fact that Lord Robert's statement was received with enthusiastic applause, as if the members of Parliament have concurred in the principle that the question of the Khalifate is one to be disposed of by Mussalmans alone, and that no other power has any right to interfere.

The British Government is a free Government, and the British people respect the feelings and aspirations of others as they do their own. It is true that every Englishman is not a perfect specimen of his nation. There are, of course, certain persons in every community who regard themselves as the elect. But the fundamental principle of the English is expressed in the words of Sadi, viz., that which thou disapprovest for thyself, do thou disapprove for others also.

We know perfectly well why Russia raised the question. Her political history and national traditions show that in religion she is bigoted, and by nature, rebellious. She can never comprehend the question of the Khalifate, but the British nation understands and knows full well that in Islam the Khalifate is a religious factor, and politics have absolutely nothing to do with it. We admire Lord Robert Cecil's words inasmuch as they embody the democratic policy of the British Government, but as a Mussalman we wish to amend the words as follows, viz., that the disposal of the question of the Khalifate depends on Mussalmans alone, because the Khalifate is an office based on the sacred law of Islam and connected with prophetic and Apostolic office. The Khalifa is the deputy of the Apostle, a minister of the Sacred Law and Commander of the Faithful. The conditions relating to the office are based on the principles of Islam and Mussalmans, even if they wished, cannot of their own accord dispose of the question, for they have no right to interfere with the Divine Law, or with the consensus of Divines.

When Mussalmans were rulers themselves, they could not settle the question. Our ancestors ruled India as mighty Monarchs, and yet they were obliged to bow their heads in submission to the Khalifate.

118. The Qaumi Report, of the 3rd December, has a letter from a correspondent named Muhammad Sharf-ud-din from Cuddapah which announces that on the 14th November 1917 a mass meeting of Mussalmans was held in the town under the presidency of Mr. P Muthu Krishna Aiya, Barrister-at-Law, in which the following resolutions were passed:—(1) that the scheme of the Congress Muslim League should not be regarded as beneficial. If it be thus regarded concord between different classes in India will be difficult. Self-government for India is not required. The country has yet to make gradual progress, (2) that the Government of India may be respectfully requested to release Mr. Muhammad Ali and Mr. Shaukat Ali on suitable conditions, (3) that the meeting regards the monster petition of the Home Rule League with contempt, because the signatures of the public were obtained by fraud.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

A meeting at Cuddapah against Home Rule.

The Qaumi Report, of the 3rd December, has, as in several of its previous issues, a notice calling upon every Mussalman to remember the 7th day of December 1917 to send an 8-anna message to the Secretary of State to release all Mussalman detenus.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

119. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 1st December, has a letter against Home Rule from a correspondent named Ghulam Muhi-ud-din Sahib Quraishi in which he describes in detail the several disadvantages that are likely to accrue from Home Rule. He asserts that it is against the principle of Government to accept, for the sake of a few highly cultured Brahmans, a suggestion which will mean the loss of Mussalman rights and liberties.

Jaridah-i-Rozgar, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

Home Rule mania.

120. The Quasim-ul-Akhbar, of 26th November, (received 4th December), reproduces the article published by the Hamdum which runs as follows:—We have learned with much concern that Mr. Muhammad Ali's health has again, for some time past, been indifferent. His relatives and friends knew that he had been suffering from Bright's disease, but thanks to the treatment of skilful physicians he had just recovered. When, however, he was interned, his people were apprehensive lest the same disease might reappear; God forbid! that it should so happen.

Quasim-ul-Akhbar, Bangalore, 26th Nov. 1917.

Mr. Muhammad Ali's health.

On enquiry we now learn that the damp climate of Chunderwara does not suit him and his people. His health has been seriously affected by the fact of his expectation of release having been disappointed. We are afraid it will be difficult to effect a thorough cure in his health, unless his liberty be restored, so that he may be treated by experts. Muhammad Ali's welfare is very precious both for the members of his community as well as for compatriots, and we very urgently invite the attention of the Government to this aspect of the case.

121. The Qaumi Report, of the 4th December, writes:—Next Friday will be the 7th December. At the services on that holy day prayers and supplications should be made for the release of the detenus. The editor hopes that all Muhammadans will, with sincerity of heart, humility of spirit, and Godly fear, prostrate themselves before the Almighty and pray for the release of the Muhammadan detenus.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 4th Dec. 1917.

The internees' Friday.

We are sure that every Muhammadan, either on behalf of the Anjuman or of his community or his brethren, will address a wire to the Secretary of State for India at Calcutta using the following eight words:—

"Pray release Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali and other Muslim interned."

We cannot remain silent any longer at this prolonged internment of our brethren. For more than three years we have stood the test of patience, forbearance, contentment and trusting to Providence. Now our hearts are moved and our souls are stirred, and we cry aloud to God and beseech our rulers. We are sure that Heaven will not be niggardly, nor will the earth be strait for us. The wounds of our hearts will not be healed, or the irritation of our sores relieved until we see some divine sigh. Our clamour now is this—

"I will not cease demanding till I get what I want.

"Either my body will be united with the beloved or be separated from my soul."

Qaumi Report, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

A telegram from London.

122. The Qaumi Report, of the 5th December, writes as follows :—Our contemporary the Madras Mail has published, in its issue of the 4th instant, the following telegram from its own correspondent in London :—

London, 1st December.—"The paper India is still lamenting over the internment of Mr. Muhammad Ali and Mr. Shaukat Ali, but its friends are wise. They do not raise this question in public here."

Our dear contemporary has published the above telegram in bold type, and has given it a prominent position in its esteemed columns. But we know that this uncalled for effort has not been made purely for the sake of the Muhammadans, but rather is a kindness incidental to its attitude to the Home Rule question. We regret to find that our Anglo-Indian friend, in its opposition to Home Rule, does things which detract from its dignity. We can understand the reason for its opposing Mrs. Besant's views, and we can also appreciate its object in opposing Home Rule. But it puzzles us as to why it is angry with the Muhammadans, and why it takes the trouble to get a wire from London which can neither afford it pleasure nor assist it in attaining its object.

We have often explained the case of Muhammad Ali, Shaukat Ali and other Muhammadan detenus to those who held similar views, and have honestly tried our best to prevent our friend from being misled, or from misunderstanding our aspirations. Unfortunately its errors increase in inverse ratio to our explanations. We wonder what we can say further.

The difficulty is that the Government of India also has shut the door of enquiry and does not even wish its ears to be troubled with the sound of our voice. The incident of the All-India Moslem deputation, for example, speaks for itself, and shows that the mere mention of the names of Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali in the address was the cause of its not reaching the Secretary of State for India. It is therefore amazing to find that the Home Rule address should have been read with such pomp and parade and the Government of India not feel hurt to listening to its scathing sentences, its inflammatory tone, and its incisive style, while the Muhammadan address was rejected simply because it contained a request for the release of the internees. Our contemporary the Madras Mail thinks the object of Home Rule is to eject the British Government and the English from India bag and baggage. If this view is correct, the Government of India had the courage and patience to listen to the Home Rule address, but was not able to give ear to the appeal for the release of a few Muhammadan detenus. It could not even listen to the poor Muhammadans' complaint and then do whatever it liked. Are not the Muhammadans obliged to draw the inference that the Government of India regards their address worse and more disagreeable than the Home Rule address? If this is true, we are very sorry, for, the idea that will be entertained by the Muhammadans in general against the Government, will be that it desires to be friendly with those in favour of Home Rulers, but does not mind falling out with Indian Muhammadans.

Although the Government is disappointing and displeasing the Muhammadans and putting their feelings to a severe test, the latter continue to give the fullest proof of their steadfast loyalty, and peace-loving attitude. They have neither indulged in threats nor raised a revolt. They have not changed their attitude, but, on the other hand, they have shown genuine courage. Had the members of the deputation made the required amendment in their address, curses might have been hurled at them today. The Muhammadans are not sorry their address has not been presented.

But we request His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India to be so kind as not to leave this point out of consideration, that all that they have heard, or will hear in India, whether from any league, society, association or anjuman, must be particular in opinion and echoing the voice of its members. But the deputation, which was not received and the address which was rejected by them, constituted the voice of all the Muhammadans of India; and it is, therefore, regrettable to find that they prevented this united voice from reaching their ears.

The Madras Mail correspondent says that the paper India is still expressing its grief for Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali a long way off. If it can see through the seas it will find that it is "Muslim India" and not "India" merely. It is loyal India that laments not for a solitary Muhammad Ali or a solitary Shaukat Ali, but for all Muhammad Alis and Shaukat Alis. It is a pity that it dees not know this secret. It is not our fault, but its own mistake.

If this question could be raised there, we are not sorry. They may come here and see with what courage and boldness it is being raised here. The fact is that we do not want to adopt the European principle which inculcates to agitate freely. We adhere to the sacred principle of Islam which teaches daring and liberty.

123. The Qaumi Report, of the 6th December, writes:—We have already written that a deputation of ladies will wait upon the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu on the 18th instant. We do not know what the object of our dear sisters is, or what proposition they want to discuss themselves. We do not wish to influence their aspirations in any way, but consider it necessary to say this much that the Muhammadan ladies have taken this trouble unnecessarily. The respected mother of Muhammad Ali Sahib and the wives of Husrath Mohani and Muzharul Huq, instead of joining the deputation, could have very well discharged some other national duty, especially when the Muhammadan address was rejected. Suggestions were made to further the matter relating to Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali and when Muhammad Ali was not given the chance of interview, how can the sense of self-respect of our honourable and respected sisters permit them to accept an interview. It is amazing to find how our sisters have overlooked the present incidents, and how they are not being influenced by the general feeling of the Muhammadans. Our respected sisters know that Islam will not be honoured or dishonoured by political reforms made in the country, whether they be according to any scheme suggested by the League or the memorandum of the nineteen members. If we choose to do so we can wait for another century for reforms, but we cannot tolerate the delay of another day for the release of the internees. It is not consistent with our religious dignity that we should be regarded as the cause of that blame, and that we should not care to free ourselves from it. We regret still more that our dear sisters have joined a deputation which is not intended to gain any religious dignity. Their action in this is opposed to national self-control, and the community cannot look upon their participation with a favour or approval.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

The ladies' deputation.

IV.—Native States.

124. Under the heading "Travancore University" the Lokaprakasam, of the 10th December, has the following in English:—"As a necessary step towards the laudable expansion of collegiate education within the State, the Government of our sister State of Travancore have issued a Government Order which says: The time has arrived to consider the question whether a University adapted to local conditions and environments should be constituted. His Highness's Government, therefore, resolve to appoint a committee to conduct the necessary enquiries and furnish a full and detailed report. Mr. Hodgson, Director of Public Instruction, is the Chairman, and the various interests of education are represented on the Committee, which includes Bishop Gill, judges and vakils, principals and professors of colleges, and representatives of engineering, medicine, agriculture, and industry. With the general awakening that is manifest throughout, the keen desire for education is evinced wherever we turn to, and an esteemed correspondent of ours who draws our attention to the immediate necessity of raising the Ernakulam College into a first-grade institution is, indeed, to be congratulated. The present times are suited for the consideration of schemes like that. The examples of Mysore which has already set up a University of its own as well as of Hyderabad which has decided to do so, are sufficient in themselves, and the recent action of the Travancore Darbar adds still more to it. While there is expansion and improvement in the existing institutions all round, it would, indeed, be a case of Cochin being left behind if she were content to remain where she was since 1874, without so much as a single first-grade College. Mr. J. W. Bhore, I.C.S., the Diwan, has been known to be a successful financier, and the State might follow in the wake of sister States in the educational policy. The remarkably rapid progress of education in the State as well as the past tradition and present commendable condition of the College, more than merely warrants its elevation and the Darbar will do well to take the matter into their serious consideration without any great delay.

"A University for Travancore has been in the hope of many long before Mysore conceived a similar idea, but it was left to Mr. M. Krishnan Nayar, the present Diwan, to solve it. No doubt, it is a momentous experiment, and the patriotism of the Diwan in advancing His Highness to embark upon the contemplated course deserves all praise. Unlike other existing universities in India, we hope that the Darbar will pay particular attention to found an industrial university in Travancore. The great demand of the day is for increasing the material prosperity of the people, and the solitary special need of Kerala at present is industrial education that will fit the young man, after a short course, to enter a business as an apprentice, and by and by as its Chief. Unlike the Mysore one, which is but a minor edition of the Madras University, the Travancore University should be for manufacturing industrialists. Technical education in the vernaculars, calculated to equip a youth after a course extending to about four or five years, to earn his livelihood by manual labour or mechanic skill in any factory, is all that we want. More expenditure on the scientific side as well as for facilities for the young hopefuls learned in chemistry or biology, to have some better scope for training, is what we want. These are days for the improvement of vernaculars and a completely vernacularised system will do immense good for all practical purposes. By advocating for vernacularising we do not in the least mean that English should be neglected, but are only for giving secondary importance, and we are more for 'vernacularising', only the industrial and scientific side of the University, we are particularly concerned with. We shall await with great hope the Committee's report upon which depends much of the fate of the future University."

Dravidan, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

A first-grade college for Cochin.

125. The Dravidan, of the 8th December, is surprised at the Maharaja of Cochin not evincing sufficient interest in the matter of opening a first-grade college in his State, though there are sufficient facilities for the same and, referring to the establishment of a University in Mysore and the proposal to establish one in Travancore, observes that at least the opening of a first-grade college will greatly benefit the students there.

II.—Home Administration.

(k) General.

1. United India and Native States, for the week ending 13th December, writes:—"We feel it our imperative duty to refer once again to the case of the Ali brothers which has been aggravated by the attitude of the Government in refusing the Moslem address to Mr. Montagu, because of the reference therein to the internment of Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali. . . We cannot bring ourselves to congratulate the Government on their decision to refuse the address of the Moslems from All India, simply because of the reference therein to the Ali brothers. . . We have not ignored that the maintenance of the public safety is the duty of the Government and they must necessarily have certain powers by which they might take whatever action is needful for that purpose in the interests of the country. We equally bear in mind that everything has a due limit and such also the powers to be delegated to the executive and in fine any action on their part which favours of a violation of the principles of the British constitution or the suppression of the personal freedom and liberty of a citizen ought to be answered for by them satisfactorily to dispel any apprehensions on the popular mind as to a state of affairs prevailing threatening their position as constitutional citizens. . . This sudden punctilio of the Government has saddled an uncomfortable position on the country. An agitation which might have been spared is seriously engaging the thought of leaders and we do not know that the Government have at all acted wisely in this matter. Why on earth, may we ask, should the Government have felt such a trepidation at the inclusion of a line pertaining to the internment of the Ali brothers? If the Government are in possession of indisputable facts of the guilt of these two internees and if they are, in fact, in a position publicly to vindicate their action in condemning them to confinement, why, we are at a loss to understand, should they not permit a challenge to be offered to them even if it amounted to that? The only question that, therefore, now arises is, are they or are they not sure of the strength and justice of their own action? This will have to be answered and answered clearly and unequivocally by the Government. We have no doubt the Government are sure that they are not going to set at liberty criminals merely because some person or persons demand it without knowledge of the details of the case. They also know in equal degree, that if they cannot justify their action by proving the guilt of those that have come under their suspicion, they have not the ghost of a justification of retaining them in such restriction of freedom and liberty as their suspicion dictated the infliction. If so, why should not a public trial be held which would, granting the unassailable position of the Government, expose all the iniquities of those whom the public in believing to be grossly wronged hold in love and veneration? . . . Whatever, therefore, might have been the circumstances in which the Government had been led in the past to persist in an attitude which the public deem inexplicable, we sincerely hope that at least this hour they would give the issue their very serious consideration and respond to popular call, thus vindicating their own position, affording the internees a chance to redeem their fair name and getting public opinion to do by itself what is peremptory in the interests of the king and the country."

I.—Foreign Politics.

Vartakamitran, Tanjore, 29th Nov. 1917.

Indians in Ceylon.

2. A correspondent to the Vartakamitran, of the 29th November, says:—The majority of those settled in Ceylon are Indians. The number of Tamilians who have till now migrated to Ceylon will be about ten lakhs and more than half of these have settled there permanently. Still there is no representative in the Ceylon Legislative Council, who can safeguard their interests. As the laws framed by the Ceylon Government may affect the Indians also, it is very necessary that the latter should have a representative of theirs in the Council and this is a concession for which the Indians there will have to agitate.

The editor of this paper has a short note approving of the above suggestion and observes that, when the Indians in the Fiji Islands have a representative of theirs in the local Legislative Council, the Indians in Ceylon have not been granted this privilege, because they have not moved in the matter.

3. The Hindu Nesan, of the 14th December, reproduces an article on this subject appearing in the Lokopakari of the 10th idem and abstracted in paragraph 11 of Report No. 50 of 1917.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 12th Dec. 1917.

Russia's plight.

4. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Hindu Nesan, of the 12th December, refers to the pitiable plight of Russia and the action of the present Government there, which has declared that it has cancelled all loans taken by Russia from foreign countries and, characterising this move as ungrateful on the part of that country in the face of the assistance it had received from the allies for the last three years, says that this undignified act would leave an indelible stain on the history of that country.

Dravida Patrika, Madras, 12th Dec. 1917.

The Dravida Patrika, of the 12th December, also characterises this action of Russia as an unconscionable one and a gross breach of faith, and remarks that it bespeaks the miserly, irresponsible and timid nature of the Government now in power in Russia.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 12th Dec. 1917.

The fall of Jerusalem.

5. The Swadesamitran, of the 12th December, characterises the fall of Jerusalem as the greatest of the victories so far achieved by the British in Turkey, and observes that it is noteworthy that this city, which is full of Christians and Christian Churches and which is of historic importance, has at present fallen into the hands of the Christians.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 12th Dec. 1917.

The Desabhaktan, of the 12th December, notes with pleasure the capture of this ancient and historic city and, characterising this as indicative of the final success of the British arms, observes that this capture would facilitate the achievement of further victories on the side of the British.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

The fall of Jerusalem.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th December, says:—To whatever theatre Indians go, there victory is gained. At a critical time, the Indian army went to France and was able to protect that country. In the Mesopotamian theatre, it drove away the enemy. It handed over East Africa to the English. Today it took Jerusalem and placed it in the hands of its rulers. May the Indian army earn fame by defeating the Germans!

Lord Lansdowne on the war.

6. The Hindu Nesan, of the 12th December, reproduces the comments of the Dravida Patrika of the 5th idem on the letter said to have been addressed by Lord Lansdowne to the press suggesting the desirability of concluding peace at this stage. These comments are abstracted in paragraph 10 of Report No. 50 of 1917.

7. Referring to the formation of a new party known as the national party in England on the score that the liberal party has lost its prestige, while the unionist party has become lifeless, the Swadesamitran, of the 15th December, reports Lord Montagu to have justified as follows the formation of the new party:—I have become disgusted with the tactics of both these parties. Besides this, though the Government have given out the truth to a larger extent of late regarding the German air-raids on London, they have not confided in the people and told them the whole truth. Though it is necessary that falsehoods should be uttered to confuse the enemy, the Government have been uttering complete falsehood only to the British public.

A new party in England.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

8. The Andhraprakasika, of the 3rd December, says:—It cannot be supposed that all the vessels sunk by the enemy are sunk by submarines or torpedoes or machine guns. Many vessels strike against mines and are destroyed. For example, a vessel was sunk by means of a mine recently in the Indian Ocean. Recently the Australian papers announced that mines scattered by the enemy were found in the seas about Australia. From this it is plain that mines are placed by the enemy in all the seas of the world.

Mines.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 3rd Dec. 1917.

9. The Andhraprakasika, of the 7th December, says:—Fearing that the enemy's forces pouring in from the Russian theatre may outnumber the British forces in the Cambrai theatre, the English papers are loudly urging that the British forces should be increased. But this matter was well discussed in the House of Commons already and so there is no need to fear any danger.

The war.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 8th December, says:—From today's telegrams, it appears that the British forces were driven back to some extent. The reason appears to be the innumerable German soldiers that poured in from the Russian theatre. . . . But this is nothing when compared with the positions that the British have taken recently. On the whole, the German forces that have come from the eastern theatre are fighting somewhat fiercely in the western and in the Italian theatres. There will surely be some change in the situation in these two theatres, but it may be said that that change will in no way affect the British army. Though the present situation may appear fearful, we are very confident that the allies will in the end gain the Victory.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

10. The Qaumi Report, of the 11th December, writes under the marginally-noted heading:—Some people enquire whether the Germans capture non-European soldiers. In this connection it is necessary to explain that they do, and that such soldiers are to be found in most of the German camps as is evidenced by photographs taken from time to time. It appears, however, that the Germans extend to Indian prisoners special consideration and permit them to cook their own food if they so desire.

Consideration shown to Indian prisoners (of war).

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

11. The Qaumi Report, of the 13th December, writes:—Yesterday's telegram contains the concise, but startling, news of the fall of Jerusalem. We are sure that this intelligence will stir the feelings of the Muhammadans, and that they will acknowledge them by bowing themselves before the Almighty. "Thou givest the kingdom to whom Thou wilt and taketh away the kingdom from whom Thou wilt" (Kôrān).

The memory of Jerusalem.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

As to the facts we are still in the dark. It is better for the present not to express an opinion on this tragic event. We cannot help, however, calling to mind that this is not the first time Jerusalem has been taken from the Muhammadans. Prior to this this divine inheritance has been lost and recovered on several occasions.

The editor gives in detail the seven crusades fought between the Christians and the Kings of Jerusalem, and says that it was, after the last battle in 1270 A.D., that the crusaders abandoned the idea of capturing Jerusalem, which, up to the day before yesterday, had remained in the hands of the Muslims.

Jerusalem is the prayer point of the Jews from whom the Christians took it, and made it their place of pilgrimage. Later the Muhammadans captured it from the Christians. Now it has been recaptured by the Christians after a lapse of $\frac{1320 \text{ A.H.}}{1180 \text{ A.D.}}$ years. But the Christians have not captured this as Christians, but merely as an incident in a war of political ideals.

Islam is neither honoured nor disgraced by the capture or loss of a city and our holy religion does not regard walls, minarets or domes as sacred things, but reveres their names, and what they stand for. Our patience and gratitude be in the direction of the will of God.

It was predicted 1300 years ago by our holy Prophet that the destruction of Jerusalem will be the first sign of the approach of the last day. We observe that Jerusalem has not yet been destroyed and that the last day has yet to come.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

The jury system.

13. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Swadesamitran, of the 14th December, observes:—In many cases in which the Judge differed from the jury, the High Court has decided that the opinion of the jury was correct. A trial before assessors serves no useful purpose, as the Judge is not bound by their opinion. The assessors are jurors in cases connected with property, but only assessors in other cases. Our contention is that they should be jurors in all cases and that in all districts, serious offences should be tried only by jurors. As, even in places where the jury system is in force, many cases are tried by assessors, not much benefit results therefrom. Even when a case is tried by a jury, Sessions Judges have the power to address the High Court, if they differ from the jury and the High Court is empowered to decide the case as it likes. Before 1872 the opinion of the jurors was binding on the Judge. It was a law passed in that year that declared that the Judge need not accept the opinion of the jury and that he could refer the case to the High Court. As this deprived the people of a right which they enjoyed, the Congress has been demanding from 1886 that this law should be changed and the juries empowered as of old. It is only one or two Judges that have expressed themselves against the jury system. All others have often opined that the jurors are of great help to them and that their opinions are always correct. So there is no doubt that our people are qualified to act as jurors. Why, then, should cases be tried at times with the help of assessors? Why should not all cases be tried with the aid of jurors and why should not this system be introduced in districts where it does not obtain?

(d) Education.

Lokopakari, Madras, 26th Nov. 1917.

The progress of education.

14. The Lokopakari, of the 26th November, writes as follows on this subject: —The scale of fees in the colleges of this Presidency is high and the poor people find it therefore very hard to educate their children. It is the duty of the Government to spread education among the people, who are steeped in ignorance, and to help them in their advancement. It is only countries advanced in education that can attain a high position in every respect. It was with this view that Mr. Gokhale brought the Compulsory Education Bill for consideration in the Imperial Legislative Council; but to the misfortune of this country it was not passed. Though since the celebration of His Majesty's Coronation in India, the Government have been spending more money on education in this country, yet the amount spent here for this purpose is very small when compared with that spent in the other countries. From this it may be inferred that India is the least educated of all countries in the world. The Government always plead want of funds whenever the popular representatives in the Legislative Council demand an increase of expenditure under the head "Education". Provision may be made for a larger expenditure under this head by curtailing the expenditure under the other heads. If the Indians have the control over the finance, they will spend liberally on education and industries, which should advance considerably. It is very necessary that the Government should introduce reforms leading to the spread of education and improvement of industries.

15. The Desabhaktan, of the 11th December, reproduces in Tamil the comments of New India of the 10th idem, on the Government order issued recently modifying G.O. No. 559, prohibiting students from taking part in politics. The article appears in New India under the heading "The G.O. or the Director."

WORLD ADVERTISER, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

16. The Dravidan, of the 11th December, takes exception to the statement of Mr. Eardley Norton at the Tinnevelly Conference that, if the ordinary people in this country are backward in education, they are themselves to blame for it and that it is their own duty to correct their mistake, and says:—It is not possible for the people to improve the state of affairs. Primary education should be improved only by the Government and it is their main duty to do so. Unless all the ordinary people have a little grounding in primary education, there is not a chance of even a few of them having secondary and higher education. In this country, when a good amount of money is spent on other items, it is only a very small amount that is spent on education. We do not think this is the case in any civilized country in the world. The ordinary people of this Presidency live only in villages, and there are not a good number of primary schools in rural areas. When the Government, acting on the words of the communities which have progressed, are spending four times as much for higher education as they spend for elementary education, why should they not be made to spend a large amount on elementary education also?

Mr. Norton on education.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

17. A correspondent to the Dravidan, of the 13th December, refers to the resolution passed at the Tinnevelly-Madura-Ramnad Districts non-Brahman Conference held at Tinnevelly about this college, maintained from the Tirukkurungudi chatram funds in the Nanguneri taluk and observes:—It is really cruel that none but Brahman students are admitted into this college, though a sum of about Rs. 4,500 from the income of the choultty in Tirukkurungudi is utilised for this college. With this amount, nearly fifteen elementary schools can be started in the same taluk at this time when the non-Brahmans have not the benefit of even elementary education. This may turn the Maravas who abound in that taluk from their evil ways and improve them.

"An educational C.I.D."

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

19. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 6th December, says:—The text books prescribed in educational institutions are very costly. If any one in the good graces of the Text Book Committee produces a book, the committee forces the school authorities to prescribe it as a text book. The authorities accordingly prescribe such text books in arithmetic, history and geography and give home exercises from them. . . They grant holidays on unnecessary occasions and, holding schools on Saturdays and Sundays for two or three days, mark the attendance for both forenoon and afternoon. . . The Educational authorities should effect some reforms. Until then there can be no progress in education.

Higher education.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

SUVARNALEKHA, Tanuku, 13th and 27th Nov. and 4th Dec. 1917.

20. The three issues, Nos. 34, 35–36 and 37 of the Suvarnalekha, dated the 13th and the 27th November and the 4th December, contain a conversation in which many arguments are adduced condemning the policy of neglecting the vernaculars in the University education. In the course of this, one speaker who is a coarse wit says that the people are dissatisfied beyond all bounds with the fact that the Educational authorities have failed to make the study of the vernaculars compulsory in the Intermediate and the B.A. classes. He asks why the English Professors have taken the responsibility of not making the vernaculars subjects of study in the Indian Universities. The speaker says:—Though some may differ from me in other matters they are at one with me in this. While I worship Sankara Acharya, they worship Ramanuja Acharya and Maridi Mahalakshmi. There is nothing common in our worship. While these seat a young widow beside the barber's razor case, they lay her by the side of a paramour. Our customs are not the same. . . But in the matter of the study of the vernaculars, all those living in the land between the eastern and the western sea are agreed. . . If the vernacular pandits are a set of useless men, they have to be trained to suit the modern conditions. Vernaculars should not be boycotted from educational institutions for the mere reason that the Pandits are not up-to-date. . . That the students are at liberty to take the vernaculars as their optional subject is no argument. Why should this argument be applied to English? In the matter of the language of the rulers and the vernaculars, there should be no option at all. Their study must be made compulsory.

The vernaculars.

(j) Salt and Abkari.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

21. Adverting to the high rate at which salt is at present said to be sold in Madras, and the statement reported to have been made by the authorities in Bengal that enormous supply of salt would be had from Madras to relieve the salt scarcity in Calcutta, the Swadesamitran, of the 14th December, writes:—Just see how curious this is. We cannot much commend the magnanimity of the Madras Government in having informed the Calcutta authorities of the enormous quantity of salt available here for sale. It will lead the poor people here to question what Government have done to check the rise in the price of salt in this city, while they have gone to help Calcutta. Though on account of the salt scarcity there it is but just to export salt from here when it is possible to do so, yet we have once again to ask why the Government have not made arrangements to check the present high price of this commodity by devising means for selling it at reasonable rates in the important places of the city. Though it was said that the Government would make certain arrangements in this matter, yet we are not aware of any such arrangements having been made up to date.

High price of salt.

(k) General.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

22. The Desabhaktan, of the 11th December, writes:—The desire for Home Rule, which has long been almost concealed in the heart of mother India, is becoming patent now and is growing actively day by day. Whether India acquires Home Rule soon or late, the active desire for it will never disappear and it will go on increasing until Home Rule is obtained. If we sincerely represent to Government our true opinions, they have no reason whatever to be provoked by it. It is only if we do not do this that there is the possibility of the Government believing the false tales carried to them by a few selfish persons and getting disgusted with the people. It is when the rulers and the ruled do not understand each other correctly that the peace of the country is disturbed and an anarchist spirit crops up. So we are bound to remain loyal and devoted to our Government and, pointing out our grievances to them by peaceful means, co-operate with them in rooting out anarchism. The majority of our English brethren are, of course, aware, by their long association with us, that we will never do anything to disturb the peace of the country. Some Englishmen, who are ever intent on doing injury to India, sent false information to England that the Indians were always quarrelling without any union, that they would even go to the extent of committing murders and that those who come to India for holding high appointments could hardly expect to return home. But their object has not been completely fulfilled. The people in England have been convinced of the sincere loyalty of the Indians, from the sacrifices made by the latter in the present war. They are also aware of the assurance of the Indians that, if the Government would give up their suspicion and distrust of the Indians and act impartially, without treating the Indians differently from the Englishman, they would all of them fight for England and gain a victory. So what we want is that we should acquire Home Rule under the British authority, by peaceful means and by the co-operation of the rulers and the ruled.

The Home Rule movement and union.

Swadesamitran & Desabhaktan, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

Home Rule.

The Swadesamitran and the Desabhaktan, of the 14th December, reproduce in Tamil a letter said to have been written by Mr. E. L. Ayyar to Mrs. Besant about the work done by him in England and Wales in the cause of Home Rule for India. This letter is published in New India of the 13th idem.

Dravidabhimani, Salem, 7th Dec. 1917.

The Home Rule agitation.

The Dravidabhimani, of the 7th December, also says that the Home Rule agitation is now carried on only by the Brahmans and, dwelling on the various obstacles said to have been thrown by this class in the way of the non-Brahman Conference being held at Salem, remarks that the granting of Home Rule will only transfer all power into the hands of these Brahmans and ruin the country. It adds that the audience in the counter-non-Brahman Conference held at Salem, at the instigation of the Brahmans, comprised only municipal employees, jutka drivers and men of that type.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 12th Dec. 1917.

The ideal of India.

23. A correspondent to the Desabhaktan, of the 12th December, observes:— The Indians have all along been relying on the words of Mr. Macaulay and other English statesmen that, when they became capable of governing themselves, the Government of the country would doubtless be entrusted to them. The time has gone when the fitness of Indians for Home Rule was questioned. No one, except some Englishmen of the type of Curtis and Webby, whose brains have become shrunk on account of their associations with the Round Table, some Anglo-Indians and Anglo-Indian papers who have no sympathy whatever for India, while they are still eating of her salt and a few, who having lost their head and being led by the nose by the inveterate enemies of the progress of our country, are always abusing the Brahmans out of jealousy, will dare say that the Indians are unfit for Home Rule. The statement of the late Mr. Dadabhai Nowroji in the Congress of 1906 that Home Rule was the panacea for all evils, is still fresh in the minds of the Indians. Many were anxious that the Home Rule movement might wane and disappear on account of the foolish acts of some officials. But as a matter of fact the lamp of Home Rule is burning brightly. We have accepted Home Rule as our ideal and this ideal has become indelibly impressed on our minds. No one can wipe it out. We are anxiously expecting to gain this ideal soon. Is it fair to tell us that we are unfit to guard our country, after making us decrepits by the application of laws like the Press Act, the Defence of India Act and the Arms Act? Even under all these restrictions, our country has produced eminent men like Tilak, Lajpat Rai, Gokhale, Rabindranath Tagore and Ramamurthi. This shows what kind of men a free India will produce. There are those who say that if Home Rule is granted immediately, many mistakes will be committed. But which country came up without committing mistakes? The Indians are sure to attain the bliss of Home Rule and it is for this very purpose that Providence has placed them under the British rule.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

National dress.

24. The Desabhaktan, of the 11th December, regrets that the Indian leaders who talk much about swadeshism on the platform do not give up their habit of dressing in a western fashion and remarking that these are not the men working sincerely for swadeshism and welcoming the new spirit that has arisen among the students of preferring the national to the western mode of dressing as an indication of the progress of this country, appeals to the students to follow the example of Mr. Gandhi and use only cloths woven in this country for their dress.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 29th Nov. 1917.

The Indian Industries Commission.

25. Referring to the evidence of Sir Vithaldas S. Mehta before this Commission, as the representative of the Indian Chamber of Commerce, the Vartakamitran, of the 29th November, writes:—It cannot be forgotten that, in the beginning of the enquiry by this Commission, the European capitalists gave evidence that the Government of India should not take the initiative in the matter of any industries and render any pecuniary aid. That is really the European view. The opinion of the Indians, who have an interest in the advancement of India, will be seen from the evidence of the members of the Indian Chamber of Commerce. These members are of opinion that the Government should appoint experts for investigating about new industries. It was pointed out by Mr. Low that the appointment of experts might lead to difficulties, if their opinion about any new industry turned out to be incorrect. But this cannot happen if, when appointing experts, care is taken to see whether they are really experts and what work they have been doing. Evidently Mr. Low is aware of one appointed as an expert in the dyeing industry being made an expert in leather and of men, who have been Sub-Collectors or have been holding some other appointments in several districts, being employed as trade experts and that is why this doubt has cropped up in his mind. The appointment of experts by Government is necessary in this country; because the people, though anxious to start new industries, do not know how to work them and there are not again many capitalists of the type of Messrs. Tata & Sons, who can choose capable experts and pay them decently. In reply to a question from the Commission whether public money could be spent for starting a few industries, Sir Vithaldas stated that it was necessary and that the capitalists should be made to pay something for getting the advice of the experts. The expenditure of public money in this matter cannot result in any harm, as it will lead to the starting of several industries in the country and thereby provide means of livelihood for several people. This alone will not do. Government aid is also necessary for new industries. The Government may render help by purchasing Indian-made articles for their use, by giving pecuniary assistance to industries freshly started and appointing experts therefor and by guaranteeing to make good any loss that may be sustained for some time. We agree with Sir Vithaldas in his opinion that all this help should not be given to companies worked by others than Indians. The money of the Indians should not be used for helping non-Indians. If any new company is started in India and the help of the Government of India sought therefor, the latter should understand how much of Indian capital there is in the company and unless it belongs mostly to the Indians, the Government should not interfere. The present Directors in the Department of Industries are not bound to act according to the opinion of the people. As men holding such appointments as Sub-Collectorships are now appointed as Directors, they should necessarily be made to take the opinion of Indian merchants having experience in trade and industries, in what they do.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

The Indian Industries Commission.

The Swadesamitran, of the 15th December, refers to the evidence of Lala Harikishen Lal before this Commission in Lahore charging Government officials with having colluded with the Anglo-Indian Banks to crush the Indian banking enterprise and the observation of Sir Francis Stewart, who presided at the session in Lahore, that Mr. Harikishen Lal was levelling serious charges against officials, and remarks:—Though we have no details with us to say whether the statements of Lala Harikishen Lal are true or not, there is the fact that he has declared his readiness to meet any inquiry. Mr. Adamji in Bombay and Mr. Harikishen Lal in Lahore have levelled very serious charges against officials and both of them are ready for any inquiry. But all the same neither Sir Thomas Holland nor Sir Francis Stewart has tried to ascertain the truth of the allegations and they have made a show of browbeating the witnesses. We do not know what the higher authorities are going to do in this matter. The public will not rest content until a satisfactory inquiry is made about the allegations of these witnesses.

26. Referring to the numerous conferences now held in the mufassal, the Swadesamitran, of the 11th December, observes :— The activity of the party, which is working against us, has necessitated these Conferences A small group called the non-Brahmans have been caught under the spell of our enemies and are trying to tenaciously obstruct the progress of the country. The Madras Mail, the European Association and others are playing the good samaritan and saying that, in the interests of the people, the popular representatives should not be given any power. The address presented to Mr. Montagu by the European Association seems to indicate that His Majesty's Government committed a folly in having announced, without obtaining the permission of the association, that their policy was to confer on India in course of time a system of government which would be responsible to the people. As this association has come out openly to declare that the very ideal of His Majesty's Government is wrong and that nothing should be done in pursuance of this ideal till the new Parliament meets, it has become the duty of our people to impress on the Government that the views of this association are based on interested motives and that they are capable of injuring the progress of the Indians and the future strength of the British Empire. That is why conferences are held in different places. The argument adduced by the European Association against the grant of Home Rule is that only ten per cent of the people are literate. This in itself seems to be an admission that it is not to the interest of the country that the bureaucracy should continue to administer it. There is nothing surprising in the European Association clashing with the ideal of the British Government. John Stuart Mill has stated many years ago that when a country is kept under subjection and ruled by foreigners, those belonging to the ruling race that go there for purposes of living will always cause trouble like this. So the threatening of the authorities by the Madras Mail and the warning of the European Association that no reforms should be thought of until the new Parliament meets are things to be expected; for they belong to the ruling race. Nevertheless we shall boldly urge our rights and our qualifications to have them.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

The Conferences.

27. Referring to the constitution and scope of this committee which have now been announced, the Swadesamitran, of the 11th December, observes:—We do not know the object with which this committee has been brought into existence and again we doubt if it would go into all the items connected with conspiracies. It seems to have been asked to report whether further legislation is necessary to suppress these conspiracies. Does this indicate that the authorities deem the existing laws, which are already severe enough, to be insufficient? If so, it is surprising indeed. Coming to the constitution of the committee, though it is gratifying to see that three out of the five members thereof are Judges, there are only two Indians in it and only one of these is a non-official. None of the prominent leaders of the people have been included in it. How can it then command the full confidence of the people? The matter to be inquired into by it concerns the honour of India and the administrative policy of the officials. So it is regrettable indeed that popular leaders commanding the esteem of the people are not in it.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

The Conspiracy Committee.

28. Adverting to the fact of the Madras Presidency Association being one of those that have not been permitted to present addresses to Mr. Montagu, the Desabhaktan, of the 12th December, says :—We do not know what made the Madras Government treat this association in this manner. Its president and other office-bearers are all eminent leaders of the people and the majority of the people of this Presidency are followers of this association. Institutions of yesterday, associations presided over by men who are not the accepted leaders of the people and other bogus bodies have been permitted to wait on the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu. All these are against the Congress League demands. The majority of the people in this Presidency are in favour of these demands. What benefit can the people derive from associations, which are antagonistic to popular opinion, seeing the Secretary of State and the Viceroy? Mr. Montagu is going here not to see rich men and zamindars but to understand the real opinion of the subjects. What is the use of the Madras Government presenting to him persons who do not know the real condition of the people, selfish individuals and those encouraged by Anglo-Indians? We hope the Local Government will realise that their action in this matter will wound the feelings of many and allow the Madras Presidency Association and other associations to present their address. The popular leaders in every district should, in the meantime, hold meetings immediately and condemn the action of the Government in slighting the Madras Presidency Association, and if the Government should still assume the same attitude, the Madras Mahajana Sabha and other bodies should, instead of waiting on the Secretary of State, bring the facts to the notice of His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State by means of the Press and telegrams.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 12th Dec. 1917.

The Madras deputations to Mr. Montagu.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 12th December, also expresses its surprise at the Madras Presidency Association, conducted by influential non-Brahman leaders, having been refused the opportunity of presenting an address to Mr. Montagu, when other associations inferior to it in the number of their members and their influence have been given this privilege, and, referring especially to the South Indian Islamiah League having been started only nine days after the date fixed by the Government for the receipt of applications for presenting an address to Mr. Montagu, observes:—Another association which has been allowed by the Local Government to present an address to Mr. Montagu is the Newington Old Boys' Association, of whose existence we have not heard till now. There is no possibility of knowing who its members are and what its ideals and also the experience they have in political matters. Besides the Presidency Association, a number of important associations also have been denied the privilege of presenting addresses to Mr. Montagu. The reason for this, perhaps, is that all these associations support the Congress League scheme of reforms We hope the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu will spend some thought over this matter and grant permission to the Madras Presidency Association and other associations, which have been left out, to present addresses.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

The Madras deputations to Mr. Montagu.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 14th December, expresses its regret at some associations having been refused the privilege of waiting in deputation upon Mr. Montagu, and says that this differentiation in treatment has caused great heart-burning to those who have been denied the opportunity of presenting addresses to him.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

The Dravidan, of the 14th December, refers to the meeting proposed to be held at the Gokhale Hall to protest against the action of the Madras Government in having refused permission to the Madras Presidency Association to present an address to Mr. Montagu and observes.

We do not think there are any weighty reasons to allow this association, which has come into existence as a creature of the Brahmans, to see Mr. Montagu. All the non-Brahmans of this Presidency accept the aims of the South Indian Liberal Federation and even Muhammadan gentlemen have adopted the rules of our Federation and formed a separate League against the Congress and the Muslim League. So it is clear that all classss, except the Brahmans, are against Home Rule. Further, only a few hundreds of members have joined the non-Brahman association led by Diwan Bahadur P. Kesava Pillai and these are all supporters of the Home Rule League. As Mr. Kesava Pillai has had an interwiew already with Mr. Montagu at Delhi on behalf of these, there is no necessity for him to approach the Secretary of State again on behalf of the Presidency Association.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

The Desabhaktan, of the 14th December, also refers to this protest meeting and says:—The people are as anxiously awaiting this meeting as they awaited the arrival of Mr. Montagu. They have realised well that union has many advantages. This is the proper opportunity to acquaint Mr. Montagu with the real condition of Madras and with the fact that it is only a few among us that are working against our efforts. We would say that the action of the Madras Government in preventing some associations from seeing Mr. Montagu has after all done some good. Protest meetings should be held in every district as is done in the city, and telegrams should fly in different directions. This is the time to expose the tactics of the Anglo-Indians and of those of us who are led by them. We hope our leaders will attend to this work zealously. If the Madras Government realise the opinion of the public and issue orders before the meeting takes place this evening, that all associations may wait in deputation upon Mr. Montagu, they will be causing immense satisfaction to the people and merit their gratitude.

We should deem it to be our fortune indeed that the truth of our movement has been realised even in England, and we hope that this Indo-British Association will thrive well. We should care only that the real situation should be understood and we should not make a difference here between our people and others.

Lord Sydenham is the president of this association. He wrote among other things that dangerous sedition prevails in India and that the Indian Maximalists wield authority in the Congress. So long as an association under his presidentship is serving the country, the agitation for self-government also will prevail. We thank him for doing the kindness of thus helping the Home Rule movement.

36. Adverting to the statement said to have been made by the Agent of Messrs. Ralli Brothers before the Cotton Committee at Nagpur, that no legislation was necessary for preventing the adulteration of cotton, on the ground that the matter could be settled among the merchants themselves, the Vartakamitran, of the 29th November, writes:—It is not right to go in for frequent legislation in matters relating to trade. There will be no room at all for adulteration, if only the merchants assert that good prices will not be paid for adulterated cotton. The appointment of Inspectors to look after these matters would not only increase the expenditure but also affect the proper conduct of business. Further, as subordinate officers may have to be deputed to inspect cotton presses, all these efforts would only result in unnecessary trouble and loss.

38. Adverting to the observations of the Madras Mail taking exception to the eulogistic remarks of Lord Curzon, while referring to the services rendered by the Indian troops in France, in his introduction to the "History of the Indian Army Corps" in France to be published in England, on the ground that there is nothing praiseworthy in the conduct of soldiers, who work for wages, proceeding to the required station and performing their duties as directed, the Swadesamitran, of the 12th December, remarks:—The Madras Mail has evidently forgotten that at the beginning of the war all the soldiers in the English army were only paid men! Though there is nothing for us to learn from the Madras Mail of the valour and courage of the Indian troops, we refer to it here only to bring to light the attitude of this paper which poses to be the champion of the cause of the helpless. We will, however, remind it that all operations, in which the Indian Army has participated, have produced excellent results. The entry of this army into France checked the German advance instantaneously. Its entry into South Africa contributed to the fall of all German possessions and to the surrender of the German troops. The Indian army also proceeded to Mesopotamia and today the sacred city of

The Indian troops in France.

Jerusalem has come into our possession. When we take a perspective of the work of the allied forces in this war, is it not a fact that, of the victories achieved by them, those scored by the Indians are the most important? Is it that the Madras Mail has realised the truth and is jealous of it?

Lady clerks for military service.

39. Referring to a telegram said to have been received from Delhi that the Government of India have decided to appoint lady clerks in place of those who have left for military service outside India during the pendency of the war, the Hindu Nesan, of the 14th December, observes:—This is, of course, necessary. But it is doubtful whether there are so many women in India, who can discharge the duties of these clerks. Indian women would rarely enter service in offices and the present lady clerks only do the duties of typists and telephone clerks and even these few belong to the Anglo-Indian community. Would a sufficient number of lady clerks be available from among the members of this community to attend to the work of the military clerks, if the latter are sent overseas or on regimental duty? There are only a few lady clerks in certain banks and commercial firms, and it is indeed these that would have to be appointed to the posts referred to above. Inconveniences like these are usual to occur in times of war. There should, however, be some incentive for them to enter the service. But as the telegram received notifies the minimum pay to be only Rs. 10, it is doubtful whether lady clerks will be available for service on such a small pay.

The strange attitude of an official.

40. The Swadesamitran, of the 14th December, reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Bombay Chronicle on the alleged strange attitude of Sir Claude Hill, who presided over the recent Agricultural Conference held in Poona, in omitting from the address delivered by him at the Conference certain portions thereof commending the capabilities and zeal of Doctor Mann, the Principal of the College of Agriculture, Poona, while they are found in the printed copies of the address furnished to the press, and in the course of these comments the following observations occur:—What is the reason for the sudden disappearance of this reference from the speech? Can it be that, as soon as Sir Claude Hill came to know that Doctor Mann had allowed his students to invite Mr Horniman to deliver them a lecture, he lost all regard for Doctor Mann and deleted the portions referring to him from his speech? Is it not a wonder of wonders that the qualifications, capabilities and zeal of Doctor Mann should vanish from the view of Sir Claude Hill, merely because the former had allowed his students to invite Mr. Horniman? It appears, therefore, that officials should first find out the attitude of the authorities and then act according to their views.

Mr. Madhava Rao on reforms.

47. The Desabhaktan, of the 12th December, reports the Amrita Bazaar Patrika to have observed as follows about the opinion expressed by Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao in an article contributed by him to the Times of India on the reforms to be introduced in India:—From the views expressed by him he should be taken to be a statesman of a very high order. He invites the attention of the Government and the people of this country to a French proverb which says that small reforms will injure big ones. We would say that small reforms are great obstacles to political progress. They would be productive of more evil than what would ensue if no reforms were introduced; for if no reforms are granted, it may kill the progressive spirit of the people and turn them away from political ideas; but small reforms will only increase the yearning for reforms and drive those engaged in the agitation for them to commit excesses, not being able to satisfy their desire otherwise.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

How can we progress?

48. The Desabhaktan, of the 13th December, observes as follows in the course of a leader under this heading:—The methods of the Home Rule League are those chaulked out already by the Congress, whose aims are appreciated even by our Government. No true Indian or unbiased European, wishing for the progress of India, will deem the resolutions of the Congress to be one-sided. Though this Congress has been, for more than thirty years past, demanding many reforms for getting rid of numerous existing grievances, nothing has come of it. But before blaming the Government for heeding our request, it is necessary that we should do our duties properly. We should educate our people about the details of Home Rule, the advantages of having it and the ways of working for its acquisition. Every Indian should set apart a certain portion of his time every day for doing something conducive to the progress of the people. Countries such as Rome, Spain and France, which were once very famous, lost their glory only on account of absence of effort on the part of the people, and the British have been able to bring many big countries under their rule only by means of strenuous efforts. We should not only make our people strive for improving the amity of feeling between us and our English brethren, but also apprise them of the union that will be established between the people of the two countries as a result of the privileges which we demand. We should formulate even now the laws suitable to Home Rule and give an idea thereby to the people and Parliament in England of the nature of the Home Rule we demand. We should carry on our work in ways which will make the people of other countries appreciate our loyalty, patriotism and spirit of brotherhood.

The moderates again to the front.

49. The Desabhaktan, of the 12th December, writes.—When the attention of all people throughout India is engrossed on the agitation for Home Rule, a few here and there are trying to suppress this agitation. Even in Calcutta, a gentleman by name Prithwis Chanda Roy proposes to convene an All-India Conference of moderates, as he calls it, and requests all people in India to attend it. It is really funny to be told that the difference between moderates and extremists still exists in India. We were under the impression that there were many mad men only in Madras. Evidently there is a gentleman of this type in Calcutta also. His efforts are sure to fail.

The condition of the Panchamas.

51. The Desabhaktan, of the 13th December, publishes a communication from a correspondent, in which he says that the Adi Dravida Mahajana Sabha, which now poses to be the organ of the depressed classes, is only a recent institution started by a few of the members of the Paraiya Mahajana Sabha, which has been in existence for the last 30 years and which had the honour of presenting an address to Sir Arthur Havelock; and that the new association is a creature of the Chetti-Nayar clique, and, dwelling at length upon the various parties among the Panchamas themselves and the way in which the educated few among them treat their illiterate brethren, concludes that there is no hope for this community, unless the Government introduce compulsory education in their case.

MADRAS BULLETIN OF CO-OPERATION, Madras, September 1917.

The initial difficulties of co-operative societies.

52. A correspondent to the Tamil edition of the Madras Bulletin of Co-operation, for September 1917, writes:—Though the co-operative movement is intended for the ordinary people, its growth is bound to be slow, until there is a wider and faster spread of education among the people, the department takes an interest in spreading this movement more widely and it secures the assistance of non-officials. Considering the initial difficulties which many societies now in existence had to contend with, there seem to be several defects in the method of starting societies and working them. I have a personal knowledge only of the condition of societies in the Tinnevelly district, and so I shall confine my remarks to them. What the Government have done till now is to approach people in a few places, who have never attempted any new thing, and, infusing an enthusiasm in them start societies. But unless steps are taken to promote this enthusiasm, the people are bound to lose their co-operative spirit. At present, it is the Circle Inspector that is responsible for starting new societies and he has the ear of the Assistant Registrar. But what kind of a man is he? He has been a clerk for some time in the office of the Assistant Registrar or a youth, who, having passed the school final examination, has learnt work under an Inspector for three or four months. But the work to be done by these Inspectors is a very responsible one. So without relying on the words of these young men, having no worldly experience, the Assistant Registrars should also ascertain personally whether it is advisable or not to start societies in any particular place. Even after starting them, they should be inspecting them often and render assistance in carrying on their work, until they can be relied upon to stand on their own legs. If the Assistant Registrar cannot do this himself or through his Inspector, he should depute the honorary organiser of his department or the President or the Secretary of a society in the neighbourhood to watch the work of such societies. What now happens is that, if a villager seeing the work of a society in an adjacent village, makes an application to the department for starting one in his own village, the Inspector goes to the village concerned about five or six months after the receipt of the application and, if the enthusiasm of the villagers in this matter had not abated by that time and if otherwise he is satisfied that a society can be started there, allows one to be started and registers it. It is only after this that the difficult portion of his task requiring skill begins. He will have to choose proper members for the panchayat, who, in addition to being capable men, will have to be men inclined to do public good. It is not desirable to make the village munisif or karnam the secretary of a society, as is now done in some cases, as these officials would have already their friends and enemies in the village and they have also the knack of leading the supervising officers by the nose. No societies should be started in villages, where there is already a factious spirit unless persons are available there for the panchayat who do not side with any party and who can bring the different parties together. Then, again, in the case of new societies, the department should make it a point to reply to their communications promptly. If, as happens now, a new society cannot have its first loan even after ten months since it came into existence, how can it improve and how can those working it have any enthusiasm? Many societies are not able to get a good name, on account of its panchayat not knowing even the ordinary procedure. The only means of getting over this difficulty is by the Inspector putting the panchayat in the way whenever he inspects the society or by asking the president or secretary of an adjacent society to do so. In some villages, the members of the panchayat are illiterate people and so there is the chance of the accountant deceiving them by writing one thing and reading out another. So some attention should be bestowed on this matter. Further, the Inspector should call for a general body meeting of the society, whenever he happens to inspect it, and place before the meeting details of the loans taken by the panchayat and those repaid by them. This will be an incentive to the general body of members to take an interest in the work of the society.

MADRAS BULLETIN OF CO-OPERATION, Madras, September 1917.

The supervision of co-operative societies.

53. A correspondent contributes a long article on this subject to the Tamil edition of the Madras Bulletin of Co-operation for September 1917 in the course of which he says:—

'The charge against the present Inspectors that, as they are young and inexperienced men and as they are given independent charge of a circle before they understand the nature of the co-operative movement, they often commit mistakes, is not quite unfounded. As a matter of fact, if Inspectors had done their work properly, the societies would not have been spoiled as much as they are now. It is often only the particular receipt in the receipt book of the society, which the Inspector signs in token of verification and the one preceding it that are filed in the chitta and again cases are found in which loans have not been secured by deeds even on the date on which the Inspector signed the Loan Ledger, as having checked it, and for months thereafter. Items of expenditure passed by them are not supported by vouchers and are incurred again. The figure in the audit note at times differs from that in the accounts of the society. Some societies are not inspected for months and others for years. Cases have occurred in which Inspectors have, after getting the signature of the President of a society in the plaint and vakalat for a suit, failed to file it, either in expectation of some consideration from the defendants or being obliged to them, thereby causing loss to the society. Inspectors have again kept quiet, knowing that a society has incurred an expenditure in contravention of the orders of the Assistant Registrar, without reporting the same to higher authorities immediately. How can societies be expected to improve, if this is the type of the Inspectors? Instances again are not wanting in which Inspectors have misappropriated the money of societies. Considering these things, it should be admitted that non-official supervision would be preferable. As to the way in which this is to be secured, the super-audit should be left in the hands of the Government, as suggested by the Imperial Committee, and responsibilities undertaken by the societies. If the co-operative movement is to improve, the societies should be managed efficiently and for this there should be local unions unconnected with the District Banking Union. The efficient supervision of the societies will be possible only by the former and not by the latter. The same charges that are now brought against Inspectors may be brought also against the staff of the District Banking Union and this will impede the progress of societies. Let me give a tangible instance and refer to the work of the District Banking Union for the Madura-Rāmnād districts, which has been supervising the work of the societies in these two districts from 1914. It is only after this supervision was begun that about fifteen societies had to be entrusted to liquidators in these two districts. The number of bad societies increased. Many societies in the books of which the secretary of the bank had noted, during his inspection in 1913, that their work was very good had become deteriorated in 1914. Such being the case, how can the supervision of the District Bank be deemed to be more efficient? By this I do not mean to say that the Directors of the District Bank do not know their work. My contention is that, however capable they may be, it will not matter as long as they have not the time to do much. They may not have time enough to look to their own transactions. So it is a difficult thing for them to supervise the work of many societies in the district.

54. The Dravida Patrika, of the 5th December, publishes some verses under this heading from the pen of C. Subrahmanya Bharati in which the following sentiments find a place:—Look at the beautiful flag of mother (India) come to sing its praise and do obeisance to it.

DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

The flag of the mother.

Look at the silken flag waving at the top of a lofty post with the words Vande Mataram written clearly thereon.

It is strong enough to withstand even the severe blast of a stormy wind. Look at the crowd of warriors standing at the foot of the post. They can be relied upon to guard the flag even at the risk of their lives.

55. The Visvakarman, for November, takes exception to Mr. T. Mukkama Asari and Mr. N. Duraivelu Asari claiming to represent the 15 lakhs of people in South India belonging to the Visvakarma community and says:—

VISVAKARMAN, Madras, November 1917.

The Visvakarma community and Indian political agitation.

The views expressed by Mr. T. Mukkama Asari are his own. None of the conferences of the Visvakarma community have passed a resolution in favour of Home Rule, nor has he obtained the sanction of the Visvakarma conference committee, before committing the community to the cause of Home Rule.

The paper then gives a summary of the reforms embodied in the scheme of the Congress and the Muslim League, which Mr. Mukkama Asari is alleged to have described as very moderate, and adds:—The petty reforms demanded by the Home Rulers are the control of the purse, supervision over the executive officials of the Government, provincial autonomy, replacing Europeans by Indians in administrative appointments, separation of executive from judicial functions, etc. But the responsibility of maintaining the army should, it seems, be undertaken by the Englishmen themselves. This means that the responsibility of protecting India should be on the Englishmen, while its administration and revenue should be in the hands of the Indians, which is a very reasonable argument indeed! If, in the present circumstances of the country, such reforms are granted, it is clear that the Government of the country will become centred in the hands of a small class, which has the advantages of education, official status and influence, and all other communities, which have not these advantages, will have to go to the wall.

56. The Pandiya Nesan, of the 10th December, refers to the good work done by this institute, and observes that, as it is apparent that those who are bit by mad dogs should necessarily proceed to the institute without delay to have an effective cure, the Government would do well to take steps to acquaint even the ordinary people in every town about the work of this institute.

PANDIYA NESAN, Madura, 10th Dec. 1917.

The Pasteur Institute, Coonoor.

57. A correspondent contributes a long article on this subject to the Swadesamitran of the 10th December in the course of which he observes:—It is regrettable to note that apart from some Anglo-Indians and a few selfish Indians obstructing the political demands of the Congress and the Muslim League at the present juncture, even those who are for these demands have begun to oppose them, with the idea of securing communal representation. Though these have not the venom of the Anglo-Indians in their heart, their attitude is a sufficient

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 10th Dec. 1917.

Caste distinctions and political reforms.

obstacle to the fulfilment of our objects. Every patriot should realise the serious evil consequences which will result from giving effect to this proposal. If communal representation, based on caste distinctions, should be adopted as a principle, an increase in the number of members in the Provincial Legislative Council to 5,000 instead of to 125 will still leave room for complaint that certain communities have not been represented. And again where is the necessity of the different castes being represented in the Legislative Councils? Can the administration operate differently upon different castes? At the last meeting of the Legislative Council, though many questions on subjects about which the people were anxiously expecting information did not receive any satisfactory replies, it was stated in response to a question of the Hon'ble Mr. Ahmed Tambi Marakkayar that the Government were considering about improving the prospects of the non-Brahmans in appointments under Government carrying high salaries. How is this to be done? Is it by giving a high appointment to one, even if one is not qualified to hold that appointment, or is it by the Government making separate arrangements for improving the qualifications of non-Brahmans at the expense of Government? Legislation and administration will, in every country, be the same for all people, except perhaps in particular items, and they never change with caste distinctions. So there will be no use to the Legislative Council by there being representatives of each caste in it. Further, such a representation may introduce into the Council a few who are not at all qualified to be there. This means that, while there are only one or two puppets in the Council now, there will be a good many persons of that stamp then. When the chorus for the song of the Anglo-Indians declaring that Indians are unfit for Home Rule is only their want of union on account of the caste distinctions, is it wise on our part to introduce our caste distinctions even in political matters? Is it not our duty to be as united in political matters as we have been in the loyal help rendered by us in the war and gain our end?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

Mr. Montagu in India.

58. The Swadesamitran, of the 13th December, expresses its regret at Mr. Montagu not having found it possible to be present at the Congress and observes:—Who is responsible for making it impossible for Mr. Montagu to be present at the Indian National Assembly? Our people hoped that though they could not give him an idea of their eloquence, they would at least have the opportunity of explaining to him their grievances personally. But the action of the Madras Government has made this too impossible, on account of their having denied permission to a number of representative institutions to present addresses to Mr. Montagu. If the Government do not like that Mr. Montagu should hear the representations of such institutions, why was he invited by the Viceroy to go to India? When announcing the prospective visit of Mr. Montagu to India, the Viceroy stated on the 5th September last that he would leave nothing undone to enable Mr. Montagu to hear the views of all representative bodies and others in this country as desired by Mr. Montagu. We want him only to keep his word. There is no doubt that the institutions now omitted by the Local Government are representative ones. Does Mr. Montagu know that these institutions wanted to present addresses to him and has he declined to give them an opportunity to do so? Did he express a desire to hear the representation of the Islamia League, which was started only recently, against the Muslim League? If he did not do either, who has taken the responsibility for favouring certain bodies and ignoring the others? The Government of India could not have known of the local institutions, and it is therefore only on the advice of the Madras Government that it should have been decided which institutions are to see Mr. Montagu and which not. If this is so, the question naturally arises as to what made the Madras Government omit these institutions. Why have associations, which are against the Congress League scheme, been allowed to see Mr. Montagu, while those favouring that scheme have been denied this privilege? If the bureaucrats are able to defeat the very object of the visit of Mr. Montagu to India, when can they be expected to allow the aspirations of the Indians to be gained? We learn there was the same complaint even in Delhi. Everything seems to be done to prevent him from having a correct idea of the real condition of India. It seems his arrival here tomorrow is not public and not even the Sheriff of Madras can be present on the platform among the few who are to receive him. Why all this precaution? This will naturally create an impression in the minds of the people that the authorities here have no confidence in the minister of the King-Emperor. This has caused great pain to several associations and classes. If the object of the Viceroy and the British Cabinet is to be accomplished, the Secretary of State for India should not return, after hearing the representations of a few bogus associations. The people here would concede that the Government have acted fairly only if all the institutions which wish to make a representation to him in person are allowed to do so. If this is not done, the responsibility for the impression created thereby upon the mind of the public will rest only on the officials.

The Dravidan, of the 13th December, takes exception to the view expressed by the Desabhaktan, of the 12th idem, that the majority of the people in this Presidency support the Congress League scheme and adds:—Perhaps, in the opinion of the Desabhaktan, the majority of the people means the Brahmans! It is the non-Brahmans, including the Adi Dravidas, that form the public of this Presidency. How often are we to din this into the head of the bogus patriots, who are under the spell of the Home Rulers?

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

The same paper approves of the action of the Local Government in having denied permission to the Madras Presidency Association to present its address to Mr. Montagu, and it is glad that the Government have now fully realised that this institution is not a genuine body started with the object of working for the country but has been ushered into existence by the Brahmans to serve their own interests.

59. The Swadesamitran, of the 15th December, offers a hearty welcome to the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu in the name of the people of this Presidency and says:—This Presidency can be said to be more important than other Presidencies in that, apart from its progress in other directions, it has advanced a good deal politically. Home Rule Leagues were first started only here and numerous branch leagues have now been formed in different portions of this province and are working for the cause of the country. Nearly eight lakhs of people have signed the monster petition to Mr. Montagu here, which is itself an indication of the progress of this province. Another feature lending importance to this Presidency is that the European agitation, too, was started only here. It is the Madras Mail, which had all along pretended to sympathise with the aspirations of the Indians, that whipped up the Europeans to move in this matter, seeing that the time for the fulfilment of these aspirations is near at hand. The European agitation started by the Madras Mail gave an additional impetus to the Home Rule movement. Moreover, our Governor also accelerated the progress of the movement by openly warning the people not to dream of having Home Rule after the war and that repressive measures would be availed of to suppress the movement. These words spread like wild fire throughout India and helped to strengthen the cause of Home Rule immensely. Thus it is in Madras that the Home Rule movement was born and developed. In this Presidency it is not only the Governor that was illiberal in his views, but even the other members of his Government and the bureaucrats were plainly showing their curious attitude regarding reforms and Home Rule. Though we cannot say definitely that the unnecessary Brahman-non-Brahman controversy which has recently arisen and the funny conduct of some persons in connection with the Presidency Muslim League have been managed from behind the screen by one or two belonging to the bureaucracy, we cannot but note that it is the suspicion of the public that the creation of this spirit of disunion received the support of the bureaucracy in several ways. The fact that some associations have not been able to see Mr. Montagu here is again an indication of the attitude of the Government and the bureaucracy in Madras. So we hope the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu will not attach any undue importance to the factious spirit that has recently appeared in this Presidency. The Indians expect them to differentiate between the genuine movement in the country and spurious ones. We are sure Mr. Montagu will not judge of things as the bureaucrats in India do, with their own likes and dislikes.

Mr. Montagu in Madras.

The Swadesamitran, of the 12th December, reproduces in Tamil an extract from an article in the Capital of Calcutta in which a correspondent says that, after moving with Mr. Montagu, many influential Europeans in Calcutta have had to change their opinion about him and that he appears to be a frank and strong willed man, ready to hear and consider whatever is told. The correspondent adds that no one will now say that he is a vain pretender and has no political knowledge.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 13th December, quotes from the opinion of a Delhi correspondent to an Anglo-Indian paper to the effect that, though every one who has had an interview with Mr. Montagu has formed a very good impression of him and has felt satisfied and confident, some one is sure to be disappointed when the final proposals regarding reforms are published, and remarks that it betokens great capability on the part of Mr. Montagu to please all people and that, if any one will have to feel disappointed in the end, it cannot be those that desire for legitimate reforms.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

Grievances of the Postal officials.

60. Adverting to the memorial said to have been submitted by the Postal officials in the Madras Presidency to the Director-General for the redress of their grievances, the Desabhaktan, of the 14th December, in considering these grievances to be doubtless indescribable, truts that, as these officials have to work for a longer time and without any relief, which is enjoyed by the officials of the other departments, the memorial will receive the sympathetic consideration of the Government.

DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, 12th Dec. 1917.

"Our mother."

61. The Dravida Patrika, of the 12th December, publishes some verses under this heading contributed by one C. Subrahmanya Bharati, which contains the following:—The mother (India) will do charity with all her sixty crores of broad hands, but will (at the same time) bring to the dust those who come to war with her.

She is more patient than the earth, . . . but she will resemble the fierce goddess Durga, when faced with those who commit vicious deeds.

Our mother will bless those kings who are inclined to be good . . .; if they are otherwise, she will swallow them and then dance with joy.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

Child mortality.

62. The Hindu Nesan, of the 14th December, says:—A comparison of the mortality of children in England with that in India shows that the rate is higher in India and yet the authorities are still considering about training some ladies in midwifery so as to be useful to women during periods of confinement. Lady visitors well versed in sanitary methods are appointed in western countries for the purpose of explaining to the people the advantages resulting from their observing the rules of sanitation. There are no such visitors here. Local committees such as are contemplated to be introduced in England for the purpose of supplying pure milk in any locality may well be appointed here and entrusted with the duty of protecting children. Our opinion is that if institutions for taking care of children and providing accommodation for women during periods of confinement are started here with the co-operation of local gentlemen, they will prove to be very useful. If the committees of such institutions are not able to advance sufficient money to build the necessary structures or to maintain the institutions, the Government will do well to give liberal grants to them so as to infuse in them an interest and enthusiasm for their work.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

An anti-Home Rule meeting at Sattur.

63. The Dravidan, of the 14th December, publishes from the pen of a correspondent the proceedings of a meeting of Roman Catholic Christians held at Sattur on the 9th idem at which lectures are said to have been delivered explaining to the audience the kind and impartial treatment which the people have under the British Government, irrespective of caste or status, when compared with the despotic rule of the ancient kings in India and the fraudulent motive of those who now clamour for Home Rule and declaring that in consideration of the evils that may arise from the immediate grant of Home Rule, the Government should be requested to grant it only after all the Indians become equal in every respect.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

The Home Rule movement and officials.

64. The Desabhaktan, of the 14th December, reports the Amrita Bazaar Patrika to have referred to the conduct of the Deputy Commissioner of Mandalay in having taken certain pleaders to task for having obtained signatures to the monster petition presented to Mr. Montagu and observes as folllows:—

It is plain now that the officials do not like the Home Rule movement. There are numerous instances to show that they are doing much, both openly and secretly, to injure this movement. Questions in the Provincial Legislative Councils as to whether high officials are concerned in this elicit no satisfactory replies. We wish the mean-minded acts of the officials reach the ears of Mr. Montagu.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

65. The Desabhaktan, of the 14th December, refers to the opinion expressed by Lord Sydenham that the Indians are unfit to have any reforms now and remarks:—This is, perhaps, one of the many who work against those whose salt they have eaten. This gentleman lived upon the money of India for five years and is now abusing her.

Lord Sydenham.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

66. The Swadesamitran, of the 14th December, refers to the withdrawal, by the Maharaja of Bobbili, of the scheme of reforms approved at a meeting of the Landholders' Association which he had submitted to the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu, on account of the objections raised by a minority, and the subsequent presentation of an address by this minority embodying a separate scheme and observes that, while the proposals drawn up in the name of the zamindars, in pursuance of the Congress League scheme, have not reached the authorities, proposals which are contrary to this scheme, have reached their hands in the name of the zamindars.

DESABHIMANI, Guntūr, 21st Oct. 1917.

70. Referring to the fact that the shop-keepers in Guntūr closed their shops as a protest against the orders issued by Mr. Narasimha Acharyulu, Deputy Collector, the Desabhimani, of the 21st October, (received on the 13th December), says under this heading:—The inconsiderate orders of the Deputy Collector have incensed the Hindus. . . Since writing the above, we have learnt that the authorities have given permission to the people to have their music under certain conditions, and that the shop-keepers have opened their shops.

The sad plight of Guntūr.

The same paper says:—While in pursuance of the orders of the Deputy Magistrate, the people of Guntūr have proceeded to erect pandals, the Deputy Magistrate presented himself before the people, and stopped the erection of the pandals. He instructed the Chairman of the Municipality not to grant licenses. Licenses were, therefore, refused. What could the Chairman do when the Deputy Magistrate, who is responsible for the peace of the country, advised him not to issue licenses. The Deputy Magistrate could not be ignorant of the decision in the Home Rule flag case in which the Hon'ble Justice Sadasiva Ayyar said that if any one not liking to see the flag, disturbed public peace, he should be brought to book, but not the man who hoisted the flag. It is stated that the erection of pandals will irritate the Muhammadans. Do not the Muhammadans erect pandals before their panjas? Do the authorities think that the removal of their pandals will calm the minds of the Hindus? How can the acts of the authorities be described?

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 2nd Dec. 1917.

will end. We are aware of the statesmanship, the administrative capacity, the charming tact and eloquence possessed by our Government. They do as they wish to do, and they are not wont to do according to the wishes of the people. We should not, at the same time, forget their responsibility. . . The art of swimming should be learned in the water. Capacity to administer must be gained in administration. Unless the administration is entrusted to the people, it is not possible to decide as to their fitness or unfitness. The countries of the rulers themselves, which enjoy self-government now, testify to this. Their own experience is a better testimony for it. The demanding of small reforms and the giving of them will not satisfy the people. They will stand in the way of big reforms being introduced.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

The Andhra Panchamas.

72. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th December, says that he has become a member of the proposed deputation of the Andhra Panchamas, anxious to help a down-trodden race. He has learnt that Mr. Montagu has refused to receive the address of the Muhammadans because it contains a prayer to release the interned Muhammadans. He regrets he cannot be a member of the deputation, for to be a member of any deputation while the interned are not released, his conscience says, violates the honour of the Indians.

The editor adds a note that the Andhra Panchama deputation was not accepted and that the correspondent need not feel sorry.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

Plague at Vizagapatam.

73. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th December, refers to the appearance of plague at Vizagapatam and says:—Not only those suffering from plague but also those who are free from it are sent by force by the municipality to the sheds on the other side of the Upputeru. The weather being too chill there, the people prefer to leave the city in thousands and go to the villages. Even big men are leaving the city. The readers will imagine for themselves the hardships of the poor. The college near the street in which the plague first broke out has not been closed. Nobody thinks about it. There have been cases of robbery due to the people going away to the villages, unable to suffer the hardships in the city. It is not known what more is in store in the future.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

The Kurnool District Conference.

74. The Andhrapatrika, of the 11th December, says with reference to the Kurnool District Conference:—When the President was delivering his address, the audience was spell-bound, wondered at his patriotism, and shed tears to hear about the low state of the country. The words of the President about the duties of the people of the city to those of the villages melted everybody's heart.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

The Bapatla Taluk Conference.

75. The Andhrapatrika, of the 11th December, reports the President of the Bapatla Taluk Conference to have said:—Wise men consider it an anomaly that the rulers have promised to give the Indians rights of administration but have not carried out their promises. They have been continuing their bureaucratic system of administration. . . It is to be regretted that the Anglo-Indians and a few Indians under their influence are opposed to the Congress reforms. That the advocates of democracy in England who can do good or evil are ignorant of the true state of things in India is another obstacle. It is natural that those who have been wielding the authority for some generations past make efforts not to surrender it. To remove all these obstacles requires great perseverance, sacrifice and courage. Justice and authority are working in opposite directions.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

The Cuddapah District Conference

76. The Andhrapatrika, of the 11th December, reports the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Cuddapah District Conference to have said thus:—The opposition of the Anglo-Indians is natural. We must be prepared to face it. From the time of Lord William Bentinck to this day, they have been opposing every proposal requiring an abatement of their authority. They have vowed to take the side of the bureaucracy. In no other country has the bureaucracy so much strength. They wish that the Anglo-Indian officials should permanently wield the authority, and that the Anglo-Indian non-officials should permanently exploit the country and carry away money. They say that they wish the advancement of the country, but in practice they thwart it. They say they wish the grant of self-government to India, but that should be delayed till the end of time.

The Cuddapah District Conference.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th December, reports the President of the Cuddapah District Conference to have said:—The Minto-Morley reforms did not provide for a majority of elected members in the Legislative Council. The nominated members have to side mostly with the Government. The rules require the official members to side with the Government. Under such circumstances no resolution which the Government do not like is accepted. The Government have the right to reject even accepted resolutions. The non-officials are therefore disappointed. Even the Congress reforms are incomplete. India should for purposes of administration should be conveniently divided into provinces enjoying complete self-government. . . The members of the Executive Council should be all elected. We must be able to ask them to quit their seats when they act against the resolutions of the Legislative Councils. We must ask chiefly for financial independence, control over the Executive Councils, and a majority of elected members. The Congress League reforms are not complete. Certain Indians also have joined the opponents out of self-interest or to please those who have secretly set the Anglo-Indians against us The Anglo-Indians have at all times been opposing all reforms calculated to benefit the Indians. They tried even to drive Lord Ripon from this country. We have to pity them for the mischief they do. They are few and they cannot stop the great tide of time. . . While the British are fighting against the Germans, condemning their evil acts, the Anglo-Indians recommend that German methods should be adopted in dealing with the Indians. They are insulting us. . . We are not sorry for the agitation of the Europeans, however great that may be. What we are sorry for is that a few Indians have fallen into their snare

Peace is impossible.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

77. The Andhrapatrika, of the 11th December, quotes the words of Sir Edward Carson expressing his confidence that the British will not withdraw from the war till they accomplish their object, and writes under this heading:—We believe that every one who wishes the welfare of the Empire will agree with Sir Edward Carson. The responsibilities of the British in connexion with the war are daily growing. It must be admitted that the treacherous conduct of the Russians has made the situation critical. . . The doctrines of the Maximalists are spreading even among the Russian soldiers. The most horrible of their acts is the cancellation of all foreign debts. They might have stooped to this dishonourable act on account of want of money. But this can never be the means to escape from the payment of debts. They may get some abatement of interest or suspension of repayment for some time. But this is the first instance of this sort of violation of international laws. England refused to release two Russians kept under restraint This leads us to doubt the safety of the British in Petrograd. . . The Germans will try to fight vigorously in the Western and in the Italian theatres. As there was no pressure in the Eastern theatre, the Germans have been able to march some of their army back to the west. They occupied the forest of Borloun. Yesterday's mail surmises that the British have retreated 6 miles in length and a mile or a mile and a half in breadth. This must cause some loss to the English. . . From today's telegrams, it would appear that the British have taken some of the enemy's trenches. The English do not intend to give the enemy any rest. It appears that an army of twenty lakhs of Americans will be sent to the Western theatre in the spring. But the Minister appointed to encourage economy says that 690 big vessels have been sunk by the submarines, that the food problem in the world has assumed a serious aspect, and that it is to be decided whether the Americans should use their vessels to transport armies or to send provisions. From the military preparations that the Americans are making, it may be inferred that they will be able to do both these things. . . Though the war situation is not very encouraging, there are very many favourable circumstances. The Americans have made up their minds to gain the victory in the war. If along with this, the Irish and the Indian administrative problems are satisfactorily solved, both the countries will become strong. India will show its unsurpassed valour, will fight against the enemy and gain the victory. The British should not let go the opportunities now afforded, but should use them and establish liberty in the world. Only then can there be a satisfactory peace.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

The list of deputations.

78. The Andhrapatrika, of the 11th December, says:—The list of deputations to wait on Mr. Montagu, published by the Government, is disappointing. The disappointment of the Andhras, who have unanimously resolved to make a representation to Mr. Montagu, is beyond all bounds. The addresses of the non-Brahman Association, which wishes the welfare of the country and of the Andhra Association do not find a place. We cannot say how many more addresses were rejected. Bureaucratic authority appears to be at the bottom of all this. It is in this Presidency that the Home Rule movement has been strongest. Perhaps the authorities want to show that the opposition to this movement is greatest in this Presidency. It cannot be said that Mr. Montagu cannot spare time. But he is going to remain here for a week. We are at a loss to know why he should finish such an important business as the receiving of addresses in three days. If it is a fact that he cannot spare time, why should he receive three addresses from the Anglo-Indians, and four from the landholders? Why should he reject an address from the non-Brahmans wishing the welfare of the country and accept five addresses suggested by one association and three addresses prepared by the Muhammadans? If it was intended to reduce the number of addresses, it would be well to treat all alike. In other provinces, the Hindus and the Muhammadans have unanimously urged the necessity of self-government. The zamindars in Calcutta demanded full provincial autonomy. The present arrangement will result in the evil of the opposition to Home Rule appearing greatest in the addresses of the Madras Presidency where Home Rule has had its birth. . . Meetings should be held all over the country and the disapproval of the people should be communicated to Mr. Montagu. Resolutions should be passed regarding self-government and the constitution of provinces and telegrams sent to Mr. Montagu and the Government in England. Unless this constitutional agitation is adopted, the representations of the well-wishers of the country cannot reach the ears of the authorities.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

Pardon.

79. The Andhrapatrika, of the 11th December, says:—Mr. Montagu who wishes a calm atmosphere should pardon all political offenders, forgetting the past in the present circumstances. There is no necessity now for repression. We pray that the Government will remove all repression so that all the people may enjoy the benefit of reforms.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

The "high-handedness" of a European.

80. The Andhrapatrika, of the 11th December, reproduces in Telugu from page 5 of the Hindu of the 10th December the letter of its correspondent regarding the "High-handedness" of a European in South Kanara.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

The present duty.

81. The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th December, says under this heading:—The associations that have been working for years with self-sacrifice for the advancement of the country have been brushed aside and all associations without a name have been given a high place. This is surprising. We do not think that India will attain political salvation through the deputations which are to wait on Mr. Montagu. Self-government, whose necessity we have been urging, will conduce to the stability of the Empire. Without solving the Indian problem, it will not be possible to run the Imperial machine From the broad-minded Secretary of State down to Lord Curzon and Sir John Rees who are against India's getting any freedom, all have recognised this truth. So those who oppose the grant of self-government cannot but meet with dishonour. There can be no statesman who will hear the words of Doctor Nayar and neglect the efficiency of the Empire. But the bureaucracy do not appear to take a broad view of the political problem. It is natural that the people give expression to views opposed to those of the authorities.

If, for that reason, their deputations are rejected, then there is no necessity for Mr. Montagu and his colleagues to tour in India at such an expense. We see no great harm in the rejection of a few deputations. An opportunity has been afforded to Mr. Montagu and the Government in England to know the ways of the bureaucracy. The associations, whose deputations have not been accepted, will do well to at once communicate to Mr. Montagu and the English Government their aspirations by means of resolutions. . . The rejection of the deputation of the Andhras is certainly a source of pain to every Andhra. By means of meetings and agitation all over the country, the Andhras should express their disappointment before Mr. Montagu leaves Madras, and see that he receives the deputation at least before leaving Bombay. They should at once inform the Government in England of the disregard shown to them.

82. The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th December, says:—The Cuddapah District Conference have unanimously adopted a resolution to the effect that the Congress reforms require changes, that the Members of the Legislative Councils should all be elected, that all the members of the Executive Councils should be elected by the Legislative Councils. Those who have eyes will see how the wheel of time is turning.

Complete provincial autonomy.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

83. The Andhraprakasika, of the 1st December, criticises the scheme of the advocates of self-government, refers to the statement "the situation is full of hope" made by a correspondent to New India in connection with the interview of Mrs. Besant, etc., and writes:—The Government are already reputed to have released Mrs. Besant, being afraid of the clamour of the Home Rulers. The people ask if the Government have now begun to earn the reputation of having promised to grant Home Rule in accordance with the wishes of Mrs. Besant. We pray that the Government will enquire into the truth of "the situation full of hope", of which the correspondent to New India has knowledge and publish it to the world.

Prospect of self-government.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

84. The Andhraprakasika, of the 1st December, reports that a teacher in Bangalore who is an advocate of Home Rule, referred to the Muhammadans as julkawallas because they have no idea of Home Rule and condemned the grant of scholarships to Muhammadan boys. The paper regrets that the "Home Rule Devil" makes most of the Home Rulers act in a reproachable manner.

A teacher's impertinence.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 1st Dec. 1917.

85. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 5th December, adduces arguments to show that India is yet unfit for self-government.

Self-government.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

86. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 5th December, says:—The system of forest reserves in the Madanapalle taluk has been a source of great inconvenience to the ryots. As the cattle and sheep are not allowed to go into the reserves freely, three-fourths of them have perished. Home Rulers go about the villages telling the ignorant people that under a system of Home Rule the forest reserves may be abolished and dishonestly taking their signatures and marks in certain books. We pray that the Government may not act on the basis of these signatures and marks.

Forest reserves and Home Rule.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 5th Dec. 1917.

87. The Andhraprakasika, of the 6th December, says:—We learn that the Cuddapah non-Brahman Conference to be held on the 8th has been arranged for secretly and with evil intention by the Home Rulers without the knowledge of the non-Brahmans. To call such a conference the Ceded Districts non-Brahman Conference is a surprise to us. It will be well to call it the conference of the Home Rulers of Cuddapah or the conference of Kesava Pillai & Co.

The Ceded Districts Non-Brahman Conference.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 6th Dec. 1917.

88. The Andhraprakasika, of the 7th December, says that from the news received from the Transvaal, it would appear that the condition of the Asiatics in that country is very miserable.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 7th Dec. 1917.

The income of the people.

89. The Andhraprakasika, of the 7th December, says:—According to Doctor Gilbert Slater the average income of an Indian is Rs. 6. There was a time when rice was sold at 12 to 16 measures a rupee. Now it is sold at 4 measures a rupee. The price of other necessaries of life has also gone up. So a sum of Rs. 6 cannot enable a man in these days to eat his fill. A man earning Rs. 6 may have to maintain a family. Needless it is to describe the misery of the family of such a man. He has to meet so many expenses incidental to life, and how can he do it with Rs. 6 a month? It is no exaggeration to say that even Rs. 12 will not be sufficient for him.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

The Andhra movement.

90. Referring to the compliment paid by Mr. Raghavendra Rao, a Kanarese gentleman to the Andhra movement, the Andhrapatrika, of the 14th December, expresses its surprise that the bureaucracy has disregarded a movement which is winning the admiration of the other classes of people.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

The deputations.

91. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 14th December, says:—If the list of deputations that are to wait on Mr. Montagu has been prepared by the Madras Government they may surely be said to have fallen into the hands of the followers of the Madras Mail and the Justice. . . The fact that an opportunity to place their views before Mr. Montagu has been given to some mushroom associations, which have been formed in order to do evil to the country, while it has been refused to movements which have been for years working for the welfare of the country, under the guidance of self-sacrificing people, shows that we are in a state of dependence and helplessness, and confirms the necessity of self-government for India.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 11th Dec. 1917.

Soldiers and jatkas in Madras.

92. The Qaumi Report, of the 11th December, has a letter from a correspondent named Abdul Ghafūr which is to this effect:—Last night at 10-20 p.m. we were passing the Fort Road in a jatka, when suddenly nine soldiers surrounded our conveyance and looked in to see if women or men were inside, but finding that we were all men they deplored to one another the absence of females. If you (the editor) will kindly publish this information, it will prevent women from going out for a drive on moon-light nights. The number of the carriage we occupied was 385 and that of the driver, 1555. The names of those in the jatka were—(1) Muhammad Ibrāhīm Sāhib, aluminium merchant, Evening Bazaar; (2) Saiyid Miran Muhī-ud-dīn, merchant, Triplicane Chouk; (3) S. M. Abdul Ghafūr Sahib, commission agent, Appu Maistri Street, Georgetown, Madras; (4) Saravnam Mudali, the driver.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 8th Dec. 1917.

An offering from the poor.

93 The Qaumi Report, of the 8th December, writes:—Yesterday was Friday the 7th instant when, as previously decided, telegrams were sent to Mr. Montagu by the people of all cities, towns and villages containing this unanimous demand:

"Pray kindly direct the release of Muhammadan internees".

Although Mr. Montagu has been addressed, but as a matter of fact the request is directed to the liberal-minded English nation. There has been made an appeal to its sense of fair-play, a reference to its sentiments and a demand to its foresight.

Those who accuse us of agitation and those who consider us disloyal may observe what we have done.

We have neither intimidated nor threatened. We have not expressed disaffection, but heart has spoken to heart. Our hearts are throbbing with pain and hearts, yet to be, will not be able to do otherwise.

It is not Mr. Montagu's heart alone that will throb, but the great, generous and sympathetic heart of Britain. Will it not even now take it to heart and be distressed? It will assuredly do so to-morrow, if not today, for we hear—

"Beneath the rolling spheres there is a way from heart to heart."

The various scraps of papers which contain the telegrams are not really pieces of papers but pieces of our hearts and livers and our tear-drops. Will not the British nation receive this memorial from the poor Muhammadans? Will not Mr. Montagu pay some regard to, and Lord Chelmsford take notice of, it? These scraps of papers are silent, but they have been inspired by our patience and perseverance, while our tongues are eloquent in their silence.

These papers contain the message of Muhammadans and the request by the community. Only search them and you will find that they echo the voices of all from peer to the peasant. This offering of our poor community is presented to our coming guest who may kindly accept it and congratulate us on our extraordinary courage.

If we do not get medicine for our pain, and remedy for our disease they may excuse us; for we have not troubled them but we ourselves have cried aloud; our hearts have throbbed and paid the price. If nothing comes of it, this much will have been established, viz., that the Muhammadans are still alive.

94. The Qaumi Report, of the 13th December, writes:—It is understood that the Government of Madras have rejected the addresses of the Presidency Association and the Skin Merchants' Association, and have not allowed them to be presented to the Secretary of State.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

Ignoring the rights of certain Anjumans.

The Presidency Association is an influential Anjuman of non-Brahmans which, like the Islamic League, has been established in opposition to the People's Association, and has its twenty-six branches in the districts, and the Skin Merchants' Association consists of Muhammadans. Although these two associations were established long before the establishment of the Islamia League, and have been conducting their business regularly, it is amazing to find that they have not been included in the test. It is more astounding to find that the deputations of the Islamia League, and the soidisant Ulemas have been accepted, despite the fact, that the Islamia League came into existence after the appointed date, and no Anjuman of the Ulemas has yet been founded! In all fairness both from the point of custom and principle, the Anjumans of the Presidency Association and the Skin Merchants are more deserving. No one can deny the fact that both these associations contain some notable and respectable Hindus and Muhammadans.

The Presidency Association has felt very keenly the ignoring of its rights. They have sent a wire to His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India to the effect that justice has not been done to them. We hope that both these Anjumans will be permitted to submit their addresses and such minor restrictions will not be regarded as reasonable.

95. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 15th December, writes:—The primary duty of every Government is to maintain peace and security in its country and among its people and to stamp out those things which are prejudicial to the commonweal. If this is not done, the Government cannot rule undisturbed, nor can the people turn its attention towards reforms and progress. A Government can be said to govern and to be civilized when public peace and security prevail.

Jaridah-i-Rozgar, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

Public peace.

For the establishment of peace in one's country it is essential that the Government should be able to protect its frontiers against enemy attacks from land or sea and to hold the scales even in its country.

The editor observes that without public peace there can be no educational advancement, no preservation of public health, no full treasury.

Although a Government may maintain law and order by the help of its soldiers and police, still the loyalty of its subjects is a sine qua non.

The editor concludes the article with a prayer to God to avert the calamity of Home Rule from India.

96. The Qaumi Report, of the 16th December, has a leader on the marginally-noted subject, which is to this effect:—The Government, for some reason or other, had refused admission to the Presidency Association of non-Brahman Home Rulers, but within three days their clamorous importunity has succeeded and now intelligence has been received that the necessary permission has been granted to them. The Government in thus stumbling teaches that no Government decision is either final or divinely revealed. Only those persons succeed who agitate most. It is agitation that is responsible for the release of Mrs. Besant and the organisation of a procession to support her appointment as the President of the Congress, for the opportunity she has had of shaking hands with the Viceroy, for reading the Home Rule address, for opening the door for her admission to the Bombay Presidency, Berar, etc. It was agitation that was responsible for the cancellation of the partition of Bengal, and it is agitation that has dragged Mr. Montagu and his companions to this country.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 16th Dec. 1917.

Reception of the Hindu deputation.

The deputation of the Mussalmans of India, however, has been rejected and their address refused. Muhammad Ali's request has not been granted and the demand for his and other Mussalman detenus' release has been set aside. Their aspirations have not been appreciated. Their requests and rights have not been respected. Their applications have not been answered. Their movements have not been attended to and no references have been drawn from their telegrams. The explanation of all these defects is that we have not agitated and that we have undertaken not to do so.

There is a company of hide merchants in Madras whose deputation has also been rejected. It does not possess the mental artillery of the Presidency Association and so it lies wounded. The wounded deputation that was injured with it has been restored to health and put on its feet, the Trades' Association, the old Boys of Wellington and Planters are admitted, but Mussalman merchants whose trade forms an important part of the country's resources and from whose wealth a great portion of public needs are met, is not allowed to send up its deputation. Have the Mussalmans been guilty of some extraordinary sin? We know not. But we do know that the Government is not acquainted with the procedure adopted by Mr Montagu nor do they know what he is investigating. If we do not agitate, it does not mean that we do not feel our defeat. There is a special reason for it, which the Government can easily understand. But we, in our own country and in the presence of our compatriots, cannot be expected to tolerate the continuance of this state of affairs. It is incumbent on the Government not to subject us to more trials but to defend and respect our national honour so that the innovation of agitation may not find its way into our religion? God forbid!

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

1. The Hindu Nesan, of the 18th December, says:—The telegrams received today indicate an inclination on the part of Turkey to conclude peace. Considering the advance of the British in Palestine and the capture of Jerusalem and the steady progress of the British forces in Mesopotamia, there is nothing strange in Turkey making proposals for peace. If there is any ally of Germany, which is suffering much on account of its having been allured to enter the war by false coaxing and useless promises, it is Turkey. So we have to presume that the news about the inclination of Turkey to conclude peace is true.

Peace with Turkey.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 18th Dec. 1917.

2. The Andhraprakasika, of the 18th December, says:—The plight of Turkey is far worse than that of Russia. The Turks now realise that they have been deceived by the Germans. . . There is nothing strange in Turkey suing for peace, which will be concluded sooner or later.

Turkey.

Andhraprakasika, Madras, 18th Dec. 1917.

3. The Andhraprakasika, of the 17th December, writes:—Recent telegrams show that the Germans have had a success in their encounter with the British in the western theatre. . . This is mainly due to the transfer of overwhelming hosts from the eastern to the western front. There is nothing strange in the British having had to relinquish Bourlonwood. . . But this reverse is nothing compared to the recent British gains and German losses. This advantage of the Germans can only last until the Americans join.

The war.

Andhraprakasika, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 18th December, says:—Though the Germans have taken some territory at Cambrai in the western front, the British have afterwards arrested the enemy's progress. . . It has been announced that the Germans and the Russians have agreed as to the terms on which peace has to be concluded. On account of the treachery of the Russians, the Allies have to bear a heavier burden, and are put to the necessity of mustering larger armies.

The war.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 18th Dec. 1917.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 15th December, says:—Russia and Rumania having discontinued fighting with a view to enter into a treaty with Germany, the war has taken a new turn. The enemy's forces have had some rest. These forces, which have been fighting in the Russian front extending over 700 miles, have been afforded an opportunity to pour into other theatres. There might have been in that front about 20 lakhs of soldiers. We do not know where this army will now be sent. From the fact that the Germans met with success at Cambrai in France, it may be surmised that the western theatre is being strengthened. For this reason it will not be possible for the French and English armies to go to the rescue of the Italians. It has been announced that the Austrians are taking big guns into Italy. It is not known whether any army will be sent to Mesopotamia and Palestine. . . The only question that now confronts the Allies is "how the army should be increased?" As the Russians have abandoned fighting, it must be admitted that the burden of the Allies has increased. The speeches of the British ambassador in Russia and of Mr Asquith in England contain hints of peace. We have to see what reply Germany is going to give now.

Kistnapatrika, Masulipatam, 15th Dec. 1917.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 14th Dec. 1917.

The war.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 14th December, says:—If the Germans had intended to make peace, the Austrian minister would not have stated that he would send forces to the war theatres where they are required. From this it appears that the Germans required the help of the Austrians. It appears that those forces would probably be sent to the Austro-Bulgarian theatre. If so, we will hear of the enemy's offensive in the Balkan theatre in the near future. The Germans also think that the Allies are careful about the western theatre, and so it is natural that they want the help of the Austrians in this theatre also. It appears that the war in this theatre will also be very terrible. The Allies and especially the British are deeply considering about this. From this it should not be inferred that the British are lacking in the strength of men and munitions. The British have not had any loss. The positions which the British deem important have not fallen into the enemy's hands. But the present trouble of the English soldiers is very great. It is threefold. They have first to fight against the enemy in the western theatre. Secondly, they have to help the Italians in the Italian theatre. Thirdly, they have to relieve the French army which is tired. . . From the great attempts the Germans are now making, it appears that the war will become fierce. They may meet with some success, but as soon as the Americans join the Allies, the defeat of the enemy will be announced. For two or three months, the war may be favourable to the enemy. The Russians have now become puppets in the hands of the Germans. The German armies have now come back from the Russian theatre. The Americans have not as yet joined the Allies in time. So there is nothing strange in the statement that the Germans may meet with success. You can yourselves see what terms of peace the enemy will propose when the Americans join the Allies.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 18th Dec. 1917.

The war

In a leading article reviewing the European situation, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 18th December, dwells on the immense resources of the Allies, and remarks that the latter, who are fighting in a just cause, are bound to triumph in the end.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 18th Dec. 1917.

Russia and the war.

4. In an article under the heading "The deplorable condition of Russia", the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 18th December, dwelling on the internal troubles which led to the proposal for a separate peace, observes:—The Germans are disarming the Russians, depriving the army of their weapons and sending the troops for cultivation work. Russia is vanquished for the time being. A separate agreement has also been entered into with the enemy. It is impossible to say what the final result will be. It is considered in some quarters that Russia may be reduced to the same state as we Indians are. However that may be, we know that the Tsar and his Ministers and the Army Commanders were striking terror into the world some six months ago; now the same persons are looked upon with contempt. This is really most wonderful. The ways of Providence are inscrutable. In half a minute some are hurled from heaven to hell and others raised to heaven from below. We cannot help regretting that Russia has been the victim of such sport of Fate.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 22nd Dec. 1917.

Russia and the war.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 22nd December, dwelling on the internal troubles in Russia, observes:—It is because Russia promised to stand foremost to the end that this war broke out. Russia has acted very treacherously in forgetting that promise now and consenting to make a separate peace. God is therefore punishing her by means of a civil war. They will have to face greater punishment still. Russia was the root cause of this gigantic war. It is to help Russia that the British entered the war. There is not the slightest doubt that Russia's behaviour at the present critical juncture will be an ineffaceable blot on her name.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 20th Dec. 1917.

German Admiral's view on Great Britain.

5. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 20th December, writes:—We have frequently written that the superiority of our Government is admitted by friend and foe. The object with which Great Britain is so sympathetically and generously supporting the weak kingdoms, and freely spending large sums of money, and using her brave armies, is simply to eradicate German tyranny, and to thwart her in the policy of force.

Unless our Government achieve the aims and objects for which it entered the war, it will never sheath its sharp sword.

There is no doubt that the successes, which Britain has hitherto gained, are due to her defensive plans. If Great Britain had made previous preparations for the war like Germany, the very existence of the latter might have disappeared from Europe by now. But when she found that the peace of Europe was being disturbed, she made ready for war, and has, within two years, surpassed Germany's years of preparations. If the war continue Germany will have no alternative but to sue for peace.

II.—Home Administration.

(b) Courts.

Village panchayat courts.

6. Referring to the benefits conferred upon the people by the establishment of village panchayat courts in different parts of Malabar, a correspondent in the Kerala Patrika, of the 15th December, writes that the increase in the number of petty civil suits filed in the panchayat courts is a clear proof that litigants have great confidence in such courts and that, owing to the inefficiency of the village munsifs, they are reluctant to resort to their courts. He then invites the attention of the authorities to the desirability of establishing a bench court in Mannur for the neighbouring amsoms of Kizhakkambram, Tatukkasseri, Keralasseri and Nagaripram in Palghat taluk, in view of the large population and the growing importance of these places. He further adds that parties are now put to unnecessary expense and inconvenience in going to Ottappalam Munsif's Court to file suits below the value of Rs. 20.

Kerala Patrika, Calicut, 15th Dec. 1917.

National education.

7. The Purnachandrodayam, for November, publishes an article on this subject contributed by one R. Ranga Achariyar, M.A., L.T., in which the following observations find a place:—As Professors of the type of Mr. Porter, Mr. Powell, Doctor Miller and Mr. Gopal Rao have become rare now, the amity between the teacher and the student has gone down. The present-day teachers work for the salary they receive and so they do not care much to move with the pupils outside the school or the college. Further, Indian professors, however high their educational qualifications may be, are paid far less than their European colleagues who are much inferior to them in qualifications, and as this low scale of salary is not sufficient to enable the Indian professors to make both ends meet, their life becomes an anxious one. The English professors, being members of the ruling race, entrust all the difficult portions of work to their Indian colleagues and do not move with the students outside the college. Thus there is not much affinity between the teachers and the students in the present system of education, and the students regard the school as no more than a machinery to enable them to pass examinations and the teachers as the men working this machinery. Coming to the subjects taught to the students now, there is no connection whatever between these subjects and India, and they do not enable the Indians to conduct themselves in wordly life any better than what they have been doing till now. It is only a few avocations such as the public service and the profession of a teacher, a doctor or a lawyer that are now open to the students. There is not much difference between them and those that have not had education. In spite of the trouble they take to learn the English language, they are not able to become experts in it and they have no knowledge whatever of their vernaculars. Thus they are between two stools, not having a complete knowledge of either language. Further, the present course of instruction does not at all inculcate a spirit of patriotism in our minds. What is taught to the students in schools is that every thing belonging to this country—education, language, customs and habits, history, civilization—is low and that, if western civilization, methods of education and scientific principles had not been providentially introduced into India, the latter would have been ruined. This has made many among us give up our Purnachandrodayam, Madura, November 1917.

principles and take to English habits and customs. Though these think that they have raised themselves, they are condemned both by the Englishmen and by their own countrymen. So to be brief, the present system of instruction, though costing a good deal, does not benefit the majority of the people and even, in the case of those who get through it successfully, it does not benefit them in proportion to their efforts. It leads to physical deterioration, premature death and the poverty of the country.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 19th & 20th Dec. 1917.

The Hindu Nesan reproduces the above in its issues of the 19th and 20th December 1917.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 6th Dec. 1917.

State aid to education.

8. The Vartakamitran, of the 6th December, says:—The reason why education has improved so little in India is, we have to presume, that the Government are not taking sufficient interest in this matter. It is on account of the absence of progress in education that many industries have not been able to thrive in this country and a spirit of union could not be established and agriculture improved. Considering the efforts made in other countries to improve education, we may say that no effort at all is made here in this direction. Statistics about the expenditure on education incurred by every country in the world show that the least amount is spent in India. But it may be stated that a larger amount is spent for education in other countries as the people there pay more by way of taxes. The Indians pay 22 per cent of their income as taxes, while in England the people pay only $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent as taxes and this when the average income of an Indian is Rs. 30, while that of the Englishman is Rs. 780. Why is education at a low ebb in India, even when the people pay so much by way of taxes? If all people are to have elementary education in India, the expenditure on education per head should be Rs. 4; but the present expenditure is only As. 1-9 per head, which means that it will take nearly 2,400 years more for the expenditure on education to reach a level of Rs. 4 per head, seeing that it has taken 60 years for it to reach the present level! Even the amount now spent by the Government on education is not spent in proper ways. The heads of Educational Department attach greater importance to increasing the number of tables and chairs in schools than to improve education.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 18th Dec. 1917.

The present system of education.

9. The Desabhaktan, of the 18th December, writes:—In ancient days students always used to be with their teachers and imbibe their culture and good qualities. But the situation is quite different in the case of the present-day students. They get through their education cheerfully till they reach the fourth class. From the fifth class onwards, they become timid and anxious and there is no end to their difficulty in the higher classes. They are troubled not a little by the Professors and the Principals, and in many places the Professors treat the students as if they were their enemies, the result being that there is constant rupture between the two, of which we see numerous instances now. If this is to continue, how can the students improve their knowledge and behaviour? It is the opinion of the wise among us that the education now imparted to our students befits them only to appointments and does not inculcate to them good qualities like obedience to elders. The moment the students pay the fees for examination, they become anxious as to what the result would be and this affects their health a good deal leading at times even to premature death. What is the remedy for all this? We will say it is only Home Rule.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 14th Dec. 1917.

Students and politics.

10. Referring to the communiqué issued by the Government regarding the order prohibitting students from attending political meetings, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 14th December, remarks that the Government have in a way withdrawn the order, and it is some consolation to find that the responsibility of the Principals in this matter, which the Government needlessly sought to take on their own shoulders, has been re-entrusted to them. The paper next refers to the discussion on the same subject in the Bombay Legislative Council, and remarks that it is unfortunate that the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Manmohan Ramji on the subject was lost.

(f) Land Revenue and Settlement.

Disposal of darkhast cases.

11. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 14th December, writes:—The intimation regarding the disposal of darkhast cases is usually sent in a notice in Form D, which is only a card. A notice of this kind can never reach the hands of the parties. How are the parties absent from their village to get the notice? Copies of summons, however, are served on their heirs or successors to the family in the absence of the party concerned. It would be well if the authorities should arrange for the service of the notice in Form D in darkhast cases in duplicate.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 14th Dec. 1917.

(j) Salt and Abkari.

Price of salt.

12. Referring to the present high price of salt, the Mahavikata Dutan, of the 15th December, says:—As the Government have the exclusive control over the manufacture of salt, why can they not fix its price definitely, as they have done in the case of toddy and liquor? Why can they not open depots for the sale of salt as has been done by the Bombay Municipality? How is the Corporation here justified in collecting any amount of taxes from the people, without caring for their welfare? If the Government and the Corporation move in this matter immediately and take steps to bring down the price of salt they will be laying the people under a deep debt of gratitude to them.

MAHAVIKATA DUTAN, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

Consumption of liquor.

13. The Hindu Nesan, of the 13th December, observes that the steps taken so far by the Government to combat the drink evil have not produced results as satisfactory as is desired and writes:—There are two ways of reducing the consumption of liquor and they are the raising of the excise duties as much as possible and the reduction of the existing number of liquor shops. We find from the Excise administration report for the last year that many of the recommendations made by the Excise Advisory Committees have been given effect to. But considering the constitution and powers of these committees, they do not seem to have recommended just the measures that are expected to mitigate the drink evil. It will not be possible for the Government to reduce the consumption of liquor unless they adopt decisive measures. A licensing board is very necessary to go into the question of granting licenses to liquor shops, and we will, therefore, request the Government to enquire into the harm, both physical and mental, produced by the consumption of liquor and also constitute a licensing board as stated above.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

The Abkāri administration.

14. Referring to the annual report on the Abkāri Administration in the Madras Presidency, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 17th December, says:—Despite the efforts of the Government to check the spread of the drink habit, by increasing the tax on intoxicants and decreasing the number of licenses and also by the formations of Excise Advisory Committees, the drink vice is becoming more and more widespread, and the public affirm that the steps now taken against the growth of intemperance are inadequate. We must observe that in the British territory as well as in the Native States the Government are helping the people to indulge their love of intoxication and are thus increasing their revenues. If the Government are not keen upon this revenue, let them give it all for the spread of education, particularly industrial and moral education. If this is done, we can expect the people to realise the evils of the habit better than at present.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 17th Dec. 1917.

(k) General.

The criminal tribes.

15. The Vartakamitran, of the 6th December, publishes a communication from a correspondent who suggests that the classes which have been declared to be criminal tribes in India, may well be given military training and used in the present war, as they have all the qualities requisite for a soldier and as their taking to evil ways is due more to their inability to make a living otherwise and their having therefore taken up thieving and other criminal acts as a regular avocation than anything else.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 6th Dec. 1917.

The editor of the paper adds a note to the effect that it is a matter to be decided after experiment whether much benefit would accrue by enlisting these men in the army.

VAISYAMITRAN, Devakōttai, 10th Dec. 1917.

Mr. Norton at Tinnevelly.

16. The Vaisyamitran, of the 10th December, reproduces in Tamil the speech delivered by Mr. Eardley Norton at the non-Brahman Conference at Tinnevelly, referred to in paragraph 48 of Report No. 50 of 1917.

MAHAVIKATA DUTAN, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

The Mahavikata Dutan, of the 15th December, reproduces the comments on this speech of the Dravidan of the 10th idem abstracted in paragraph 48 of the above report.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

Enlistment of Indians in the army.

17. The Lokopakari, of the 17th December, refers to the necessity of the allies increasing their man-power in view of the transfer by the enemy of troops from the eastern to the western front and says:—This is a good opportunity for the Government to raise a big army in India by confiding in the Indians and enlisting them in the army. This will do credit to both India and the British Empire. If the Indians had been allowed to enlist at the very beginning of the war, a very big army could have been raised here and the war easily brought to a successful conclusion. We hope that the British Government will take steps to avail themselves of the full strength of India at least in the interest of the world.

The Prapanchamitran, of the 18th December, reproduces the above.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

The Madras deputations to Mr. Montagu.

18. The Lokopakari, of the 17th December, regrets that all classes in India are not able to see Mr. Montagu and discuss questions with him freely and quoting the refusal on the part of the Local Government, to permit the Madras Presidency Association and other bodies to wait in deputation upon Mr. Montagu to prove that it is only those who are in the good graces of the Government officials, that have been able to approach the Secretary of State, remarks:—The fact that some shortsighted people, who are inimical to the Brahmans and the Home Rule movement, have been allowed to see Mr. Montagu gives room for the impression that the associations now disallowed have been shut out because they are in favour of Home Rule. As Mr. Montagu is here only to ascertain personally the attitude of India, every class should have the facility of expressing its views before him. The bureaucracy will do well not to allow their likes and dislikes to interfere in this matter. It is only when they fail to do so that the people get excited. There will be no possibility of any excitement in the country if the authorities will begin to deal with the people sympathetically.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

The Madras deputations to Mr. Montagu.

The Desabhaktan, of the 13th December, refers to the action of the Local Government in preventing the Madras Presidency Association from waiting in deputation upon Mr. Montagu and says:—We do not know what our popular leaders are going to do now. The slur cast on the popular leaders of this Presidency for a long time by the people of other Presidencies that they were a set of timid people was wiped out in a way by the bold stand made by some of these leaders during the internment of Mrs. Besant, and the Bengalees began to admit that there were true patriots even in Madras. If this appreciation earned by the Madras leaders is not to wane, they should try to wipe out the insult now offered to the Madras Presidency Association and other associations. The insult to this association should be deemed to be an insult to the whole Presidency, and it behoves the leaders to agitate to remove it by constitutional means.

Reverting to this subject in a leaderette the same paper observes:—The action of the Local Government has wounded the feelings of every patriot in this Presidency. Have they forgotten that the Madras Presidency Association represents the non-Brahmans of this Presidency, or are they under the delusion that the South Indian Peoples' Association represents the non-Brahmans? It is regrettable in the first instance that the Secretary of State for India has not been allowed to move with the Indians, and it is indeed the misfortune of this Presidency that he has been prevented from hearing the addresses of representative associations like the Madras Presidency Association.

SWADESAMITRAN, HINDU NESAN & DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

The Swadesamitran, the Hindu Nesan and the Desabhaktan, of the 15th December, reproduce in Tamil the proceedings of the public meeting held at Madras on the 14th idem under the auspices of the Madras Presidency Association to protest against the action of the Local Government in disallowing deputations from certain associations to wait upon the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India These proceedings appear in the Hindu of the same date.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 15th December, also publishes in Tamil abstracts of the proceedings of similar meetings of protest held at Kumbakōnam, Tinnevelly, Tirukkōyilūr, Arni, Tuticorin and Tiruvadamarudūr. Proceedings of all these meetings except the last appear in the Hindu of the same date.

The same paper takes exception to the members of the deputation from the Madras Presidency Association having been allowed to present the address of the association, while they are present at the Government House as members of the Mahajana Sabha or the Congress Committee, and observes that this association with Mr. Kesava Pillai and others as its office-bearers deserves better treatment at the hands of the Government.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 15th December, reproduces in Tamil a letter of Mr. B. Pattabhi Sitaramayya on this subject appearing in the Hindu of the 14th idem.

The same paper has a leader on the action of the Local Government in this matter in the course of which it says:—The associations which have been denied the privilege of waiting in deputation upon Mr. Montagu are all of them in favour of the Congress League scheme. What of that? When there are two parties having different opinions on a subject, it is but natural that each party should like to represent its own views and we cannot understand the rationale of allowing one party to have its say and disallowing the other. Those associations which have now been shut out consist of intelligent and capable men as members, and Mr. Montagu will be able to formulate his reform proposals properly only if he is allowed to understand the opinion of the people here about the administration of the country. While the Government of India and the Government of Bengal have received all the deputations that offered their views without giving room to any complaint, the Madras Mahajana Sabha and the Madras Provincial Congress Committee, the two important political associations here have been allowed only half an hour.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

The Swadesamitran, of the 17th December, says that the permission eventually granted by the Government to the Madras Presidency Association to present its addrsss to Mr. Montagu will be received with satisfaction throughout the country and adds:—It is not to the interest of the Madras Presidency Association alone that it should present its views to the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu. They must hear the views of this body representing lakhs and lakhs of people if the object with which the Secretary of State has crossed over six thousand miles is to be accomplished. We believe Mr. Montagu will understand how far the Provincial Government will have any regard for the wishes of the people ordinarily, when at such an important juncture like this with the Viceroy and the Secretary of State by their side they ignore public opinion. All is for good goes the adage and it may be that this is also for good.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 18th Dec. 1917.

The Madras deputations to Mr. Montagu.

Referring to the several deputations that waited upon Mr. Montagu, the Swadesamitran, of the 18th December, observes:—The first deputation to see the Secretary of State was that of the United Planters' Association. This association whose demand was that a greater importance should be attached to the welfare of a few planters than to the rights of crores of people was represented by only two persons. Perhaps they were ashamed of this themselves and presented an address in private without seeing the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu at the Banqueting Hall. The next deputation was that of the Madras Chamber of Commerce. At the last meeting of the Legislative Council, the Hon'ble Mr. Gordon Fraser, who headed this deputation, admitted that the non-official Europeans took no interest in the proceedings of the Council, as they had no time to think leisurely about the questions discussed there. So it is a matter for surprise that all of them have suddenly become experts in political matters. Coming to their suggestions, they say that reforms should begin from below and not from above, and that municipalities and local boards should be given some powers but that the Local Governments should have the power of supervising their work. This is what obtains now. The municipalities and local boards have some powers, but the Local Government or the officials on the spot usually interfere and prevent their exercising these powers. It is again a fallacy to argue that reform should begin from below. Taking it for granted that the Indians become experts in conducting municipalities and local boards, how can they acquire the capacity to manage other departments also? According to the present suggestion, they should be trained in another department after they become perfectly capable of conducting the local administration. This means that a system of Government responsible to the people cannot be introduced in this age. Our contention is that the Indians have already acquired sufficient capabilities in all the departments and that they should be given responsible powers in every department. This is progress as it should be. Unless there are representatives responsible to the people in the Government of India or the Provincial Governments, no benefit can result from the constitution of the institutions subordinate to them being widened. It is only if popular representatives occupy the higher positions, that executive officials would have a regard for the aspiration of the popular representatives in the lower ranks and refrain from abusing their power. Therefore, we can have true progress only if popular representatives acquire seats and powers from the village panchayat up to the Government of India. Both the European deputations referred to above suggest that the Legislative Council may be enlarged and entrusted with some powers. We have to take it that these associations have no idea of political matters or the present situation. What purpose will be served by giving larger powers to Legislative Councils without making the Executive Councils subject to them? The existing defects in the Legislative Councils are that the popular representatives are not in the majority there and resolutions and laws passed by them do not bind the Government. Without removing these defects, to say that the powers of the Legislative Councils should be increased is a meaningless assertion.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 18th Dec. 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 18th December, while expressing its satisfaction at the Madras Presidency Association and the Andhra Mahasabha having been permitted after all to present their addresses to Mr. Montagu, regrets that the Visvakarma deputation alone has not been given this privilege and observes:—Mr. Montagu cannot but be impressed by the addresses presented to him at different places and the interviews he has had with various individuals, that some good should be done to India, and we trust that this impression will bring about such a reform in the administrative machinery here as will conduce to the welfare of the Indians.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 18th Dec. 1917.

The Dravidan, of the 18th December, observes: —Of the different bodies that waited on Mr. Montagu on the 17th December, the only ones which proposed any great changes in the administration of the country were the Madras Mahajana Sabha, the Madras Congress Committee and the South Indian Chamber of Commerce. In the address of the Madras Congress Committee a reference was made to the signatures obtained in favour of the Congress scheme. We do not believe either the Viceroy or Mr. Montagu will attach any weight to these signatures. The Madras Presidency Association which was not permitted in the beginning to see Mr. Montagu was allowed the privilege at the last moment. We are glad that the efforts of the influential Brahmans, whose support this association has, have proved fruitful. But all this will not prevent Mr. Montagu in the least from understanding the truth.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 19th Dec. 1917.

Continuing its comments on the deputations to Mr. Montagu, the Swadesamitran, of the 19th December, says:—The general trend of all the addresses presented to Mr. Montagu is in support of the national ideal. It is quite natural that the European Associations do not accept our ideal. It has been stated by John Stuart Mill long ago that, when a country is ruled by others who have conquered it, the members of the ruling race would themselves be a great obstacle in the way of the Government. Therefore we can ignore the opinion of the Europeans and look to that of the people in this country. Almost all the important associations are agreed in holding that the Legislative Councils should be enlarged, that the popular representatives should be in the majority there, and that half the number of members in the Executive Councils should be Indians. Thus they have admitted that the present constitution of Government and method of administration do not suit the times and that they should be necessarily reformed. Therefore there is no difference of opinion regarding the situation, which necessitates reforms. The arguments of those who say that the Executive Councils should not be subordinated to the Legislative Councils and that the members thereof elected by popular representatives cannot hold water, as the non-official mojority in the Legislative Councils will be of no avail then. Even Lord Morley, who was against the non-official majority in the Imperial Legislative Council in view of the responsibility of that Government to the British Government and the British Parliament, conceded the necessity for such a majority in the Provincial Legislative Councils. Now that the British Government have accepted that their ideal is to introduce in India gradually a system of Government responsible to the people, the necessity of the popular representatives being in the majority in Imperial Legislative Council and of the Executive Council being responsible to them becomes patent. So the Legislative Councils should be enlarged, the popular representatives being in the majority therein, and the Executive Councils made subject to them. The plea that, if the power of passing the budget is given to the Legislative Council, it may at times lead to a deadlock in the administration does not conform to the experience in other portions of the world. The question is asked how to get over the difficulty when a measure is passed by the Legislative Council, but not approved by the Executive Council. The reply to this is that, when the popular representatives unanimously vote for a measure, it should be an excellent one and that the Executive Council should, therefore, accept it. But the Congress League proposals make a provision for such a difficulty by empowering the provincial Governors and the Viceroy to veto a measure passed by the Legislative Council in the first instance. So the objection raised by some associations on this score cannot stand.

The Madras deputations to Mr. Montagu.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 19th December, writes:—Of the seven associations that presented their addresses to Mr. Montagu on the 18th instant, four upheld the Congress League scheme, and the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu cannot be unaware of the fact that the views expressed by these four associations represent generally the opinion of the Indian community. It bespeaks the statesmanship of Lord Chelmsford and Mr. Montagu that they eventually allowed the Madras Presidency Association to present their address and thereby removed a cause for serious complaint. Of the remaining three associations that presented their address on the day, the Madras Chamber of Commerce is one. We may at once say that this association can claim no experience whatever in politics and therefore it is a question to be considered whether any weight can be attached to their opinion. The statements made in their address are many of them not completely true. When the people of the country are striving hard with a yearning to secure progress in political matters, the injudicious criticisms and absurd opinions offered by the members of this deputation will not retard the advance of the popular movement in the least. We condemn the statement by this deputation that the present national movement is not liked by either the Europeans or the Indians as being totally untrue. Whatever the view of the Europeans may be, it can never be stated of the Indians that the mercantile community among them are not interested in having Home Rule. The address of the South Indian Chamber of Commerce and the addresses of the Arya Vaisya Association and the Hides and Skins Merchants' Association, which have not, however, been presented to Mr. Montagu, are clearly in favour of Home Rule. Then, again, the statement by the deputation of the Madras Chamber of Commerce that the agitation for reforms is carried on only by some Brahmans is, we need not say, an utter falsehood. Though the deputation said that they came forward to express their views on reforms out of pure humanitarian motives, it is clear that they protest against reforms only on account of a fear that their introduction may affect their profitable concerns prejudicially. It is a meaningless statement on their part to assert that the introduction of reforms will be a hardship to the majority of the Indians, as if the crores of Indians depend only upon these European merchants for their living.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 19th Dec. 1917.

DRAVIDA PATRIKA, Madras, 19th Dec. 1917.

The Dravida Patrika, of the 19th December, feels gratified at the Madras Presidency Association having been allowed to wait in deputation upon Mr. Montagu, as a result of the protest meeting held in the Gokhale Hall and, taking this to be an indication of the fact that much weight will be attached to public opinion in the reforms to be introduced hereafter, observes:—The several associations that will interview Mr. Montagu during these three days will give out views which either favour or are against the Congress League scheme of reforms. But as Mr. Montagu came to India once before and knows which of these associations are responsible political bodies, we firmly believe that the reforms to be introduced in this country will be based on the proposals of the Congress and the Muslim League, which have been for a long time working for the political salvation of the country, and the memorandum of reforms submitted by the nineteen elected members of the Imperial Legislative Council, we do not say that Mr. Montagu should disregard the Anglo-Indians. But the great cry raised by them, that the reforms proposed in the memorandum of the nineteen will completely ruin them, is not only not borne out by facts but also indicates their selfish spirit. Therefore, we hope that Mr. Montagu will find out the truth with an unbiassed mind and introduce reforms in this country accordingly.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 20th Dec. 1917.

Continuing its comments on this subject, the Swadesamitran, of the 20th December, says:—Two associations which claim to represent the Adi Dravidas in this Presidency have expressed themselves against Home Rule on the ground that, if it is granted, the authority would become centred in the hands of the higher classes. It is an entirely baseless fear on the part of this community that the transfer of power from the British officials to the higher classes will affect it prejudicially. Neither the British officials nor the higher classes are responsible for the present condition of this community, the reason for which is enshrouded in ancient history. As far as the higher classes are concerned, they have come forward to uplift this community at every stage. It is clear that as much has not been done for the Adi Dravidas by the non-Brahmans as has been done by the Brahmans. If, nevertheless, they have not improved it is due to themselves and the Government. What have those in position among the members of this community done to remove the grievances of the community? Why have they not demanded till now seats in municipalities and local boards? Have the Brahmans prevented them from getting into these bodies? What have the Government, in the hands of the Europeans, who employ many men belonging to this community as servants on low salaries, done to improve their condition? These people who have had some help at least from the Brahmans would not have come out to oppose their countrymen out of gratitude to the Government, who have not after all done them much. We presume that they have only repeated before Mr. Montagu what was taught to them by those, from whose hands power will be taken away, if the Congress League demand is granted. We take this to be an attempt to deceive Mr. Montagu, as he is not expected to know the real conditions of the country.

The Madras deputations to Mr. Montagu.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 20th Dec. 1917.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 20th December, refers to the addresses presented to Mr. Montagu on the 18th idem and observes:—The Indian Christian community which demands communal representation is not evidently aware of the difficulties in giving effect to its suggestion. The suggestion of the Kerala Janmi Sabha that there should be provincial autonomy will not serve any purpose, unless the executive is subordinated to the legislature. According to the scheme of this sabha, it is the bureaucrats that will have all powers. Coming to the address of sixty zamindars and landholders, it can represent only the views of those who have signed it and not the opinion of all the zamindars and landholders in this Presidency. Considering the fact that an address approved at a meeting of the Madras Landholders' Association was not presented to the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu and certain noteworthy events in the Presidency, it looks as if the address of the association was not quite palatable to a certain section of the officials.

The Desabhaktan, of the 20th December, refers to the address of the South Indian Liberal Federation which desires that the responsibility of the administration should continue as it is and at the same time demands the enlargement of the Legislative Council, and observing that an increase in the number of members in the Council will serve no useful purpose as long as the responsibility of administration is in the hands of the executive, appeals to the members of the Federation to realise the importance of the Congress League scheme and co-operate in working for the advancement of the country. DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 20th Dec. 1917.

The same paper also refers to the address of the Adi Dravida Mahajana Sabha and, while admitting that this community has been ill-treated by the Brahmans and other castes in the past, observes that the old order of things has changed and that many Brahmans are now ready to help this community, and adds that all depressed classes are sure to be benefited by the grant of Home Rule to India.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th December, says:— ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

Deputations.

From the list of deputations rejected, it will appear that the Government who are on the side of "Anglo-Justice" party reject deputations representing associations which are very old and which contain distinguished members and are doing great service to the country; while they accept deputations from associations like school debating societies, if these happen to be in the good graces of the "Anglo-Justice" party. Men are thought fit to have an interview who gather some members of the depressed classes and vilify the congress and ridicule great men like Mr. Gandhi. Will our leaders now exhort the people of every village to send telegrams expressing their disapproval, and demanding a change in the administration or will they continue to sleep over the matter?

Another correspondent says:—It is a surprise that while the deputation of the *Adi Dravida*s was included in the list of deputations, that of the Adimandhras, who form a fifth of the people in the Andhra country, was not included . . O, English rulers, who are taking pains to uplift the depressed classes, please give our deputation an opportunity to wait on Mr. Montagu to enable us, who are helpless, to have a status of our own. . . It is unjust on the part of the rulers to cause pain and dissatisfaction to the ruled.

The Andhrapatrika (weekly), of the 12th December, says in its supplement:—Mr. Montagu has not come to Madras to know the views of the Madras Government. If his object is to get acquainted with their views, his tour in India is unnecessary. The Madras Government can communicate them to him easily. It is not proper on their part to approve of some deputations and reject the others as they please. This renders the visit of Mr. Montagu useless. It is known all over that there is great difference between the views of the Madras Government and the Madras public. This is the chief reason of the commotion in Madras. It is the duty of the rulers to arrange for Mr. Montagu knowing the views of the people fully. The action of the Madras Government in rejecting some deputations prevents Mr. Montagu from knowing the opinions of the public. ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 12th Dec. 1917.

Deputations.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th December, gives a list of the associations which were refused or granted interviews and adds the note:—The association of the Madras Presidency Landed Proprietors and that of the Newington old students have been got up in opposition to the Madras Landholders' Association. The South Indian Liberal Federation and the non-Brahman Associations and the Madras Dravidian Association belong to the well-known Doctor Nayar and Mr. Chetti. The Madras Adi Dravida Association and the Dravida Mahajana Sangham are the creatures of Doctor Nayar and Mr. Chetti. The South Indian Islamia League and the Madras Ulemalu have been got up by the "Anglo-Justice" party against the Muslim League. The Muttialpet Muslim Anjuman which was in a corner has been dragged to the front. ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 15th Dec. 1917.

Deputations.

The Kistnapatrika, of the 15th December, analyses the list of deputations received or rejected, concludes that all, excepting four, of those that have been accepted, are against the Congress, and asks "what does this mean?"

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 16th Dec. 1917.

The deputations.

The Desabhimani, of the 16th December, writes on this subject:—While the people have been eagerly awaiting the arrival of Mr. Montagu, in the hope that he would deliver India, many people of the Madras Presidency have met with a disappointment. In Northern India the Moslem deputation was refused an interview. . . In our presidency deputations of associations that sprang up but yesterday were received while that of the longstanding Andhra Sabha was not. . . On the whole, in our opinion, the deputations of all the anti-Home Rule associations had an interview.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

Mr. Montagu in Madras.

19. The Dravidan, of the 15th December, welcomes the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu to Madras and, referring to the various addresses that will be presented to them during their stay here, remarks.—It is a peculiar feature of this Presidency that about 15 lakhs of Brahmans are, by dint of their official influence, keeping under subjection and preventing the progress of the 400 lakhs of non-Brahmans here. The Viceroy and Mr. Montagu can clearly understand this at a perusal of the list of officials in all the Government offices in this Presidency. They should note that it is the non-Brahmans that are the real tax-payers and form, therefore, the basis of the economic condition of this Province. The British Government should care for the interests and wishes of these people. We hope that the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu, who have an abiding interest in India, will understand well that political reform in this country should be based on social reform and introduce a proper scheme of reforms.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 18th Dec. 1917.

Mr. Montagu at Madras.

The Dravidan, of the 18th December, takes exception to every association in the city desiring to wait upon Mr. Montagu and, observing that the Madras Government have not acted partially in the matter of selecting the associations which are to send deputations to Mr. Montagu and that they have chosen only the important associations, remarks that no other proof is required to convince Mr. Montagu of the utter unfitness of India for Home Rule than the agitation started by a few associations which have not been permitted to see him.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 19th Dec. 1917.

Mr. Montagu in Madras.

The Dravidan, of the 19th December, expresses its regret at there being much of agitation here during Mr. Montagu's visit, which is against his wish that there should be a calm atmosphere and, attributing this to the efforts of the only community, which is ever discontented and avaricious and is always making much noise, says that the Government would do well to be a little resolute in matters like this. This paper takes exception to the praise bestowed on the Madras Presidency Association by New India and, evincing its surprise at New India having no sympathy for the other associations, whose addresses have also been disallowed, remarks that, however much New India may praise the Madras Presidency Association, a comparison of the status and qualifications of those who comprised its deputation with those of the members who formed the deputation of the South Indian Liberal Federation will make the people realise who are the true representatives of the non-Brahmans.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 21st Dec. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit to Madras.

The Swadeshabhimani, of the 21st December, writes:—In connection with the addresses presented to Mr. Montagu there was an incident which was unpleasant from the point of view of the public. Not that it occurred in Madras for the first time; for, at Delhi, the Viceroy had rejected a deputation of one section of the Muslim League of Lucknow. Similarly, the Madras Presidency Association was not granted the right of representation and Diwan Bahadur Kesava Pillai was not allowed an interview. This caused serious disquietude among the public. We learn that this association and the Mahajana Sabha have since been permitted to send their deputations. But the Diwan Bahadur was altogether denied a private interview!

We must say that the Viceroy and others are not displaying their statesmanship in situations like this. For, these restrictions against popular representatives are by no means a mark of statesmanship. What do you lose by allowing them to have their say, so long as the grant or refusal of their requests lies in your own hands? Your statesmanship consists in hearing everything and using your discretion only in the decisions you arrive at. Although it would serve no purpose to speculate on the reforms that might be granted as a result of Mr. Montagu's visit, it may not be inopportune to place before our readers a suggestion made by the esteemed editor of the Kesari in this connection. Some of the recent utterances of the authorities indicate that the Indo-European scheme drawn up by Mr. Curtis will gain some recognition. We have already dwelt on this muddle and expressed our strong disapproval of the same. The institutions and representatives who are yet to approach Mr. Montagu will do well to make it a point to condemn this Indo-European joint scheme. This is an excellent suggestion which the Kesari has made.

20. The Dravidan, of the 15th December, also views that the minimum pay of Rs. 10 offered to lady clerks proposed to be entertained in place of clerks sent out on military duty is too low, but adds that it is a matter for gratification that their maximum pay is fixed at Rs. 100.

Lady clerks.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

21. The Dravidan, of the 15th December, thinks that the one-rupee notes newly issued will have to be reissued by Government frequently, because they are likely to become soiled soon by constant use.

The one-rupee note.

DRAVIDAN, Madras. 15th Dec. 1917.

22. The Desabhaktan, of the 15th December, writes:—The object of those demanding Home Rule is not to get rid of the English Government. The Home Rule we ask for is to be under the English rule. What we want is not a change in the existing rulers but a change in the existing system of administration. Under the present system, poverty and disease are spreading in India. The expenditure is in excess of the income and the people are therefore suffering from hunger, burglaries and thefts are increasing. What is the price of salt which even the poorest man requires? The situation is bound to become worse as days pass by. England has realised the misery of India and Mr. Montagu is here only to relieve it. The wealth of India is now going to many countries in several ways. Under a system of Home Rule, it will remain in India. Will this help or afflict the poor people? Perverting this truth, zamindars presiding at bogus conferences pronounce that Home Rule will injure the country. How can zamindars know the suffering of the poor people? It is men like Mr. Gandhi that know it and that is why they demand Home Rule and we too follow suit.

Home Rule.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

In refuting the arguments for Home Rule of the Presidents of the Special Kistna District Conference of Ellore and of the Reception Committee thereof, a correspondent to the issues of the Andhraprakasika, of the 17th, 18th and 19th December, writes to the following effect:—The scheme of the Home Rulers will be found on close scrutiny to be no other than a demand for complete and immediate Home Rule in disguise. Its effect will be the transfer of power from the English bureaucracy to the educated few of India. The Indians, at present, are uneducated and torn asunder into a number of castes and subcastes which are bitterly hostile to one another; and the administration would, in the existing circumstances, be more efficient in the hands of the members of the bureaucracy who are not swayed by factious spirit and party feelings and are more capable administrators. Some reforms may be granted as the first step leading up to self-government, but not complete and immediate Home Rule.

Home Rule.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 17th, 18th & 19th Dec. 1917.

23. A correspondent to the Hindu Nesan, of the 17th December, referring to the fact that the editor of the Aryamitran, a paper which is now defunct and which is proposed to be revived, was asked to furnish a security of Rs. 700 and, remarking that this paper was not dealing with politics much but was devoting its attention mainly to pointing out the defects in charitable institutions, expresses its surprise at a larger amount now being demanded as security than was once demanded by Mr. Wood.

The Aryamitran.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

The Nadars.

26. A correspondent of the Desabhaktan, of the 17th December, appeals to the Nadars not to hate the Brahmans and says:—Follow those who try by legitimate ways to curb people who mock at mother Bharata. Some of you waited upon the Governor at Madura for the purpose of improving the educational facilities enjoyed by your community. What happened? He praised you to the skies and sent you back no wiser than you entered. You welcome some leaders who follow Anglo-Indians and offer them rose garlands. If you use those roses for our own countrymen residing in the locality, they will help to improve your existing educational institution.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

The Anglo-Indians and the people.

27. The Desabhaktan, of the 17th December, has a leader under this heading in the course of which it refers to the attempt of the Anglo-Indians to obstruct the efforts of the leaders here to introduce reforms on account of the fear they have that, if the Congress League scheme of reforms is adopted, they would not be able to live at the cost of India as they are doing now, treating her people as slaves, and appeals to the Indians not to trust these Anglo-Indians and the fools who follow them, but abide by the principles of the Congress and the Muslim League, as these, if given effect to, will reduce the influence of the Anglo-Indians and improve the condition of the poor people here.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

The Anglo-Indians.

The Calcutta correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th December, says:--From the addresses presented to Mr. Montagu by the Anglo-Indians, it appears that they do not approve of even the scheme of Mr. Curtis, which does not satisfy the Indians, and that the very idea of reforms is a bugbear to them. A European friend writes to the Statesman that however necessary it may be to satisfy the people, no scheme of reform will be accepted by the Government in England if all the Europeans are against it. Many Anglo-Indians are under this delusion. They think that the Europeans should enjoy certain special privileges simply because they belong to the ruling classes. On this foundation, they build many strange edifices. As stated by Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao, Mr. Montagu would have done well to remove that false impression of the Anglo-Indians before considering the reform schemes. There could have been no room for their present mad contentions if they had been told that the time had come for them to give up the old idea that their white colour secured them special privileges. But even now it is not too late. We hope that the Anglo-Indians, who attempt to brush aside a surging ocean with a broomstick, will give up their false notions.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

The landholders of Bengal.

28. The Desabhaktan, of the 17th December, refers to the scheme of reforms submitted to Mr. Montagu by the landholders of Bengal, which shoots even higher than the Congress League scheme, and is surprised at the timidity of some of the Madras landholders who cry out that the Congress League scheme is too much for India and that India is not yet fit to have the reforms embodied therein.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

The Indian Industries Commission.

29. Adverting to the evidence of Mr. Harikisben Lal before this commission regarding the alleged antipathy of the Anglo-Indians towards Indian banks, the Desabhaktan, of the 17th December, observes:—Every one is aware of the information published in the papers some days back that the manager of a branch of a Bank in Madras was taking commissions freely from those who took loans from the Bank. It is indeed highly regrettable that some Anglo-Indians behave very meanly, though belonging to a community which is noted for its impartiality, in making money. It really shows the stupidity of these merchants, who seem to regard India as a fit ground for their exploitation, that they have not realised the existence of bold men also therein.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 12th Dec. 1917.

Industrial Commission.

The Desamata, of the 12th December, writes with reference to the enquiry of the Industrial Commission:—There being no industrial education in this country nor encouragement to those who have a desire to carry on industrial progress, a belief has gained ground that the Government are indifferent to this matter. The evidence of Mr. K. A. Peerbhoi before the Industrial Commission confirms this belief. Mr. Peerbhoi not only openly made a general statement that the Government of India had, out of race bias, done him great injustice, but also furnished particulars as to when and how the injustice was done, so that the President Sir T. Holland felt himself in an embarrassment. The Government of India may repudiate the allegations, but Mr. Peerbhoi said that he was prepared to prove every detail. If what he states is proved to be true, there can be nothing that will reflect greater discredit upon the Government of this country.

The people cannot help believing in the truth of Mr. Peerbhoi's allegations, unless and until the Government of India proves them to be false. So long as such belief lasts in the minds of the people they cannot but hold that the action of the Government is unjust, and that such acts of injustice cannot be avoided until the system of Government is changed. . . Whatever he stated was to the effect that the authorities in this country gave big contracts to European companies to the disappointment and discouragement of indigenous companies. . . Sir T. Holland was afraid that his evidence may betray the secrets of the rulers and thereby lower their prestige in the eyes of the subjects, and offered to conduct the enquiry in camera, since the officers accused had no chance of a reply, but Mr. Peerbhoi would not agree to the proposal saying that the enquiry was the public one and that he was prepared to prove his allegations. Sir T. Holland then strove hard to save the situation by producing statements showing a list of Indian companies to which contracts had been given. But questioned by Mr. Peerbhoi as to the amounts of the said contracts, Sir T. Holland said that he had no information about that. What was Mr. Peerbhoi's reply? It was, "Therein lies the whole secret". Sir T. Holland tried to shut out the press from this information, but Mr. Peerbhoi said that he would see it all published. . . It is to save such heart-burnings that we desire swaraj; and it is to keep their special advantages out of stake, that the European traders work against our aspirations.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 14th Dec. 1917.

The Industries Commission.

Referring to the evidence of Mr. Peerbhoi before the Industries Commission in Bombay, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 14th December, remarks:—The President of the committee, seeing that the honour of big Government officials was at stake, suggested that the examination of Mr. Peerbhoi should be done in camera. Mr. Peerbhoi did not consent to this. Further, the reporter of the Bombay Chronicle published these facts in the paper. This did not lead to anything extraordinary, but brought to light the partiality of the authorities to their own class as well as the attitude of the President. A Commission is appointed, it will be admitted, in order to make a searching enquiry into a matter and to arrive at the truth in regard to the prevailing state of things. If such a Commission should seek to conceal the delinquencies of the officials, like the fence in the fable grazing the crops no one who has any brains will fail to wonder why these Commissions are appointed at all.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 18th Dec. 1917.

A non-Brahman meeting at Tuticorin.

30. The Swadesamitran, of the 18th December, publishes, in Tamil, from the pen of its own correspondent, the substance of the lectures said to have been delivered by Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu at meetings held at Tuticorin on the 11th, 13th and 14th idem under the auspices of the local branch of the Madras Presidency Association, in which the following observations occur:—English historians have omitted some important points in their work. The Englishmen, who came here first for purposes of trade, gradually acquired territories. They followed the principle of "Divide and rule" for gaining the latter object. They annexed Native States on the ground that there were no proper heirs to them. . . It is non-entities who never interfered in public affairs till now, people who have the empty title of zamindars with no zamins and Rajas with no kingdoms and landholders who are unable to redeem their property under mortgage that now oppose the scheme prepared by the Congress which has been in existence for the last thirty years.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 18th Dec. 1917.

Popular leaders in Madras.

31. The Desabhaktan, of the 18th December, expresses its regret at the Madras Mahajana Sabha and the Madras Congress Committee having ignored the resolution passed by them that they would not present their address to Mr. Montagu as the Government had not allowed the Madras Presidency Association to wait in deputation as an independent body and as other bodies such as the South Indian Hides and Skins Merchants' Association have also been prevented from seeing Mr. Montagu, and having waited upon the Secretary of State, and observes:—Constitutional agitation aims only at bringing the rulers and the ruled together and those who are afraid to join such an agitation are traitors to the country. They are clearly even traitors to the king, as the object of constitutional agitation is only to acquaint the Government with the popular opinion. What have our Madras leaders gained by seeing Mr. Montagu in the face of an unanimous resolution passed by them advocating passive resistance and by ignoring altogether the insult offered to other associations. If there had been some more protest meetings like the one held in the Gokhale Hall, the Madras Government would have allowed all associations to see Mr. Montagu. The duty of acquainting the Government with the true condition of the people rests with the leaders and they are to blame if they fail to do so.

The Chingleput District Special Conference.

32. The Swadesamitran, of the 18th December, publishes in Tamil an abstract of the proceedings of the Chingleput District Special Conference which met at Chingleput on the 16th idem. The Dravidan of the same date reproduces in Tamil only that portion of the proceedings which refers to the interruption by Mr. Scott Browne, the Sub-Collector. These proceedings appear in New India of the 17th idem.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 19th Dec. 1917.

The Chingleput Special Conference.

The Desabhaktan, of the 19th December, reproduces in Tamil the comments of New India of the 18th idem about the alleged conduct of Mr. Scott Brown, the Divisional officer of Chingleput, in interrupting this conference

Commenting on this incident, the paper itself writes:—The heroic spirit displayed by Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar, the president of the conference, when the Sub-Collector transgressing the law attempted to disturb the conference, is commendable, as the Sub-Collector would have gained his object had any one else been the president. Mr. Ayyar has established by deed that he is a true son of mother Bharata; and we should have men like him everywhere for they alone are fit to lead the people in future.

The same paper publishes in Tamil the substance of the speech delivered by the Chairman of the Reception Committee at this Conference, extracts from which appear in New India of the 18th December 1917.

Rejected addresses.

33. The Swadesamitran, of the 18th December, reproduces in Tamil the protest of Professor K. Ramamurti against the action of the Madras Government in disallowing the deputation of the Andhra Conference and the Madras Presidency Association, as it appears in New India of the same date.

DRAVIDABHIMANI, Salem, 14th Dec. 1917.

The Salem District Non-Brahman Conference.

34. The Dravidabhimani, of the 14th December, reproduces in Tamil the presidential speech of Mr. K. S. Durai Raja of Pudukkōttai at this Conference.

A correspondent contributes a long article to the Dravidan, of the 17th December, refuting the comments of the Swadesamitran, of the 8th idem on the speech of Mr. K. S. Durai Raja abstracted in paragraph 68 of Report No. 50 of 1917, in the course of which he makes the following observations :—No intelligent man will deny that there is a great difference between the Congress in the time of the late Mr. Gokhale and that held last year, under the guidance of Mrs. Besant, whose views have been changing ever and anon to suit the times. That is why Mr. Durai Raja said that the views embodied in the memorandum of the nineteen were not accepted by the late Mr. Gokhale and others. As for the remark that what the Home Rulers demand is only reforms which form the basis for Home Rule, it was stated by the Hon'ble Mr. V. S. Srinivasa Sastri at a meeting, as reported in the Swadesamitran, of the 20th November 1917, that gradual Home Rule was not wanted and Mr. L. A. Govindaraghava Ayyar, who presided at the meeting, observed that the people should not be satisfied with the grant of a few reforms and that complete liberty should be demanded. When Mrs. Besant and the two gentlemen noted above want complete Home Rule and the Swadesamitran says that it is only the basic reforms leading to Home Rule that are sought, how can Mr. Durai Raja make out the correct view of the Home Rulers? There is no use in comparing Australia, Newzealand and other countries with India in determining the fitness of the people to exercise the right of voting. The editor of the Swadesamitran cannot be unaware of the fact that there are not as many divisions of caste and creed in the colonies as exist in India and that there are not in the colonies, which are advanced in culture and worldly experience, people of the type of the Indians, who signed Mr. Gandhi's petition in lakhs, without knowing what it contained and to curry favour with others. As for the view of the Swadesamitran that the Brahmans do not prevent the non-Brahmans from getting appointments, they cannot do so under the British Rule. But what they do is to take only Brahmans wherever they happen to be in power, and thus keep out the non-Brahmans. The remark of the Swadesamitran that, if the popular representatives get the control of the purse, education can be spread, is funny indeed! First of all, there arises a doubt as to who should be regarded as popular representatives. It is only those of the type of Mrs. Besant, the mother of the Brahman world, Dr. Sir S. Subrahmanya Ayyar and Mr. C. P. Ramaswami Ayyar. If these get the control of the purse, nothing need be said of the kind of educational progress the non-Brahmans will have. Instead of moving forward, they will begin to move backward.

Dravidan, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

35. A correspondent to the Lokopakari, of the 17th December, takes exception to the views expressed by the Dravidan, of the 1st idem under this heading, which are abstracted in paragraph 73 of Report No. 49 of 1917, and observes:—Though the deterioration of our industries is due partly to the use of steam engines for industrial purposes by other countries, it is not the sole cause for it. If our Government had realised the impediments to our industries from the beginning and were inclined to support them in several ways, they would not have deteriorated. They could have prevented foreign articles from competing with ours by levying proper import and export duties. They could have given an impetus to our cottage industries by rendering pecuniary aid and they could have given an industrial training to our people. If all these had been done by our benign Government, our industries and trade would have flourished. It is the English merchants who, with an eye upon self-interest, applied the principle of free trade and prevented our industries from thriving. William Digby has clearly proved in his book styled "Progressive British Rule—a revelation" how the ship-builders in England ruined our ship-building industry. The Dravidan bewails the lot of those who, without attending to the industrial condition of this country, interfere in politics But the very reason why Indians have taken to politics is their feeling that they cannot improve in trade without the help of the Government and that this help cannot be secured unless there are Indians in the executive. If we become capable in political matters and send our representatives to the British Parliament, they will point out our grievances in that assembly from time to time and get them redressed. They will also introduce bills there to protect our industries. It is to secure these results that the Indians demand

Lokopakari, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

Japan and her teachings to India.

Home Rule. The Dravidan says that India has for centuries been a ground of spoliation for many countries. But why has this been so! Is it not because of the want of union and confidence among us? If all of us unite and, electing our representatives to conduct the administration, improve our condition, cannot the necessary steps be taken to prevent the spoliation complained of by the Dravidan? This paper is quite right in saying that this is the best opportunity to develop our industries. But if, taking advantage of the present opportunity, large amounts are invested in starting new industries, are our Government ready to come to our rescue when, after the war, Germany and Austria may revive their industrial activity and begin to compete with us? Are they prepared to levy the necessary protective duties? We do not remember to have heard that the Government are prepared to do so. The paper complains that Japan is stuffing our market with half-finished goods. But Japan is not India. The former is ruled by her own people, which is not the case with India. Then again the Japanese Government render the necessary assistance to their subjects in the matter of trade. But there are no mercantile facilities in India. It is to acquire such facilities that the Indians have taken to politics.

SARVA VYAPI, Pondicherry, 19th Dec. 1917.

36. A correspondent of the Sarva Vyapi, of the 19th December, characterises the demand of the Indians for Home Rule now, when the British are engrossed in carrying on a gigantic war, as an unsympathetic one and says:—If the inhabitants of French India and those of British India are both given the same kind of privileges, where is then the difference between a republic and a monarchy? The British Government, though a monarchy, have granted numerous privileges to their subjects, which are not enjoyed under any other Government, and they are ready to grant them further privileges, in course of time. That the Indians should, instead of waiting patiently, trouble the Government for reforms and privileges, almost as a reward for their having sent some troops to the front, savours of nothing but ingratitude. There is no denying the fact that, if Home Rule is granted to India now, the administration will become centred in the hands of the Brahmans, which means that the lot of the other classes would become pitiable. So Home Rule should not be granted to the Indians, until they get rid of their internal differences. The one fact that they have elected Mrs. Besant, a foreign lady, as the President of their national assembly this year, is sufficient to prove that they cannot manage their affairs independently.

For the last four years, Mrs. Besant and Mr. N. Subba Rao have striven hard, and brought about a reconciliation, which placed the National Congress, and with it the political life of India, entirely in the hands of the extremists who have thrown the country into convulsions. Mrs. Besant's presidentship of the coming Congress has given the finishing stroke. . . The moderates now repent their co-operation in the matter of having the Congress League memorial signed by a multitude of persons, and are now, under the lead of Mr. P. C. Roi, making efforts to hold a moderates' Congress this year. We request that His Excellency the Viceroy will acquaint the Secretary of State with all these details.

44. It is to be regretted that the leaders do not try to grapple with the formidable questions that have arisen out of internments. You may be aware that all those imprisoned in the Alipore Jail under Regulation III of 1818, refused to take food. When a similar thing was done in England in connection with the question of woman's suffrage, the whole country was in a state of commotion. The Government had to take much interest in allaying the indignation of the people. But here, alas! the conditions are different. The Associated Press has stated that the abovementioned action of the interned is due to their indignation at the orders of internment. But the papers say that that is not the only reason, but that the interned are subjected to solitary confinement and to other unbearable cruelties. It is a pity that instead of enquiring into these important matters, the Government have sent these unfortunate people to distant lands, making it impossible for their parents also to try to reconcile them to their lot. It is true that the Government have now constituted a committee to enquire into the internments, but I can firmly assert that no great good will come out of it. Nobody would suppose that the Government officers are doing injustice intentionally. But the complaint of the people is that they rely on the reports of the Criminal Investigation Department. Even if these reports are shown to another enquiry committee, the result will not be different. If witnesses on behalf of the interned are not examined, such committees will only serve to wipe off the tears of parents who are immersed in unbearable grief. They can never serve to do justice to the interned.

The question of internments.

45. The Andhrapatrika, of the 15th December, says in its leader:—The Andhra country which has been anxiously awaiting the visit of Mr. Montagu is now disappointed, for the opportunity to place the Andhra problem before Mr. Montagu was lost. Freedom of speech has been restricted. If at this juncture when the ideal of self-government is presented before the Secretary of State, we fail to acquaint him with the Andhra problem, we cannot make out a strong

He prays that the present law governing the appointment of village servants may be so amended as to revive the rights which they lost under the system of the clubbing of the villages.

Vilifying the Indians.

49. The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th December, refers to the statement of the Madras Mail that it knows at whose instance the nineteen members of the Legislative Council have drafted their reform scheme, and to its remark that it does not tend to the efficiency of administration that the Government officers in whom the Government repose confidence should violate it and attempt to establish Home Rule. The paper says:—It is easy to guess on whom the Mail is vomiting its ire. It is suspecting the Hon'ble Sir Sankaran Nayar. If the Mail is really loyal to the Government there can be nothing more disloyal than to fail to disclose the breach of confidence it knows of. Why should the Mail be so very merciful to those who are guilty? Is not the editor of the Mail responsible for the safety of the Government? The truth is that the Mail has begun to vilify the Indians by any means. Will no Press Act apply to the Mail for vilifying responsible Indians?

Mr. Montagu's visit.

52. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 18th December, from Vizagapatam complains that certain respectable men were invited in the name of the Collector by means of tickets to be present at the Waltair Railway station, when Mr. Montagu arrived there, but that on their going to the station, they were asked to quit it. The failure on the part of the authorities to feel that the invited gentlemen will be disappointed is very strange.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 14th Dec. 1917.

Mr. Montagu's visit.

The Swadeshabhimani, of the 14th December, writes:—Mr. Curtis is among the persons who were allowed to have an interview with Mr. Montagu. We have already acquainted our readers with his movement and his confidential circular urging that in the reconstruction of the empire after the war the colonies should have control of Indian affairs. Such a personage went to see Mr. Montagu. What has he to do with Indian politics? He does not belong to India; he does not belong to England; nor is he among the Anglo-Indian traders and others who have settled in this country, and yet, he interferes in Indian politics and raises meaningless discussions. Who is to question him? . . . It is already known to our readers that Mr. Montagu does not say anything while receiving deputations. No doubt, he says a word or two at the private interviews by the Indian representatives. But, even here, we learn that he makes very hurtful comments on the Congress Muslim Joint Scheme of reforms, like a lawyer worrying the defendant with needless cross-questions. Nobody can publish anything that took place in a private interview; but, on the whole, the experience of the Indian repreesntatives is as we have stated above. How very singular!

Mr. Montagu's visit.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 18th Dec. 1917.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 18th December, writes:—Of all the administrators in this world, the British are best able to identify the interests of the people with their own. There are many Anglo-Indians, however, who have tasted of autocratic power and are now opposed to British traditions. They have great unity among them which makes even the Government tremble. Even His Majesty the King, the Cabinet, the Parliament and the British public have not the requisite strength to put an end to their autocratic behaviour. Their methods alone will convince Mr. Montagu of the nature of their intentions. It is easy to know of the magnitude of Anglo-Indian influence. Mr. Montagu is not free. He has not the power to hear those Indians who wish to represent their grievances. He may hear only those whom the authorities would permit. It is natural that they would allow only those who follow their wishes to approach Mr. Montagu. Those who would honestly and fearlessly point out the shortcomings of the administration find it difficult to get the permission. It is difficult to acquaint the British Government, through the Secretary of State, the true nature of the political situation in this country at the present critical juncture. Whatever the people can represent with the permission of the Anglo-Indian authorities, let them represent. As regards what they cannot by this means, let them seek other methods. The first of these is to expose the shortcomings of the administration in the Indian press; to publish them in the India which is conducted by the National Congress Committee in England; to send some of the most capable and patriotic among our countrymen to England and to try to acquaint the British public with those shortcomings. There is yet another duty greater than all these, namely, to sink all caste and religious differences. If we listen to the advice of our enemies without pausing to think of the consequences, we might have to face all those calamities which have befallen Russia. We can never escape them. It is, therefore, imperative that we should give up all mutual animosities arising from caste, race or religion.

The Secretariat.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

53. The Andhraprakasika, of the 13th December, says that in the Secretariat, there are 320 Brahmans and 98 non-Brahmans and invites the attention of its readers to the great disparity that there is between the number of Brahmans and that of non-Brahmans in that office.

The Special Kistna District Conference.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 13th Dec. 1917.

54. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 13th December, reports Mr. Bhimasankaram to have stated at the Special Kistna District Conference held at Ellore, that the Government that does not release Mr. Shaukat Ali and his brother, is an unjust Government.

Self-government.

RAVI, Cocanada, 13th Dec. 1917.

55. The Ravi, of the 13th December, says:—Self-government for India within the Empire is really natural and proper. We are glad that the Government have expressed the idea clearly. But any sudden changes in the administration should be viewed with suspicion. When a country is not fit for great political freedom, it is dangerous to grant it prematurely.

The duty of the Congress.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 19th Dec. 1917.

56. The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th December, says:—The Congress reforms do not fully express the aim of the people, which is the establishment of responsible self-government.

The Congress drafted its scheme on the basis of the memorandum of the people's representatives. Some compromise was found necessary in order to satisfy the members of the Moslem League who had not been very enthusiastic about self-government. It is, therefore, just on the part of the Bengalees to think that the Congress scheme requires to be changed. . . In the Congress scheme there is no provision to remove the Executive Council when it acts against the wishes of the representatives of the people. There is some provision in the scheme of Mr. Curtis, but the representatives of the people have not been given full authority. Small political concessions pave the way for anarchy. It is impossible that a responsible Government and an irresponsible Government can jointly work the administrative machinery. The Bengal Landholders' Association demanded complete self-government for provinces and made provision in its scheme for the removal of the Executive Government. The scheme of the non-Brahman opponents strengthens the arbitrary nature of provincial Governments instead of strengthening the authority of the people. . . We fear that these various schemes may confuse Mr. Montagu. There will surely be a great discussion about this in the Parliament. . . Though the Congress scheme may be adopted in the matter of the Imperial Government, the time has come for the Indians to demand that all the members of the Provincial Councils should be elected and that the Provinces should be given complete self-government. The wishes of the people are fast undergoing change. The leaders in the country should therefore discuss this matter carefully in the coming Congress and draft a complete scheme.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 19th Dec. 1917.

The Mail and India's future.

57. The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th December, says:—The Mail has given a prophecy of the future. It has given a hint that there is no hope for the ideals of the Indians being fulfilled. . . To speak the truth, the Mail and its followers appear inwardly to favour highhandedness such as that of the Prussians. . . India alone, when it is made strong, can help to make the Empire stable. The treacherous conduct of the Russians necessitates an urgent solution of the Indian problem. Under such circumstances, responsible English statesmen cannot listen to the words of the Mail, and refrain from giving self-government to India. So the prophecy of the Mail will never come to pass.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 15th Dec. 1917.

An appeal to the Secretary of State.

58. The Kistnapatrika, of the 15th December, has, as its leader, an eloquent appeal to the Secretary of State to the following effect:—Welcome, a hearty welcome to you, the best of ministers! Three hundred millions of people offer you welcome. You are blessed. Which Emperor has had such fortune, and which ambassador? The salvation of this ancient continent of India is entrusted to your hands. . . How can we describe the fortune of you who have come to save India, a land with such excellent traditions, from her unbearable obscurity? . . The sacredness of this mission may invest any man with divinity, and of all men, you are, by nature, an incarnation of freedom. You have received your training at the feet of lovers of freedom such, as Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Asquith. You have won your laurels in the political field, as a co-worker with the most intellectual Lord Morley. Yours is a race that has had great eminence in Asia. No race in the world has suffered so many hardships as yours, persecuted and exiled from hearth and home. . . The term "Jew" is a badge of suffering in this world. . . Who else is more susceptible of the emotion of sympathy than you who have been born of that race? You know what it is to be dependent. You have realised what it is to suffer under the tyranny. Our Emperor, and his Prime Minister have chosen you, an Asiatic and Jew, as a person capable of sympathising with the Indians who are strangers in their own country. You are yet in the prime of life. Old age that damps enthusiasm has not touched you. An unflinching determination, an unquenchable soul flame, a confidence that knows no discomfiture, a tact that does not yield to opposition, and a breadth of heart that keeps clear of selfishness, eminently fit you for this work; and the present juncture is favourable to you. The whole world is now subjected to the white heat of freedom. . . There is no moment more auspicious to lay the foundation stone of the temple of freedom in India, the crest jewel of the British Empire. Mark, O great soul, that your mission is God ordained! . . . We know you are no Emperor. It is true you are not all-powerful. You are but an individual person. Numberless counter-blasts are blowing to frustrate your endeavours. Serried ranks of servants of the State surround you as a rampart. How can your vision penetrate that? Can you, from your confinement in the State palaces, command a view of India? For what purpose have you come all the way from a foreign continent? Is India in palaces and in cities? Have you observed one village in your journey, or visited the hut of a ryot?

No railway train carries you to such a hut and no motor-cars. One has to reach them, trudging under the sun, wading through mire, and inhaling foul odours. . . Broken pots, torn mats and tattered rags are their possessions. . . Their meal consists of a few crumbs of rice in conjee with a little salt and red pepper and that, insufficient for appeasing the hunger of the children that gather around it. The mother deplores her inability to supply the children their fill. Is anywhere else on the face of the earth such destitution met with? And do they heave a sigh for all this? They never complain of their woes. Papers do not speak of them; conferences do not think of them; and Government do not publish them. They live in quite a different kingdom, and the merciful God alone takes care of them in their distress. . . For whose comfort are these railways and high roads? . . . Have they even conjee for their three meals every day? Is it not for these helpless creatures that the noble hearted Gokhale raised his voice? Can you recollect the insults which Gokhale had to face in the Imperial Council Chamber? Are not the Indians entitled to have the light of a single school for ten villages? Did not the miseries, to which the high souled Gandhi was subjected in his endeavours for the deliverance of the destitute black worms crushed during their stay as emigrants in foreign countries, pierce your heart? Has the righteous life of the revered Tilak, who became a victim for freedom of speech, made any impression on your heart? You have visited India. What is it that you have seen or heard? We do not know it for you have sealed your lips. We have no access to you, if we wish to speak to you, nor have we had even the fortune of our representation reaching you. It is something like God granting the boon but the temple priest withholding it. We cannot understand what feelings and sympathies move your heart and what thoughts rise in your mind; nor what message you carry to His Imperial Majesty. Remember what sublime eloquence flowed from the lips of liberal-hearted persons like Burke and Sheridan about Indian's woes in the Parliament which is the temple of freedom. Do not forget that Burke's voice found its echo from your lips while you spoke in the Parliament about the Mesopotamian question before you assumed the office of a minister. A more divine voice must now come out of your lips. Human voice cannot describe the grievances of India. . . All the people are anxious about how you manage their affairs. . . Tell His Imperial Majesty that India can no longer be in obscurity. Tell His Majesty that in this bountiful India there are over a hundred millions that go without a single full meal a day. Tell His Majesty that manufactures have been dwindling away and people are languishing in destitution, and that after a century and a half of British rule, you could not make two in a hundred of them literate. Impress upon His Majesty that you have been considering it an offence, that we should candidly represent our grievances. Tell His Majesty that our leaders are being dishonoured in our Legislative Councils. Tell him that even in such adverse circumstances, India gives birth to statesmen like Gokhale, master-poets like Sir Rabindronath, saints like Mr. Gandhi, scientists like Jagadis Chandra, and philosophers like Arabindo. Proclaim that India, the mother of such illustrious offspring, does not deserve dependence. Tell His Majesty that it behoves England who has drawn her sword for the deliverance of Belgium, to grant freedom to India with an ancient history of her own. . . Tell His Majesty that India wishes to impose her own taxes, and to appoint her own officers both civil and military. Tell him that it is disgraceful that three hundred millions of his subjects should be deprived of the privilege of wearing arms. We cannot forsake our mother tongue for the sake of a foreign language. Tell His Majesty that it is but just that Indians should live in their country, even as other nations do in theirs. You need not be anxious about the results which are not in your hands, nor even in His Majesty's. They are in the hands of Him who is the ruler of all rulers. Do your duty with an impartial heart, and if you set about the work of reform, with India's future welfare at heart, you will soon fulfil the purpose for which you have been sent by His Majesty.

59. The Kistnapatrika, of the 15th December, says with reference to the meeting at Nidadavole under the presidentship of the Collector:—The question of the closing of the big channels has been discussed in the meeting. Yet the Gostanadi channel had been ordered to be closed even before the meeting was held. The authorities settle everything beforehand, and meetings like this appear to be so many ways of wiping the tears off the eyes of the ryots. They want by these meetings to appear to issue orders after they consult the opinion of the people. Neither the ryots nor the Government are benefited by these meetings. The closing of the Gostanadi channel is an instance in point. After this was announced, why should the question be moved in the meeting? Why should the authorities consult public opinion? What is the use of the ryots telling that large canals should not be closed for three months? Never has the Gostanadi channel been closed for more than a month, since the construction of the anicut. So garden crops have been raised in many villages under this channel. It is to be seen what may become of them.

The Brahmans and the non-Brahmans.

62. The Andhraprakasika, of the 14th December, says:—The population of our presidency is four crores and fifteen lakhs. Of this, the non-Brahmans number four crores and the Brahmans, fifteen lakhs. It is the non-Brahmans that cultivate crops and supply food to the people. . . The Brahmans exercise authority over them, and are determined to keep them in slavery. . . The people hope that the Government will not any more look with indifference on the machinations of the Brahmans, who are solicitous to keep down the intelligent non-Brahmans. We pray that the Government will not bring disaster to the non-Brahmans by giving the Brahmans complete authority.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 15th Dec. 1917.

The Brahmans and non-Brahmans.

In an article giving a summary of the President's speech at a conference of non-Brahmans at Tinnevelly, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 15th December, writes:—The president Mr. Joseph is a European and has been very earnest and straightforward in his speech. In his scheme of communal representation, out of 60 electorates he proposes 6 for Brahmans. Although there may be 60 electorates and a hundred representatives to be elected by them, the electors will vote only for those whom they think capable of representing them. Even the 6 out of the 60 electorates for Brahmans are too many considering their number. This concession, therefore, seems to us too liberal. If we consider the strength of the Brahmans in relation to the total population, they might be entitled to 2 out of the 60. It would be well to come to a reasonable settlement of the respective rights of all communities and to promote mutual good-will.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 15th Dec. 1917.

Hospitals and dispensaries in India.

63. In an article complaining of the inadequacy of the existing arrangements for supplying medical aid to the people, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 15th December, says:—There are three circumstances which hamper progress in the matter of medical aid. There might be some indifference on the part of the people themselves. But as the people are fast advancing in education and copying modern modes of life, popular indifference cannot be taken as the sole factor impeding progress. A second cause might be the want of perfect equality in attending to the rich and the poor. The travelling dispensaries are very popular wherever they are established. The number of patients seeking surgical aid is also increasing. The poverty of the people is another chief reason why medical relief is not sought more largely. This is a difficulty which the Government alone can remove. Owing to the absence of proper facilities, only 13·5 per cent of the population attended hospitals during 1915. The Government have stated that they are unable to incur greater expenditure under this head. Since 1910 the Government have increased the expenditure by one to four lakhs which is very little. It cannot be said that this has contributed to wider relief, for the additional expenditure may have been merely due to the rise in the prices of medicine and other appliances. The Government ought to provide more funds for the increase of facilities for medical aid and also to the training of a larger number of men.

Communal representation.

64. In an article under this heading, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 22nd December, remarks:—Each community is sending its representatives to the Secretary of State and the Viceroy. Many of these represent the needs of the country; others are merely repeating what they are asked to say by the autocrats. There are many in the country who do not know the advantages of a democratic government. These are induced to say that an irresponsible system of government should be perpetuated and they repeat the words of their instigators. However skilfully this instigation may be done, the British Government will not attach any weight to such representation. It is a cardinal principle of the British Government that those who pay the taxes should have the right to see that this money is utilised in their own interests. Those who advise to the contrary are sure to fail in their attempts.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 22nd Dec. 1917.

The swadeshi movement.

65. In continuation of an article in a previous issue on the swadeshi movement, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 21st December, deplores the influx of foreign goods into the Indian market, and proceeds to observe:—India is becoming foreign even in her thoughts and sentiments. We are, however, ourselves to blame for blindly indulging in luxuries and flooding our houses and persons with articles of foreign manufacture. The root cause of this state of things is to be found in the type of education obtaining among us at present. It is no great matter after all that we were conquered by foreigners and put into a state of political dependence. The truly regrettable circumstance is the way in which our market has been captured. For political independence India could still afford to wait for many a year. But economic salvation, which comes through industrial and commercial advancement, India wants in the immediate present. It is not the uneducated, but those who have had some degree of modern education that gave room for foreign goods and thereby caused the loss of our economic independence. It is easy to understand this from a comparison of the list of articles used by the uneducated and the so-called educated among us. We have solid evidence to prove that prior to the introduction of the present-day education India wanted nothing that was foreign. This is what a Missionary, one Mr. Ward, wrote to the British Minister from Serampore in 1820, regarding the six crores of people who were under the East India Company: "At present the Hindus of the middle ranks, not to speak of the lower, want nothing which can be supplied from England; sixty millions of subjects requiring not one article from the governing country. Improve their faculties; they will then learn in how many ways they may increase their rational ejnoyments, their industry will hence be stimulated to procure them." Well said! Is it not wonderful that the expectations of this Missionary a hundred years ago have been so eminently fulfilled? The main point to be considered is that our wants and our love of luxury have gone to such extreme that our indigenous goods came to no longer in request and the market was seized by foreign manufacturers. This is the main impediment which hampers the progress of our swadeshi movement.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 21st Dec. 1917.

The riots in Ceylon.

66. Referring to the result of the enquiry into the cause of the disturbances in Ceylon in 1915, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 21st December, remarks:—The Commission has found out that the authorities themselves were to blame. Further, the Governor, Sir J. Anderson, was unable to disprove the accusations of the Commission against the authorities. Above all, it is his belief that the authorities were guilty of untold vagaries. But has the Governor done anything beyond verbal reproof to punish the subordinates guilty of such unpardonable delinquencies? Has he given any warning to the prime authors of the riot? There is besides not a word regarding the incapacity of the Inspector-General of Police! The Governor himself, even in matters in which he is convinced of the facts, is unable to take any adequate steps. This incident of Ceylon is enough to indicate the power of the bureaucracy. Not only in India, but everywhere, in the absence of an administration responsible to the people, a bureaucracy will be a bureaucracy.

KERLA PATRIKA, Calicut, 15th Dec. 1917.

The Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India.

67. Referring to the visit of the Secretary of State to India, the Kerala Patrika, of the 15th December, writes:—The chief point to be considered in Indian administration is whether Indians should be granted self-government or not. No sane man among the Indians will say that India does not need self-government. But there is difference of opinion as to the time when it should be granted and the manner in which it should be carried out. It is too much to ask for the grant of complete self-government at once and many would not favour such a proposal.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 14th Dec. 1917

Ship-building industry.

68. Referring to the proposal to establish a ship-building yard in India, the Manorama, of the 14th December, disapproves of the intention of Government to place that industry under the control of the Munitions Board. The opinion is expressed that, if this ship building business be handed over to big Indian firms, such as Tata & Co., and sufficient encouragement and help be granted for such enterprises, it will not only encourage Indians to develop that industry but would be conducive to the prosperity of the country.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 14th Dec. 1917.

Mr. Gandhi to be appointed as a member of the committee appointed to enquire into the anarchical movements in India.

69. Referring to the composition of the committee, appointed to enquire into the cause and cure of the anarchical movements in India, the Manorama, of the 14th December, expresses the opinion that, if one or two Indian representatives were on the committee, the people of India would have had greater satisfaction and peace of mind, and observes that since the Government holds Mr. Gandhi in high esteem is evident from the fact of his appointment as a member of the committee, appointed to enquire into the iniquities of the planters of Behar, it is to be hoped that Government would, at least now, appoint him as a member of this committee.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 15th Dec. 1917.

A memory of Jerusalem.

70. The Qaumi Report, of the 15th December, has a leader on the marginally-noted subject of which the following is an excerpt:—And that is, "verily God doth not cause any change in His great gift to a nation until that nation changes itself and verily God heareth and knoweth everything" (Kôrān, viii, 55).

This text is applicable to us just as it applies to other nations. He is not the God of Muslims only, but the Creator of Polytheists, infidels, atheists and apostates also.

The editor thinks that the loss was due to the reliance of Mussalmans on weapons of warfare and not on God and observes:—From the time of Huzrath "Umar" the second Khalifa (successor) of the Prophet, the conqueror of Jerusalem, up to yesterday the true sons of Al Fārūk (Umar) maintained their great ancestors' dignity in that city. But today it was sold by a few impious betrayers of the nation. God have mercy upon us! Although this war is a political war and there has been no regular fighting for the capture of Baghdad, Mesopotamia or Jerusalem, but political aims are so comprehensive that certain disagreeable things have happened. It is, however, sufficient for our peace of mind and assurance to remember that this is not a religious war and that the capture of Jerusalem is but an incident which cannot affect the ultimate aims and objects of the struggle. Time was when the mighty Fārūk (Umar) wrote terms of peace on the city gates, but now the fall of the city will not quench the thirst of Mars. None can say what will happen in the future, or how long the war will last. It is possible that there may be yet another battle, that the front may be transferred from the West to the East and peace be concluded in this part of the world. God knoweth what His plans are.

At the beginning of the war the British Government promised that it would respect and reverence the Holy places of Islam. Jerusalem is also its prayer point. How, then, can it tolerate it being subjected to indignity? There is no doubt that we are much aggrieved to find that the European political war has not left even religion alone, and that such complications have been created by political expediencies that both, those who promised and those to whom the promise was made, are pained and sorry. It was not their intention that any religion should sustain a blow, nor was it their desire that any political question should be interfered with.

71. The Qaumi Report, of the 16th December, has a letter from Mr. Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali's mother addressed to the Hon'ble Mr. Yakub Hasan Sahib Bahadur, Madras, which runs as follows :—

Qaumi Report, Madras, 16th Dec. 1917.

A letter from the mother of Shaukat Ali.

"God is Great".

Dear Uncle, greeting !

Your telegram addressed to my grandmother has been received and an answer thereto has just been sent. I am now instructed by her to give you a reply in full. She says, "If I were to go to Madras, whether you wrote to me or not, I would stay with you for your relations with Shaukat and Muhammad have been such that I could never stay elsewhere. But according to the message no information has yet been received by me as to my election as a member of any deputation, a fact which might easily be gleaned from the newspapers. Even if I were actually elected I could not take part in a deputation. My age and health do not permit me to undertake such a long journey in the absence of any urgent business. Besides it is probable I shall have to undertake another long journey this month, and therefore my coming to Madras seems to be out of the question. Moreover, I do not know what necessity there is for such a deputation. Some of the demands which the women of India intend to make are such as should be made by men alone. Yes ! if they had not had the moral courage to present these demands, then it would have been our duty to wait upon the Secretary of State for India, present them ourselves, and teach our men a lesson in self-respect. But by the grace of God our men have not yet exhibited weakness necessitating us to teach them any such lesson. With regard to other demands that relate to the special rights of women, is it proper that we should object to placing them before our men and then approach others with them ? Such an act is a slight both to men and women. There is further a special reason for my not taking part in this business, and that is when the Secretary of State for India and the Viceroy, in spite of the fact of their being men, observe, at the suggestion of the Government of India, purdah with my sons, it behoves me to observe purdah still more strictly with them being a woman ! I have nothing to demand from them for myself or for my children. God's door is already open to me, at least five or seven times every day and every night do I bow my head at His threshold and stretch forth my hands in supplication to Him. I can obtain whatever I need from Him alone, and when He thinks one should receive, one receives.'

72. The Qaumi Report, of the 17th December, writes :—Deputations are waiting on Mr. Montagu and His Excellency the Viceroy, and are giving expression to their demands. We call to mind the old Islamic days when deputations of infidels were successively waiting on the Prophet who gave them a patient hearing. Instances may be found in Islamic history, which may well teach Muhammadans a lesson, touch their amour-propre and show them how they have viewed themselves.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 17th Dec. 1917.

The Muhammadan deputation.

The editor, referring to a very interesting Islamic deputation, contrasts it with that of today, and says that in the former requests were made to the Prophet for permission to retain their idol for a period of three years, and to exempt them from offering prayers. Both these requests were refused. The present deputation, however, does not contain any such demands, nor does it claim the restoration of the administration of India to the former rulers, viz., the Muhammadans, nor does it demand exemption from taxation on the grounds of their being the former rulers. The amusing part of it is that Home Rule League address has been presented with much parade and show, the gist of which may be expressed in the words of a wag :—"Now, sir, be kind enough to relieve us of your protecting shadow." Muhammadan address, however, which contained a reference to the affair of Muhammadan internees with a view to reconsideration, was declared to be irregular, inopportune and contrary to principle.

73. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 21st December, writes :—His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India arrived here on Friday last and, after a rest of two days, received from Monday up to yesterday, deputations from the various societies, which after stating their respective rights, demanded what they desired for the progress of their respective communities. Both His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State, who are already acquainted with the various races and religions of India, will, before taking into consideration the All-India Congress League scheme and Mrs. Besant's propaganda for the grant of Home Rule for India, understand that the demands, made by the Brahman committee, nominally on behalf of India, but really for their own benefit, will never prove beneficial to this country.

Jaridah-i-Rozgar, Madras, 21st Dec. 1917.

His Excellency the Viceroy, the Right Hon'ble the Secretary of State for India and various deputations.

Referring to the arrival of the above-mentioned distinguished visitors, our contemporary Justice speaks of the ends and aims of the clamour of the Brahman Home Rulers, and says if His Excellency the Viceroy and the Secretary of State will kindly glance at the Civil List here, they will find that Brahmans alone are governing the Madras Presidency. In another article on High Court Judges and Secretaries to Government, the paper says that both appointments are being held by Brahmans.

It is on this account that, since the appearance of the Home Rule malady in epidemic form, we (the Jaridah) have been and are still seriously opposing it in successive articles. The political, social and religious privileges that we enjoy under the present mode of administration are quite suitable for us

Mushir-i-Dakhan, Hyderabad, 22nd Dec. 1917.

74. The Mushir-i-Dakhan, of the 22nd December, writes:—When the price of an article goes up, the fact can be deplored unreservedly. Unfortunately everything, one sees, is expensive. Further the demon of dearness has not left even salt alone. Now that this demon has risen to his zenith, salt comes under the head of an expensive commodity.

The dearness of salt is contrary to Nature's law.

Salt is a thing that it is used by rich and poor. It is so useful that, from time to time, it is necessary to give it to cattle. Among the necessaries of life, salt ranks next to air and water. According to the law of Nature salt must be so abundant and its price so cheap, that no difficulty should be experienced by any living thing in obtaining it. The operation of the persons or reasons, that are the cause of this unnatural rise in the price of salt, should be suspended at an early date. In other words, strenuous endeavours should be made, as soon as possible, to ascertain, by official enquiry, the causes of the prevailing dearness, and steps should be taken to remove them.

III.—Legislation.

Manorama, Calicut, 21st Dec. 1917.

75. Commenting on the important provisions of Madras Children Bill a leader in the Manorama, of the 21st December, remarks:—The Madras Government should be congratulated on having undertaken legislation of this nature. The cases disposed of by the Criminal Courts last year will convince anybody that this measure is absolutely necessary. The Bill will be beneficial to youths and young persons destitute of guardians, who roam about in the towns and eventually turn out bad characters. It is, therefore, to be hoped that this Bill will soon be passed into law.

Remarks on the Madras Children Bill.
